THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND: DURING THE INTER-REGNUM.

A.D. 1688. NOTWITHSTANDING the received Maxims of the Law, the Subtleties and Refinements of its Profeſſors, and the Turns and Doubles of ſelf-intereſted Stateſmen, the Throne was now apparently vacant. The King was not dead; therefore had no Succeſſor: He had withdrawn his Perſon, without leaving any Deputy or Repreſentative; therefore all the Operations of the kingly Office ceas'd: And tho' his Majeſty had put in a ſort of Caveat againſt the ſupplying that Vacancy, the very Phraſe of being within Call, which he had made uſe of on that Occaſion, ſeem'd to acknowledge, that it was in the Breaſt of the People whether they would give him ſuch a Call or not. It is farther obſerv'd by Mr. Echard, that, tho' he aſſign'd Reaſons for his ſecond Departure, he aſſign'd none for his firſt: His throwing away the Great Seal imply'd a ſettled Deſign to unhinge the Government: And, whether his own Violences neceſſitated the Revolt of his Subjects; or their Revolt, together with his Apprehenſions of the Prince of Orange, neceſſitated his Departure; the Government was actually unhing'd: There was no ſupreme Authority any where; that aſſum'd by the Lords had no legal Foundation; the Prince of Orange had been invited to redreſs, but had no Pretence to govern: The public Peace was not to be left adrift upon the Tide of Power, till Time and Chance ſhould ſettle or deſtroy it; and there was no Proſpect, ſcarce a Poſſibility, of a Settlement, unleſs by the Choice of the People on one hand, or the Preſcription of the Prince on the other. The Commonwealth was indeed in the Caſe of a rich and tempting Lady, who, having brought a Bill of Divorce againſt an imperious Huſband, was again woo'd by the ſame Huſband, and alſo by the notable, ſtirring Advocate, by whoſe Aſſiſtance ſhe had obtain'd her Suit, and who believ'd he deſerv'd both her Perſon and all ſhe was worth, for his Pains. There was perhaps a Neceſſity to cloſe with one or the other; and, if the Compariſon holds, it may be preſum'd, that the new Comer had the beſt Chance to be the happy Man: For the very Itch of Novelty is no ſmall Provocative: The Fair-one is apt to think ſhe conſults her Intereſt, when ſhe gratifies her Inclination; and beſides that, unleſs ſhe is romantically generous, ſhe cannot be thoroughly grateful. A.D. 1688.

The King's Paper was ſoon made public, and almoſt as ſoon anſwer'd by Dr. Burnet, who, tho' he glides over this Circumſtance in his Hiſtory, was the Champion in ordinary of the Revolution, and ready to enter the Liſts againſt all Comers. This (a) Anſwer, ſuch as it is, is ſtill extant in the State Tracts, and has in the Front of it theſe ſignificant Words, Publiſhed by Authority. But the Writer himſelf, in the Introduction to it, intimates, that it is an Anſwer and no Anſwer; for, after premiſing, "That it might be confuted not only with Clearneſs, but with Severity too, if there was not a Reſtraint put upon the full Liberty of anſwering any thing that goeth under a Name, to which Reſpect would ſtill be paid, even by thoſe to whom it was deny'd;" he adds, "Therefore nothing will be ſaid to it by way The King's Paper anſwer'd by Dr. Burnet.

A. D. 1688. way of entire Anſwer;" and then reduces the King's whole Charge to theſe two Points; "1. The Prince's ſending his Guards at eleven o' Clock at Night, to take poſſeſſion of the Poſts at Whitehall, without advertizing him of it in the leaſt. 2. The ſending a kind of an Order by three Lords, to be gone out of his own Palace before Twelve that Morning." Now, for the ſake of Truth, which is above all Reſpects and Conſiderations, it is neceſſary to obſerve, That this Shew of Tenderneſs to the King is, in truth, a Tenderneſs to the Cauſe the Doctor has to handle; and that the King's Paper is thus epitomiz'd for the ſame Reaſon: That the Force of his Majeſty's Reaſons turn'd on the Meſſage he had ſent by, and the Inſtructions he had given to, Lord Feverſham; and the impriſoning that Lord, inſtead of ſending him back with a ſuitable Anſwer: That the Doctor paſſes over theſe Inſtructions, and that Impriſoning, and mentions the Invitation only: That he artfully makes the Lords which form'd the Prince's Council at Windſor anſwerable for all that follow'd, by ſaying, that his Highneſs left them to debate the whole Matter, &c: That he will not allow the King to urge, he had not the leaſt Advertiſement of the Prince's Purpoſe, ſince Zuyleſtein had inform'd him, It was his Highneſs's Deſire that he ſhould ſtay at Rocheſter: That as to the Hour when the Dutch Guards arriv'd, he aſſerts, it was computed they would have been there by Eight o' Clock; as alſo, That it ſo happen'd that they did not ALL arrive in Town till paſt Ten: That the Difficulty made of withdrawing the King's Guards render'd it ſo late before the Lords could deliver their Meſſage: And that, upon the Whole, he refers it to Conſideration, "Whether, ſince a thing of this kind was judg'd neceſſary to be done, it had not a better Grace, even in reſpect to the King himſelf, to do it upon ſhort Warning, rather than expoſe him more, by treating, and propoſing formally that which his Majeſty was in no Condition to deny; and concludes, That whoever would compare the Power of the Prince, with the Uſe he made of it, muſt be ſufficiently convinced of his Moderation."

Thus we are taught to believe, that his Highneſs had the Right of his Side, in all things; and that the King had Reaſon to be thankful, that he was not render'd yet more odious to the World, for having preſum'd to ſhew, that he had any Senſe or Feeling remaining: The Nation had long been habituated to think ill of him; and it now became the Faſhion to ſpeak ill of him; for the more univerſally he was condemn'd, the more effectually his Adverſaries were juſtify'd: Thus whatever had a Tendency to aſperſe him was greedily imbib'd; and every Extenuative, of every kind, was wilfully over-look'd: The Unfortunate have few Friends, and thoſe few have very rarely Courage enough to ſhew themſelves ſuch: While, on the contrary, thoſe who are wafted to their Wiſhes with an uninterrupted Gale of Proſperity find every Hand ſtretch'd out, on every Side, under the Pretence of offering Aſſiſtance, but in reality to ſhare in the Profits of the Voyage: A Conſideration which ought never to be forgot, when we read the Story of Princes depos'd, and that of their more happy Supplanters!

A. D. 1688.

It was Sunday the 23d when the King withdrew, and the next Day the Lords at Weſtminſter had notice of it; but came to no Reſolution that Day, except to put a Negative on a Motion made by ſome of his old Servants, for the reading his Paper of Reaſons, before inſerted; and this Negative, according to the Duke of Bucks, was the firſt Proof of their Intention to exclude their King, tho' many Diviſions aroſe among them afterwards, about the beſt Way of doing it: They, however, agreed the next Day (the 25th) in two things, which yet farther ſhew'd, that all Regard to his Majeſty was at an End; and that even their Regard to themſelves, as a Body, was exceeded by their Devotion to the Prince. The firſt, ſays the Nobleman laſt-quoted, was, that a Convention ſhould be ſummon'd, by circular Letters, in the Prince of Orange's Name, to all thoſe Places which had a Right of chuſing Members of Parliament: And the ſecond, That his Highneſs ſhould be deſir'd to manage all public Affairs, as well as public Monies, in the mean time (b): Which abundantly evinces that they had not done ſo before.

The Lords refuſe to read it.

They addreſs the Prince to call a Convention, and take upon him the Adminiſtration.

"Some, who had Eſtates in Ireland, (proceeds

(b) Their Lordſhips Addreſſes (which, it ought to be remember'd, were ſign'd by the whole Houſe) on theſe two Heads, were as follow:

"We the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, aſſembled in this Conjuncture, do deſire your Highneſs to take upon you the Adminiſtration of public Affairs both civil and military, and the Diſpoſal of the public Revenue, for the Preſervation of our Religion, Rights, Laws, Liberties and Properties, and of the Peace of the Nation; and that your Highneſs will take into your particular Care the preſent Condition of Ireland, and endeavour by the moſt ſpeedy and effectual Means to prevent the Dangers threatening that Kingdom: All which we make our Requeſt to your Highneſs to undertake and exerciſe, till the Meeting of the intended Convention, the 22d Day of January next; in which, we doubt not, ſuch proper Methods will be taken, as will conduce to the Eſtabliſhment of theſe things, upon ſuch ſure and legal Foundations, that they may not be in danger of being again ſubverted."

"We the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, aſſembled at Weſtminſter in this extraordinary Conjuncture, do humbly deſire your Highneſs to cauſe Letters to be written, ſubſcrib'd by yourſelf, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, being Proteſtants; and to the ſeveral Counties, Univerſities, Cities, Boroughs, and Cinque Ports, of England, Wales, and the Town of Berwick upon Tweed: The Letters for the Counties to be directed to the Coroners of the reſpective Counties, or any one of them; and in default of the Coroners, to the Clerk of the Peace of the reſpective Counties: And the Letters for the Univerſities, to be directed to every Vice-Chancellor: And the Letters to the ſeveral Cities, Boroughs and Cinque-Ports, to be directed to the chief Magiſtrate of each reſpective City, Borough and Cinque-Port; containing Directions for the chuſing, in all ſuch Counties, Cities, Univerſities, Boroughs and Cinque-Ports, within ten Days after the Receipt of the reſpective Letters, ſuch a Number of Perſons to repreſent them, as are of Right to be ſent to Parliament: Of which Elections, and the Times and Places thereof, the reſpective Officers ſhall give notice, within the ſpace of five Days in the leaſt. Notice of the intended Elections for the Counties to be publiſh'd in the Churches, immediately after the Time of Divine-Service, and in all the Market-towns within the ſaid reſpective Counties: And Notice of the intended Elections for the Cities, Univerſities, Boroughs and Cinque-ports, to be publiſh'd within the ſaid reſpective Places. The ſaid Letters, and the Execution thereof, to be return'd, by ſuch Officer and Officers who ſhall execute the ſame, to the Clerk of the Crown in the Court of Chancery; ſo as the Perſons ſo to be choſen may meet and ſit at Weſtminſter, on the 22d Day of January next."

A. D. 1688. ceeds his Grace of Bucks) desired the Care and Preservation of that important Kingdom might be particularly inserted in that Address; which was, something oddly, opposed by the new Court-Party (for their sure Expectation of a new King warrants me now to call them so); but yet the Reason and mere Necessity of the thing proposed forced them to comply with it at last.

It may be wonder'd at, and scarce believ'd hereafter, that a full House of Noblemen, (about Ninety) wherein were so many of the old Court and Council, should agree so readily to lay aside their King, and not so much as read the Letter that he left behind him, which might almost be reckon'd the last Words of a dying Sovereign: But that was the Cause of its being thought dangerous, and too moving to be read. It must also be consider'd, that, of late, both the King's Actions and the Prince of Orange's (even as if they had agreed it between them) tended to the possessing every body with a strong Opinion of the Protestant Religion being endanger'd by the one, and protected by the other: This made almost all the King's Ministers, as well as his Courtiers, expect more Favour, even under this new Prince, than they were like to find under a few Bigots of a Religion that endures no other. Therefore, since Zeal in some, and Interest in all, co-operated against the King, we need look for no farther Reasons of so sudden a Change. Besides all this, we may reasonably conclude, that some few Persons, meaning the Prince no good, might think it imprudent to stem a Tide to no other Purpose but their own Ruin; and therefore rather reserv'd that Interest (which, by their Compliance they obtained both with the Prince and People) to secure the public Good as much as possible, in a Season when almost every body seem'd to abandon it: For some of the old Whigs, who had so long despair'd of Court-favour, were now so transported with it, not only out of their old Principles, but even out of their very Senses also, that such a good Opportunity was lost, of resettling our old Constitution, as perhaps England is never like to have again: Which I do not observe with any regard to either of the Kings in competition; but I only mean, that (whichsoever Prince that Convention should set up) our Liberties might have been secured, and the Government fixed on the best and steadiest of Foundations, an united Interest of King and People! A. D. 1688.

This Address of the Lords investing the Prince with almost regal Power, tho' sufficiently welcome, yet was a little perplexing: For, as he could not but think it dangerous to dally with such an Offer; so, on the other hand, it was not very safe to accept it, without the Approbation of the Commons also.

The Difficulty lay in this; That he could not have that Approbation, neither formally nor plainly, without first assembling a Parliament; which yet itself alone was so great an Act of Sovereignty, that to call it, by the Lords Advice only, was in a manner accepting the regal Power from them.

He was better advis'd in this, than in most other things; for a good Expedient was resolv'd on: He reply'd, That he would consider of their Address; and in the mean time assembled at St. James's all those in Town who had been Members of King Charles's (c) two last Parliaments, together with the Lord-Mayor, Court of Aldermen, and fifty Representatives of the Common-council, whom he (d) directed to consider the extraordinary Necessity of coming presently to some good Resolution.

Accordingly they all went to Westminster next Day; where, in the usual House of Commons, (chusing Mr. Powle for their Speaker) they (e) imitated the Lords, in making exactly the same Address; and indeed both Houses might well concur in all, since influenced, I might have said enforced; by the same Causes; which last Expression I make use of, both on account of the Prince's Army here, commanded by a famous General, the Marshal de Schomberg; and also of a Murmur which went about, that the City-Apprentices were coming down to Westminster, in a violent Rage against all who voted against the Prince of Orange's Interest; and 'tis

(c) His Grace here falls into a small Mistake; for, tho' it is certain that the Prince overlook'd the Members of King James's Parliament entirely, and thereby betray'd a Partiality, which was not very becoming, nor perhaps very politic, at this Crisis, he did not limit his Invitation to the Members of the two last Parliaments of King Charles only, as appears by his own Words, which were as follow:

" Whereas the Necessity of Affairs does require speedy Advice; We do desire all such Persons as have serv'd as Knights, Citizens, or Burgesses, in any of the Parliaments that were held during the Reign of the late King Charles II. to meet us at St. James's, upon Wednesday the 26th of this Instant December, by ten of the Clock in the Morning. And we do likewise desire, That the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen of the City of London would be present at the same time; and that the Common-council would appoint fifty of their Number to be there likewise. And hereof we desire them not to fail."

(d) In a formal Speech, viz. " You, Gentlemen, that have been Members of the late Parliaments, I have desired you to meet me here, to advise the best Manner how to pursue the Ends of my Declaration in calling a free Parliament, for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the Restoring the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom, and settling the same, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted. And you the Aldermen and Members of the Common-council of the City of London, I desire the same of you. And in regard your Numbers are like to be great, you may, if you think fit, divide yourselves, and sit in several Places."

(e) The first Question they debated was, What Authority they had to assemble? Upon which it was soon agreed, That the Request of his Highness the Prince was a sufficient Warrant: The next was, The Disposal of the Administration: And Sir Robert Sawyer saying, when the Prince was nam'd, He could not conceive how it was possible for his Highness to take it upon him without a distinguishing Name or Title; Serjeant Maynard reply'd, That the Assembly would lose a great deal of Time, if they waited till Sir Robert could conceive how that was possible: Which was deem'd a sufficient Answer. A temporary Offer of the Government to his Highness being then hinted, one propos'd, that it should be, not for a Month only, but for a whole Year; to whom it was answer'd, that the Convention ought only to consider of that. Others mov'd, That the Association, that had been sign'd by the Lords, might likewise be subscrib'd by this Assembly; but it was carry'd, That the said Association should be left upon the Table, and every one be at liberty to sign it or not. And it was not till after these Debates, that they agreed upon their Address; which was not exactly the same with the Lords; for it began with a Paragraph of Thanks to the Prince for coming to the Rescue of these Kingdoms, which the Lords had given before.

A. D. 1688. 'tis certain, that ſome hot-headed Perſons were hardly reſtrained by the Prince of Orange himſelf, who liked their Zeal, but found no need of uſing ſuch a ſort of Means as might juſtly invalidate all that ſhould be then done in his Favour.

As ſoon as they had thus publicly addreſſed to the Prince, and every Man had privately adjuſted his own Conditions with him, both Houſes diſſolv'd themſelves, in order to go into their ſeveral Counties, to influence the approaching Elections of that Convention, which was to ſettle all things."

Thus far the Duke: But his Grace has forgot to obſerve by the way, that even after the Commons had concurr'd with the Peers in offering the Adminiſtration to the Prince of Orange, he took a Day to conſider of it; and that when he did ſignify his Acceptance of it, he return'd no Thanks to the Offerers, as if he choſe to have it underſtood, That they had impos'd a Burthen upon him, not confer'd a Favour. His Expreſſions on
He complies. that Occaſion are, "I have conſider'd of your Advice; and, as far as I am able, I will endeavour to ſecure the Peace of the Nation, until the Meeting of the Convention in January next; for the Election thereof, I will forthwith iſſue Letters, according to your Deſire. I will alſo take care to apply the public Revenue to the moſt proper Uſes that the preſent Affairs require; and likewiſe endeavour to put Ireland into ſuch a Condition, as that the Proteſtant and Engliſh Intereſt may be maintain'd in that Kingdom. And I farther aſſure you, That, as I came hither for the Preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of theſe Kingdoms; ſo I ſhall always be ready to expoſe myſelf to any Hazard for the Defence of the ſame."

Thus a Transfer was made by all the Lords, Spiritual as well as Temporal, and ſuch of the People as were call'd upon to repreſent the Commons, of the whole executive Power to his Highneſs, without one Proteſt or diſagreeing Voice: It is moreover
P. 303. obſerv'd by Sir John Rereſby, that all this was tranſacted in the midſt of almoſt a dead Calm; no Miſchief was attempted, no Diſorders were rais'd, or fomented; but all was
The whole Nation acquieſces. Peace, Acquieſcence, and Submiſſion: And the ſeveral Papers which paſs'd on the Occaſion were immediately inſerted in the Gazette, that all Europe might be made acquainted with an Event ſo extraordinary in itſelf, and ſo favourable to the farther Deſigns of the Confederates againſt France: The Prince, it is true, was in poſſeſſion of the ſupreme Power before; and had on ſome Occaſions exerted it as dictatorially, as if it had deſcended to him ever ſo legitimately: Thus he had no ſooner receiv'd Information of the King's Departure from Rocheſter, than he order'd M. Barillon, the French Embaſſador, who had been more active than ſucceſful in his Endeavours to raiſe a Spirit againſt him among the Peers, to depart the Kingdom in twenty-four Hours; and when his Excellency apply'd for farther Time, not only gave him an abſolute (f) Refuſal, but order'd a Party of his own Guards, under the Command of Mr. de l'Etang, a French Refugee, to conduct him to the Sea Side. This was a high Strain of Power, and is known to have been his peculiar (g) Act and Deed: And there is an Allotment of Quarters for the Engliſh, Scotiſh, and Iriſh Forces in the Gazette of Decem. 20, in the Stile of Authority, tho' without Name or Date, which it ſeems alſo reaſonable to place to his Account; both becauſe the Lords, as before obſerv'd, did not ſit after the Prince's Arrival at St. James's, and becauſe we find the ſame Allotment repeated in the next Gazette of the 29th, under a Paper ſign'd by his Highneſs, which, after premiſing that, upon the late irregular diſbanding the Forces, many Soldiers carry'd away their Arms, which they had ſince either loſt or embezzled, directs and requires all Perſons into whoſe Hands any of the ſaid Arms had fallen, to re-deliver the ſame on Demand, either to the ſaid Soldiers, or to their Officers, or to the Officers of Ordnance appointed to receive them. How far his Highneſs's divine Commiſſion mention'd in Sir George Treby's Oration to him, might warrant theſe extraordinary Aſſumptions, we ſhall leave it to State Caſuiſts to decide; but after the ordinary Courſe of Things, it ſeems not a little ſtrange, that the Earl of Feverſham ſhould be made anſwerable for turning thoſe Soldiers looſe upon the People with their Arms in their Hands; and that the People, who had, perhaps, given Money or Subſiſtence, as a valuable Conſideration for thoſe Arms, ſhould be thus requir'd to reſtore the ſaid Arms to the ſame Hands, without the leaſt Hint of their being reimburs'd, or of their being protected againſt thoſe who had till now been render'd ſuch a Bugbear to the Nation. But if theſe Inſtances ſhew that his Highneſs was already in fact Lord-Paramount, this Recognition of the Lords and Commons gave him Authority as well as Power; and thenceforward he had all the Springs of the Government, as well as the Credit of the Truſt, and the Terror of his Forces, to employ towards his own Eſtabliſhment.

A. D. 1688.

Quarters aſſign'd by the Prince to the King's Forces.

The Arms of ſuch Soldiers as had parted with them require'd to be reſtor'd.

Thus, on the laſt Day of December, we find his Highneſs entering publicly upon the Adminiſtration, as the People's Delegate, and avowing that he acted by Warrant from them; as appears by the Preamble of his Declaration of that Day, authoriſing Sheriffs, Juſtices of the Peace, and other Officers and Miniſters, to act in their reſpective Places as in time paſt: And yet in the penultimate Clauſe of this remarkable Piece, it is in Effect acknowledg'd, that he had before exerciſ'd the Rights of the Prerogative, by the following

The Prince aſſumes the Government to form.

He directs all Officers to reſume their Functions.

(f) It is ſaid, That the French King having caus'd the Earl of Eſſex, and ſome other Engliſh Gentlemen, to be ſeiz'd and ſecur'd at Paris, it was debated, Whether Mr. Barillon ſhould not be detain'd here, by way of Reprizal; but, on better Conſideration, it was over-rul'd.

And in a second Declaration, dated January 2, for the better collecting the Revenue, or in other Words, for redressing the Disorders which he himself and his Adherents had created, we also find the following Suggestions: "Whereas, since the fifth Day of November last, divers Persons have intermeddled with, and receiv'd, the public Money arising by the Revenues of Customs, Excise, Hearths, and other ways; some by Commissions and Authorities from us, and others by Commissions from divers Peers and others, who took up Arms and declar'd for us, for the Support of those who had taken up Arms under them, and for other public Uses. By Means whereof many Persons who acted by Authority of the Commissioners of Customs, Excise, Hearth-Money and otherwise, have been in many Parts of the Kingdom displac'd, and the Officers appointed by the said Commissioners have deserted their Duties and Employments, &c. &c. by Means whereof the Payment of all public Money is generally stopt, &c.--- We do hereby revoke and make void all such Commissions, prohibit and forbid all and every Person and Persons, under Pretence of the said Commission, or any of them, to intermeddle in any of the public Revenues, or receive any Money arising thereby, &c.

1688-9. Sets forth a Declaration for rectifying the Disorders of the Revenue. [Gazette, Num. 2416.]

Sir John Reresby tells us, That the Prince, upon his Arrival, seem'd more inclin'd to the Presbyterians than to the Members of the Church, which startled the Clergy (b): Others again give us to understand, that on the 30th of December, being Sunday, his Highness heard the whole Service read by Dr. Burnet at the Chapel in St. James's; that the Bishop of St. Asaph preached before him, and that he receiv'd the Sacrament from the Hands of the Bishop of London. "Which open professing himself of the Church of England, say they, gain'd him not a few Friends." And thus it is that the Party-Herd on both Sides, mistaking the Shew for Substance of things, console and afflict themselves without any real Grounds for either: The Prince was as much a Politician as his intractable Temper would allow him to be, and suited his Behaviour as far as he could to his Interest. He was of Opinion, that the Champions for a divine, hereditary Right, would never be Champions for him; and therefore he thought it worth his while to be well with the Dissenters, who had no such Difficulty to surmount, before they could dispose of the supreme Power. And this open professing himself of the Church of England was no more than an occasional Conformity, which he found expedient, if not necessary, to silence those who might otherwise have objected, that he lay under the same legal Disqualification to administer the Government with those whom he had made War upon; and that a Calvinist would make us unsuitable a Head to the Church of England as a Papist.

[Life of King William.]

A.D. 1688-9. Receives the Sacrament after the Form of the Church of England.

To pass on from the Forms to the Essentials of his Government, it must be suppos'd, that one of his first Cares was to settle such Preliminaries with the Princess of Denmark as should dispose her not only to wave her Pretensions, which in Point of lineal Right were so much more legitimate than his, but also to throw her whole Weight and Interest into his Scales: And, according to the Duke of Bucks, that Affair was easily dispatch'd; "For, says his Grace, since the Lord Churchill, who (i) govern'd that Family, was

His Treaty with the Princess of Denmark.

(b) And also, That he took so much upon him, as to make the Duke of Beaufort wait full four Hours, before he would give him Admittance.

(i) In the Right of his Lady, must be understood; for it was she was the Favourite; and how she came to be so, and on what Terms she stood with the Princess, we find thus specify'd by herself:

"The Beginning of the Princess's Kindness for me had a much earlier Date than my Entrance into her Service. My Promotion to this Honour was wholly owing to Impressions she had before received to my Advantage; we had used to play together when she was a Child; and she even then express'd a particular Fondness for me. This Inclination encreased with our Years. I was often at Court, and the Princess always distinguish'd me, by the Pleasure she took to honour me, preferably to others, with her Conversation and Confidence. In all her Parties for Amusement, I was sure, by her Choice, to be one; and so desirous she became of having me always near her, that, upon her Marriage with the Prince of Denmark, in 1683, it was, at her own earnest Request to her Father, I was made one of the Ladies of her Bed-chamber.

What conduced to render me the more agreeable to her in this Station was, doubtless, the Dislike she had conceiv'd to most of the other Persons about her, and particularly to her first Lady of the Bed-Chamber, the Countess of Clarendon; a Lady whose Discourse and Manner (tho' the Princess thought they agreed very well together) could not possibly recommend her to so young a Mistress; for she look'd like a Mad-woman, and talk'd like a Scholar. Indeed her Highness's Court was throughout so oddly compos'd, that I think it would be making myself no great Compliment, if I should say, her chusing to spend more of her Time with me, than with any of her other Servants, did no Discredit to her Taste. Be that as it will, it is certain she at length distinguish'd me by so high a Place in her Favour, as perhaps no Person ever arriv'd at a higher with Queen or Princess. And, if from hence I may draw any Glory, it is, that I both obtain'd and held this Place without the Assistance of Flattery: a Charm, which in truth her Inclination for me, together with my unwearied Application to serve and amuse her, render'd needless; but which, had it been otherwise, my Temper and Turn of Mind would never have suffer'd me to employ.

Young as I was, when I first became this high Favourite, I laid it down for a Maxim, That Flattery was Falsehood to my Trust, and Ingratitude to my greatest Friend: and that I did not deserve so much Favour, if I could not venture the Loss of it by speaking the Truth, and by preferring the real Interest of my Mistress before the pleasing her Fancy, or the sacrificing to her Passion. From this Rule I never swerv'd. And though my Temper and my Notions in most things were widely different from those of the Princess, yet, during a long Course of Years, she was so far from being displeas'd with me for openly speaking my Sentiments, that she sometimes profess'd a Desire, and even added her Command, that it should be always continued, promising never to be offended at it, but to love me the better for my Frankness.

Favour with a Princess upon these Terms engaged me to her in the Manner that it ought; I mean, by a Sentiment which I chuse to call Honour, rather than Gratitude or Duty, because while it implies all the Justice and Affection of these, it seems to express a more disinterested Principle of Action. For I can truly affirm, that I never consider'd myself, on any Occasion where her Interest or Glory was concern'd; nor had I any Idea of a Misery which I would not have sooner incurred, than the inward Shame of being conscious of a Failure in this respect. The Facts themselves, which I am going to relate, will in a great degree evince the Truth of what I say; and that the Princess was perfectly persuaded of it, is, I think, sufficiently manifest, both from her Letters to me, and from that unreserved Intimacy of Friendship, in which we for many Years lived together.

Kings and Princes, for the most part, imagine they have a Dignity peculiar to their Birth and Station, which ought to raise them above all Connexion or Friendship with an Inferior.

A.D. 1688-9. was like to be highly favour'd in this new Reign, they little thought of her Pretenſions; and therefore, with a good Bribe to her Favourite, the Prince had no more to do, but to promiſe the Princeſs a great Penſion by a Settlement in Parliament; which being in Preſent, and enough to keep her Court in Splendor, was then thought equivalent to three Kingdoms in Reverſion." But, on the other Hand, her Grace of Marlborough, treating of the ſame Circumſtance, in which ſhe had ſo deep a Concern, in her digreſſive Manner, expreſſes herſelf as follows: "This was another Event which furniſh'd ſimple People with a Pretence to cenſure me. It was inſinuated, that, to make my Court to the King and Queen, I had influenc'd the Princeſs to forego her undoubted Rights. The Truth is, I did perſuade her to conſent to the Project of that Settlement, and to be eaſy under it after it was made. But no Regard to the King or Queen, nor any View of Ambition, had the leaſt Share in moving me to this Conduct, any more than to what inconſiderable Part I acted in the Buſineſs of the Revolution.

As to the latter, it was evident to all the World, that as things were carry'd on by King James, every body ſooner or later muſt be ruined, who would not become a Roman Catholic. This Conſideration made me very well pleaſed at the Prince of Orange's Undertakings to reſcue us from ſuch Slavery. But I do ſolemnly proteſt, that, if there be Truth in any Mortal, I was ſo very ſimple a Creature, That I never once dreamt of his being King. Having never read, nor employ'd my time in any thing but playing at Cards; and, having no Ambition myſelf, I imagin'd that the Prince of Orange's ſole Deſign was to provide for the Safety of his own Country, by obliging King James to keep the Laws of ours; and that he would go back as ſoon as he had made us all happy: That there was no ſort of Difficulty in the Execution of this Deſign, and that to do ſo much Good would be a greater Pleaſure to him than to be King of any Country upon Earth. I was ſoon taught to know the World better. However, as I was perfectly convinc'd that a Roman Catholic is not to be truſted with the Liberties of England, I never once repin'd at the Change of the Government, no, not in all the time of that long Perſecution I went through. I might, perhaps, wiſh it had been compaſs'd by ſome other Man who had more Honour and Juſtice than he, who could depoſe his Father-in-law and Uncle, to maintain Liberty and Laws, and then act the Tyrant himſelf in many Inſtances; but I never once wiſh'd that the Change had not been made. A.D. 168

And, as to giving King William the Crown for Life, it was the ſame Principle of Regard for the Public Welfare that carried me to adviſe the Princeſs to acquieſce in it. It is true, that when the thing was firſt ſtarted, I did not ſee any Neceſſity for ſuch a Meaſure; and I thought it ſo unreaſonable, that I took a great deal of Pains (which I believe the King and Queen never forgot) to promote my Miſtreſs's Pretenſions. But I quickly found that all Endeavours of that kind would be ineffectual; that all the principal Men, except the Jacobites, were for the King, and, that the Settlement would be carried in Parliament, whether the Princeſs conſented to it, or not. So that in Reality there was nothing adviſable but to yield with a good Grace.

I confeſs, had I been in her Place, I ſhould have thought it more for my Honour to be eaſy in this Matter, than to ſhew an Impatience to get poſſeſſion of a Crown that had been wreſted from my Father. And, as it ought to have been a great Trouble to the Children of King James to be forced to act the Part they did againſt him, even for the Security of Liberty and Religion, (which was truly the Caſe) ſo it ſeem'd to me, that ſhe, who diſcover'd the leſs Ambition, would have the more amiable Character. However, as I was fearful about every thing the Princeſs did, while ſhe was thought to be adviſ'd by me, I could not ſatisfy my own Mind, till I had conſulted with ſeveral Perſons of undiſputed Wiſdom and Integrity, and particularly with the Lady Ruſſel of Southampton-houſe, and Dr. Tillotſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. I found them all unanimous in the Opinion of the Expediency of the Settlement propoſed, as things were then ſituated. In concluſion, therefore, I carried Dr. Tillotſon to the Princeſs; and, upon what he ſaid to her, ſhe took care that no Diſturbance ſhould be made by her pretended Friends, the Jacobites, who had preſſed her earneſtly to form an Oppoſition."

It was but fit to make uſe of the very Words of theſe great Perſons, becauſe they ſhould loſe none of their Authority: And now where the Authority lies is the Queſtion; for their Evidence is oppoſite and irreconcileable: According to the Duke, the Prince of Orange had an eaſy Talk to manage the Princeſs of Denmark, by means of a good ferior. Their Paſſion is to be admir'd and fear'd, to have Subjects awfully obedient, and Servants blindly obſequious to their Pleaſure. Friendſhip is an offenſive Word; it imports a kind of Equality between the Parties; it ſuggeſts nothing to the Mind of Crowns and Thrones, high Titles, or immenſe Revenues, Fountains of Honour, or Fountains of Riches, Prerogatives which the Poſſeſſors would have always uppermoſt in the Thoughts of thoſe who are permitted to approach them.

The Princeſs had a different Taſte. A Friend was what ſhe moſt coveted: And, for the ſake of Friendſhip, (a Relation which ſhe did not diſdain to have with me) ſhe was fond even of that Equality which ſhe thought belong'd to it. She grew uneaſy to be treated by me with the Form and Ceremony due to her Rank; nor could ſhe bear from me the Sound of Words which imply'd in them Diſtance and Superiority. It was this Turn of Mind which made her one day propoſe to me, that, whenever I ſhould happen to be abſent from her, we might in all our Letters write ourſelves by feigned Names, ſuch as would import nothing of Diſtinction of Rank between us. Morley and Freeman were the Names her Fancy hit upon; and the left me to chuſe by which of them I would be called. My frank, open Temper naturally led me to pitch upon Freeman; and ſo the Princeſs took the other; and from this time Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman began to converſe as Equals, made ſo by Affection and Friendſhip. [Account of the Conduct of the Dutcheſs of Marlborough, p. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14.

A.D. 1688-9. a good Bribe to her Favourite: According to the Duchess, the Prince never forgave the Difficulties which that Favourite threw in his Way; and, instead of being brib'd into his Measures, she oppos'd them at first out of Zeal to her Mistress; and acquiesc'd at last, because she was tenderly concern'd for the Welfare of the Public, and because she found all farther Opposition would signify nothing: She had the most Knowledge of the Fact, but, if she was under any irregular Influence, had the most Reason not to tell the Whole of it: And He might be bias'd, by some secret Prejudice, to adopt Matter of Scandal for Matter of Fact. Upon the Whole, therefore, all that is certain, is, that the Princess, at the Instance of her Favourite, on some Consideration or other, did submit; and that, in consequence of her Submission, his Highness found his Way render'd so much the more easy to the Throne. Bishop Burnet indeed postpones the Mention of the Princess's Concern in the Settlement till that great Affair came before the Convention: But 'tis scarce to be suppos'd, that a Matter of such Importance was suffer'd to hang in suspence so long: The Princess left the North, and came forward to meet her Consort at Oxford, as soon as she had receiv'd the News of her Father's first Departure from Whiteball; Both of them repair'd to London, the very next Day after his Majesty left that Palace, for the last time, by the Direction of the Prince of Orange; and, upon their Arrival, were immediately visited (g) in form by his Highness: Hitherto they had All co-operated in the same Design; whatever Gloss the specious Pretence of Zeal and public Spirit had set on that Design, it is out of all question, that private Interest was at the bottom; and their Highnesses of Denmark having taken so large a Share in the Adventure, having appear'd thus early to put in for their Share of the Profits, and being still of so much Importance to the general Issue, there was a Necessity to make the Hearing and Determining of their Clames one of the first Considerations of the Cabinet.

He resolves to new model the Army.

It was not, however, the only one. The King's Army, who had shewn such a wonderful Concern for the Protestant Religion, that they had sacrific'd to't it both their Duty and their Honour, could not digest the Treatment they had receiv'd from his Highness; and made no Secret of their Resentment: This produced a Resolution to model them yet farther, by breaking several of the most refractory Corps; and, in general, all such Officers as refus'd to serve his Highness: But this could not be done without Money; and, what with the late extraordinary Charges incurr'd, and the several Diversions which had been made of the Revenue, there remain'd but 40,000*l.* in the Exchequer. As the shortest Way, therefore, to procure the necessary Sums, it was propos'd to make application to the City: Alderman Duncomb, an eminent Banker, who was one of the Committee which had waited on the Prince at Henley, had even then made him an Offer of his Cash and Credit; and now his Highness was in possession of the Government, many other Persons shew'd the same Disposition to be the same way serviceable to him: And these Undertakers, had in effect drove the Bargain, and answer'd for the Success, before the Proposal was made: It was not however held decent in those Days, for the Government, however constituted, to have recourse to Individuals only, on such Occasions as these: Individuals were, indeed, the Instruments, which brought the Matter to bear; but still Application in form was made to the Body of the City; and it was in the Power the City had to assist the Court in Extremity, that their highest Importance consisted. Thus on the 8th of January, the Aldermen and Common-council being extraordinarily assembled, a Letter was deliver'd to them from his Highness, "setting forth the great Occasion there was for an immediate Supply, beyond what the present Condition of the Revenue could furnish, for the Charge of the Navy, paying off Part of the Army, and sending a speedy Relief for the Defence of the Protestant Interest in Ireland; and proposing, that, for the answering those great Ends, such a Sum of Money should be advanced by the City, by way of Loan, as they could conveniently spare, which should be secur'd in the best Manner that could be advis'd, and repaid at full Interest in six Months." The Gazette adds, "Whereupon a Vote immediately pass'd, with all Chearfulness and Unanimity, That they would supply his Highness accordingly." The Sum demanded was 200,000*l.* and in four Days it was all subscrib'd; one Man, Sir Samuel Dashwood, subscribing 60,000*l.* Bishop Burnet says, "This was the great Distinction of those who were well-affected to the Prince: For, whereas those who were ill-affected to him refus'd to join in the Loan, pretending there was no Certainty of their being repaid; the others did not doubt but the Convention would pay all that was advanc'd on so great an Exigence; and so they subscrib'd liberally, as the Occasion requir'd."

He applies to the City for a Loan.

Which they unanimously agree to.

The Prince was now arm'd at all Points: For Lord Dartmouth himself, giving way to the national Torrent, which bore down all before it, had made no difficulty to receive and (g) "The same Evening his Highness paid a Visit to the Queen-Dowager; and, among other Questions, ask'd her Majesty, How she pass'd her Time, and whether she play'd at Basset? The Queen took this Opportunity to speak at a distance in favour of the Earl of Feversham, and answer'd his Highness, That she had not play'd at it since the Absence of her Chamberlain, who us'd to keep the Bank. The Prince of Orange took the Hint, and assur'd her Majesty, That he would not, by any means, interrupt her Majesty's Diversions; and the next Day order'd the Earl to be set at Liberty. However, his Highness's Complaisance did not alter the Queen's Resolution of retiring to Portugal; for, at that very time, she dispatch'd an Express to Lisbon to that purpose." [Life of King William, vol. i. p. 5.

A.D. 1688-9. and obey his Highneſs's Orders; in virtue of which, he had purg'd the Fleet of all its Papiſt-Officers, and, having left Sir John Berry with twelve Men of War at Spithead, return'd, December 29, with the reſt to the Downs. With two Fleets and two Armies under his Command, a large Sum of Money at his Diſpoſal, and the whole executive Power in his Hands, his Highneſs was now indeed in a Condition to ſet all Oppoſition at defiance: But how great ſoever the Truſt was, which had been ſo freely repos'd in him, without the Forms of a Treaty, or the Ceremonial of an Oath, no Apprehenſions ſeem'd to be entertain'd of his abuſing it: He was conſider'd as a Deliverer, from whom nothing but Good was to be expected: His Commiſſion was, beſides, to expire ſo ſoon, at leaſt it was ſo underſtood, and his future Eſtabliſhment ſeem'd to depend ſo much on his preſent good Behaviour, that no body thought he would venture to commit the ſmalleſt Treſpaſs.

It appears, however, by the Courſe of his Highneſs's Adminiſtration, that he did not think himſelf oblig'd to be altogether ſo ſcrupulous; but, on the contrary, that he thought himſelf ſo ſure of his Point, that he was free to act, as if he had already taken poſſeſſion for good and all; and as if it was of more Importance to him to ſatisfy his Allies, than thoſe who were to be his Subjects. Thus, tho' the Maintenance of a ſtanding Army in Time of Peace, and the Exercile of martial Law to retain them in due Obedience, were number'd among the Grievances he came to redreſs, we find a new Declaration, dated January 16, ſuggeſting, in his Highneſs's Name, "That great Diſcontents and Diſorders had been occaſion'd in the Fleet by certain groundleſs Reports, which had been induſtriouſly ſpread among the Seamen, touching the Uncertainty of their Wages; and that ſeveral of them had been thereby miſ-led to abſent themſelves without Leave; and certifying, that all Wages, and Arrears ſhould be fully made good to all of them, the Abſentees not excepted; provided they return'd to their ſeveral Ships, within fifteen Days; in which Caſe they were to receive his Highneſs's Pardon, and to be exempted from the Puniſhment they were liable to, as 'tis ſaid, by the Laws of the Sea: But, in caſe they refus'd this generous Offer, they were to be proceeded againſt as Deſerters, with all poſſible Rigor." So that, notwithſtanding the plauſible Air of this Paper, the Wages which theſe poor Men had earn'd in the Service of one Maſter were not only uncertain but deſperate, unleſs they bound themſelves to ſerve another: And we alſo find yet another Ordinance, without any diſtinguiſhing Name or Title, dated January the 21ſt, addreſs'd to the Army, in the following remarkable Words, viz.

He ſets forth two Ordinances, promiſing the Seamen and Soldiery their full Pay and Arrears, provided they continued in the Service, &c.

[Gazette, Num. 2421.]

"Whereas, upon Our calling together the Forces, We have appointed ſuch Officers to command them, in whom We may repoſe entire Truſt and Confidence, as well for their Readineſs and Inclination for Our Service, as for their Care and Diligence in keeping the ſaid Forces in good Order and Diſcipline: And having, out of the tender Regard and favourable Conſideration which We ſhall always expreſs for the good Service and dutiful Behaviour of the Forces, taken care for their Maintenance and Encouragement, and given Orders for the ſatisfying and making good to every Officer and Soldier their full Pay, and Arrears due to them, until the firſt Day of this Inſtant January; and for the making conſtant and punctual Payment of the Subſiſtence-money, and Clearings of the Army, in the uſual Method, without any the leaſt Diminution of the former Pay; We have thought fit hereby to declare the ſame, that no Officer or Soldier may be miſ-led, or diverted from Our Service, by any groundleſs Reports, or malicious Inſinuations, ſtrictly charging and requiring all Officers to repair forthwith to their reſpective Commands, and all Soldiers to their reſpective Quarters and Places of Rendezvous, upon pain of Our higheſt Diſpleaſure, and being puniſh'd for their Default as the Nature of their Offences ſhall deſerve. And if it ſhall ſo happen, that, notwithſtanding theſe Our Gracious Intentions and Offer of Pardon for their paſt Abſence or Deſertion, any Soldiers ſhall obſtinately continue to abſent themſelves from their Duties, We do hereby direct and require all Officers Civil and Military to ſeize and apprehend, and to be aiding and aſſiſting in the ſeizing and apprehending of, all Soldiers that have deſerted, or ſhall deſert, the Service, in order to the bringing them to condign Puniſhment, to be inflicted upon them with the utmoſt Severity."

A.D. 1689.

For the better underſtanding of the laſt of theſe Papers, it ought to be obſerv'd, that there had been a general Review of the Engliſh Forces, which is what is meant by the calling together of the ſaid Forces; and it was expected, that a great Part of them would have been diſbanded, agreeable to the Pretences aſſign'd for the Loan: Indeed, Lord Ranelagh, the Paymaſter, had Orders to pay off their Arrears, and Lord Churchill to break the Corps before alluded to, viz. five of Horſe and three of Foot; which ſo far ſeem'd to anſwer the Expectation of the Public: But this Reform went in fact no (b) farther than the Officers of thoſe Corps (for the private Men were incorporated into other Regiments); nor did it even reach thoſe who had ſerv'd before, provided they ſhew'd a Willingneſs to ſerve under his Highneſs. So that this Reduction was rather notional than real, and the main Benefit of it redounded to the Prince only; who had hereby an Opportunity of ridding his Hands of all that were obnoxious to him, and of obliging (i) an

(b) Except in the Fourth Troop of Horſe-guards, commanded by Lord Dover, which was entirely broke, to make room for the Dutch Life-guards, which was afterwards put on the ſame Eſtabliſhment.

A.D. 1688-9. (i) an equal Number of his Friends. Hence, the Enemies of his Highneſs took the liberty to ſuggeſt afreſh, that his Adventure to England was not for the ſake of England, but to ſtrengthen his own Hands, and to further his own Deſigns on the Continent; that an Army was ſtill to be an Engine of Government; and that, in his late dictatorial Edict in relation to it, he had equally overlook'd the Ends of his original Declaration and the Limits of his Commiſſion, which, according to the very Words of the Lords Addreſs, till the Meeting of the intended Convention, was to expire the next Day.

That the Grievance of an Army might, however, be leſs ſenſibly felt by the Body of the People, his Highneſs, in the Courſe of theſe Tranſactions, ſet forth two other Ordinances; by the firſt of which, all Officers and Soldiers were peremptorily requir'd to march out of every Town where an Election was to be made, the Day before the ſame ſhould be made, to the next adjoining Town or Towns, (theſe are the Words of the Order) where they were to continue till the ſaid Election was fully completed: And, by the ſecond, (k) as a Matter of Grace, private Houſes were exempted from the Burthen of receiving and entertaining Soldiers, and the providing Quarters for them was left to the Direction of the Civil Magiſtrate.

State of Ireland.

The Lords and Commons who had, under the Reſtrictions above ſpecify'd, entruſted his Highneſs with the Adminiſtration, had, moreover, recommended to his particular Care the preſent Condition of Ireland: He himſelf had promis'd to do ſo, and in his Letter to the City had made that Service one of the Conſiderations of the Loan; and the Affairs of that Country were then at ſuch a Criſis, as at once ſeem'd to invite and command his Attention. On the one hand, Lord Tyrconnel and his Creatures were ſtill in poſſeſſion of the Sword, and all the Powers of the Government; and on the other, his Excellency had the whole Proteſtant Intereſt to ſtruggle with, and not full 4000 diſciplin'd Men to keep them in Subjection. A.D. 1688-9. Of theſe he had not above 600 about him; and all were ſo intimidated with the bad News from England, that they openly expreſs'd a Deſire of quitting the Service, provided they might be allow'd to return to the Stations they were in when King James came to the Crown. "This was ſo univerſally talk'd of by themſelves, ſays Archbiſhop (l) King, P. 984 that if any one could have aſſur'd them of theſe Terms then, no doubt but they would have readily comply'd, and have left the Lord Tyrconnel to ſhift for himſelf." The ſame Author farther ſuggeſts, "That it was propos'd by ſome of the Proteſtants to ſeize the Caſtle of Dublin, where the Stores of Arms and Ammunition lay; as alſo, the Perſon of the Lord Lieutenant: That it was reaſonable to think the wiſer Papiſts would have been pleas'd if theſe Deſigns had taken Effect: That the Poſſibility of ſucceeding in them was demonſtrated; and that they were rejected, partly at the Inſtance of Lord Mountjoy, and partly becauſe of the unanimous Reſolution, which had been taken by all the Proteſtants of the Kingdom, not to be the Aggreſſors."

The Truth, however, is, that the two Parties were equally afraid of one-another: The Proteſtants were in continual Dread of another Maſſacre; and the Papiſts every Day expected to ſee the Ports of Ireland filled with the Engliſh or Dutch Men of War and Tranſports, to compel Lord Tyrconnel to follow his Maſter, in caſe he did not think fit to atone for his paſt Offences by a voluntary Reſignation: And that a Part of Lord Dartmouth's Squadron was not deſtin'd to that Service, inſtead of being laid up in the Thames and Medway for the Reſidue of the Winter, was the Complaint of the whole Kingdom then, and will ever be the Wonder of Poſterity. Biſhop Burnet endeavours to account for this Omiſſion by ſaying, among other things, That the Prince did not know whom to truſt: That a general Diſcontent, next to Mutiny, began to ſpread itſelf thro' the whole Engliſh Army: That, probably, if Strange Neglect of it.

(i) "The Regiment of Dunbarton was given to Marſhal Schomberg, which was a Diſappointment to Duke Hamilton, who expected it ſhould have been beſtow'd on the Earl of Selkirk his Second Son, to make him amends for his Regiment that had been given before to Colonel Godfrey: That of Major-general Oglethorp, whom the Prince vainly endeavour'd to engage in his Service, was given to the Lord Churchill's Brother: And that of Skelton to Colonel Fitzpatrick. Colonel Tuſton, who commanded Admiral Herbert's Regiment, ſurrender'd his Commiſſion; as did likewiſe Major-general Sackville, and Colonel Legge. Several other Officers follow'd their Example, upon account of the new Oath that was exacted of them." [Life of King Will. vol. I. part 2. p. 5.

(k) His Highneſs's Will and Pleaſure were expreſs'd in the following Words:

"Whereas we are inform'd, That divers Regiments, Troops, and Companies are, contrary to our Intentions, quarter'd in private Houſes; We have thought fit hereby to declare Our Pleaſure to be, That none of the Forces, of what Nation or Quality ſoever, ſhall preſume to quarter in any private Houſe, without the free and voluntary Conſent of the Owner; and that all Houſes be deemed private Houſes, except Victualling-houſes, and Houſes of public Entertainment, or ſuch as ſell Wine, or any other Liquor, by Retail: In which Houſes, We do think fit, that all Officers and Soldiers be lodged by the Direction and Appointment of the Chief Magiſtrates, Juſtices of the Peace, or Conſtables of the Place, where any Forces ſhall come, and not otherwiſe: And we do hereby ſtrictly forbid all Officers and Soldiers, upon any Pretence whatſoever, to take up any Quarters for themſelves or others, without ſuch Direction or Appointment, upon pain of being caſhier'd, or ſuffering ſuch other Puniſhment as the Offence ſhall deſerve.

W. H. Prince of Orange.

(l) "I will not enlarge, ſays B. Burnet, more upon the Affairs of that Kingdom (Ireland,) both becauſe I had no Occaſion to be well inform'd about them, and becauſe Dr. King, now Archbiſhop of Dublin, wrote a copious Hiſtory of the Government of Ireland during this Reign, which is ſo well receiv'd, and ſo univerſally acknowledg'd to be as truly as it is freely written, that I refer my Readers to the Account of thoſe Matters which is fully and faithfully given by that learned and zealous Prelate." This is the Repreſentation on one Side: And, on the other, we find the Archbiſhop's Performance call'd an infamous Libel, publiſh'd againſt the King, not only to juſtify his Subjects rebelling againſt him, but to render him odious to all Mankind. And we are farther told, that the foul Aſperſions, baſe Calumnies, and groſs Partiality and Diſingenuity throughout the Whole of it, even in relating of Matters of Fact, had been ſufficiently detected; and that a Copy of that Detection had been tranſmitted to him by way of Challenge to anſwer it, if he could, or durſt.

See a Quarto Tract, called, Dialogue between A. and B. two plain Country Gentlemen, concerning the Times, p. 26.

A.D. 1688-9. if he had ſent any of them over, they would have join'd with Tyrconnel: That he was oblig'd to keep the Dutch about him, to maintain the Quiet of England: That there was very little Ammunition in the King's Magazines to ſpare: That there was no Ship of War in thoſe Seas to ſecure the Tranſport: That the Prince was made to believe, he (Tyrconnel) would reſign the Sword, if he might have good Terms for himſelf and the Iriſh; and Aſſurance that Lord Clarendon ſhould not be his Succeſſor: That his Highneſs, for this Reaſon, avoided ſpeaking to the ſaid Lord on the Iriſh Affairs; by which he made him his irreconcileable Enemy: And that, upon all theſe Accounts, he enter'd into a Treaty with Tyrconnel by the Interpoſition of the two Temples, Sir William and Sir John. But much of this Apology is ſo apparently fallacious, that it explodes itſelf: A very ſmall Body of Forces would then have been ſufficient for this Service; and the ſending an equal Number of Engliſh and Dutch would have ſolved the Objection which he raiſes to the ſending all of either: The ſame Quantity of Ammunition which was neceſſary for that Body at home, would have ſerv'd them there; and out of eighty Engliſh and Dutch Men of War, there could have been no want of Convoy to ſecure the Tranſport. Beſides, France was in no Condition as yet to give our Deliverer any Interruption; on the contrary, all its Ports lay open to Inſults from hence: For, preſuming on the ſtrict Alliance which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two Crowns, Breſt, St. Malo's, Cherbourg, Havre, &c. were in a manner unfortify'd; and if Advantage had been taken of that Neglect, all their Shipping might have been ruin'd almoſt beyond Recovery. It is moreover remarkable, that the Letter which gave riſe to the Prince's Treaty with Tyrconnel, was not written till the very Day, A.D. 1688-9. that Lord Dartmouth ſail'd from Portſmouth for the Downs; So that the Reſolution to leave Ireland a Prey to its own Diſtractions, ſeems to have been taken before that Treaty was thought of: And if ſo groſs and ſo fatal a Neglect, after the ſolemn Remonſtrances which his Highneſs had receiv'd from the Lords and Commons, brought his Conduct into Queſtion, what can be alledg'd in Excuſe for his relying entirely in the Courſe of that Treaty, on the Sincerity of a Man, who he knew had a double Game to play, and a whole Kingdom to ſtake?

It was indeed the firm Perſuaſion of the Majority of the Iriſh Privy Council, that it was the Intereſt of that Kingdom to follow the Example of this; not ſo much becauſe of its being an Appendage to it, as becauſe it was unable to hold out againſt it. They likewiſe made it their great Endeavour, from time to time, to prevail with the King's Deputy to deliver it up, and thereby preſerve it from being made the Seat of War and Deſolation: And we are told his uſual Anſwer was, That he could not do it with Honour till it was demanded: As alſo, that he ſometimes aſk'd in Raillery, Whether they would have him caſt the Sword over the Caſtle-Walls, ſeeing there was none to receive it? The natural Inference from which is, That he was more ſolicitous to ſubmit to the Prince, than the Prince was to clame his Submiſſion: But then the Letter, before alluded to, from Judge Keating to Sir John Temple, which Dr. King ſo expreſly aſſures us was written by his Excellency's Command, and peruſ'd by him, before it was ſent, warrants no ſuch Concluſion: On the contrary, it is grounded on a Suppoſition that the King was ſtill King: And the manifeſt Drift of the whole is to (m) engage all the Men of Intereſt about the Prince,

"SIR,

"I had ere this acknowledg'd the Favour of your laſt, and return'd you my Thanks for your kind Advice, relating to the ſmall Concerns I had in England, which I have now diſpoſed of here; but, to deal freely with you, the Diſtractions ariſing from the great and ſudden Alterations in England, and the panic (but I believe groundleſs) Fears which have poſſeſſed the Minds, not only of the weaker Sex and Sort, but even of Men who would paſs for ſober and judicious, hath render'd Matters with us ſo uncertain, that I profeſs ſeriouſly, I know not what to write; nor dare I yet give you any Account, relating either to particular Perſons or Places of the Kingdom, ſcarcely of what I hear from the remote Parts of this City; ſince what we have at Night for certain Truth, from thoſe who pretend to be Eye or Ear-witneſſes of what they relate, we find before the next Day's Exchange is over, to be altogether falſe and groundleſs. The fear of a Maſſacre hath been mutual; the Proteſtants remembring paſt Times, and being alarm'd by a Letter, neither directed to, nor ſubſcribed by any Perſon, but dropt at Comber (of which, Copies were diſperſed throughout all Parts of the Kingdom) were frighted to that Degree, that very many of them betook themſelves to the Ards and other Places of Security in the North: Some into Scotland; and very many Families embark'd from this Port for Cheſter, Liverpool, Beaumaris, and the next adjacent Parts of England and Wales, who, you may eaſily conclude, carry'd with them all the ready Money and Plate which they were Maſters of. Nor was it a difficult Matter for them to do ſo, the Confernation being ſo great and ſo ſudden, that even the Officers of the Ports, either out of Conſideration to the departing Crowd of Women and Children, or being amaz'd at the Suddenneſs of the Fright, neglected to do their Duty, whereby this City, and the adjacent Parts are almoſt drained dry, as to Caſh and Plate; which is manifeſt from Guineas being ſold at 12 d. per piece, over and above the uſual Rate. On the other hand, the Roman Catholics were very many of them under equal Fears; and indeed all of them, except the Army, who by their Callings are exempt from, or at leaſt from owning it, pretend equal Dread from the Proteſtants, who (as they alledg'd) far exceeded them in the Northern Parts, and were extraordinary well arm'd and hors'd; but their greateſt Apprehenſions ariſe from a conſtant and uncontradicted Aſſurance, which private Letters by every Packet brought hither, that the Duke of Ormond, with a conſiderable Army, and many experienced Officers, was to land forthwith in Munſter. And in this Condition now ſtands this poor Kingdom; the contending Parties being equally afraid, or at leaſt pretending to be ſo of each other; which cannot but beget great Anxiety and Sorrow in the Mind of every good Man, who hath the leaſt Concern for his King or his Country. In the Interim the Lord Deputy, intruſted by his Majeſty with the Government of this Kingdom, and keeping it entire in its Obedience to all his Commands, doth daily grant Commiſſions to raiſe and procure Arms and Ammunition for great Numbers of Men: In doing whereof (conſidering the great Truſt repos'd in him) no Man of Honour, or moral Honeſty can truly blame him. But, at the ſame time, he takes all Opportunities, both private and public, to declare, That whenever his Majeſty will ſignify his Royal Will and Pleaſure for diſbanding the Army that now is, or hereafter ſhall be raiſed upon the Commiſſions now iſſuing, or ſhall give Directions for any other Alteration in the Government, he will, without one Day's Heſitation, himſelf, and thoſe of his Relations and other Dependants in the Army, whom you know to be very numerous, give an exact Obedience. And if any ſhould be ſo fool-hardy as to ſcruple or make the leaſt delay

A.D. 1688-9. Prince, who had Property in Ireland, to make use of that Interest for the Preservation of their Property, by preventing, if possible, the sending over Troops; and by insinuating, that in such Case the whole Country would be turn'd into an Aceldama, or Field of Blood; for, after expatiating on the mutual Fears of the two Parties, the Writer proceeds to say, That the greatest Apprehensions of the Papists arose from a constant and uncontradicted Assurance, which private Letters by every Packet brought over, that the Duke of Ormond, with a considerable Army and many experienc'd Officers, was to land forthwith in Munster; and that the Lord-Deputy, on the other hand, agreeable to the great Trust repos'd in him, was daily granting Commissions to raise and procure Arms and Ammunition for great Numbers of Men: And if, in other Places, he declares himself to be verily persuaded, That, with a little good Management, the Generality of the Roman Catholics, and indeed of the whole Kingdom, would be very glad to be put in the same Condition, in all respects, as they had been in six Years before; and desir'd no more than an Assurance that it should be no worse; that the Lord Deputy would disband the Army; and that the Roman Catholic Nobility and Gentry, who were universally concern'd it, would submit to it; he all along supposes, that his Majesty's Pleasure was first to be known; that his Majesty's Concurrence was first to be obtain'd: And his very last Words are, "Since it cannot be expected that the Lord Deputy will do any thing in a Matter of so great Moment without his Majesty's Directions." A.D. 1688-9.

The same Author, who has preserv'd this Letter, is moreover positive, that notwithstanding his Excellency's verbal Professions of his Readiness to deliver up the Sword, he meant nothing less; and that the Majority of the Protestants believ'd, that he only design'd to gain Time, and to amuse them till he was strong enough to master them. He also avers, King.

delay of doing so, they shall in a few Days be taught and compell'd to do their Duty.

All this, I know you have had repeated to you from divers Hands; however, I thought myself obliged in the Station which I hold, to give you this summary Account of our present Condition, which God knows is very bad, and in all human Probability, if we take not up more Charity than as yet we have for each other, will receive sharp Corrosives, and bitter Potions, to bring us even to the Hopes of living, though in great Penury and Want. Nor can we expect, in case that any Resistance shall be made by the Roman Catholics here, that we shall see any End thereof, until the Buildings, Plantations, and other Improvements of thirty Years Expence and Industry be utterly wasted, and the Kingdom brought to the last Degree of Poverty and Confusion, and from the most improved and improving Spot of Ground in Europe, as you saw it six Years since, become a mere Aceldama, and upon the Matter, totally desart. For Armies when once raised, must be maintained by the Public, or will maintain themselves: Nor can Military Discipline be expected, where the Soldier hath not his Wages; and whether that can be had out of the public Treasury here, I refer to you, who have weighed the Revenue of the Kingdom, when at the best, even to a Drachm. But after all this, I am confident and assur'd, That the Government of England will and must at length take place here, against all Opposition whatsoever. It hath cost England too much Blood and Treasure to be parted with; but, if it should come to a Contest of that kind, the Victors, I fear, will have little to brag of, and will find in the Conclusion, nothing but Ruins and Rubbish, not to be repaired in another Age. Nor will the People thereafter reckon of any Security or Stability in this Kingdom, so as to apply themselves to the Repair of them, but expecting such periodical Earthquakes here, will provide themselves of Retreats into England and Scotland, as many have of late, and daily do.

Your Patience is, I fear, by this at an end; when you begin to enquire with yourself, To what purpose it is that I have given you all this Trouble. I must confess your Enquiry is not without Reason; but however to you, whose Friendship I have always found, and valued myself much on it, I do without difficulty declare what hath induced me hereunto.

The wonderful Alterations which a Month's time hath produced in England, in regard to the Protestant Religion, and the Universality of it; the little Blood that hath been spilt in so great a Change; the few Acts of Hostility, and little Disquiet which has as yet appear'd, has almost perswaded me, That this unfortunate Kingdom may, by the Interposition of moderate Men, be restor'd to the same Estate of Religion and Property, that it rejoiced in seven Years since, with an Addition of further Security for the Preservation of both, if more be requisite, considering the many Acts of Parliament still in force in this Kingdom.

It cannot be imagin'd, Sir, but there are very many who, having either lost their Estates upon the Forfeitures of 1641, or by their Profuseness and Prodigality spent what they were restor'd to, would willingly see the Kingdom once more in Confusion and Blood; designing by Licentiousness and Rapine to supply their Extravagancies. There want not, on the other hand, some who conceive, That the Court of Claims has, contrary to the Settlement, taken from them their Possessions, without Reprizals; and very many, who, being put by their Employments and Commands, wish for a Time to expostulate with those who are possess'd of them. But all these, in my humble Opinion, ought to give way to the public Quiet and Settlement of a whole Nation, ready to fall into Ruin.

I am verily persuaded, That, with a little good Management, the Generality of the Roman Catholics, and indeed of the whole Kingdom, would be very glad to be put into the same Condition in all respects, as they were six Years since; and desire no more than an Assurance it should not be made worse. And, if there be Faith to be found in Man, the Lord-Deputy, and Roman Catholic Nobility and Gentry of the Kingdom, who are universally concern'd in the present Army, and in that which is to be rais'd, will, upon the first Signification of his Majesty's Pleasure to that Purpose, unanimously disband, retire to their several Dwellings, and apply themselves to advance the Quiet and Wealth of the Kingdom. Nor can I ever doubt his Majesty's Condescension and Care for the Preservation of this his Kingdom, and preventing the Effusion of Christian Blood. For, most assuredly, if War should happen here, which God of his infinite Mercy prevent, his Majesty would be the only great Sufferer, in the Loss of so many Subjects Lives; wherein consists the Wealth and Strength of the greatest Monarchs.

There are very many now at London, who know the State and Condition of this Kingdom much better than I pretend to; what I now write I design not as a Secret, but, if you think it worth Consideration, I leave it to you to communicate it to such as you shall think fit: And, if there be any thing in it worthy their Thoughts, I must declare, that there is nothing within the Reach of my Industry, that I will not endeavour, in the Method of my Profession, for the Maintenance of Religion and Property, as establish'd by the Laws of this Kingdom; and should die with the greatest Satisfaction, and reckon it a nobler Posterity than any Man can pride himself in, if I could be in the least instrumental in the settling Peace and Quiet, without more Hazard or Loss to this my native Country; which I make no doubt the Almighty will in his good time effect, by his own Means and Instruments, more deserving of so great a Blessing from him than I am. If this find any Room with yourself, other thinking Men, or such who have great Stakes here, let me know your Thoughts, with what convenient Speed you can; it being a Matter in which a Moment is not to be lost; and the first Step to be made there; since it cannot be expected, that the Lord Deputy will do any thing in a Matter of so great Moment, without his Majesty's Directions."

I must likewise tell you, that in this Conjuncture of Affairs, the Thieves and Robberies are not only become more numerous, but likewise much more insolent; and instead of small Thefts, do now drive away by Force whole Herds, and sometimes, when overtaken, deny to restore the Prey. This in many Places, and especially in the North-west, is done by the Carriers and Tillers in the Country, father'd generally on the Army; of which I have now an Instance before me from Ballenglass.

A D. 1688-9. avers, that 500 Commissions were given out in one Day, to the most desperate and profligate Persons among the Irish, and who were to raise and maintain their Troops without Levy-money, Pay, or any visible Means of their own: Which, says he, was a thing impossible, without (n) allowing them to steal and plunder: And he does not forget to mention, that one of these new-rais'd Regiments, belonging to the Earl of Antrim, without the King's Livery, or the usual Arms of regular Troops, or any considerable Officer at their Head, or Notice given to the Magistrates of their coming, was sent to take possession of Londonderry; and two Companies to do the same at Inniskillin; both of which Parties were severally (o) refus'd Admittance by the Townsmen of the two Places, under the Pretence, that these Gentlemen-Soldiers were real Rapparees, and that, by their several Charters, they were oblig'd to defend their Towns against all such. It ought ever to be suppos'd, that those who fortify a Pass mean not only to keep possession, but to defend it to the last against all Assailants: And, for that Reason, those who undertake to negociate them into a Surrender ought also to be provided for a Storm: As well, therefore, from the Precautions that the Lord-Deputy was thus daily taking, as from Keating's own Letter, which made the King's Consent the Conditio sine qua non of the whole Proceeding, it became manifestly the Duty of those who manag'd for the English Interest, on this Occasion, to be provided for the worst: And that, contrarywise, they so unaccountably expos'd themselves to be outwitted by a Man whom they had always affected to despise, must either argue an Infatuation almost beyond Example; or, what was yet more inexcusable, a wicked Design to draw the Irish into a War, in order to make a new Harvest of Forfeitures; in which every Man of Interest and Importance hop'd to have a Share.

To proceed: Keating's Letter was scarce on its Way to England, before a new Stratagem was put in practice to give it farther Credit, by the Advice of Rice and Neagle, who, we are told, were the only Persons in the Lord-Deputy's Secret. The Lord Mountjoy, who had a great Ascendancy in the North of the Kingdom, where the Protestant Party was by far the strongest, and had already provided themselves with Arms, Horses, &c. was sent for by his Excellency; and, being come, was told by him, That he intended to send him, jointly with Rice, to the King in France, to lay before him the State of the Kingdom, and to tell him, That, if his Majesty pleas'd, he (the Deputy) would ruin it for him, and make it a Heap of Rubbish; but that it was impossible for him to preserve it, and make it of use to him: And that, therefore, he desir'd his Leave to treat for it. These are the Lord Mountjoy's Words, in his circular Letter to his A.D. 1688 Friends, when he undertook this Message; and Dr. King adds, "The Lord Tyrconnel swore most solemnly, that he was in earnest in this Message, and that he knew the Court of France would oppose it with all their Power; for, said he, that Court minds nothing but their own Interest, and they would not care if Ireland were sunk to the Pit of Hell, (they are his own Words) so they could give the Prince of Orange but three Months Diversion; but, he added, if the King be persuaded to ruin his fastest Friends, to do himself no Service, only to gratify France, he is neither so merciful nor so wise as I believe him to be. If he recover England, Ireland will fall to him in course; but he can never expect to conquer England by Ireland; if he attempts it, he ruins Ireland to do himself no Kindness, but rather to exasperate England the more against him, and make his Restoration impossible; and he intimated, that, if the King would not do it, he would look on his Refusal to be forced on him by those in whose Power he was, and that he would think himself oblig'd to do it without his Consent.

Mountjoy and Rice sent by the Lord-Deputy to the King, in France.

Every body told the Lord Mountjoy, that this was all Sham and Trick, and that the Design was only to amuse the Protestants, and get him, who was the likeliest Man to head them, out of the way: But his Answer was, that his going into France could have no Influence on the Councils of England, who were neither privy nor Parties to it; and, if they had a mind to reduce the Kingdom, it was easy to do it without his Assistance; that he must either go on this Message, now the Deputy had put him upon it, or enter into an actual War against him, and against such as adher'd to King James's Interest; that he did not think it safe to do the latter, having no Order or Encouragement from England; but, on the contrary, all the Advice he receiv'd from thence was, to be quiet, and not to meddle; that he was oblig'd to King James; and neither Honour, Conscience, nor Gratitude would permit him in his present Circumstances to make a War on his own Authority against him, whilst there was any Possibility of doing the Business without one. Upon these Considerations, against the general Opinion of all the Protestants in Ireland, he undertook the Business, and went away from Dublin about the 10th of January 1688-9, having first had these general Concessions made him in behalf of the Protestants: 1. That no more Commissions should be given out, or new Men rais'd. 2. That no more of the Army should be sent into the North. 3. That none should be question'd for what was past. And, 4. That no private House should be garrison'd or disturb'd with Soldiers."

But the Doctor has either misrepresented Lord

(n) In another Place, he expressly lays the Robberies and Plunderings that were continually committed, to such as the Lord-Deputy had entrusted with Arms and Employments; which Judge Keating, in the Letter above, as expressly denies.

(o) This Affair at Derry was soon compromis'd; that Town submitting to take such a Garrison as they knew they could master.

A.D. 1688-9. Lord Mountjoy, in that Paſſage where he makes him declare to his Friends, That the Council of England were neither privy nor Parties to his Errand; or elſe, that Lord was not conſiſtent with himſelf; for, in his own circular Letter, we find him expreſly ſaying, "I am morally aſſur'd this muſt do our Work without Blood, or the Miſery of the Kingdom. I am ſure it is the Way propos'd in England, who depend ſo much on it, that no Forces are appointed to come hither: And, I am ſure, what I do is not only what will be approv'd of in England, but what had its Beginning from thence."

However this may be, nothing is more certain, than that no Forces were appointed for the Service of Ireland; and that no Diſpoſition was made for ſuch an Embarkation, in caſe the Neceſſity of Affairs ſhould require it: On the contrary, when the Lords, to whom the Conſideration of the State of that Kingdom had been referr'd, made their Report in the Prince's Council, in which it was propos'd, that an Order ſhould be iſſued for reſtoring the Arms which had been taken from the Proteſtants; and that the Earl of Grenard, and the Lord Mountjoy, the Former in the Capacity of Lieutenant-General, and the Latter as Major-General, ſhould be authoriſ'd to command them, even this Propoſal was rejected, and it was thought fit to ſummon the Lord-Deputy, by a Letter, to ſubmit to the preſent Adminiſtration, and to receive ſuch Troops as his Highneſs ſhould ſend, for the Security of that Kingdom; as alſo to aſſure him withal, that, in ſuch caſe, the Roman-Cathelics there ſhould be indulg'd with a Continuance of the ſame Liberty which they had enjoy'd under the Reign of King Charles II: This was exactly agreeable to the Contents of Keating's Letter; but not at all to the Prince's Promiſe to the Lords and Commons in behalf of Ireland, or the Expectations of the Iriſh Nobility and Gentry in London, who had preſs'd his Highneſs to take the aſſociated Proteſtants in the North of that Kingdom under the Protection of his Arms, and to ſend them ſpeedy Succours.

The Prince ſends a Letter of Summons to his Excellency.

The adopting and purſuing this wretched Expedient was beſides ſo much the more ſtrange; becauſe it was as neceſſary to the avoiding a Civil War, which the Men of Property ſo much dreaded, that the King ſhould not ſend over any Troops from France, as for the Prince to reſt on his Arms in England; and till ſuch an Aſſurance had been actually obtain'd and guaranteed on his Majeſty's behalf, He, who had taken upon him to be the Defender of the Proteſtant Faith, and who could not be ignorant of the Intereſt of that inſidious Court to force his Majeſty into their Meaſures, under the Pretence of aſſiſting him to purſue his own, ought to have been as forward with his Preparations to ſuccour and protect, as they to divide and deſtroy: For if the Caſe of the Engliſh Proteſtants, before his Arrival, was grievous, that of the Iriſh was deſperate: They were the Minority in point of Number: They were under the Dominion of their Adverſaries: As they had, therefore, even a better Plea for Reſiſtance, ſo they ſtood alſo more in need of Deliverance: And as his Highneſs had made the Cauſe of Religion the Cauſe of his Expedition, he was ſo much the more oblig'd to haſten to their Reſcue. A.D. 1688-9.

It muſt not however be ſuppos'd, that this Letter of Summons contain'd the Whole of the Project; or that the Patrons of it were ſo very weak as to flatter themſelves, that the Lord-Deputy would be induc'd to give up the Sword merely for the ſake of his Party, without any immediate Conſideration for himſelf. On the contrary, it is reaſonable to think, from the Care which was ſhewn in the Choice of the Perſon to be ſent on this Errand, that his ſecret Inſtructions regarded the Man, more than the Cauſe. Sarsfield, one of the beſt and braveſt of the Iriſh Officers, was firſt apply'd to, but gallantly refus'd it, ſaying, He would freely ſerve his Highneſs againſt the King of France, but never would be acceſſary to deprive his lawful Sovereign of one of his Kingdoms. Colonel Hamilton, another Officer of the ſame Nation, and of equal Character, was next recommended by young Temple, according to Biſhop Burnet, as well on the Credit of that Character, as becauſe he was known to be much in the Favour of the Lord-Deputy, and in the Eſteem of his Countrymen: "Hamilton, we are told by that Author, was in the Prince's Hands as a ſort of Priſoner of War, and had been, together with a Body of Iriſh Soldiers, whom the Prince kept for ſome time as Priſoners in the Iſle of Wight, and whom he GAVE afterwards to the Emperor.--- So he undertook to prevail with the Earl of Tyrconnel to deliver up the Government; and promiſ'd, that he either would bring him to it, or that he would come back and give an Account of his Negociation." His Lordſhip proceeds to ſay, "That this Step had a very ill Effect; that Hamilton broke his Faith with the Prince, and made uſe of his Credit with Tyrconnel to rivet him in the Intereſt of the King his Maſter, by inſinuating, That, if he ſtood firm, Affairs would take a new Turn in his Majeſty's Favour; and, upon the Whole, directs his Readers to conclude, That the Lord-Deputy was really diſpos'd to ſubmit, on good (p) Conditions, till Hamilton gave him this new Bias; and that the Blame of the whole Miſcarriage ought to be plac'd to the Account of the Temples, who recommended him."

by Colonel Hamilton, who betrays his Truſt.

The Temples blam'd for that Miſcarriage.

Sir William is involved in this Charge as well as his (q) Son and his Brother. And yet Dr. Swift, who was his Chaplain, aſſures us in the Life of that Gentleman, which he has prefix'd to his Works, That tho'

(q) This hopeful young Gentleman, Sir William's only Son, was ſo overcome with Concern for the ill Succeſs of this his firſt Adventure in public Buſineſs, that, in a Fit of Deſpair, he leap'd into the Thames, near the Bridge, and was drown'd.

A.D. 1688-9. tho' he visited the Prince at Windsor, and introduc'd his Son to him, he had neither Concern in, nor Knowledge of, his Highness's Expedition; and that he peremptorily refus'd to enter into his Service, tho' tempted and even importun'd to accept of the Secretary's Office. But, if this should not be sufficient to disculpate him, and as he was the leading Man of his Family, and his own Interest was greatly concern'd in the Tranquillity of Ireland, it should still be thought he had the Lead in this unhappy Negotiation, there is yet another Passage of the Bishop's own, which leaves Room to suppose, that a Family Interest was not the governing Principle in this mysterious Affair. "Others thought, says his Lordship, that the leaving Ireland in this dangerous State, might be a Means to bring the Convention to a more speedy Settlement of England, and that, therefore, the Prince ought not to make too much Haste to retrieve Ireland. This Advice was generally believ'd to be given by the Marquis of Hallifax; and it was like him. The Prince did not seem to apprehend enough the Consequence of the Revolt of Ireland, and was much blam'd for his Slowness in not preventing it in time." Thus we have a new Charge which reaches far beyond the Temples, and to which he puts in no other Answer than the several Fallacies before expos'd. But if it has any Foundation in Truth, whatever Reason the Nation had to rejoice in their Deliverance, they had little to glory in their Deliverer, who could so coolly sacrifice one Kingdom to gratify his Ambition with another.

Another Cause assign'd for the Neglect of Ireland.

The exact time when Hamilton came to Dublin, and Mountjoy and Rice left it, is not precisely specify'd. As our Historian of his own Times states the Matter, the Embassy of the latter was an Effect of the Collusion carry'd on between the Lord-Deputy and the former; but he is too inaccurate every where in point of Chronology to be depended upon any where: And upon comparing the Date of Keating's Letter, which was December 29, with that of Mountjoy's, which was January 10, it appears next to impossible that such a Journey, and such a Detail as must have been preparatory to it, could have been completed in so short a time. But whether this was the Case or not, it seems reasonable to think, that his Excellency had taken his Resolution before they set out; and that Hamilton's Applications only serv'd to confirm him in it: For while they were on their way to Paris, a French Engineer landed at Cork, and went immediately post to Dublin; and when they arrived there, Lord Mountjoy was thrown into the Bastile, before he had Leave to tell his Story; which shews that he was employ'd on that Errand for that End; and that the two Kings had already form'd their Concert; which they could scarcely have done without TYRCONNEL's Participation. Besides all which, it is farther remarkable, that the two Privy Counsellors were scarce gone, before his Excellency deny'd that he had ever made such Concessions to the Protestants, as Lord Mountjoy had annex'd to his said Circular Letter; appear'd highly provok'd that he had dispers'd any such Letter; and absolutely refus'd to perform any one of them: Which, as it was, in effect, throwing off the Mask at once; so it convinc'd the Protestants of that Kingdom, that all Hopes of an Accommodation were at an End. A.D. 1689.

Affairs of Scotland. [Balcarras's Memoirs, p. 50, 51, 52.]

It is now time to make a Transition to the Affairs of Scotland. The Earl of Balcarras, who had been dispatch'd by the Regency of that Kingdom to lay before the King the State of it, and to request new Instructions, did not arrive at London till the Day after his Majesty first withdrew from Whitehall; and, finding the Purpose of his Journey thus lamentably defeated, thought it his Duty to advise with such other Scotish Privy-Counsellors as were in Town, both on the Contents of his Mission, and what was proper to be done in the present unparallel'd Crisis. These were in all five: And the most eminent of them were the Viscount Dundee and the Duke of Hamilton. To the last, the Earl had a Letter from the Council, requesting, that his Grace would join with him in representing Matters to his Majesty, and in receiving his Commands thereon. On the Receipt of this Letter, the Duke demanded a Sight of that to the King, and declar'd, that otherwise he would have nothing to do with them. They gave him a Copy of it; he insisted haughtily on having the Original; the Earl as peremptorily refus'd it; which put his Grace into such a Fury, that he could no longer conceal his Purpose in requiring it; which was to lay it before the Lords at Whitehall. This in his Transport he avow'd; as also, that he would have no farther Concern with a Chancellor, and such of his Collegues as then sat at the Council-board, contrary to Law; and that he would consult with the English Lords what was proper to be done next. With which Words he left them in a Rage, tho' the Meeting was held in his own House. Nor was the Rashness which he shew'd on this Occasion more inexcusable than the Meanness which he shew'd immediately after; for upon his Majesty's unexpected Return, he sent for Ld. Dundee, made Excuses for his Passion, desir'd him to make his Peace with the rest of the Lords; and, at another Meeting, offer'd them his Friendship and Service. What follow'd, was his assisting at the only Council held by the King during his short Stay at Whitehall, as we have seen, and his shewing all imaginable Concern for his Service: And yet, while his Son waited upon his Majesty in his Barge to Rochester, he staid in London to be ready among the foremost to pay his Court to the Prince, at his Arrival at St. James's.

Lord Balcarras's Interview with the Duke of Hamilton at London.

For the Turn which things had already taken at Edinburgh in his Highness's Favour, and which has been already explain'd, he was principally obliged to the Marquis of Athole: But then the Marquis was either so jealous of the Duke of Hamilton, or so impatient to put in for his Reward, that he left his Post at the Head of the Regency, and came up to London; which was, in a manner,

A.D. 1688-9. ner, undoing all again; for those who had before submitted to him and his Faction, re-assum'd the Direction, and gather'd together such a Body of Guards as seem'd to argue a Resolution to keep it; and he found by his Reception, that his Importance sunk with his Power, and that his Merit lasted no longer than his Services.

The Marquis of Athole comes to London, and is coldly receiv'd: The Duke of Hamilton gets the start in his Highness's Favour.

The Duke, on the contrary, was receiv'd by his Highness with all the Distinction imaginable; not out of Affection, but, as we are told, because he was the fittest Tool to manage the different Interests of his Countrymen: For with the discontented Noblemen and Gentlemen, none appear'd more dissatisfy'd with all that had been done in the former Reign, tho' none had been deeper concern'd in what was done, than he. To the Presbyterians he suggested, that he had always been in their Interest; and that whenever he seem'd to give into any Severities against them, it was in order to preserve them from worse. Of the Episcopal Party, at least of such as were inclin'd to trust him, he begg'd they would suspend their Judgment of him, till a Convention should be call'd, and then it would be seen who were most for the Interest of the King and the Nation. With these Pretexts, so easy to be made by Men of no Principle, and so likely to ensnare the Credulous and Unwary, he seduced a vast Number of all Persuasions to place their whole Confidence in him, and made himself thought absolutely necessary to all Governments, which was all he aim'd at.—— This is the Portrait of his Grace, as given by Lord Belcarras, and what indeed will serve for every self-interested, aspiring Temporizer whatsoever. His Lordship adds, That the better to deceive the several Parties whom he propos'd to lead, he never appear'd at any of their separate Meetings; for if he had confin'd himself to any one, he had oblig'd the rest; and if he had openly caball'd with all, he had brought himself into Suspicion with all; whereas, by this artful Management, each believ'd he was their own, and that all his Interest, Credit, and Consequence would be made use of for their sole Advantage.

An Intrigue within the Circle of a Court thrives like a Plant in a Hot-bed: Thus the Artifices of the Duke, in concurrence with the Influence of the Prince-Administrator, brought the Scotish Affairs to such a Ripeness, in so short a time, that in the Beginning of January, all the Nobility of that Kingdom (not excepting even the Earl of Belcarras and the Viscount Dundee) and all the considerable Gentlemen who were then in London, to the Number of about eighty of the Latter and thirty of the Former, were induc'd to wait upon his Highness, and to negociate with him, in a foreign Court, for the whole Nation, without any Authority from the Regency still subsisting, or the City of Edinburgh, or the rest of the Peers, who were in all about a hundred and forty. The Prince had indeed undertaken to deliver Scotland as well as England; and, in the Declaration which he caus'd to be circulated there, to prepare his Way, had as explicitly disavow'd all selfish Designs and Ends, as in that which had captivated the People of England: But the Scots had seen him dispense with his own Promises; had seen him not only refuse all Treaty with the King, but actually make use of his Fears to drive him out of his Kingdom: When, therefore, they took this extraordinary Step, they had their Eyes open; and, in agreeing to this Meeting, they knew they were to article away their Crown. A.D. 1688-9.

The proper Disposition being thus made, the Prince sent a formal Invitation to the several Persons concern'd, to meet him at St. James's: They comply'd with it: The Meeting was held January the 7th; and his Highness upon that Occasion express'd himself as follows:

His Highness invites the Scotish Peers and Gentlemen to St. James's, and desires their Advice.

"My Lords and Gentlemen, The only Reason that induc'd me to undergo so great an Undertaking was, that I saw the Laws and Liberties of these Kingdoms overturn'd, and the Protestant Religion in imminent Danger: And seeing you are here, so many Noblemen and Gentlemen, I have called you together, that I may have your Advice, what is to be done for securing the Protestant Religion, and restoring your Laws and Liberties, according to my Declaration."

He then withdrew; and they adjourn'd to the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, where, having unanimously chosen the Duke of Hamilton for their President, his Grace made an introductory Speech to the Business of the Day; in which he had the Address to direct his Audience to the very Point the Prince had in view, without seeming to do so; and to make his Court, without doing any open Violence to his Impartiality: In particular, he enlarg'd on the present deplorable State of Scotland; said they were cast loose, without any Order, or Shadow of Government: That this had made way for Licentiousness and Confusion: That the Mob were at present Masters; and that therefore there was an absolute Necessity to lodge the supreme Authority somewhere, till a Convention of the States could be held, who might provide for a more solid and lasting Settlement. To this all agreed; as also that they ought to assist his Highness with their Advice: But in adjusting Particulars many Debates arose, and many Hours were wasted. At last, however, certain Heads were adopted, and digested in Writing, in order to be farther consider'd the next Day. Accordingly, the next Day in the Afternoon, the Debate was resum'd, some Amendments were made, and, upon the Whole, the Writing was order'd to be engross'd, as the last Act of the Day; when, to the general Surprize, the Earl of (r) Arran rose up, and, out of a Paper,

They chuse the Duke of Hamilton for their Chairman.

Lord Arran's Motion in behalf of the King.

(r) In the Earl of Belcarras's Memoirs, the Names of the Noblemen of Scotland are seldom specify'd at length: And the Name of this Nobleman in particular is, by Mistake, specify'd thus, A—ll; which, contrary to a notorious Fact,

A.D. 1688-9. Paper, according to the Earl of Belcarras, read as follows:

" My Lords, I have all the Honour and Deference for the Prince of Orange imaginable. I think him a brave Prince, and that we owe him great Obligations, in contributing so much for our Delivery from Popery. But, while I pay him those Praises, I cannot violate my Duty to my Master. I must distinguish between his Popery and his Person. I dislike the one, but have sworn, and do owe, Allegiance to the other; which makes it impossible for me to sign away that which I cannot forbear believing is the King my Master's Right. For his present Absence from us, by being in France, can no more affect our Duty, than his longer Absence from us in Scotland has done all this while.

My Lords, the Prince in his Paper desires our Advice: Mine is, That we should move his Highness to desire his Majesty to return and call a free Parliament, for the securing our Religion and Property, according to the known Laws of that Kingdom; which, in my humble Opinion, will at last be found the best Way to heal all our Breaches."

It is no uncommon thing in Scotland for a Father and a Son to take different Parties; for, in such case, which ever succeeds, the Family is sure to be safe: We are not to wonder therefore at this Incident, or that his Grace in the Chair frown'd on his Son, for having made so rash a Motion: But the whole Company appear'd as little satisfy'd with it, and broke up almost immediately, without entering into any Debate. The Contempt which was thus put upon it encourag'd Sir Patrick Hume, the next Day, when they met for the last time, to make his Court at Lord Arran's Expence, by reminding them of his Yesterday's Proposal; by demanding whether any body present would second it? and, when no body reply'd, by proceeding to say, " That it was evidently opposite and inimicous to his Highness the Prince of Orange's Undertaking, his Declaration, and the good Intentions of preserving the Protestant Religion, and of restoring their Laws and Liberties, express'd in it;" as also by moving, " That the Meeting should declare this to be their Opinion of it." Lord Cardross seconded this officious Motion, and thereby furnish'd his Grace in the Chair with a new Opportunity to illustrate that Equality and Moderation, which he affected at this time, in order to render himself the common Center of all Parties, and thereby more respected by that which was uppermost. " Our Business, said he, is to prepare an Advice to be offer'd to the Prince; and that Advice being now ready to be put to the Vote, there is no need to give our Sense of the Earl's Proposal: Besides, as no body else has own'd or seconded that Proposal, it is no longer before us: And the Vote of the Meeting, upon the Advice brought in by their Order, will sufficiently declare their Opinion for it." He therefore A.D. 1688-9. call'd for that Vote: Lord Sutherland seconded his Grace: Upon which, finding their Zeal was not according to Knowledge, Sir Patrick and Lord Cardross dropp'd their Motion: And, upon the Question, the Paper of Advice, which follows, was unanimously agreed to, viz.

" We the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom of Scotland, assembled at your Highness's Desire, in this extraordinary Conjunction, do give your Highness our humble and hearty Thanks for your pious and generous Undertaking, for preserving of the Protestant Religion, and restoring the Laws and Liberties of these Kingdoms.

In order to the attaining these Ends, our humble Advice and Desire is, That your Highness take upon you the Administration of all Affairs, both Civil and Military; the Disposal of the public Revenues and Fortresses of the Kingdom of Scotland, and the doing every thing that is necessary for the Preservation of the Peace of the Kingdom, until a general Meeting of the States of the Nation, which we humbly desire your Highness to call, to be holden at Edinburgh the Fourteenth Day of March next, by your Letters or Proclamation, to be publish'd at the Market-Crosses of Edinburgh, and other Headboroughs of the several Shires and Stewarties, as sufficient Intimation to all concerned, and according to the Custom of the Kingdom: And that the Publication of these your Letters or Proclamation be by the Sheriffs, or Stewart-Clerks, for the Freeholders, who have the Value of Lands, holden according to Law, for making Elections; and by the Town-Clerks of the several Boroughs, for the Meeting of the whole Burgesses of the respective Royal Boroughs, to make their Elections at least fifteen Days before the Meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh; and the respective Clerks to make Intimation thereof, at least ten Days before the Meetings for Elections: And that the whole Electors and Members of the said Meeting at Edinburgh, qualified as above express'd, be Protestants, WITHOUT ANY OTHER EXCEPTION OR LIMITATION WHATSOEVER; to deliberate and resolve what is to be done for securing the Protestant Religion, and restoring the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, according to your Highness's Declaration."

It was also subscrib'd by every Individual present; and this render'd it in a manner unnecessary to sign the Association, which some contended for, tho' without Success. From this remarkable Unanimity, however, in the more essential Points, and particularly, from the Clause of Exclusion to Papists, and of Admission to all Protestants without distinction, to elect, or be elected, it was pretty apparent, that the King's Cause was, at present, as little consider'd by the Scots as the English: Lord Belcarras, in his Apology to the King, endeavours indeed to set a Glos instead of Arran indicates Argyll: It is farther to be observ'd concerning him, that he was one of those whom the Prince had already disoblig'd; for, upon his Return from attending the King to Rochester, his Highness took his Regiment of Horse from him, and gave it to its old Master the Earl of Oxford.

A.D. 1688-9. Gloſs on the Proceeding; but without Succeſs. According to him, the Diſorders which then convuls'd the Kingdom, and the Neceſſity to put an immediate Stop to them, made many comply; as alſo the Conſideration, that the Term of the Prince's Government was prefix'd to ſo ſhort a Day as the 16th of March: Then, as to Lord Arran's Propoſal, he ſays, That a great many would willingly have join'd in it, had they been ſeaſonably appriz'd of it, whereas he brought it in without the Participation of any body: Forgetting, or chuſing to forget, that it was as much neglected the ſecond Day as the firſt. He adds, That Lord Arran himſelf was under Suſpicion of being ſecretly attach'd to the Prince as well as his Father; that tho' his Propoſal ſeem'd juſt and bold, it was ill-tim'd, conſidering, if any had join'd with him, his Highneſs would immediately have ſent down Troops to Scotland; which would have inevitably hinder'd all the King's Friends from appearing at the Convention, where alone they could do him Service; and, that all a wiſe Man had to do was, to get out of the Claws of the Enemy, which, without theſe Compliances, had been impoſſible; the Roads being every where guarded, and all Paſſage deny'd, till by theſe Conceſſions they had given earneſt of their good Behaviour. Laſtly, his Lordſhip gravely mentions the Scruples of many of the loyal Party about ſitting in this Convention; as holding it to be againſt their Oath to ſit in any Aſſembly not called by Regal Authority; after having ſat himſelf in the Aſſembly at Whitehall, and having there concurred in adviſing the Prince to call that very Convention, which, as before hinted, was to gratify him with the Crown.

And preſent it to the Prince at Whitehall.

The very Manner of preſenting their Paper of Advice to his Highneſs, moreover, carry'd along with it an Air of Homage; for, to ſhew him the more Reſpect, they all waited upon him in Perſon with it; and they did the ſame, when he call'd upon them to receive his Anſwer: But, in return for this Compliment, we are told, He thank'd them for the Truſt they repos'd in him; which was a Condeſcenſion that he could not prevail with himſelf to ſhew to the Lords and Commons of England. The Paper was deliver'd on the 10th: On the 14th his Highneſs reply'd as follows: A.D. 1688-9. [Sir John Dalrymple's Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland, Append. Part 2.]

His Highneſs's Anſwer.

"My Lords and Gentlemen, In purſuance of your Advice, I will, until the Meeting of the States in March next, give ſuch Orders concerning the Affairs of Scotland, as are neceſſary for the calling of the ſaid Meeting, for the preſerving of the Peace, the applying of the public Revenue to the moſt preſſing Uſes, and putting the Fortreſſes in the Hands of Perſons, in whom the Nation can have a juſt Confidence: And I do further aſſure you, that you will always find me ready to concur with you in every thing that may be found neceſſary for ſecuring the Proteſtant Religion, and reſtoring the Laws and Liberties of the Nation."

And upon this Occaſion there happen'd yet another Incident, which ſerv'd to ſhew the Forwardneſs of the Scotiſh Nation to enliſt under the Prince's Banners; for the Earls of Crawford and Lathian, and Others, having arriv'd in London ſince the ſaid Paper had been preſented, the former of thoſe Earls, in the Name of all theſe New-comers, deſir'd of his Highneſs, that they alſo might have an Opportunity to ſubſcribe it: Which was done upon the ſpot: And 'tis added, that all ſhew'd great Satisfaction with his Anſwer.

"And now, ſays our Hiſtorian of his own Times, the Adminiſtration of the whole Iſle of Britain was put into the Prince's Hands." All that remain'd to be done, therefore, was to continue it there: And this was the great Buſineſs of the enſuing Convention: The Elections were all this while in agitation; and, according to the Author laſt-quoted, were manag'd fairly all England over. "The (f) Prince, continues he, did in no ſort interpoſe, in any Recommendation, directly or indirectly:" But then he admits, "that all Men were forming their Schemes, and fortifying their Party all they could:" And, if ſo, it muſt be concluded, That the Prince's Party

(f) His Highneſs's Letter of Summons, or Writ of Election, was as follows:

"Whereas the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, the Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes, heretofore Members of the Commons Houſe of Parliament, during the Reign of King Charles II. reſiding in and about the City of London, together with the Aldermen, and divers of the Common-council of the ſaid City, in this extraordinary Conjuncture, at our Requeſt, ſeverally aſſembled, to adviſe us the beſt Manner how to attain the Ends of our Declaration in calling a free Parliament for the Preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, and reſtoring the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom, and ſettling the ſame, that they may not be in danger of being again ſubverted, have adviſed and deſired us to cauſe our Letters to be written and directed; for the Counties, to the Coroners of the reſpective Counties, or any one of them; and, in default of the Coroners, to the Clerks of the Peace of the reſpective Counties; and for the Univerſities, to the reſpective Vice-Chancellors; and for the Cities, Boroughs, and Cinque-ports, to the chief Magiſtrate of each reſpective City, Borough, and Cinque-port; containing Directions for the chuſing in all ſuch Counties, Cities, Univerſities, Boroughs, and Cinque-ports, within ten Days after the Receipt of the ſaid reſpective Letters, ſuch a Number of Perſons to repreſent them, as from every ſuch Place is or are of right to be ſent to Parliament; of which Elections, and the Times and Places thereof, the reſpective Officers ſhall give notice: The Notice for the intended Election in the Counties to be publiſhed in the Market-towns within the reſpective Counties, by the ſpace of five Days at the leaſt before the ſaid Election; and for the Univerſities, Cities, Boroughs, and Cinque-ports, in every of them reſpectively, by the ſpace of three Days at the leaſt before the ſaid Election; the ſaid Letters, and the Execution thereof, to be returned by ſuch Officer and Officers, who ſhall execute the ſame, to the Clerk of the Crown in the Court of Chancery, ſo as the Perſons ſo to be choſen may meet and ſit at Weſtminſter the two and twentieth Day of January next.

We, heartily deſiring the Performance of what we have in our ſaid Declaration expreſs'd, in purſuance of the ſaid Advice and Deſire, have cauſed this our Letter to be written to you, to the Intent that you truly and uprightly, without Favour or Affection to any Perſon, or indirect Practice or Proceeding, do and execute what of your part ought to be done according to the ſaid Advice, for the due Execution thereof. The Elections to be made by ſuch Perſons only, as, according to the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms, of right ought to chuſe Members for Parliament; and that you cauſe a Return to be made, by Certificate under your Seal, of the Names of the Perſons elected, annexed to this our Letter, to the ſaid Clerk of the Crown, before the ſaid two and twentieth Day of January.

A.D. 1688-9. Party were as busy in fortifying as the reſt. The Duke of Bucks will have it, that all poſſible Induſtry was us'd for chuſing only Perſons ill-affected to the unhappy King: And it is no Secret, that the Influence of the Adminiſtration, in whatever Hands, has a mighty Sway on all ſuch Occaſions: It is true, there never was perhaps ſo little real Neceſſity to make uſe of it, as now; for the Eyes of the People in general, being ſtill dazzled with the Glare of his Highneſs's Pretenſions, and their Hearts embitter'd againſt the King and his Cauſe, they were eaſily led to believe, that in eſpouſing his Intereſt they eſpous'd their own; and, upon the Whole, ſince it does not appear that the Party, which afterwards ſo fiercely declam'd againſt the new Settlement, made any formal Complaint of extraordinary Iniquities and Outrages practis'd upon this Occaſion, we ought to conclude, that they wanted ſufficient Matter to found it upon: There was indeed no avow'd Oppoſition to his Highneſs; on the contrary, his Name, his Merits, his Services, were in every Mouth; and even thoſe who began about this time to turn their Backs upon him, becauſe he had firſt turn'd his Back upon them, durſt not openly gratify their Reſentment, for fear of drawing down the Reſentment of the Public on themſelves: That, therefore, the Convention, without any flagrantly-ſiniſter Practices, ſhould be form'd, for the general, of ſuch Perſons as were more diſpos'd to favour the Deliverer than the King, is not ſo much to be wonder'd at, as that the Latter ſhould afterwards find any Favour at all: Hitherto the whole Body of Proteſtants, of whatever Parts compos'd, had co-operated againſt him, had transferr'd that Attachment to his Highneſs which was once his acknowledg'd Right, had taken Arms on the Prince's Side, had aſſociated for his Defence, had overlook'd the Breaches of his Profeſſions and Declarations, had ſeen his Majeſty driven away from his Palace, if not without Compaſſion, at leaſt without the leaſt Remonſtrance in his Behalf: Even the great Aſſembly of Lords Spiritual and Temporal had heſitated whether they ſhould permit his own Guards to reſcue him out of the Hands of his own Subjects; had refus'd to receive his laſt Proteſt againſt the Violence which had been put upon him; had made a ſolemn Tender of the whole executive Power to the Prince, without the leaſt Retroſpect to his Majeſty or his Pretenſions; and had put it into his Power both to act as Sovereign, by convoking the States of the Kingdom, and, by their Means, to ſecure to himſelf the Poſſeſſion of the Sovereignty for good and all: Every one of which Steps was equally inconſiſtent with the Paſſive-Obedience-Creed, and the Letter of the Law: That thoſe, therefore, who had gone ſuch Lengths, ſo unanimouſly, ſhould all at once ſeparate from, and oppoſe, one another; that Part of them ſhould reſume the ſame Scruples in point of Loyalty, which they had ſo notoriouſly violated; that they ſhould affect to make A.D. 1688-9. the Cauſe of the King the Cauſe of God, and endeavour to intereſt Heaven and Earth in his Reſtoration; can ſcarce be accounted for on any other Principle, than that which induc'd them to commence Patriots. Till the King ſtretch'd forth his Hand againſt the Church, he had free Leave to make what Innovations he pleas'd in the State; nay, he had all the Aſſiſtance which the whole Body of the Clergy could give him: But he had no ſooner done ſo, than The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon! was every where the Word: And the Prince! was given out as the only Name under Heaven by which the Church could be ſav'd: Reſiſtance then became lawful, nay meritorious; the Plate of an Univerſity was at his Highneſs's Service; and the whole Intereſt, Power, and Credit of the whole eccleſiaſtic Eſtabliſhment at his Devotion.--- The Event ſhew'd that their Weight was great; and, it muſt be own'd, the Prince had the full Benefit of it.--- Poſſibly, they preſum'd too much on this, and expected to have the ſole Government of his Highneſs by way of Equivalent; and poſſibly the Prince, on the other hand, ſet ſo high a Value on the Deliverance he had brought them, that he thought himſelf entitled to their beſt Services, and that thoſe Services ought to be plac'd to their own Account. When two Parties ſtand on ſuch unequal Grounds, they will be ſure to overlook one another: And, if this was the Caſe with theſe, it was but natural that they ſhould ſeparate with as much Haſte as they had joined. It is certain, that his Highneſs loſt the Body of the Biſhops in a few Days after he enter'd upon his Adminiſtration; as alſo, that he never was upon good Terms with their Metropolitan, after he took poſſeſſion of St. James's: The Particulars of the Breach, indeed, both Sides, as if by Conſent, have left in the Dark; and for that Reaſon it may be charitably concluded, that they would not bear the Light. It is as certain, that, before his Government was a Fortnight old, the Preſs, which had hitherto been ſo ſerviceable to his Views and Deſigns, was made uſe of againſt him; and that he himſelf was ſo little able to bear the Freedoms which his own Party had ſo freely us'd, that he caus'd the following Order to be ſet forth in the Gazette, viz. [Num. 2417.]

Order to reſtrain the Preſs.

"Whereas there are divers falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious Books, Papers of News, and Pamphlets, daily printed and diſperſed, containing idle and miſtaken Relations of what paſſes, with malicious Reflections upon Perſons, to the Diſturbance of the public Peace, which are publiſh'd without any Authority, contrary to the Laws in that Caſe provided; his Highneſs the Prince of Orange has thought fit to order and require the Maſter and Wardens of the Company of Stationers, and Robert Stephens, LATE (s) Meſſenger of the Preſs, to make diligent Search in all Printing-houſes, and other Places, and to apprehend all ſuch Authors, Printers, Bookſellers,

(s) The very Inſtrument made uſe of on the like Occaſion, in the former Reign.

A.D. 1688-9. Booksellers, Hawkers, and others, as shall be found to print, sell, or disperse the same, and to have them before the next Justice of the Peace, to the intent they may be proceeded against according to Law; for the due Execution whereof, all Mayors, Justices of the Peace, and other Officers, are requir'd to be aiding and assisting to them, as there shall be occasion."

A Sketch of the Prince's Cabinet.

Among the Persons who at this time compos'd the Prince's Cabinet, Mr. Bentinck held the first Place, in such a Degree of Super-eminence, as scarce left Room for a Second: But if any had a Pretence to aspire so high, it was Mr. Sydney; for if the Former had his Highness's Heart without a Rival, the Latter had an equal Share in his Confidence: After them came the Earl of Shrewsbury, Admiral Herbert, Lord Mordaunt, Lord Delamere, and Mr. Russel, who, led by their Passions as well as their Principles, were, of all others, deepest engag'd in his Highness's Adventure, and for that Reason were trusted by him the most: The Marquis of Halifax and the Earl of Danby had also their Seats, as Prime-politicians and Party-leaders; and were made great use of, as well because of their Followings, as because they bid against each other for the Administration. The Earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rochester, and whoever else of the old Prerogative-party had any Credit or Authority among them, for a while also made their Court to his Highness as assiduously as the rest, and so long were permitted to participate of his Councils.

All of these had their particular Views and Connections; and any, perhaps, would have serv'd him on his own Terms, provided they might have engross'd him. When therefore it appear'd that his Highness had already made his Choice; that he continued to depend chiefly on those with whom he at first embark'd; that the Stream of Elections was directed in the same Channel; and that the Grandees of the Church were sufficiently disoblig'd to take any Bias that should be given them, it became the Business of the Disappointed to set up an Opposition, under such a Colour, if possible, as should both countenance them in what they had already done, and what they design'd to do.

The Plan which they adopted upon this Occasion, considering their own Advices to the Prince at Windsor, when the King's Message by Lord Feversham was under Deliberation, and considering the Treatment which the King had since receiv'd from the whole Body of the Nobility, assembled at Westminster, was a strange one: They took upon them to shew, in Print, 1. The Necessity of treating with his Majesty to return to his Government, under such legal Restraints as should give Security to the most jealous Persons, for the Preservation of their Liberties, Laws, and Religion; with a Proviso, that, if he should not give his Consent, the next Heir should be declar'd Regent. 2. To demonstrate that this was practicable. And, 3. That every other Course would be iniquitous, desperate and ruinous. According to them, the very Refusal to treat would be thought such a scandalous Neglect of Duty to a Sovereign Prince, and would give such Jealousies to People, that those who oppos'd it were only afraid that the King should comply, as would be the Foundation of universal Discontents: And, if he was set aside, it could not be done by any legal Authority: In which case, no Man would think himself bound in Conscience to obey or acknowledge any other King. They further urg'd, That if those conscientious Men should be ever so few, if they were Men of Eminence for their Integrity and Ability in Church or State, those few Examples would give a terrible Shock to a new, tottering Government: That tho' the late Defection was general, it had no other End than to re-establish Law and Religion on the old Foundation of a free Parliament, which was all the Prince himself declar'd for: That the Resentments of the disobliged Nobility, Gentry, and Soldiery, would shock a Throne which had so sandy a Foundation: That tho' the Country would have paid their Deliverers chearfully, if they had acted as Deliverers only, they would grudge to pay them for doing their own Business: That, under such a Variety of Discontents, there would be no Way to keep the Peace; but by a standing Army; which would alter the Frame of our Constitution, and establish one of the great Grievances which we had complain'd of: That if the Convention, notwithstanding all these Considerations, should pass on to the next Heir, it would be incumbent on them to examine thoroughly the Pretences of the Prince of Wales; and yet, if they had not good Proofs of an Imposture, they had better let it alone: And that the giving the Crown to the Prince of Orange, upon the Pretence that the Government was dissolv'd, would shew the Populace the Way to argue themselves into a State of Nature, and to level all Distinctions at once.

A.D. 1688-9.

The Person who held the Pen on this extraordinary Occasion was Dr. Sherlock, who had before defended the Conduct of the Bishops against the Emissaries of the King; and we ought not to forget, that, in the Course of his Performance, he has let slip the following menacing Passage, which will serve in a good degree to account for the growing Ill-humours of the Church, in part touch'd upon above: "There are no Contentions so fierce as those about Religion: This gave Life and Spirit to the Prince's Design, and had the main Stroke in this late Revolution: And tho' Popery were a hated Religion, yet most Men are as zealous for their own Religion as they are against Popery: Those of the Church of England are very glad to get rid of Popery; but they will not be contented to part with their Church into the Bargain; for this would be as bad as they could have suffer'd under Popery. The several Sects of Dissenters are glad to get rid of Popery also; but now they expect glorious Days for themselves; and what they expect God Almighty knows, for I am confident they don't know themselves. Now consider how difficult it will be for any Prince, who has but a crazy Title to the immediate Poſſeſſion of the Crown, to adjuſt that Matter ſo, as neither to diſguſt the Church of England nor the Diſſenters; and, if either of them be diſoblig'd, there is a formidable Party made againſt him."

There is alſo a Poſtſcript to this Letter, in which we find the following ſhrewd Paſſage: "There is one thing more I would beg of you, viz. That the Story of a French League to cut Proteſtants Throats in England may be well examin'd; for this did more to drive the King out of the Nation, than the Prince's Army: And, if it ſhould prove a Sham, as ſome, who pretend to know, ſay it is, it ſeems at leaſt to be half an Argument to invite the King back again."

To this Pamphlet an expreſs Anſwer was immediately ſet forth: But as there is (t) more Pertneſs than Argument or Information in it; and as, about the ſame time, another more important Tract (before-mention'd, in the former Volume) called, An Enquiry into the preſent State of Affairs, was alſo ſet forth, with thoſe intereſting Words, Publiſh'd by Authority, in the Front of it; it will be more ſatisfactory to take our Counter-evidence from thence; and that more eſpecially, becauſe it treats profeſſedly of the Two grand Queſtions, Whether the People, in their preſent Circumſtances, ow'd Allegiance to the King? or, Whether they were bound to treat with him, and call him back, or not? The Author of this was Dr. Burnet: He ſets out with adopting St. Paul's Syſtem of Government (Rom. Cap. xiii.) founded on Power only, without any reſpect to Right; and concludes from it, That the Duties of Magiſtrate and Subject were reciprocal; and that, conſequently, upon the total Failing of the one, the other did likewiſe ceaſe. He then proceeds to the particular Caſe of the King; charges him with abuſing his Truſt, to the Subverſion of the Government; ſuppoſes the Fact to be acknowledg'd on all Sides, and to be ſo notorious as to need no Proof; ſays, that, how abſolute ſoever the Authority of a Governor might be, as ſoon as it appear'd, that the Bulwarks, inſtead of being the Defences of the City, were become Batteries to ruin it, Nature would lead to a ſhort Way of arguing; and all Men would conclude, that their only Duty was Self-preſervation: Which being allow'd, it follow'd, that the King and his People were in a State of War; and, conſequently, all Ties were broke on both Sides. His next Topic is the Deſertion, which he ſtates as voluntary (the King having no juſt, viſible Cauſe of Fear upon him,) after a Treaty had been ſet on foot, which had nothing that could be hard in it, except it was the putting the Laws in force againſt Papiſts in Employment, the giving the City of London ſome Quiet from their juſt Fears, and the aſſigning the Pay for the Prince's Army: And from hence alſo he concludes, that the mutual Tie was broke a ſecond time; and that the People, being then forſaken, were under a Neceſſity to provide for their own Safety. After this he aſſerts, That either the Allegiance of the People to the King was entirely diſſolv'd, or it ſtill ſubſiſted in its full Force and Vigour: If the Firſt, That then they were under no Obligation to his Majeſty; and it would be a hard Taſk to perſuade Men to return to their Bonds again: If the Laſt, That then they ought to recall the King, imploring only his Pardon for what was paſt, without entering upon any previous Treaty, or preſuming to offer any Articles to him. To any Suppoſition which might be made, that the Allegiance of the Subject was only ſuſpended, not diſſolved, as in the Caſe of an Infant or Madman; and that, conſequently, the Title and Dignity of King ſhould ſtill be preſerv'd to his Majeſty, even tho' the Regency ſhould be transferr'd to another, he anſwers, That natural Diſabilities afforded no Argument in favour of ſuch as were affected and culpable; and that, beſides, in either of thoſe Caſes, there could ariſe no Damage to the Public, by any Struggle between the King and the Regent; whereas, in the preſent Caſe, ſuch a Struggle would be unavoidable, and the Conſequence muſt infallibly be, either the overthrowing the Regency, if not aſſaſſinating the Regent; or, in the Impriſonment of the King: That it could not be ſuppos'd, that any of the King's Children, in whom Piety and Nature work'd, could ever engage in a State of Life, which gave them ſo melancholy a Proſpect: That the Name and Title of a King carry'd a Sound with them, which ſtruck the People: That if, after all the Provocations which the Nation had receiv'd, it ſhould be thought proper to let the King continue to have the Advantage of that Title and Name, it would be natural for all Men, when the preſent Sharpneſs was worn off, to think Matters had been carry'd too far againſt him: That the leaving any Root in the Ground might occaſion a new Spring: That the Subjects were bound, by their Oaths, to maintain the King in his Prerogatives, as well as his Title: That it would look like condemning their own Actions, to allow him the Honour, and yet deprive him of the Power: That if the Oath might be ſlacken'd in any one Part, it might be diſpens'd with in all: That, in all Settlements, it was natural to aſk for good Security: That Experience had ſhewn what inſignificant things Promiſes and Oaths were, when Popery was in the other Scale: That to truſt any more was too impudent a Propoſition for any Man to make: That, therefore, if a Treaty was to be open'd, and the King to return on whatever Condition, it was natural to think the Deſign of Popery and arbitrary

A Pamphlet, by Authority, to prove that no Treaty ought to be held with the King.

(t) The Letter-Writer had ſaid, "That as the Army ought not to have fought for Popery, nor againſt the Laws and Liberties of this Country, ſo neither ought they to have deſerted the Defence of the King's Perſon and Crown, but have brought the Prince to Terms as well as the King." And the Anſwerer replies, "Why, Sir, nemo tenetur ad Impoſſibilia. The King was never brought to Terms, nor, perhaps, never will: So that if they had fought at all, it muſt have been for Popery and againſt both our Laws and Liberties. Sir, ſhew when and where the King offer'd us or the Prince any Terms, and I will paſs my Word, you ſhall be employ'd to frame Laws for the Convention."

A.D. 1688-9. bitrary Government would probably return with him, and that more furiouſly, and more irreſiſtably than ever; for it was not to be expected, that God would work new Miracles for the Preſervation of a People, who threw themſelves back into the miſerable Condition they had once been reſcued from: That if, after all, it ſhould be inſiſted, that the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy were conceiv'd in ſuch Terms, as made it impoſſible to break thro' them, it ought to be conſider'd and receiv'd as a full Anſwer, That the End and Deſign of thoſe Laws were, to ſecure us againſt the Danger of Popery: That the King himſelf, to whom thoſe Oaths are taken, is no longer King, than while he maintains thoſe Laws which bind his Subjects to Obedience: And that if the King ceaſes to be King, by ſubverting our Conſtitution firſt, and deſerting us afterwards, then all our Oaths fall to the Ground; like the matrimonial Oath, when the Condition of it was forfeited: In which caſe, the next Heir became the lawful and rightful King; and, if the next was a Femme covert, then, by the Law of Nations, which creates a Communication of all the Rights of the Wife to the Huſband, this Right of Sovereignty was communicated to him alſo: That, moreover, all the Schemes which could be offer'd for ſecuring the Nation, by a Treaty with the King, had ſuch viſible Defects in them, that Men, who were accuſtom'd to examine things, could not be deceiv'd by them: That the Law-Maxim, ſo often inculcated of late, That all Acts of Parliament to the Diſheriſon of the Crown were null and void in themſelves, ſwept away the very Foundations of all the Security which could be offer'd: That there could be no legal Parliament, without taking the Oath of Allegiance to the King; to do which to the King, in the naked State he was to be reduced to, by thoſe who were for treating with him, would be putting a Scorn on God and Religion: And, That the Nation could have no Security by Law for what they had done, or for what remain'd to be done, but by an Act paſs'd by King, Lords, and Commons. Theſe are the Contents of ſeven of his Sections: The eighth and ninth are of ſo much Conſequence, (the Former on a national account, and the Latter for the ſake of pointing out the Turns and Doubles of theſe Revolutioners) that they deſerve to be inſerted entire.

"But, after all, ſome Men plainly ſay, The King can do no Wrong; that his Miniſters are only accountable for all the Ill he had done; and that the Prince, in his Declaration, has laid the Blame of all that for which he engag'd in this great Deſign on the evil Counſellors about the King, on whom the Puniſhment ought to fall, and not on the King himſelf, whoſe Perſon is exempt from Cenſure. To all which this is to be anſwer'd, That the Maxim, The King can do no Wrong, is perverted to a Senſe very different from that which was at firſt intended by it; for the Meaning of it is only this, That the King's Power cannot go ſo far as to ſupport him in the doing of any Injuſtice or Wrong to any, according to that Chapter in Magna Charta, by which all Commiſſions granted againſt Law are declar'd to be null and void; for this is the true Meaning of that Maxim. But there is no Reaſon to carry this ſo far, as that if Kings will ſtrain their Authority, viſibly, to do the higheſt Wrongs poſſible, they were in no way accountable for it. Whatſoever has been done in Parliament, and has never been condemned by any ſubſequent one, is a Part of the Law of England: Since then two of our Kings, Edward II. and Richard II. have been judged in Parliament for their Maladminiſtration; and ſince theſe Judgments have never been vacated by any ſubſequent Parliaments; thoſe Proceedings are a Part of our Law. And tho' perhaps there have been more expreſs Definitions made of late in favour of the Crown, than ever were in former Times; yet as long as thoſe Proceedings remain upon Record, it is plain that this great Right of the Engliſh Nation of preſerving itſelf in Caſes of extreme Neceſſity, againſt the violent Invaſions that the Crown may make upon it, is ſtill entire, and in force. But, after all, it will be readily yielded, that as the Life of a Father is never to be attempted on by his Children, how great ſoever their Provocations may be; ſo the King, being made the political Father of the Country, his Perſon ought ſtill to be ſacred. But when the Root of the King's overturning our Laws is, his being ſo entirely devoted to his Religion, and to the Order of the Jeſuits, how decent ſoever it might be for the Prince to lay the Blame of all on his evil Counſellors, yet it will be an unreaſonable Piece of Tenderneſs in the Repreſentative of the Kingdom, not to lay the Blame of things where it ought to be laid.

A.D. 1688-9.

Either all Thoughts of treating with the King, or all Enquiries into the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales are to be laid aſide. The King has gone ſo far in what he has averred with relation to that Matter, that it is impoſſible to judge it an Impoſture without giving him a large Share in it; and no Man can think that it is impoſſible to maintain the common Decencies of Reſpect to the King, if any Steps are made in that Matter; for even an Enquiry into it is the calling his Honour into queſtion, in ſo ſenſible a Point, that no Man that can make a Diſcovery is ſafe to make it, nor are any ſafe who pretend to examine it, as long as there are any Thoughts of treating with him; which will never be believed to be quite laid down, as long as the Title of King is acknowledged to be ſtill in him. Men that condemn the Errors in Government committed by him, may flatter themſelves with the Poſſibility of his pardoning them; but there is no Mercy where the Matter is perſonal, in which his Honour is ſo immediately concern'd, and where a Judgment againſt the Child caſts ſo black and ſo indelible a Stain on himſelf."

In his tenth Section, reſuming the Conſideration of a Treaty, he proceeds yet farther to

A.D. 1688-9. to ſuggeſt, that ſuch Terms as the King might be induc'd to grant, would not be worth accepting; and that ſuch alone as would be acceptable, he would be oblig'd in Point of Honour to refuſe. By which we are at Liberty to conclude, that if the King would have given up his Son, and enter'd into the Confederacy againſt the Power which had given him Protection, and could have given ſufficient Security for the Performance of Articles, he might have continued to adminiſter the Kingdom in Truſt for the Prince, whether his Subjects gave their Conſent or not. He alſo adds, "That when Matters were brought to ſuch a Paſs as they then were, it was more becoming the Wiſdom and Dignity of the Nation to act frankly and aboveboard, than to think to varniſh them over with ſome outward Appearances: That in ſuch Caſes, any other way of proceeding had not that Air of Greatneſs and Openneſs which is neceſſary upon ſuch Occaſions: That a great deal of time would be loſt in preparing the Propoſitions; and a Treaty being once entertain'd, many might be practis'd on, and either be corrupted or deſtroy'd: That perhaps half of the Articles would be dropp'd in the Treaty, or the whole would be given up by the King in leſs Time than was employ'd in preparing any one of them: That the very Talk of a Treaty would keep the Minds of many in Agitation and Suſpence: That ſome who were then deſperate, with relation to the King, would enter into a ſeparate Treaty with him; and an inconſtant Multitude would be too much tempted to run as faſt to him as ever they ſhew'd Zeal againſt him: That theſe were not imaginary Dangers, but viſible to all who had converſed much in Hiſtory, or had obſerved the Varieties of Mens Thoughts with relation to public Affairs, or conſider'd how little is to be built on any preſent Heats, how fervent and how univerſal ſoever they may ſeem to be, and how ſoon a Nation may be apt to run even out of one Extreme into another; and that therefore the keeping things ſtill in a looſe and unſettled State, was the hazarding the whole Matter, and the running the Riſk of a Relapſe, which would be much more dangerous than the former Diſeaſe was, unleſs the King of France, who had the King now in his Power, would be pleas'd to mediate for us, out of his try'd Love to us and our Religion."

And in the eleventh (u) Section he dictates to the Nation as follows: "The clear and natural Method of proceeding upon this Occaſion, is, firſt, To ſtate this Nation as a Proteſtant Kingdom, that is incompatible with Popery or a Popiſh King; of which Opinion many were before the King came to the Crown; and he has ſo managed the Matter ſince, that he has convinced the whole Nation of it at laſt. Here a View may be taken of the Courſe of his Government, in thoſe things that have been notorious and public, without entring into ſuch Specialities as will need Proof, and by Conſequence take up Time; and in Concluſion it is to be ſet forth, that he has quitted the Realm in a Storm, and has left the Nation to ſhift for itſelf; and has both deſerted the Government in general, and abandon'd even thoſe who had ſtuck to him, and were ready to have ſacrific'd all for him in particular: And that the laſt Act of his Authority might be long remember'd, he order'd his Army to be diſbanded; which, ſince it was to be done without paying or diſarming the Soldiers, was the letting looſe of ſo many arm'd Men, under the greateſt Temptation to live like Banditti and Robbers in the Nation. Upon all this it is natural to declare the Throne void; and that the King has fallen from all Right to it. In all that I have ſaid concerning his Deſertion, I limit my Reflections to his firſt leaving of Whitehall; for the Accident at Feverſham, and what follow'd after that, cannot be call'd a Return to his People: And ſince the Seals never appear'd, and the King never ſpake of a Parliament, nor altered his Meaſures in any thing, but ſtill proſecuted his firſt Deſign by his ſecond Eſcape, his deſerting is ſtill to be dated from his firſt going from Whitehall; and he having given that juſt Advantage againſt himſelf, which came after all that Series of Injuſtice and Violence that had gone before it, no Man can think that it was not very fitting to carry it as far as it would go, and not to treat with him any more upon the foot of acknowledging him King."

A.D. 1688.

What gave ſo much the more Force to Dr. Sherlock's Paper, and made this Counter-performance of Dr. Burnet's ſo much the more neceſſary, was the following Letter from the King to the Lords of his Council; which, tho' not ſo much as mention'd by the Hiſtorian of his own Times, had been made public, and diſpers'd all over the Kingdom:

"JAMES R.

My Lords, when we ſaw that it was no longer ſafe for us to remain within our Kingdom of England, and that thereupon we had taken our Reſolutions to withdraw for ſome time,

(u) The Concluſion of all, which is principally calculated to make an Impreſſion on the Clergy, runs in theſe Words:

"When all this is laid together, it is not to be ſuppos'd that conſidering Men can be ſhock'd with thoſe Prejudices that ariſe, rather out of the Sound of ſome ill underſtood Words, than out of any real and forcible Arguments, and it can leaſt of all be imagin'd, that the great and learned Body which has ſo triumph'd over Popery in their late Conteſts with it, ſhould now let themſelves be ſo miſled with the narrow Notions of an unbounded Loyalty, as to oppoſe or even diſlike ſuch a complete Settlement, as the preſent Exigence of our Affairs requires. Their Worth, the Courage that they ſhew'd againſt Popery, and their Readineſs to have been made Sacrifices in that noble Reſiſtance which they both made and maintain'd to the laſt, has indeed rais'd them above Cenſure, and all ſevere Imputations. But it cannot but leſſen the Eſteem that is due to any, though it does not detract from their Worth, if they will ſtill purſue a Point that is liable to ſuch great and juſt Exceptions. No body can think they are in love with Popery, or fond of coming again under Father Peter's Miniſtry [who is charg'd with having ſaid, That he would make them eat their own Dung]: but Men that ſee through all the Reaſons that are offer'd for treating, and foreſee the fatal Conſequences that muſt attend it, will be tempted to think that ſome Men either have not Strength of Thought enough to examine this whole Matter more impartially, or that having once declar'd themſelves of a contrary Opinion, they cannot conquer Nature ſo far, as to do that which will import a Confeſſion of their once having been in an Error.

A.D. 1688-9. time, we left, to be communicated to you and to all our Subjects, the Reasons of our withdrawing; and were likewise resolv'd, at the same time, to leave such Orders behind us, to you of our Privy-council, as might best suit with the present State of our Affairs: But that being altogether unfafe for us at that time, we now think fit to let you know, that tho' it has been our constant Care since our first Accession to the Crown, to govern our People with that Justice and Moderation, as to give, if possible, NO Occasion of Complaint; yet more particularly upon the late Invasion, seeing how the Design was laid, and fearing that our People, who could not be destroy'd but by themselves, might, by little, imaginary Grievances, be cheated into a certain Ruin: To prevent so great Mischief, and to take away not only all just Causes, but even Pretences, of Discontent, we freely, and of our own accord, redressed all those things that were set forth as the Causes of that Invasion: And that we might be inform'd by the Counsel and Advice of our Subjects themselves, which way we might give them a further and full Satisfaction, we resolv'd to meet them in a free Parliament: And, in order to it, we first laid the Foundation of such a free Parliament, in restoring the City of London, and the rest of the Corporations, to their ancient Charters and Privileges; and afterwards actually appointed the Writs to be issued out for the Parliament's meeting on the 15th of January: But the Prince of Orange seeing all the Ends of his Declaration answer'd, the People beginning to be undeceiv'd, and returning apace to their ancient Duty and Allegiance; and well foreseeing, that, if the Parliament should meet at the time appointed, such a Settlement in all probability would be made, both in Church and State, as would totally defeat his ambitious and unjust Designs, resolv'd by all means possible to prevent the meeting of the Parliament: And, to do this the most effectual way, he thought fit to lay a Restraint on our Royal Person; for as it were absurd to call that a free Parliament, where there is any Force on either of the Houses, so much less can that Parliament be said to act freely, where the Sovereign, by whose Authority they meet and sit, and from whose Royal Assent all their Acts receive their Life and Sanction, is under actual Confinement. The hurrying of us under a Guard from our City of London, whose returning Loyalty he could no longer Trust, and the other Indignities we suffer'd in the Person of the Earl of Feversham, when sent to him by us, and in that barbarous Confinement of our own Person, we shall not here repeat, because they are, we doubt not, by this time very well known; and may, we hope, if enough consider'd and reflected upon, together with his other Violations and Breaches of the Laws and Liberties of England, which by this Invasion he pretended to restore, be sufficient to open the Eyes of all our Subjects, and let them plainly see what every one of them may expect, and what Treatment they shall find from him, if at any time it may serve his Purpose, from whose Hands a Sovereign Prince, an Uncle, and a Father, could meet with no better Entertainment. However, the Sense of these Indignities, and the just Apprehension of further Attempts against our Person, by them who already endeavour'd to murder our Reputation by infamous Calumnies (as if we had been capable of supposing a Prince of Wales) which was incomparably more injurious, than the destroying of our Person itself; together with a serious Reflection on a Saying of our Royal Father of blessed Memory, when he was in the like Circumstances, That there is little Distance between the Prisons and the Graves of Princes, (which afterwards prov'd too true in his Case) could not but persuade us to make use of that, which the Law of Nature gives to the meanest of our Subjects, of freeing ourselves, by all means possible, from that unjust Confinement and Restraint. And this we did, not more for the Security of our own Person, than that thereby we might be in a better Capacity of transacting, and providing for, every thing that may contribute to the Peace and Settlement of our Kingdoms: For as, on the one hand, no Change of Fortune shall make us forget ourselves so far, as to condescend to any thing unbecoming that high and Royal Station in which God Almighty, by Right of Succession, has placed us; so, on the other hand, neither the Provocation or Ingratitude of our own Subjects, nor any other Consideration whatsoever, shall ever prevail with us to make the least Step contrary to the true Interest of the English Nation; which we ever did, and ever must, look upon as our own. Our Will and Pleasure therefore is, That you of our Privy-Council, take the most effectual Care to make these our gracious Intentions known to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in and about our Cities of London and Westminster, to the Lord-Mayor and Commons of our City of London, and to all our Subjects in general; and to assure them, that we desire nothing more than to return and hold a free Parliament, wherein we may have the best Opportunity of undeceiving our People, and shewing the Sincerity of those Protestations we have often made of the preserving the Liberties and Properties of our Subjects and the Protestant Religion; more especially the Church of England as by Law established, with such Indulgence for those that dissent from her, as we have always thought ourselves in Justice and Care of the general Welfare of our People, bound to procure for them. And, in the mean time, you of our Privy-council (who can judge better by being upon the Place) are to send us your Advice, what is fit to be done by us towards our returning, and the accomplishing those good Ends. And we do require you, in our Name, and by our Authority, to endeavour so to suppress all Tumults and Disorders, that the Nation in general, and every one of our Subjects in particular, may receive the least Prejudice from the present Distractions, that is possible. So, not doubting of your dutiful Obedience to these our Royal Com-

Kingdoms are not ſo eaſily recover'd as they are loſt: And if, in conſequence of this politic Addreſs, Dr. Sherlock had, together with all the Roman-Catholics, all the diſobliged Churchmen, and conſcientious Loyaliſts, on his Side; Dr. Burnet had ſtill the Court-Intriguers of all ſorts, together with the Republicans, on his. No Treaty, was a Propoſition that all thoſe of the latter Diviſion agreed in, becauſe it equally flatter'd the Views and Intereſts of all: But then it was the only one they agreed in; and they had no ſooner proceeded thus far together, than they immediately ſeparated, in order to make a ſeparate Uſe of it.

The ſeveral Purſuits of the ſeveral Parties.

The poor Republicans, who, from the Reſtoration down to the Revolution, had been the Forlorn of every Oppoſition, and had undertaken the moſt deſperate Services, as if for the Service-ſake, without the leaſt Proſpect of Succeſs, or Poſſibility of a Reward, now diſcover'd, or thought they diſcover'd, a Ray of Hope; and, under its Direction, took upon them to guide the People to ſuch a Settlement as ſhould both perfect and perpetuate their Felicity. If the Door was ſhut againſt the King, they foreſaw that an Opportunity would ariſe to weaken, if not aboliſh, the kingly Office; or if a ſufficient Quantity of Firmneſs ſhould be wanting, to go ſo far in the great Work which all had engag'd in, they flatter'd themſelves, at leaſt, that ſuch a Precedent might be obtain'd, with regard to the Succeſſion, by the Manner of beſtowing the Crown; and that ſo many heavy Branches might be lopp'd from the Prerogative, as would bring the Conſtitution to a more equal Balance for the time to come, and by degrees make way for a more perfect Deliverance.

The Courtiers were divided into two Factions; both, tho' in different Degrees, attach'd to the Prince, and at Variance with each other. One was for taking the full Advantage of the King's Deſertion, in order to gratify his Highneſs; but then they were for doing it in ſuch a Manner as ſhould ſeem to do the leaſt Violence to the Monarchy; namely, by transferring the Crown to the Princeſs of Orange, as the next Heir; and by putting it in her Power, thereby to communicate what Portion of the Sovereignty ſhe pleas'd to the Prince her Huſband. This Party was headed by the Earl of Danby.

The Other was for going more roundly to work, and for ſerving his Highneſs in his own Way, by making him a free Gift of the Crown, without any of thoſe nice Regards to the Courſe of Succeſſion, or the Clames of the two Princeſſes: The Marquis of Halifax, who, in the late Reign, had been ſo inſtrumental in defeating the Excluſion-Bill, was at the Head of theſe; either becauſe he thought the Principle they went upon would occaſion frequent Revolutions; or, what is more likely, to make his Court in the moſt effectual manner to his new Maſter: That he was follow'd, or rather led, in this Meaſure by Mr. Bentinck, and all the reſt of his Highneſs's Dutch Servants, will be eaſily believ'd; and that the Prince himſelf was alſo at the Bottom of it, will, upon the Iſſue of all, appear undeniable.

So great, however, were the Heats among the ſeveral Parties, and ſo fiercely and obſtinately were they maintain'd on all Sides, that the Day appointed for the Meeting of the Convention came on, before any Expedient could be found to bring them to an End: This encreas'd the Embarraſſments of the Cabinet; for no plauſible Pretence could be aſſign'd for deferring the Meeting; and if they met in a Ferment, it was obvious nothing but Confuſion could follow: As a Mean, therefore, to keep themſelves in Countenance without Doors, and withal to gain a little farther time to ſtrike up a tolerable Compromiſe within, the two Houſes were ſuffer'd to meet on the (w) Day prefix'd; The Convention meets. and ſuch a Management was obſerv'd, that the grand Affair was not only poſtpon'd for ſome Days, but all the ſeveral Parties were brought, in the mean while, to make ſuch Conceſſions as ſeem'd to indicate, that they were equally Candidates for his Highneſs's good Graces, and equally diſpos'd to deſerve them.

The Choice of the two Speakers (which fell, as before, on the Marquis of Halifax, in Oppoſition to the Earl of Danby, and on Mr. Powle, without any Oppoſition at all) was of courſe the firſt Article to be diſpatch'd in both Houſes, and then they were ſeverally preſented with a Letter from the Prince, which was to ſerve inſtead of a Speech, and of which the Tenor was as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

I have endeavour'd to the utmoſt of The Prince's Letter. my Power, to perform what was deſir'd from me in order to the Public Peace and Safety; and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted which might tend to the Preſervation of them, ſince the Adminiſtration of Affairs was put into my Hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the Foundations of a firm Security for your Religion, your Laws, and your Liberties.

I do not doubt, but that by ſuch a full and free Repreſentative of the Nation, as is now met, the Ends of my Declaration will be attained. And ſince it hath pleaſed God hitherto to bleſs my good Intentions with ſo great Succeſs, I truſt in him, that he will complete his own Work, by ſending a Spirit of Peace and Union to influence your Counſels, that no Interruption may be given to an happy and laſting Settlement.

The dangerous Condition of the Proteſtants in Ireland, requiring a large and ſpeedy Succour, and the preſent State of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the Danger of unſeaſonable Diviſions among ourſelves, nothing can be ſo fatal as too great Dela[illegible]

A.D. 1688-9. Delay in your Conſultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to reſcue this Nation, may ſuddenly feel the ill Effects of it, both by being too long depriv'd of the Service of their Troops which are now here, and of your early Aſſiſtance againſt a powerful Enemy, who hath declared a War againſt them: And as England is by Treaty already engaged to help them upon ſuch Exigencies, ſo I am confident that their chearful Concurrence to preſerve this Kingdom with ſo much hazard to themſelves, will meet with all the Returns of Friendſhip and Aſſiſtance, which may be expected from you as Proteſtants and Engliſhmen, whenever their Condition ſhall require it."

Thus we ſee the State of Ireland, and the very Dangers the new Court had ſuffer'd to grow, for Ends of their own, made uſe of, as an Argument to quicken the Proceedings of the Convention in the Settlement of England, agreeable to the Advice before aſcrib'd to the Marquis of Hallifax: And as to the War which France had commenc'd againſt the States, and which makes ſo peremptory an Article in his Highneſs's Letter, it had been declar'd November 26, N. S. without any Mention of, or apparent Connection with, the Conduct of their Lordſhips, with reſpect to the Affairs of England: The only Cauſe aſſign'd in his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Ordinance on that Head, being the Share they had taken in the Cologne-Election, and their ſending an Army under Prince Waldeck to join the Princes in League againſt the Cardinal of Furſtemberg.

We may recollect, indeed, that the French Court, by the Mouth of Mr. d'Avaux, had threaten'd to make the Caſe of the King of England their own; but that Threat had operated ſo miſchievouſly, that it was thought fit to purſue it no farther: And this Omiſſion ought to be look'd upon as an Endeavour to rectify their Error.

This by the way. The Particulars of the Letter could not as yet be debated: What was now to be conſidered, was the Continuance of his Highneſs's Adminiſtration. The Moment the two Houſes were form'd, his Commiſſion expir'd, and they might have transferr'd the Regency to a joint Committee of their own, as Truſtees for the People; and by way of Precaution againſt the Deſigns of a Prince who had been adviſ'd to act as a Conqueror. But no ſuch Notion ſeems to have been entertain'd; on the contrary, Mr. Powle, from the Speaker's Chair, open'd the Diet, with an Harangue, on the dangerous State of the Nation, the fatal Conſequences of Anarchy, the deplorable Condition of the Proteſtants of Ireland, the dreadful Conſequences to England of the Loſs of that Kingdom, the Growth of the Power of France, the inſatiable Ambition of the moſt Chriſtian King, his ſworn Enmity to the Proteſtant Religion and the Intereſt of England, the Neceſſity of putting the Nation in ſuch a Poſture as might not only ſecure it from any Affront, but enable it to ſubdue France itſelf a ſecond time, or at leaſt recover the Provinces of Normandy and Aquitain, which were the Inheritance of our Kings; and whatever elſe had a Tendency to convince or perſuade his Audience, that their All depended on the Prince of Orange. And with ſuch great Succeſs did he play the Orator on this Occaſion, that the Houſe rang with Applauſes; and in a Fit of Tranſport all was agreed to that was propos'd either for his Highneſs's Honour or his Intereſt.

The Speaker's Harangue.

A.D. 1688-9.

The Lords appeared in much the ſame Diſpoſition. The Houſe was full, the Biſhop's Bench in particular: Scarce any were abſent, beſides the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who choſe to be ingloriouſly neuter at this great Criſis, and to appear neither for his King nor Country, which has drawn upon him very ſevere, but very juſt Cenſures. The appointing a Day of public Thankſgiving to Almighty God for having made his Highneſs the glorious Inſtrument of the great Deliverance of this Kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power, was the firſt Court-motion; and their Lordſhips not only agreed to it unanimouſly, but ſent down their Vote to the Commons; who, as unanimouſly concurred in it: The Commons, having alſo prepar'd an Addreſs of Thanks to the Prince, for the glorious things he had done, and therein beſought him to continue the Adminiſtration, call'd upon the Lords to concur in their turn; which they did, with the ſame Unanimity as the Commons had ſhewn before: And, after this amicable Intercourſe, both Houſes, the very ſame Day, waited upon his Highneſs in a Body with the ſaid Addreſs; which was the higheſt Compliment that they had been us'd to pay even to their Kings: The Expreſſions they us'd, upon this remarkable Occaſion, were theſe:

The Unanimity of the two Houſes.

" We the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, being highly ſenſible of the great Deliverance of this Kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power; and that our Preſervation is (next under God) owing to your Highneſs; do return our moſt humble Thanks and Acknowledgments to your Highneſs, as the glorious Inſtrument of ſo great a Bleſſing.

Their Addreſs to the Prince.

We do further acknowledge the great Care your Highneſs has been pleas'd to take in the Adminiſtration of the public Affairs of the Kingdom to this time; and we do moſt humbly deſire your Highneſs, that you will take upon you the Adminiſtration of public Affairs, both Civil and Military, and the Diſpoſal of the public Revenue, for the Preſervation of our Religion, Rights, Laws, Liberties and Properties, and of the Peace of the Nation: And that your Highneſs will take into your particular Care the preſent State of Ireland, and endeavour, by the moſt ſpeedy and effectual Means, to prevent the Dangers threatening that Kingdom. All which we make our Requeſt to your Highneſs to undertake and exerciſe, till further Application ſhall be made by us, which ſhall be expedited with all convenient Speed; and we ſhall uſe our utmoſt Endeavours to give Diſpatch to the Matters recommended to us by your Highneſs's Letter."

Thus

A. D. 1688.

Thus Reſiſtance was authoris'd in form by all the Lords, and the whole repreſentative Body of the Kingdom; the Prince was gratify'd with a firmer Hold of the Government than he had before; and of (x) eleven Biſhops, that were appointed to draw up the Form for the Thankſgiving, it does not appear that any one made any Scruple to undertake the Service.

As to the King and his Cauſe, though ſo much had been ſaid for both without-doors, not a Hint eſcap'd in favour of either: "On the contrary, the Duke of Bucks informs us, that the Lords had no ſooner fill'd their Chair, than a Letter was brought in, directed to the Speaker; and it appearing by the Bearer of it, Mr. Grey, that it was given him by the Earl of Melfort, at St. Germains, the Lords, with a kind of Clamour, forbad it to be read. By which, ſays his Grace, it appear'd plainly, what was like to follow to that unhappy Prince, tho' they ſtill divided about the Manner of excluding him." The Subſtance of this Letter was, "That he thought himſelf oblig'd in Conſcience to do all he could to open his People's Eyes, that they might ſee the true Intereſt of the Nation in this important Conjuncture: That finding he could no longer ſtay with Safety, nor act with Freedom, he had left the Reaſons of his withdrawing from Rochester, under his own Hand: That underſtanding that Letter [here repeated at length] was not taken to be his, but was maliciouſly ſuppreſs'd by the Prince of Orange, he wrote to ſeveral of his Privy-Council, and directed Copies thereof to divers of them, the Peers of the Realm, believing none durſt intercept or open any of his Letters: That of all theſe he had no Account: That, however, he did not wonder that all Arts were us'd to hinder them from knowing his Sentiments, (y) ſince the Prince of Orange, againſt all Law, choſe to impriſon Lord Feverſham, and to drive him the King away, rather than receive his Invitation of coming to St. James's, or hear what he had to propoſe; well knowing, it would content all reaſonable Men; for which reaſon he durſt not truſt the Peers with the Knowledge of it: That, whatever Crimes ſhould be committed, he was reſolv'd to be innocent: That he was ready to return, when he might with Safety: That he was reſolv'd nothing ſhould be omitted on his Part, which could contribute towards the Redreſs of all Diſorders, in a free Parliament, legally call'd, and held without Conſtraint; more particularly to ſecure the Church of England; and to give ſuch Indulgence to Diſſenters, as his People might have no Reaſon to be jealous of: And that he would likewiſe, with the Advice of that Parliament, heal all Diviſions, cover with Oblivion all Faults, and reſtore the Happineſs of his People; which could be effectually done by no other Power."

A. D. 1688.

The Lords did not however reject this Letter in the peremptory Way that the Commons did; for they firſt aſk'd Mr. Grey, of whom he receiv'd it? and he naming Lord Preſton, they ſent for his Lordſhip, put the ſame Queſtion to him; and he replying, that he receiv'd it from a Scotſman, a Day was appointed for his bringing that Scotſman before the Houſe: But when that Day came, and his Lordſhip and the Scotſman attended accordingly, neither of them was call'd: And ſo the Matter dy'd of course.

Upon the Whole, we have here an additional Proof, that the Meeting of the Convention came on before the Cabinet-Syſtem was thoroughly digeſted; and that, while there was any Hope remaining, none of the Party-leaders thought it for their Intereſt to declare openly againſt his Highneſs.

But that Addreſs which appears ſo ſwift and forward an Advance, to us, fell ſhort of the Prince's Expectation; at leaſt there is Reaſon to think ſo, from the Coldneſs of his Behaviour upon it: He took State upon him, as before; he demurr'd till the next Day; and his Anſwer then partook of the ſame diſobliging Dryneſs which accompany'd all he ſaid or did: "I am glad, ſaid he, that what I have done has pleas'd you: And, ſince you deſire me to continue the Adminiſtration of Affairs, I am willing to accept it." But, in the midſt of all this ſeeming Indifference, he did not however forget to throw in another Quickener, in the following Words: "I muſt recommend to you the Conſideration of Affairs abroad, which makes it fit for you to expedite your Buſineſs, not only for making a Settlement at home, on a good Foundation, but for the Safety of Europe."

His Highneſs's Anſwer to their Addreſs.

But fit as it was for the two Houſes to expedite their Buſineſs, this very Anſwer was no ſooner reported, than they (z) adjourn'd to the 26th, and did not proceed to Buſineſs till the 28th: And, during this Recreſs, the Cabinet,

(z) "The Commons having firſt over-rul'd a Motion which had been made for printing their Votes; and the Lords having appointed the Lord Chief Baron Bromley, Sir Robert Atkins, Sir William Dolben, Sir Cresswell Levins, Sir John Holt, Sir Edward Neville, Mr. Whitlock, Mr. Bradbury, and Mr. Petit, to aſſiſt them in Matters of Law, in room of the Judges: On which occaſion we find the following Story told, by one of King James's Advocates! perhaps Mr. North, for the Style and Manner extremely reſembles his: viz." Take one ſhort but very ſignificant Inſtance, how things were carry'd in thoſe mad Days, as it was related by a noble Peer (who was himſelf very forward for the Abdication) to his Friends upon occaſion. There being no Judges yet appointed, there was a Debate in the Convention, what Gentlemen of the long Robe ſhould be made choice of to aſſiſt in the Houſe: Some named Sir Francis Pemberton, Sir Robert Sawyer, and Mr. Finch; but the Lords Mordaunt, Delamere, and ſome others, took fire ſuddenly, and broke out into big and boiſterous Language, telling the Houſe ſtarly and plainly, We will have none of them to have been Inſtruments in the late Reign. Upon which a ſudden Damp ſeiz'd all the Lords, as if they had been attacqued in Plank and Rear with Cannons and Mortars, or the Thunder from Mount Sinai: For we look'd on them, ſaid that Lord, as ſo many Princes of Orange, or ſuch as muſt not be contradicted, for fear of his Diſpleaſure; and the ſame manner moſt Votes were forced, till we had the Grace to be pliable to what the military Lords, and their Complices propos'd." Loyal Martyr vindicated, p. 20.

A.D. 1688-9. Cabinet, the Court, the Houſes and Haunts of the ſeveral Party-leaders, and, in general, the whole Town was in the greateſt Agitation that perhaps ever was known: Every Coffee-houſe-Politician had his Utopia, and almoſt every Man became a Legiſlator: Scarce a Day paſs'd without producing a Variety of new Schemes; and in all theſe it appear'd, that thoſe who were remoteſt from Buſineſs, and of courſe had the leaſt perſonal Intereſt in the new Settlement, moſt regarded that of the Public.

Projects for a new Settlement.

In the very Beginning of Jan. a (u) Tract was ſet forth by an anonymous Writer, which profeſſes to adopt an old Notion, That all Power was originally or fundamentally in the People, and formally in the Parliament. The Parliament he calls a Corporation, made up of three conſtituent, eſſentiating Parts, King, Lords, and Commons: And he argues, that, when any of theſe eſſentiating Parts is loſt, by which it becomes impoſſible to have a Parliament, that Corporation is broke, the Government is diſſolv'd, and all Power reverts to its Root or Center the People: In which caſe, continues he, the Royal Family is as it were extinct; the People may ſet up what Government they pleaſe, either the old or a new, a Monarchy abſolute or limited, or an Ariſtocracy or Democracy: If a Monarchy limited, ſuppoſing it moſtly ſuited to the Temper of the Engliſh, they may chuſe what Family they pleaſe to ſit in the Throne; they may ſettle it on the Princeſs of Orange, Princeſs Anne, Prince of Orange; and, for want of Iſſue, on whom elſe they thought fit (the Poſterity of the poor Duke of Monmouth were already forgot,) who would not hold by virtue of any old Right or Claim, but by a new Election, which might however be made in ſuch Forms as ſhould, de novo, render the Monarchy hereditary as before: The People might alſo, in ſuch caſe, ſecure themſelves againſt the future Approach of Slavery, by ſhutting up the two grand Avenues of Force and Injuſtice (for the Entrance by Corruption had not as yet been laid ſo broad, as to raiſe any Apprehenſions on that Side;) and theſe Avenues might be effectually ſhut up, by transferring the Jura Majeſtatis, the Militia, the Power of War and Peace, the Nomination of Judges, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, from the King only, to the great Corporation of King, Lords, and Commons; the Latter of whom, it was then ſuppos'd, would never give way to ſuch Abuſes as would terminate in the Ruin of their Poſterity. The ſame Author alſo ſet forth another Tract ſome time after, called Good Advice before it be late; or, a Breviate for the Convention; in which he expatiated more at large on theſe ſeveral Points, with the Addition of depriving the King of his Negative; and inſiſts, with the utmoſt Urgency, on the Neceſſity of making a full Uſe of the preſent golden Opportunity, when they had a Crown to carry in the one Hand, in behalf of the People.

and the Terms of Acceptance in the other, to place the Happineſs of their Country on an eternal Foundation.

A.D. 1688-9.

As the main Drift of this Project was only to reduce the Powgr of the King, without deſtroying the Monarchy, or rendering it elective, it met with many Patrons and Advocates without-doors; tho' it was no farther regarded within, than as it ſerv'd to eſtabliſh an Opinion, That the Throne was vacant, and that the People might fill it as they pleas'd: For as to the Limitations of the Royal Power for the time to come, they were equally diſſatisfactory to thoſe who were for adhering to the old King, and to thoſe who were for chuſing a new.

The Republicans alſo made a feeble Effort to convince the People, that it was their Intereſt to cloſe with them; and to render their Mode of Government ſo much the more palatable, by recommending it only as an Expedient to anſwer the Ends of a Regency, during the Life of the King. Their Project was called, Now is the Time; or, a modeſt Propoſal to the preſent Convention; and was expreſſed as follows:

" The thing that offers itſelf in this great Conjuncture is, to have a grand Committee of Lords and Commons, (forty at leaſt from each Houſe) to be as a Privy-council, or Council of State, or governing Senate. a temporary Republic.

It were to be wiſh'd, that twenty of each forty might be for Life; and the other twenty biennial, ten going off every Year: Or half might be changed annually.

Each Senator or Counſellor to have for his Salary or Maintenance a thouſand Pounds a Year. This would be ſuch an Advancement to the Nobility and Gentry, as England never ſaw. And the Charge is a Trifle. There is more ſpent, in ſome Monarchies, upon Hawks, Hounds, and Whores.

The Prince to preſide in this Council or Senate, (or ſuch Perſon as he ſhall appoint in his ſtead) and to have ten Votes at leaſt. He muſt alſo be General and Admiral; and muſt have ſuch farther Powers, and ſuch a Maintenance or Revenue, as his great Merits require; but, withal, ſuch as are conſiſtent with the Government he deſigns for us. The Prince's Maintenance ſhould equal, or exceed, that of all the Senators put together.

All that are of this Council, and all that hope to be, (that is, all the conſiderable Men of the Nation) will by this means be firm to the Prince: And ſo will thoſe others who have the great Privilege of chuſing them, whereby they may have Confidence in their Adminiſtration. And this one thing will give the Prince ſo ſtrong an Intereſt, that he needs fear no Pretenſion that can be againſt him. It will be better than a ſtanding Army; the Neceſſity whereof nothing can prevent, but ſuch a ſtanding Council.

The Parliament to be choſen triennially, and to meet annually.

It is believ'd, that ſuch a Conſtitution as this (u) Call'd, A Letter to a Friend, advoſing, in this extraordinary Juncture, how to free the Nation from Slavery for ever.

A.D. 1688. this would effectually secure us (according to the Prince's good Intentions) from Popery and Tyranny: And the Prince will be the glorious Author of the Britannic Liberty, as his Great-grand-father was of the Belgic. The Genoese to this Day adore the Memory of Andrew Doria, who chose rather to make them a free State, than to be their Prince. Barely to change our Master, would but revive the Feuds of York and Lancaster, and involve us in the like Calamities.

These things to continue but during the Life of the King, and not to prejudice a Protestant Successor."

But the Press found the most Employment from those who were for centering all the Advantages, derivable from the present Circumstance, in the Prince of Orange only: the Prince. One of these (who takes as much Pains as any to prove, that, as the supreme Power personal had hitherto been lodg'd in King, Lords, and Commons; so the supreme Power real had ever remain'd in the Community, was now laps'd to it, and might be equitably dispos'd of by it) is nevertheless for preserving the original Constitution as it was left by the King, as being the best, the justest, and most desirable, and only for filling up the Vacancy of the Throne: " The Royal Family, says he, affords a Person that both Heaven and Earth point out for King. There are Lords, whose Nobility is not alter'd by the Dissolution of the Government, and are the Subject-matter of a House of Lords; and there are Places which, by Custom or Charter, have Right to chuse Representatives of the Commons:" And again, afterwards, " If the Community be at Liberty to act as above; it will certainly be most advisable, not only for the Security and Welfare of the Nation, but (if rightly understood) for the Interest of their Royal Highnesses, to limit the Crown as follows:--- To the Prince of Orange during his Life; (yet with all possible Honour and Respect to the Princess, whose Interests and Inclinations are inseparably the same with his) Remainder to the Princess of Orange, and the Heirs of her Body; Remainder to the Princess of Denmark, and the Heirs of her Body; Remainder to the Heirs of the Body of the Prince of Orange; Remainder as an Act of Parliament shall appoint.

This will have these Conveniencies, among others:

1. Husband and Wife are but one Person in Law, and her Husband's Honour is hers.

2. It puts the present kingly Power into the best Hand in the World; which (without Flattery) is agreed on by all Men.

3. It asserts the abovesaid Power in the Community.

4. It will be some Acknowledgment to the Prince for what he has done for the Nation: And it is worthy Observation, that, before the Theocracy of the Jews ceased, the Manner of the divine Designation of their Judges was, by God's giving the People some A.D. 1688. Deliverance by the Hand of the Person, to whose Government they ought to submit; and this even in that time of extraordinary Revelations. I challenge the best Historians to give an Instance (since that Theocracy ceas'd) of a Designation of any Person to any Government, more visibly divine than that which we now admire. If the Hand of Providence (miraculously and timely disposing natural things, in every Circumstance to the best advantage) should have any Influence upon Mens Minds; most certainly we ought not here to be insensible. If the Voice of the People be the Voice of God, it never spoke louder: If a Nation of various Opinions, Interests, and Factions, from a turbulent and fluctuating State, falls into a serene and quiet Calm, and Mens Minds are strangely united on a sudden; it shews from whence they are influenced. In a word, if the Hand of God is to be seen in human Affairs, and his Voice to be heard upon Earth (we cannot any where (since the ceasing of Miracles) find a clearer and more remarkable Instance, than is to be observ'd in the present Revolution."

Another of these notable Undertakers, at the End of a long and labour'd (b) Discourse on the Fundamentals of Government, and the Defects of the English Constitution, appears so transported with the Virtues and Accomplishments of the Deliverer, that he ventures to say, " Were such a mighty thing as the Settlement to be determin'd by my single Vote, the Government should be Monarchy, and this Monarchy should be absolute and arbitrary, and the Prince should be my King.--- But the Honour I have for him runs not to his Posterity."

We shall have Occasion to open this Vein again by and by; and, in the mean while, it is necessary to observe, that these Papers in his Highness's Behalf, produced others of a contrary Tendency, tho' gloss'd over with the smoothest Professions of Esteem for his Person, and Gratitude for his Services, imaginable. Among the first of these was a Collection of certain remarkable Passages out of Mr. Fagel's Letter to Steward, in the Name of the Prince and Princess of Orange, which were cited at large in the former Volume, and which overflow with such Expressions of their Duty and Affection to the King, and of their Resolution to continue in the same Duty and Affection, or rather to increase it if possible, as were utterly irreconcileable with their late Conduct; and which Collection was accompany'd with the following (b) Note: " Memorandum, That these singular the King. Expressions of Affection and Duty to the King their Father, were sent after those irregular and offensive Measures of Quo Warranting Charters, the Dispensing Power, Closseting, the Ecclesiastical Commission, and Magdalen College, were practised; and comparing this with several Expressions in his Highness's

(c) The three remarkable Papers which follow, and several which hereafter occur, I never saw, either separate, or in any Collection, but that of Lord Somers.

A.D. 1688-9. ness's Declaration, and both with his Majesty's Reasons why he withdrew himself from Rochester, may it not become us, as Members of the Church of England, and Subjects of the King of England, to desire him to return to us upon the Terms of the ancient Constitution of our Government; and if those be too large, upon such Terms, as will make us safe? And may not our neglecting to do it, upon a Supposition of a Demise, because he withdrew himself, which he charges upon a Constraint, become a lasting Reproach upon these Kingdoms, and through our Means, a like Dishonour to the Prince and Princess?"

There came out also, about the same time, two other Half-sheets which contain some things that very well deserve to be transmitted to Posterity. The first is call'd, An honest Man's Wish for the Prince of Orange; and the second, A Speech to his Highness the Prince of Orange. In the Former we find these Words: "I could wish, that some Men who now seek to requite him with the Crown, would consider whether they do not at last requite him with the greatest Affront and Injury: For whilst they pretend to bestow or give it, they do indeed confront the very Words of the Prince's own most gracious Declaration, wherein he assures us, that he came to preserve the Right of Succession. Now the giving of it, I presume, must suppose it to be in their Power or Disposal; and so it shall become merely elective, which will quite destroy the Right of Succession that he, by promise, has engaged himself to maintain. And then if there be any such thing as a Right of Succession, whilst they suppose that the Prince of Orange will accept the Crown from their Hands, they must needs suppose him to be unjust in receiving that which as yet belongs to another, unless they can prove that the two next which ought to come in before him have any way forfeited their Right. And all this, I think, is no very Friendly Requital. But this may not prove the worst yet; for whilst they break the Course of Succession by giving the Kingdom to him, and make it thus elective, they may possibly do the greatest Injury both to him, and his Heirs after him, though they should be the Issue of his own very Body: For the Son will have no better a Title than the Father. And as no Man knows whether his Son shall be a wise Man or a Fool, so if he should seem a Fool in the Eyes of a reigning Parliament or Convention, and not fit to govern, then what is become of his Inheritance? And so for the Prince himself; should he receive the Crown now as a Gift from the Parliament or Convention, and that also by their most unanimous Consent; yet still, I fear, he would not be very secure in the Possession of it; for the Power that gives, may soon challenge the same Power to take away likewise: And, as the Humours of the Body Natural are said to be all changed once in seven Years, so may it be (if not much sooner also) in such a Body Politic. Nor can this be any strange thing to suppose, if we consider the Years that are past: So that the Prince, after all, if he receive the Crown A.D. 1688-9. by way of Donation, must be bound up to his good Behaviour, and have a great care of provoking or disobliging, lest the very Donor pretend some kind of Forfeiture. Again, suppose a great Part of the three Kingdoms should be possess'd with the Injustice of his Title, and appear in earnest for one whose Right it is, who knows but such Strugglings and Convulsions may follow as may make him the most unhappy, who is, doubtless, the most meritorious among Princes? And therefore for these Reasons, lastly,

I could wish, that the Wisdom of the Nation at this time conven'd, would think of some other way to express their Gratitude to this most excellent Prince, who, under God, has been our only Deliverer. And, doubtless, no good Protestant can ever think they go too far, whilst they act by the Rules of Law and Justice, without subverting the old Foundation."

And in the Latter these: "Your Honour lies in your keeping close to the Sense of your first Declaration: That Declaration obliges you in the Sense of most, and I think all, honest Men, to refuse the false Glitterings of a Crown, restores us to our Liberties, secures the Protestant Religion, is good and merciful even to Papists, makes you the great Arbiter of Europe, gives you Opportunity to resettle its Peace, and call to an Account that great Disturber, the King of France, for the real Invasions he has made upon it, and to punish him for the Insolencies he has offer'd to yourself. This Management will bespeak you great without Ambition, inspir'd with the Roman Genius, which lov'd to plant Liberty and good Manners more than Empire. And tho' the King be restor'd to the Title, and as much Power as is useful and safe, yet we shall always bless you when you are nam'd, join our Arms unanimously with yours, to make all France happy by a Restoration of the Assembly of the Estates, and to relieve the Protestants too, by reviving the Edict of Nants; to pull down the Pride of that haughty Man, and approve the English Nation, under your Banners, the Scourge of Tyrants. These are the great things you may chuse for your Share, and I pray God direct you. But, if instead thereof, you pursue other Measures, and you are either crowned yourself, or allow your Princess so to be, you must dethrone your own Uncle and your Wife's Father, hazard our Liberties by sudden and uncertain Wars, blemish the Protestant Religion with the deposing Doctrine, unite the Papal Force, strengthen the French King, make your great self appear rather ambitious than a Benefactor, create strong Factions, such as you can never imagine will be compos'd till the Restoration of the King, if you seriously reflect upon our Tempers, of which the present Fermentations give some Proof. Consider then, Great Sir, and be great by being good, that the present may adore, and After-ages for ever admire, you."

To the Objections started in these several

Papers,

A.D. 1688. Papers, no expreſs Anſwer appears to have been return'd, only in a Tract call'd, Four Queſtions debated, we find the laſt of the four to be, "Whether it be conſiſtent with the Prince's Honour to accept of the Government, eſpecially conſidering his Declaration was to redreſs Matters by a free Parliament?" The Affirmative of which is maintain'd; on a Suppoſition that the referring of all things to a Convention was tantamount to the referring them to a free Parliament: And that the Prince was call'd by the extraordinary Providence of God; which, we are to underſtand, cancell'd all other Obligations.

While theſe Matters were yet warm from the Preſs, thoſe who undertook for the Princeſs of Orange, endeavour'd alſo to eſtabliſh an Intereſt with the Public, by ſetting forth their Syſtem (under the Title of, Reflections upon the preſent State of the Nation, or, as it was afterwards reprinted, Propoſals humbly offer'd in Behalf of the Princeſs of Orange) which was as follows:

the Princeſs of Orange.

"It is a Maxim of the Law of England, concerning the Government, That there is no Inter-regnum. Of neceſſity there muſt be a Change in the Perſon, yet there is a Continuation of the Government. Which ſhews the Prudence and Perfection of the Conſtitution, in preventing, that which of all things is moſt deplorable, a Failure of Government. This Rule is therefore of that Importance, as not to be given up upon the trivial Saying of Nemo eſt hæres viventis.

'Tis true, the common and ordinary Cauſe of a Change in the Perſon that is inveſted with the Royal Authority, is Death.

But we are now in a rare and extraordinary Caſe, where the King is living, and yet may be ſaid to be diveſted of the Royal Office, as having, by his Encroachments upon the Peoples Rights, provok'd them to reſort to Arms; and being vanquiſh'd by that Force, follow'd with a total Defection from him, and his relinquiſhing the Kingdom thereupon, without providing any ways for the Adminiſtration of the Government.

This ſeems to be a Ceſſer of his Government, and may in civil and politic Conſtruction amount to as much, as if he had dy'd.

But becauſe this is a Ceſs of that nature that requires a Judgment to be made upon it, it ſeems neceſſary to have a Convention of the Eſtates of the Nation, to make a Declaration thereupon (for 'tis not for private Perſons to determine in the Caſes aforeſaid, how or when the King has loſt his Government); and, till ſuch authoritative Declaration made, the King may be ſuppos'd in ſome kind of poſſeſſion of the kingly Office.

But, after the Judgment made and declar'd, there ſeems to be no Difference in the Conſequence and Reſult of the thing, between ſuch an extraordinary Caſe of the Ceſſer of the Royal Dignity, and the Caſe of Death, or voluntary Reſignation; or as if the King had been profeſt, and made himſelf a Recluſe in a religious Houſe.

Then it muſt devolve upon the next Heir, A.D. 1688. her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Orange.

As to the pretended Prince of Wales, if there had been no Suſpicions as to his Birth (as there are many violent ones) yet he being convey'd into unknown Places, by Perſons in whom no Credit can be repos'd, and at an Age which expoſes him to all manner of Practices and Impoſtures, touching his Perſon, there can hereafter be no manner of Certainty of him, ſo as to induce the Nation ever to conſider any Pretence of that kind.

Theſe things being conſider'd,

Firſt, Whether will not the declaring her Royal Highneſs Queen of England, as next in Succeſſion, be the ſureſt and beſt Foundation to begin our Settlement upon, rather than upon a groundleſs Conceit of the Government being devolv'd to the People, and ſo to proceed to elect a King?

Secondly, If that Conceit of devolving to the People be admitted, whether muſt we not conclude, that the Miſgovernment of King James the Second, hath not only determin'd his Royalty, but put a Period to the Monarchy itſelf? And then 'tis not only a loſs as to his Perſon, but to the whole Royal Family.

Thirdly, Whether thoſe Perſons that have ſtarted this Notion, upon Pretence of giving the Nation an Opportunity of gratifying his Highneſs the Prince of Orange, in Proportion to his Merits (which it muſt be acknowledged no Reward can exceed) if they were ſearched to the bottom, did not do it rather to undermine this ancient and hereditary Monarchy, and to give an Advantage to their Republican Principles, than out of any Affection and Gratitude to his Highneſs? For if the Latter was that they had the chief reſpect to, would it not be the more proper way to declare her Royal Highneſs Queen, which will immediately put the Nation under a regular Conſtitution and Poſture of Government? Then it will be capable of expreſſing its Gratitude to the Prince of Orange, in Matters touching even the Royal Dignity itſelf, without making ſuch a Stroke upon the Government, as the electing of a King, or making any other immediate Alteration in the Right of the Monarchy (before the Parliament is completed and conſtituted in all its Parts) muſt amount unto."

As it was fear'd, by thoſe who were deepeſt in the Prince's Secret, that this would prove the moſt univerſally-palateable, of all the Schemes hitherto made public; ſo they alſo knew, that his Highneſs would never give in to it: To hinder, therefore, as far as poſſible, the Effect of this Doctrine among the People, and to pave the Way for a Compromize, yet another (d) Piece was ſet forth, if not by Authority, yet at leaſt by the ſame Perſon who had been employ'd by Authority before; in which it is, by the way, not only premis'd, as in ſeveral of the foregoing Pieces, That the Diſpoſal of the Government was fallen to the People, becauſe there the Prince and Princeſs jointly.

Wa

(d) A brief Juſtification of the Prince of Orange's Deſcent into England, and of the Kingdom's late Recourſe to Arms, &c.

A.D. 1688-9. was no Præcision in the Laws, by which any of the Blood Royal could lay clame to it; but it was queſtionable, whether, in the preſent Circumſtance, either of the two Houſes had a Negative on the other: Of which the following remarkable Uſe is made: "And, by conſequence, as it will become them [the two Houſes] in Prudence, not to interfere in their Reſolves about the Conveyance of the Crown; ſo it will be no Departure in the Lords from their own Grandeur, to conſider of what Force and Obligation, to the whole Commons of England, the Declaration of their Repreſentatives in that Matter will be; and whether it will not be more than probable, that they will own the regal Authority to be in that Perſon, and there to maintain and defend it, where they themſelves ſhall convey and ſettle it." Theſe are the very Words of the Pamphlet, which, in political Language, ſignify, that the new Court had a ſtronger Party in the Commons than the Lords; and that, in caſe the Latter continued obſtinate, the Vote of the Former would be deem'd ſufficient to make a Grant of the Crown. This however is only inſinuated, as if by the way: And the main Scope of all is to be found in the Paſſages that enſue:

"As to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Orange, they muſt be Enemies to the Kingdom, who would have any thing withheld from, or deny'd unto, her, that the Convention can in conſiſtency with their own Wiſdom, and with the Safety of the Nation, grant and beſtow. For how great ſoever ſhe is by her Quality, ſhe is far greater by her Merit. Had ſhe been of a Rank never to have ſtood in a Nearneſs to a Crown, yet all who have the Honour to know her would have confeſs'd, that ſhe deſerv'd one. But alas! tho' there may be a Partner in the Royal Style, there can be none in the Regal Power: And, as ſhe herſelf will undoubtedly acknowledge the Prince her Huſband to be the only Perſon fit at this Seaſon for the Latter, ſo ſhe will account it to proceed from no want of Deference to her Perſon and Virtues, if no more be conferr'd upon her but the Royal Title. For, ſeeing the Sovereignty can be but in one, tho' the Style be communicable to more, Reaſon of State obligeth to lodge it where it may be moſt for the public Good. The Diſpoſal of the Crown being fallen to the People, by a Ceſs and Devolution; the Succeſſion unto it is not to be govern'd by a Proximity of Blood, but by weighing what is moſt expedient for the Benefit of the Community. To beſtow the ſovereign Power unto more than one Perſon at a time were to embarraſs the Execution of it, and to make it impracticable, thro' the Differences which may ariſe if two ſhould become equally veſted in it. From thence it was, that, upon the conſtituting and creating Philip King, in conjunction with Mary the Daughter of Henry VIII. it was ordained and enacted, 'That the Queen might and 'ſhould ſolely, and as ſole Queen, uſe, have, 'and enjoy, the Crown and Sovereignty of 'and over all theſe Realms, Dominions and A.D. 1688-9.
'Subjects, with all the Pre-eminencies, Pre-'rogatives, Dignities, Authorities, Juriſdic-'tions, Honours, thereunto belonging, &c. 'and that no Right or Clame of Sovereignty 'ſhould be given, come, or grow unto the 'ſaid Philip, over the ſaid Realms and Domi-'nions.' But tho' the ſovereign Power be not communicable to more than one, and can be lodged no where, ſave in a ſingle Perſon, yet the Royal Style may be imparted to more, without the leaſt Inconvenience ariſing thereby to the Nation. And therefore when I ſay, that her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Orange ought to have the Royal Style conferr'd upon her, I do not thereby mean, that ſhe ſhould enjoy merely the bare and naked Name of Queen, but that, together with the Perſon to whom the Sovereignty ſhall be committed, ſhe ſhall be nam'd in all Laws, Gifts, Grants, and Patents, &c. and that all theſe ſhall be enacted, inſtituted, ſet forth, and made in the Name of the Perſon in whom the Sovereignty ſhall be fix'd and ſettled. Nor is this all that her Highneſs may in Juſtice expect, but it doth become the People in deference to her Merit, and in gratitude for the many Obligations which ſhe hath heap'd upon them, to ſettle the whole Sovereignty upon her in Reverſion, in caſe ſhe outlive the Perſon to whom that Power is firſt truſted and committed. And as this will teſtify, that the Diſpoſal of it otherwiſe for the preſent ariſeth not from Diſreſpect, but from Motives of Neceſſity; ſo we may be aſſur'd, that her Royal Highneſs's Love to her Country is ſo prevalent in her, above all Conſiderations regarding herſelf, that ſhe would be loth in the mean time, and under the great and preſent Exigencies, to interpoſe between the Nation and the Bleſſings and Safety likely to ariſe unto it, by the coming under the governing Care and ſovereign Protection of his Highneſs the Prince her Huſband. Nay ſhe would account it an Injury unto her, and not a Favour, to have the Regal Power ſettled in her, during the Life of the Prince, and to have his Highneſs precluded from it. And as, through her being veſted in what I have nam'd, ſhe will enjoy all the Honour and Glory which accompany a Crown, ſo ſhe will be only eaſed of the thorny Cares, and the next-to-inſupportable Toils, that, under the preſent Conjuncture of Affairs in the World, are likely to attend the ſwaying of the Engliſh Scepter."

It was but natural that ſuch a Diverſity of Doctrines and Intereſts ſhould produce Diſtraction and Confuſion. Even this Paper, ſupported as it was, by all the Engliſhmen who were Joint-Adventurers with his Highneſs, had not, at firſt, its full Effect. The Earl of Danby contended as ſtrenuouſly as ever for beſtowing the Government on the Princeſs: The Marquis of Halifax and all the Dutchmen were as obſtinate for the Prince: Neither were for dividing the Throne, by admitting a Partnerſhip in the Sovereignty; and nothing could ſatisfy the Church-Luminaries,

A.D. 1688-9. naries, together with such of the temporal Peers as thought it for their Interest to join with them, but a Regency.

In the Suspence arising from these Contrarieties, five whole Days were wasted; and then, to allay the Impatience of the Public, as well as to clear the way to their several Purposes, all those who were for filling the Throne a-new, so far concurr'd, as to agree in the Expediency and Necessity of first declaring it vacant.

Debate of the Commons on the State of the Nation.

Accordingly, on the 28th, the Commons, where it now appear'd their great Strength was, resolv'd themselves into a Committee of the whole House, of which Mr. Hampden was Chairman, upon the great Work of considering the State of the Nation. Mr. Dolben, Son of the late Archbishop of York, was the bold Man who first broke the Ice, and made a long Speech tending to prove, That the King's deserting his Kingdom without appointing any Person to administer the Government, amounted in Reason and Judgment of Law, to a Demise of that Prince. The same Opinion was adopted and defended by others after him. Sir Robert Howard went a Step farther, and not only asserted that the Throne was vacant, but took upon him to prove, that the whole Reign of his late Majesty was one continu'd Breach of the Original Contract between the King and People. His Arguments were sustain'd by Mr. Garraway, Sir Thomas Lee, Mr. Sacheverel, Mr. Pollexfen, Sir George Treby, and Mr. Somers; several of whom objected to Mr. Dolben's Notion of a Demise, as too narrow a Basis to found a new Settlement upon, as not comprehending the Mal-Administration of the late King, and as inferring a Descent of the Crown to the next hereditary Successor; whereas they insisted, that in the present Case, there could be no Descent; that the Throne was vacant, and of course was at the Disposal of the Public. A.D. 1688. Others contended, that the King's withdrawing himself amounted to an Abdication; and that it ought to be understood, he had by so doing renounc'd the Sovereignty. According to Bishop Burnet, the Republican Party were for going farther still, and contended for deposing the King by a formal Sentence [on a Presumption of Forfeiture] and for filling the Throne by as formal an Election.—But this, says he, was over-rul'd in the Beginning. On the other hand, those who were for keeping things, as near as possible, within their ancient Channel, oppos'd all these Propositions alike. We are, in particular, told, that Mr. Finch (after complimenting the Prince of Orange with all the Virtues of all the ancient Heroes, and affecting to take it for granted, that he would be more pleas'd with the Glory of having deliver'd the Nation, than to leave room to suppose, that in all he had done, he had sought only to gratify his own Ambition by his Acceptance of the Crown) gave it as his Opinion, That the most advisable Course to settle the Peace of the Nation, would be to follow such Measures as bid fairest to be approv'd by the Nation; and that a Regency during the Life of the King, would give a more universal Satisfaction than the declaring the Throne vacant. Sir Christopher Musgrave insisted, That to declare the Throne vacant, would be actually to depose the King: And he desir'd to be inform'd by the Gentlemen of the long Robe, whether there was any Provision in our Laws to authorize them to do so? Sir Edward Seymour (e), who had been so forward to join the Prince at Exeter, who had set on foot the Association, and who had accepted a Commission under his Highness, spoke also on the same Side, with great Warmth: And there is a (f) Speech in Print which concludes with a Motion,

(e) Concerning this Gentleman and Dr. Burnet Sir John Reresby recites the following Passage, in his Memoires:

"In the midst of this I saw Lord Hallifax, in company with Mr. Seymour, the quondam Speaker of the Commons, a Man of great Parts, and much for continuing the Power in the King's Name, and even in his Person, could we but be secur'd from the Danger of Popery. Dr. Burnet also was present, who with great Violence argued, That the Prince was to be crown'd; and urg'd, That England could never be happily settled, till his Highness was at the Helm, and this Kingdom in strict Conjunction with Holland. Seymour said his Proposals were impracticable: for that if the Prince was King, he must maintain himself as such by the means of an Army, which was not to be rely'd on against their natural Sovereign. He observ'd, That, as the late English Army would not fight for Popery, they would be as backward in fighting against their King; and that it was impossible for England and Holland to join heartily in one and the same Interest, being Suitors, as they were, to one and the same Mistress, namely, Trade."

(f) Which not being to be found in any Collection of Parliament Proceedings, or State Tracts, and being extremely curious, I have here annexed, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker,

The present Providence deserves our most serious Thoughts; and truly, Sir, I cannot but say that we are extremely oblig'd to the great Goodness and Valour of the Prince of Orange, who, with such Hazard and Expence, has brought us so seasonable and eminent a Deliverance from Popery, and (I hope) from arbitrary Power also; Sir, we cannot give him too much, unless we give him more than our own, the Crown I mean: We have been of a long time taught, that it is not the Gift or Work of Subjects: Sovereign Princes have made bold with one another, but I am of opinion, whatever Malice may suggest against his Highness, he has too noble a Soul to be guilty of such an Attempt: He came not hither for Greatness, he has it of his own, and brought it with him, and values being optimus more than maximus; which is the best way of joining that Imperial Style together, optimus maximus: I say, I am confident it is more than he will judge proper to receive; and that he will think it more for his Glory to reduce the Monarchy to its just and legal Establishment, than to be King himself: and to secure us against Popery, than to lead us into the Errors of it, of which the most pestilent are, the deposing Princes, and breaking Faith with Heretics. The Prince is too great a Disciple both of Religion and Honour, not to be satisfy'd with our doing what is agreeable to them; and let us not press him out of his own Sentiments, which have been the greatest and most heroic that have appear'd in this latter Age of the World, lest, whilst we have taken Arms to redress Grievances, we draw greater upon ourselves, and that as well from abroad as at home: for, Sir, when we believe Catholic Princes to have a Zeal to unreasonably fierce and unsafe to other People, we cannot at the same time think they will tamely suffer a Catholic King to be kept out of his Kingdoms, for little more than being so; and I am afraid that this Procedure may precipitate Ireland into Extremities; and if it should follow the King to France, all sober, sensible Men know of what ill Consequence a Revolt to that Crown may be to this Kingdom; we shall then, instead of invading France, find Difficulties to preserve our own; nor, for what I see, are we sure of being at Peace here: The Tide has mightily abated since the King's going from Rochester. Those that wish'd his Humiliation in the Government will by no means hear of his Exclusion and Perdition from the Crown: They either believe the Fault none of his, or not of Weight enough to justify so extraordinary an Example. Kings must see and hear by the Eyes and Ears of others, which makes it their Misfortune rather than their Crime.

A.D. 1688-9. Motion, to call upon the Prince, to complete the great things he had done for the Nation, by taking upon him to be their Arbitrator as well as Deliverer, by preſcribing the due Bounds between Prerogative and Liberty, and by calling back the King to co-operate with him for thoſe great Ends. But if ſuch a Speech was really made, it does not appear that it was even ſeconded, and, conſequently, could have no Effect. On the contrary, after a Debate which laſted many Hours, Lord Fenſhaw, miſtruſting the Iſſue, mov'd, That it might be adjourn'd to another Day, in regard of its very great Importance, and of the Miſchiefs that might be occaſion'd by taking too haſty Steps in a Matter of ſo much Weight; but without Succeſs: The Cry was ſo ſtrong on the other Side, that he could ſcarce be heard. And, upon the whole, the Committee came to this complicated Reſolution: Reſolv'd, That King James the Second, having endeavour'd to ſubvert the Conſtitution of the Kingdom, by breaking the original Contract between King and People, and by the Advice of Jeſuits, and other wicked Perſons, having violated the Fundamental Laws, and withdrawn himſelf out of the Kingdom, had abdicated the Kingdom; and that the Throne is thereby become vacant. This memorable Vote was immediatly reported to the Houſe, and being agreed to without a Diviſion, Mr. Hampden was order'd to carry it up to the Lords for their Concurrence. A.D. 1688-9.

which they ſend to the Lords for their Concurrence.

"The Houſe of Lords, ſays the Duke of Bucks, was divided into three Parties; that of the High Church [or thoſe who were for aggrandizing the Church, that the Church might, in Return, aſſiſt in aggrandizing them]: Thoſe we now call Whigs [who had hitherto engroſs'd the venerable Name of Patriot to themſelves, and who affected to love their Country above all things] aſſur'd of good Employments under the Prince: And a third, very much the ſmalleſt, inclin'd to the unfortunate King, ſome out of Conſcience, but more out of Deſpair of Favour from the Prince."

Debate thereon.

That the great Queſtion before them might be more fully and freely debated, their Lordſhips alſo reſolv'd themſelves into a Committee of the whole Houſe; the Earl of Danby had the Chair; and the Courſe of that Day's Debate took its Direction from the Earl of Nottingham, who mov'd, Not to agree with the Commons, that the Throne was vacant; and yet that it might be ſo ſuppos'd, for the ſake that they do amiſs: We are alſo of a Church that has been ſingular for her Honour and Deference to Kings, and if we have any for her, I think we ought to tread tenderly in this Point; and that we may be juſt, two things compel us to it for our own ſake. The firſt is, that the moſt of the things that made the King's Government ſo obnoxious, have already been done in this, we have had a diſpenſing Power exerciſed both at Exeter and London; we have had free Quarters conſtrain'd in almoſt all Places where the Dutch Army has march'd; we have in great part a popiſh Army too, tho' that was one of the moſt crying Offences we objected to the King, and from which we drew the moſt popular Notions of our Inſecurity: The very Money that is now receiving was aſk'd with two Armies on foot; and all Men will conclude it was ill refuſing a Propoſal ſo ſeconded: and how far our famous Petition of Right may be concern'd in this, the Gentlemen of the Law muſt determine; but I dare ſay this very Loan could not eſcape it under a lawful Prince, and under our preſent Circumſtances we cannot reaſonably think the Caſe better. Nor, Mr. Speaker, is this all: The ſecond Reaſon for Temper is, the little Truth that at laſt appears in thoſe many Stories, that, above any thing, ſeem'd to alienate the Hearts of the Subjects from his Majeſty, and to diſſolve that Tie of Affection and Duty they had to him, as his Subjects: Such as 'the Alarms we had here of a French Invaſion; the 'King's ſelling the Kingdom for five Millions Retling; the 'Iriſh killing Men, Women and Child, upon the Roads; 'the French embark'd for the Weſt, but met and ſunk by 'the Dutch; the forty thouſand new-faſhion'd Knives of 'Slaughter; the Queen's back-door, for bringing to Bed a 'falſe Child; her cutting the Earl of Craven and the Princeſs 'Anne's' with forty more of that Stamp, that Time has prov'd as malicious as falſe: How much they have influenced to this preſent Change, is not unworthy of our juſt Thoughts and Cenſure; and, in my Opinion, that calls upon us as loudly for a ſpeedy Reparation. Mr. Speaker, theſe are the things that have driven the King out of England, and if it can be prov'd that the Prince of Wales is an Impoſtor, and that there was a League with France to cut off the Proteſtants; I think nothing that has befallen him too hard Meaſure for him: But, Mr. Speaker, it is upon no other Terms that the People of England will part with their King, or with any Patience think of the Uſage he has had upon that Suppoſition: But it is objected, that ſome of thoſe that were in Arms are under Apprehenſion leſt their Eſtates and Lives ſhould be at the Mercy of the King, if he returns; I think the King will be ſo far from expecting, and the Nation from yielding to it, that they muſt not only be all pardon'd, but theſe Lords and Gentlemen, that have been the noble Aſſerters of our Engliſh Liberties at this Juncture, muſt be poſted in the greateſt Places of Honour and Truſt: I hope the King himſelf will ſee it his Intereſt to leave off little parſimonial Favourites, and be willing that ſuch be employ'd in all his Affairs as his People can confide in, and as will uſe their Preferment for the Honour of their Prince, and the Good of the Subjects.

The Objection againſt the King's Return, upon the account of having deſerted his Kingdom by going into France, I am aſtoniſh'd at; for if that Kingdom be not his Right, why is it a Part of his Title? And if it be, he may viſit that as well as any other of his Territories, if he has Reaſon to apprehend himſelf in danger, without making a Demiſe, Forfeiture, Surrender, or Abdication of the Crown of England. Mr. Speaker, I fear that, if I have not tir'd your Patience, I have been at leaſt over-long for ſome Members of a contrary Judgment, who ſit in this Convention, and therefore I ſhall only add this humble Caution, that our Convention conſider well their Power, which I humbly conceive is too ſcanty to be able to make a new King, tho' it may call home that to whom we have moſt, if not all of us, ſworn Allegiance; nay, let me ſay further, that, if our Caſe was ſo deſperate that no Remedy would ſerve but creating a new King, our Convention has not enough of our Fellow-ſubjects for the reſt to be concluded by. When things are tranſacted according to the known Laws and ancient Cuſtoms, the uſual Deputies may deliver and ſtate the Intentions of the People; but when ſo many and great Alterations muſt be made in the Building that is to be for the common Conveniency, every Man thinks himſelf worthy to be conſulted, as well as the greateſt Architect, when he is to dwell in the Houſe. Parliaments, that are called by Kings, cannot make Kings; and a Convention, not call'd by a King, and as narrow-bottom'd as a Parliament, is yet leſs than a Parliament, becauſe it wants the Sanction that a Parliament has. If then it ſeems a Solœciſm, that a Meeting leſs than a Parliament can make a King, without whom a Parliament cannot be; what ſhall we think of this Convention's making a King of him, that makes the Convention? Can they act lawfully upon an unlawful Call? Or can an unlawful Convention make him a lawful King? We are taught by an Engliſh Proverb, that no Stream riſes higher than its Fountain; how is it then poſſible for them to give him Authority to govern, that have none but what they receive from him, who, by our Law, can have none to give? Sir, this is neither more nor leſs, than for his Highneſs to make himſelf King, by a Medium of his own; a thing as much beyond him to do, as it is above us to think of it. Therefore, if we muſt go to that Work, let us call in more Heads to our Aſſiſtance; but I rather adviſe, and humbly move, that we may pray the Prince, who has been our Deliverer to be our Arbitrator, to give due Limits to the Prerogative and our Liberty, to ſecure us, that are the Proteſtant Subjects, in our Religion, and to ſhew the King what ſort of Liberty he only ought to expect for his Catholic Subjects. I ſay, let us beſeech him to call back the King for thoſe great Ends, the accompliſhing of which will make both King and Kingdom happy, and the great Prince of Orange renowned in all the Hiſtories of Europe, as well as in our Annals. [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. xxxv.

Lord Nottingham's Question, Whether, in case of a Vacancy, the Resort should be to a new King, or a Regent?

take of diſcuſſing another Queſtion, namely, Whether in caſe it was vacant, it ought to be fill'd by a Regent or a King? Which ſhew'd plainly enough, that the Vacancy would be admitted or not by him and his Party, according as they were pleas'd or diſpleas'd with the manner of filling it. A Regency was their Propoſal, and the Arguments for and againſt it are thus retail'd by the Hiſtorian of his own Times: "It was urged, that if, upon any Pretence whatſoever, the Nation might throw off their King, then the Crown muſt become precarious, and the Power of judging the King muſt be in the People. This muſt end in a Commonwealth. A great deal was brought from both the Laws and Hiſtory of England, to prove, that not only the Perſon, but the Authority, of the King was ſacred. The Law had indeed provided a Remedy of a Regency for the Infancy of our Kings. So, if a King ſhould fall into ſuch Errors in his Conduct, as ſhew'd that he was as little capable of holding the Government as an Infant was, then the Eſtates of the Kingdom might, upon this Parity of the Caſe, ſeek to the Remedy provided for an Infant, and lodge the Power with the Regent. But the Right was to remain, and to go on in a lineal Succeſſion: For, if that was once put ever ſo little out of its Order, the Crown would in a little time become elective; which might rend the Nation in pieces by a Diverſity of Elections, and by the different Factions that would adhere to the Perſon whom they had elected. They did not deny, but that great Objections lay againſt the Methods that they propoſed: But Affairs were brought into ſo deſperate a State by King James's Conduct, that it was not poſſible to propoſe a Remedy, that might not be juſtly excepted to. But they thought their Expedient would take in the greateſt, as well as the beſt, Part of the Nation: Whereas all other Expedients gratify'd a Republican Party, compos'd of the Diſſenters, and of Men of no Religion, who hop'd now to ſee the Church ruin'd, and the Government ſet upon ſuch a Bottom, as that we ſhould have only a titular King; who, as he had his Power from the People, ſo he ſhould be accountable to them for the Exerciſe of it, and ſhould forfeit it at their Pleaſure (g).

In anſwer to this, it was argu'd, that a Regency was as much againſt Monarchy, or rather more than a new Election. If a King's ill Government did give the People a Right in any Caſe to take his Power from him, and to lodge it with another, owning that the Right to it remained ſtill in him, this might have every whit as bad Conſequences as the other ſeem'd to have; for Recourſe might be had to this violent Remedy too often and too raſhly. By this Propoſition of a Regent, here were to be, upon the Matter, two Kings at the ſame time: One with the Title, and another with the Power of a King. This was both more illegal, and more unſafe, than the Method they propoſed. The Law of England had ſettled the Point of the Subject's Security in obeying the King in Poſſeſſion, in the Statute made by Henry the Seventh. So every Man knew he was ſafe under a King, and ſo would act with Zeal and Courage. But all ſuch as ſhould act under a Prince Regent, created by this Convention, were upon a Bottom that had not the neceſſary Forms of Law for it. All that was done by them would be thought null and void in Law: So that no Man could be ſafe that acted under it. If the Oaths of King James were thought to be ſtill binding, the Subjects were by theſe not only bound to maintain his Title to the Crown, but all his Prerogatives and Powers. And therefore it ſeem'd abſurd to continue a Government in his Name, and to take Oaths ſtill to him, when yet all the Power was taken out of his Hands. This would be an odious thing, both before God and the whole World, and would caſt a Reproach upon us at preſent, and bring certain Ruin for the future on any ſuch mixed and unnatural ſort of Government. Therefore, if the Oaths were ſtill binding, the Nation was ſtill bound by them, not by Halves, but in their whole Extent. It was ſaid, that, if the Government ſhould be carry'd on in King James's Name, but in other Hands, the Body of the Nation would conſider him as the Perſon that was truly their King. And if any ſhould plot or act for him, they could not be proceeded againſt for High Treaſon, as conſpiring againſt the King's Perſon or Government; when it ſhould be viſible that they were only deſigning to preſerve his Perſon, and to reſtore him to his Government. To proceed againſt any, or to take their Lives for ſuch Practices, would be to add Murder to Perjury. And it was not to be ſuppos'd that Juries ſhould find ſuch Men guilty of Treaſon. In the Weakneſs of Infancy, a Prince Regent was in Law the ſame Perſon with the King, who had not yet a Will: And it was to be preſum'd the Prince Regent's Will was the King's Will. But that could not be apply'd to the preſent Caſe, where

A.D. 1689.

(g) Our Author adds, by way of Comment: "But of thoſe who agreed in this Expedient, it was viſible there were two different Parties. Some intended to bring King James back; and went into this, as the moſt probable Way for laying the Nation aſleep, and for overcoming the preſent Averſion that all People had to him. That being once done, they reckon'd it would be no hard thing, with the Help of ſome Time, to compaſs the other. Others ſeem'd to mean more ſincerely: They ſaid, they could not vote or argue, but according to their own Principles, as long as the Matter was yet entire: But they own'd, that they had taken up another Principle, both from the Law and from the Hiſtory of England; which was, that they would obey and pay Allegiance to the King for the time being: They thought a King thus de facto had a Right to their Obedience, and that they were bound to adhere to him, and to defend him, even in oppoſition to him with whom they thought the Right did ſtill remain. The Earl of Nottingham was the Perſon that own'd this Doctrine the moſt during theſe Debates. He ſaid to myſelf, that, tho' he could not argue nor vote according to the Scheme and Principles he had concerning the Laws and Conſtitution, yet he ſhould not be ſorry to ſee his Side out-voted; and that, tho' he could not agree to the making a King, as things ſtood, yet, if he found one ſtirring, he would be more faithful to him, than thoſe that made him could be, according to their own Principles."

A.D. 1688-9. where the King and the Regent must be presum'd to be in a perpetual Struggle, the one to recover his Power, the other to preserve his Authority.

The Lords Hallifax and Danby, tho' Rivals, and embark'd in different Schemes, co-operated upon this Occasion; and, upon the whole, it appeared to be the Opinion of the Majority, That in case of a Vacancy, the Throne ought rather to be fill'd with a King than a Regent. The Numbers being forty-nine for the Latter (among whom were all the Bishops, except those of London and Bristol) (b) and fifty-one for the Former.

The Majority for a new King.

While the Lords were debating this previous Question, the Commons pass'd a Vote, declaring, That Popery had been found by Experience inconsistent with the English Constitution, and excluding for ever all Roman Catholics from the Succession to the Crown; with which we shall find, the Lords unanimously concurr'd.

Whether there was an original Contract between King and People, debated.

The next Day, being the 30th, their Lordships suffer'd it to be made a Question, Whether, or no, there was an original Contract between King and People? And many maintain'd the Negative, insisting, That Kings held their Power from God only, and were only to him accountable; while others as warmly asserted, That all Power belong'd originally and fundamentally to the Community, and to the King only by mutual Compact: In Support of which Argument, they referr'd to the Form of the Coronation Oath, which, however enfeebled by corrupt Prelates, and encroaching Kings, still discover'd the Traces of a Trust committed, of a Contract made, and of Conditions to be observ'd: They, moreover, ask'd, What did all the Limitations of the regal Power signify, if, upon a King's breaking thro' them, the People had no Right to maintain their Laws and preserve their Constitution? And tho' they acknowledg'd, that, indeed, such a Right might be abus'd, and that such an Abuse might be productive of very pernicious Consequences, they persever'd nevertheless in arguing, that the denying this Right, and the prohibiting the Exertion of it, in any Extremity whatever, tended to the utter Destruction of Liberty, and the Establishment of Tyranny. To all which, they had the Precaution to add, That the Alteration then propos'd, would be no Precedent, unless in the like Circumstance: That when such a Circumstance occurr'd, it was fit that such a Use should be made of it: That if the Precedents already to be found in our Histories, were not allow'd to be good ones, the Interest of the Public requir'd that a good one should be made; and that the Necessity of shutting the Door for ever against Popery, and of filling up the Chasm which had been made in the Government, was of more Weight than all other Considerations. It was reply'd, That the Coronation-Oath was a mere Form: That the King was as much King before he took it, as afterwards: That there was no Clause of Disability or Forfeiture in it, in Case he either refus'd to take it, or he broke thro' it afterwards: And that, in short, it was the express Voice of the Law that the People of England had no coercive Power over their King. Unluckily, those who argued in this manner, had been as deaf to the Voice of the Law on this Head, as those who profess'd to shew no Regard to it. It was as unlawful to take Arms against the King, under any Pretence whatsoever, as to depose him, to abett and comfort his Enemies, as to fight under their Standard; and yet the whole Nation had trespass'd one way or the other. When, therefore, their own Artillery came to be play'd upon them, they could not help falling into Confusion: And, upon the Issue, it was resolv'd, by fifty-three against forty-six, That there was an original Contract between King and People; and, after a short Debate, That King James had broken that original Contract. A.D. 1688-9.

The Affirmative resolv'd; and that the King had broken it.

This clos'd the Business of that Day; the next was the Day appointed by both Houses for a solemn (i) Thanksgiving for the late Deliverance; and after that Service was over, their Lordships, returning to their House, took the Word abdicated into Consideration, and without entering into a formal Enquiry, whether his Majesty's withdrawing himself, was voluntary, or the Effect of Fear and Force, concluded, that deserted was more proper. The Question which came next before them was, Whether the King, having broken the original Contract between him and his People, and deserted the Government, the Throne was thereby become vacant? The Body of the Bishops, with their Auxiliaries among the temporal Peers, recurr'd to the Law-Maxim, That the King never dies; and thence infer'd, that the Throne could never be vacant; but, on a Demise, whether natural or civil, was immediately fill'd by the next Heir. This, according to them, seem'd to be prov'd by the very Words of the Oath of Allegiance; by which the Subject was bound to the Heirs and Successors of the King, as well as to him personally. The new Courtiers, on the other hand, as stoutly maintain'd that other Maxim, that a Right of Inheritance could not entitle a Man to Possession, while the Person from whom he deriv'd that Right was living: That the Oath of Allegiance regarded a natural Demise only: That there was no Provision in the Law for a civil Demise: That it was the Business of the Convention to supply the Defect: That if the King dissolv'd the Tye between himself and his Subjects, he did the same between them and his Posterity;

(b) It is particularly remember'd, that the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earls of Huntington and Mulgrave, and the Lord Churchill, were absent, under various Pretences.

(i) Sir John Reresby observes, That the public Joy did not rise so high on this Occasion, as was expected: And it deserves to be farther remember'd, That Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, who was appointed to preach before the Lords, pleaded Indisposition to excuse himself; and, none of his Brethren caring to officiate in his room, the Honour fell to Dr. Gee, one of the Prince's Chaplains.

A.D. 1688-9. Posterity; and that the Desertion operated in the same manner with respect to a Sovereign, as an Attainder to the Subject. This Debate was the most violent of any that these violent Times produced, and ended in the manner most mortifying to his Highness the Prince-Administrator, and those who had embark'd their All on his Bottom; for, on a Division of the House, it appear'd, that there was a Majority against the Vacancy of eleven Voices.

They reject the Notion of a Vacancy: And yet cannot shew by whom it is fill'd.

But by whom was the Throne fill'd? was, naturally and obviously, the next Question. Against the absent King they had already put in a Caveat, as well by the two former Debates relating to the original Contract, and the Breach of it; as the use they had made of the Word deserted, instead of abdicated: And as to the next Heir, they were not agreed who he was. We are told by Bishop Burnet, that when it was propos'd by some, that the (k) Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales should be examin'd into, it was rejected with Indignation: And when others made a Counter-motion, That the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declar'd King and Queen, as the Persons to whom the Right of Succession was fallen, it was over-rul'd by a Majority of five Voices. And thus the Day of national Thanksgiving, became a Day of national Confusion.

It is natural to imagine, that the new Courtiers were not very easy under the Damp which this sudden Cloud brought upon their Affairs; and that they apply'd themselves with all the Art and Industry in their Power to disperse it: But then as it is impossible to trace them Step by Step thro' any one of their dark Intrigues, we ought to be as tender in our Charge, as we are deficient in our Proof.

A tumultuous Petition set on foot.

It is, however, most certain, that the very next Day, viz. February 1, some bold and officious Persons prepar'd a Petition to the two Houses, in the Name of great Numbers of the Inhabitants of London and Westminster, setting forth their deep Sense of the Dangers of Delays and perplexed Debates about settling the Government, at that time vacant; by reason whereof the necessary Ends of Government could not be duly administred, and humbly desiring, that the Prince and Princess of Orange might be speedily settled on the Throne, &c. and made it their Business to sollicit Hands to it, not only from House to House, but in the very Streets and all public Places, to the Terror and Wonder of all considerate Men, who rightly concluded, that the best Cause would be disgrac'd by such irregular Means of supporting it, and who were asham'd to see the last Resource, in a manner, plac'd in the Mob. It is true, the Prince himself thought it incumbent on him to discountenance so scandalous a Proceeding, and actually did call upon the Lord Mayor to put a stop to it: But by the Lord Mayor's Order thereon, it appears, that it had time to operate first; for the Preamble runs in these very Words, "Whereas his Highness the Prince of Orange has been pleas'd to signify to me this Day, that divers Persons, pretending themselves to be Citizens of London, in a tumultuous and disorderly manner have lately disturb'd the present Convention of Lords and Commons sitting at Westminster, upon Pretence of petitioning, &c." which is an Acknowledgment, that the Outrage had been carry'd to the very Doors of both Houses: And Sir John Reresby is express, that the Lords who were for conferring the Crown immediately on the Prince, and who began to apprehend that the adverse Parties might prevail against them, found Means to stir up the People to petition in this tumultuous manner; adding, that the Lords rejected it because it was not sign'd; and the Commons for a much better Reason; because they would not be aw'd in their Resolutions, which ought to be free. [Mem. p. 310.]

Thanks of the Commons given to the Clergy, Soldiery, Seamen, &c.

The Latter, however, thought it advisable to qualify this Refusal by two popular Votes, which pass'd Nemine Contradicente, viz. 1, That the Thanks of the House be given

(k) Concerning this Circumstance his Lordship proceeds to expatiate as follows:

"Some prefied this, not so much from an Opinion that they were bound to assert his Right, if it should appear that he was born of the Queen, as because they thought it would justify the Nation, and more particularly the Prince and the two Princesses, if an Imposture in that Matter could have been prov'd. And it would have gone far to satisfy many of the weaker sort, as to all the Proceeding against King James. Upon which I was order'd to gather together all the presumptive Proofs that were formerly mention'd, which were all ready to have been made out. It is true, these did not amount to a full and legal Proof: Yet they seem'd to be such violent Presumptions, that, when they were all laid together, they were more convincing than plain and downright Evidence: For that was liable to the Suspicion of Subornation: Whereas the other seem'd to carry on them very convincing Characters of Truth and Certainty. But when this Matter was in private debated, some observ'd, that as King James, by going about to prove the Truth of the Birth and yet doing it so defectively, had really made it more suspicious than it was before; so if there was no clear and positive Proof made of an Imposture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out beyond the Possibility of Contradiction, would really give more Credit to the thing than it then had, and, instead of weakening it, would strengthen the Pretension of his Birth.——

He was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an Enemy both to the Nation and to the establish'd Religion: It was impossible for the People of England to know, whether he was the same Person that had been carry'd over, or not: If he should die, another might be put in his room, in such a manner that the Nation could not be assured concerning him: The English Nation ought not to send into another Country for Witnesses to prove that he was their Prince; much less receive one upon the Testimony of such, as were not only Aliens, but ought to be presum'd Enemies: It was also known, that all the Persons, who had been the Confidents in that Matter, were convey'd away: So it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the Truth of that Birth could be found out. But while these things were fairly debated by some, there were others who had deeper and darker Designs in this Matter.

They thought it would be a good Security for the Nation, to have a dormant Title to the Crown lie as it were neglected, to oblige our Princes to govern well, while they would apprehend the Danger of a Revolt to a Pretender still in their Eye. Wildman thought, it was a deep Piece of Policy to let this lie in the dark, and undecided. Nor did they think it an ill Precedent, that they should so neglect the Right of Succession, as not so much as to enquire into this Matter. Upon all these Considerations, no further Enquiry was made into it. It is true, this put a plausible Objection in the Mouth of all King James's Party: Here, they said, an Infant was condemned, and deny'd his Right, without either Proof or Enquiry. This still takes with many of the present Age. And, that it may not take more in the next, I have us'd more than ordinary Care to gather together all the Particulars that were then laid before me as to that Matter."

A.D. 1688-9. given to the Clergy of the Church of England, who had preached and written againſt Popery, who had refus'd to read the King's Declaration, and who, in Oppoſition to the pretended diſpenſing Power, clam'd in the late Reign, had withſtood the illegal Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. And, 2, That the Thanks of the Houſe be given to the Officers, Soldiers, and Mariners, who had teſtify'd their ſteady Adherence to the Proteſtant Religion, and who had been inſtrumental in delivering the Kingdom from Popery and Slavery; alſo; to all ſuch as had appear'd in Arms for that Purpoſe (l).

who had appear'd against Popery, &c.

About this time alſo, to keep up the Flame without Doors, and to intimidate the Refractory within, two Papers were ſet forth, no doubt by the Direction of thoſe who conjur'd up the Mob-Petition, under the Title of, Several Queries relating to the preſent Proceedings in Parliament, more eſpecially recommended to the Conſideration of the Biſhops, and (m) A Proteſtant Precedent offer'd to the Biſhops for the Excluſion of King James II. The Queries were in all twelve. In the firſt it was aſk'd, "How the Houſe of Commons could anſwer it to their Conſtituents, if they neglected the preſent great Opportunity to rectify all the Miſchiefs which had aroſe from the Neglect of the like Opportunity at the Reſtoration? 2. Whether the Nation could be preſerv'd from falling again into the like Miſchiefs, without altering the Succeſſion, more eſpecially ſince the Birth of the Prince of Wales was not proved ſuppoſititious? And whether it would not be more adviſeable to make that Alteration firſt, and proſecute the Enquiry afterwards? 3. Whether it could be imagin'd worth the Prince of Orange's while to quit his Stadtholderſhip in Holland, in order to become a Subject here, from whence he might be liable to be baniſhed in a Year's time, in caſe his Royal Conſort ſhould die ſo ſoon? 4. Whether, conſidering the preſent State of Affairs, it was ſafe to truſt the Adminiſtration in the Hands of a Woman, tho' ever ſo virtuous? And whether the Nation would be able to protect itſelf without the Aſſiſtance of his Highneſs, who was already ſtrengthen'd with more Alliances than England could ever hope to obtain, in caſe the Crown was conferr'd on any other? 5. Whether it would be a greater real Kindneſs to the Princeſs, to make her ſole Queen, with an apparent Probability of her being depoſed again, than to aſſociate her with her Huſband, who alone was able to maintain the Poſſeſſion of the Throne, and protect the Kingdom? 6. Whether it was not more likely that a Prince who could pretend no Right to the Crown but the Choice of the People, ſhould obſerve the Conditions on which it was beſtow'd on him, than one who would be prompted by the Flatteries of proſtitute Prieſts and Lawyers, to plead a Right Divine to the Scepter, and to challenge ſuch a Prerogative as could neither be diminiſhed nor controll'd even by his own Conſent in Parliament? 7. Whether the Houſe of Commons, upon theſe Conſiderations, would not think it neceſſary that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be crowned King and Queen for their two Lives? And whether it could be imagined that the Commons ſhould ſo far betray their Country, as to recede from this Point, ſo neceſſary for its Preſervation, notwithſtanding all the Diſturbances which the Biſhops ſhould make in the Houſe of Lords; and tho' they did not meet with the Concurrence of that Houſe ſo ſoon as in Reaſon might be expected? 8. Whether the Houſe of Lords would ſuffer themſelves any longer to be impoſ'd upon by the Biſhops, in a thing that would be ſo injurious to the Nation; and, admitting they ſhould, whether the Circumſtances of Affairs would not in a little time force them to a Compliance with the Houſe of Commons? 9. Whether the Prince of Orange would not ſhew himſelf one of the unkindeſt Men in the World if he did not ſtick by theſe People, till he ſaw them ſecur'd, that had ventur'd their Lives and Fortunes for him and their Country in Confidence of his Protection? and whether he, as Head of the Proteſtant Religion, be not obliged to ſtand by the forty-eight Proteſtant Lords, and Houſe of Commons, that had ſerved their Country ſo faithfully? 10. Whether it would not be Prudence in the Biſhops,

Inflammatory Papers.

A.D. 1688-9.

(l) Mr. Lewiſon Gower was appointed to wait on the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with the former of theſe Votes; and Mr. Wharton on the Marſhal Schomberg with the other. The Marſhal reply'd, "That he look'd upon it as a great Honour done to the Army, that the Houſe of Commons ſhould take ſo much notice of their Service; that he would communicate it to the whole Army; and that he hop'd it would have a very good Effect." The Archbiſhop made no Reply at all.

(m) Viz. That of Sigiſmund the Third, hereditary King of Sweden, who, by a Convention of the States of that Kingdom was excluded, even with his Heirs (a Severity, which, ſays our Author, both the honourable Houſes of Parliament here have, with great Juſtice and Wiſdom, declin'd) from that Crown for ever. Some of the Articles drawn up againſt him were theſe: Firſt, for ſwerving from their receiv'd Chriſtian Religion; as alſo from his Oath and Promiſe, and ſolemn Engagement made to his People at his Coronation, to preſerve their Rights and Privileges; as alſo, their holy reform'd Religion inviolated: For departing the Country without the Conſent, and againſt the Will, of the States and Orders of the Realm: For exporting ſeveral Acts of great Concernment out of the Chancelary: For proſecuting ſuch as would not embrace or favour the Romiſh Superſtition: For contemning and endeavouring to undermine and annul thoſe laudable Inſtitutions and Laws made for the Security of the Realm, and the Eſtabliſhment of the Proteſtant reformed Religion: For raiſing up what Enemies he could againſt his Native Country, thereby to involve his Subjects in a Deluge of Blood, which he intended, and had almoſt effected: For inhumanly deſigning and ſuborning Ruffians and Villains, to murder and aſſaſſinate one of the chief Nobles, for no other Reaſon, but that, out of Conſcience and Duty, he would have perſuaded him from thoſe Irregularities and notorious Breaches of the known Laws of the Land. For theſe, and many more Cauſes, as the ſending his Son out of the Land, without the Conſent of the States, and cauſing him to be brought up and educated in the Romiſh Superſtition, did the Swedeſh (ſubmitting the fame to the Judgment of all ſincere and candid Arbitrators) juſtify their Abdication for ever, of King Sigiſmund the Third, and his Heirs, from the Crown of Sweden, &c. and proceeded ſtraight to the conſtituting and electing of Charles Duke of Sudermania. Vid. Spanheim's Hiſt of Sweden, &c. And, in Concluſion, they pray for, and doubt not of, a candid Conſtruction, a benign and favourable Acceptation, from all Chriſtian Emperors, Kings, Princes, States, &c. of this their legitimate Defence, and to vindicate them and their moſt equal Cauſe from all Calumny, or evil Interpretation whatſoever.

A.D. 1688-9. thops, supposing their Designs be good, as it was to be hop'd they were, to shew their Readiness to assist the Nobility and Gentry in carrying on this great Work, whereby they might settle the Church upon the surest Foundation, the Laws of God and of the Land, and continue themselves in the Affections of the People? 11. Whether all the Protestant Blood which should be spilt in Ireland by reason of these long Delays, would not be justly laid at the Bishops Doors, if they proceeded after the same manner they had begun? And lastly, to answer the great Objection, that the Kingdom of Scotland would be lost, if that of England was made elective for this Turn, whether the Scots could chuse any body that would be more agreeable to their Interests than the Prince of Orange? And, supposing they could, whether it would not be Madness to imagine, since they had a different Parliament, different Laws, and a different Original Contract (s) that the King might commit a Forfeiture there, when he had committed none here, or a Forfeiture here, when he had committed none there) that they would not place the Crown upon him, without any respect to what is done here, whether we made it a Forfeiture, or only a bare Demise?" A.D. 1688.

But neither these Papers, nor the Mob-Petition, made as yet any Converts in the House of Lords: On the contrary, they met on the first of February, in the same Disposition that they had separated the Evening before, and would hear of nothing but sending back the Vote of the Commons, so amended, by inserting the Word deserted, instead of abdicated, and by omitting those Words entirely, and the Throne is thereby vacant, as manifestly left the King without (n) Hope, and, by Inuendo, the Prince of Orange (n) His Friends, however, took advantage of the present Ferment to set forth the following specious Paper:

"A Lord's Speech without-doors, to the Lords, upon the present Condition of the Government.

My Lords,

Pray give me leave to cast in my Mite at this time upon this great Debate; and tho' it be with an entire Dissent to some leading Lords, to whom I bear great Reverence, it is according to my Conscience, and that is the Rule of every honest Man's Actions.

My Lords, I cannot forbear thinking, that a greater Reproach can hardly come upon any People, than is like to fall upon us Protestants, for this unprecedented Usage of our poor King: We fear'd the Security of our Religion because of him, and are now like to violate a great part of it by forfeiting our Loyalty towards him; Religion is the Pretence, but some fear, a new Master is the Thing: This I take to have been the Business of To-day; for, notwithstanding we see how feeble a thing Popery is in England, that it is beaten without Blows, and routed so effectually, that it can never hope, nor we justly fear, it should return upon us, and consequently our Religion pretty secure, yet I don't see that this satisfies us, unless the King goes also: He must be turn'd away, and the Crown change its Head; for, if the Crown be not the Quarrel more than Property, and his Majesty's Person than his Religion, why did not the Prince stop, when he heard a free Parliament was calling by the King's Writs, (where all Matters, especially that of the Prince of Wales, might have been consider'd) or, at least, where his Majesty's Commissioners of Peace met him? Who advis'd him to advance, and give his Majesty that Apprehension of his own Insecurity? and if any thing but a Crown would have serv'd him, why was a noble Peer of this House clapt up at Windsor, when his Majesty sent him on purpose to invite the Prince to St. James's? A Message that affected all good Mens Hearts more than any thing but his Majesty's Return: it look'd so natural and peaceable. But it seems as if it had been therefore affronted; for the Invitation could not have been receiv'd without the King's remaining King: And who was there that did not lately say it should be so? I, and who is there now that does not see it is not so?

We can, my Lords, no longer doubt of this, if we will remember, that, the same Night the Prince should have answer'd his Majesty's kind Message, the King's Guards were chang'd, and at Midnight the Prince's Guards were clapt upon his Majesty's Person; and, which is yet more extravagant, to accomplish the Business, three noble Lords, in view, were sent to let him know, it was not for his Safety, or the Prince's Honour, that he should stay in his own Palace. A strange Way, my Lords, of treating one's own King in his own House! I cannot comprehend how it was for the Prince's Honour the King should go against his Will; or how it was against his Honour that his Majesty should be safe in his own House: I leave it with your Lordships to think, who could render the King's Stay unsafe at Whitehall after the Dutch Guards were poured there?

My Lords, this I confess is a great Iniquity that sticks with me, and deserves our highest Scrutiny and Reflection, that, after deserting our King away, we should offer to advance ourselves to any body to take the Government, as if he had formally deserted it: It becomes us rather to ask, Where the King is? how he came to go? and who sent him away? I take the Honour of the Peerage of England to be deeply engag'd, both at home and abroad, to search out this Matter, and especially those who are now present, most of whom owe their Share in that noble Order to his Majesty, his Brother, Father, or Grandfather. It is not unreasonable to believe the King had not gone at first, but upon some Message sent, and Letters receiv'd, to take care of his Person, for that nothing less than the Crown was intended; but being not out of his own Territories, and therefore no Desertion, Abdication, or Remise, as the Critics of the Conjuncture we are under pretend, (for the King may be where he will in his own Kingdom:) We see, while it was in his Choice to go, he return'd, and by as good as our Advice too; so that we cannot in truth say his Desertion is the Cause; for it is plainly the Effect of our late extraordinary Proceedings. If any should say, he needed not, have gone now, it is a great Mistake; for a King ought to go, if he cannot stay a King in his own Kingdom; which Force refus'd to let him be: And to stay, a Subject to another Authority, had been a meaner Forfeiture of his Right than can in justice be charg'd upon his Retirement: Wherefore his going must and will lie at their Doors that set him an Hour to be gone out of his own Palace.

Many are angry (and yet pleas'd) that he is gone for France; but where, my Lords, should he go? Flanders dar'd not receive him: Holland, you could not think he should go to; and Ireland you would have lik'd less; and when we consider how for a League with France has been made the Cause of his Misfortune (tho' to this day it is in the Clouds) what other Prince had the same Obligation to receive and succour him? Therefore, whatever Arts are us'd to blacken his Retreat, we cannot, with any Shew of Reason, imagine, that he could think himself safe with us, that had exercis'd sovereign Power without him our sovereign Lord, and under the Protection of a foreign Prince and his Army; though at the same time, we had sworn Allegiance to him; and that it was unlawful for us to take up Arms against him, under any Pretence whatever.

My Lords, if this be not virtually and in effect to pull the Crown off his Head, and dethrone him unheard, I am to learn my Alphabet again. This is short warning to give Kings, for us, at least, my Lords, that boast of Loyalty, and were brought to these Seats by the Favour of the Crown. What can other Nations think of the Nobility of this, if we come not to a juster Temper? God defend us, and our Children after us, from the ill Consequences of what has been done, and prevent the rest. Had we embraced the happy Providence of his Majesty's Return, we might have improv'd it, that the Children unborn should have blessed us: Then we had reformed safely, for by joining Title to our Actions, we had made them legal. This we should have had from his Majesty, or a plain Denial, which would in some measure have excused so rare and unusual an Enterprise: Nor can I comprehend which way it is possible to guard the Prince's Honour, but by doing his Majesty Right; for your Lordships may please to remember, that in the Memorial of the States, that was printed amongst us, which they gave to all the public Ministers at the Hague, to justify their sending the Prince their Forces upon this Expedition, they also expressly say, It was upon Condition not to dethrone the King, or alter the Succession; and in my Opinion, we are in the high way to both.

My Lords, we are Protestant Christians, as well as Peers of the Realm, and are now upon our Religion and Conscience, as well as Honour, to do right: Let us so act as we can answer it to God and Man, and not stumble at Straws and leap over Blocks; Errors cannot be corrected by committing greater; nor one Part of the Government be mended, by

A.D. 1688-9. Orange too. This brought the Former Points again into Debate; the new Courtiers were again worsted, and for the present, had no other Resource, than to shew their Resentment by entering a Protest; in which, no less than forty of them join'd, having the Marquis of Hallifax and the Earl of Danby at their Head. A.D. 1688-9.

It was not however till the next Day that the said Vote and Amendments were actually sent down, and then they were accompany'd with a sort of Qualifier; namely, their unanimous by beating out another to do it. I need not tell your Lordships, that by our Laws, Kings cannot err, and therefore they are not accountable, but their Ministers are, without whom a King cannot perform any Act of Government; which is the reason of the Maxim; and therefore let them be punished that the Law only makes guilty. This our wise Ancestors contrived to save the Head of the Government whole, and to prevent the Confusion and Disorder that might otherwise be apt to attend the Form of it; nor is it indeed a thing that ought to be endur'd by us Peers, to suppose that he that raised us so high, could be for any Reason thrown by us so low.

My Lords, let us limit the King if you please, but not renounce him; there is a Difference between restraining and destroying him. What need of such extraordinary Remedies, since that which secures the Government under one King, will do it under another? Popery itself can never come in but over the Bridge of despotic or absolute Power; and if we can secure ourselves from that, we are as safe against Opinion as against Ambition; and till we are so by an Amendment of our Constitution, we are exposed to the mere good Nature of the Prince in Possession whoever he be. And to render what I have said to your Lordships not unreasonable, and what I have to move your Lordships to, in the Close of my Speech, not ungrateful, I beseech your Lordships that we may call up our Account, and see how our Loss and Gain stands, so far as we have gone in our late Change.

We have lost a lawful King, and got an unlawful Protector, as our Law stands: we have miss'd a legal and a free Parliament, and have got a Convention that cannot make Laws, nor call a Parliament that can, but what will need a Confirmation from a better Authority.

We have lost the Reputation of keeping our Faith with Heretics, by breaking our solemn Oaths with our King, in the time of his Extremity, because we thought him such, tho' he gave us leave to lay down our Commissions, that we might not have the Temptation or Occasion to betray him: But we have got the Reputation of good Protestants by it, tho' I fear, not of good Men, in that some of us have not only not shewn ourselves irreligiously concern'd for our Religion; but, in some respect, not honestly; that, besides a thousand personal Immoralities, could press Advance-money from the King overnight, to bear the Charges of deserting him next Day, against our warm and repeated Vows to take his Fate, and die at his Feet! And that any of us should be tainted for this Treachery, and numbered among the Heroes for our running away, cannot surely be the Lord's doing, let Dr. Burnet say what he will (alluding to his Application of that Text, in his Sermon before the Commons on the Thanksgiving-Day); and yet it is very marvellous in some Mens Eyes for all that. These are the Spurke, my Lords, that hunt the poor King's Blood, tho' we know they had hardly had any in their Veins, but for his Bounty, and yet are the Favourites of the Reformation. For Christ's sake, my Lords, let us not at this rate christen Villany and rank Dishonesty among the Graces. Popery itself could not have done more; and, it is certain, we are even with the Papists now to all Intents and Purposes.

This is not all our Loss; we have rebelled against the fifth Commandment also, Honour thy Father; and tho' we have got that of leaving Father for the sake of Religion, we could have but little Religion to do it in such a Manner, to so affectionate a Father; nor did it lessen the Error to have a Church-of-England Apostle to be Captain of her Lifeguard, in his blue Coat and Jack-boots, and an arrant temporal Sword in his Hand, to defend natural Affection and passive Obedience. This was an odd sort of Compliance with our Saviour's Command, to put up his Sword as one of St. Peter's Successors. My Lords, I shall not stop here; we thought we had been rid of popish Soldiers, but find we have got as many Papists in our Dutch, as we had in our English Army: Now it is plain, that either all Papists are not alike, (and then the Danger we have apprehended from Papists is not universal, as we have alarm'd, but that they are to be liv'd with, since we are to be fav'd and guarded from the Danger of Popery by them) or we have ill Luck to think we can be fav'd from that Religion by those that are of it, because they are Dutchmen. My Lords, I am sorry we can take such Pleasure to see Strangers tread our Courts, pray God it does not shew the Way to other Countries to take their turns. But that a Dutch Papist should be so harmless a thing with us, that thought no Papists could be so, shews our Contradictions to a Madness. I know not how well our Soldiers like to give way to Dutchmen, that thought they had purchas'd a Preference to Strangers at a dear rate; but it is the justest thing in the World upon them, that the Prince should distrust those to guard him, that had betray'd their own Master that lov'd them to a Fault; they may serve to be sent for Holland, to be knock'd on the Head in the Dutchmen Quarrel, but never to be trusted at home, tho' they have given up their Quarters with their King to Foreigners; so that the Proverb is true upon them, they have hereby brought their Noble to Ninepence. Yet, to be just, I must confess it is a Reproach due only to their Officers, and not all of them neither; and Time may give those the Opportunity to retrieve the Credit they have lost by other Mens Faults.

We were also very apprehensive of the ill Consequences of the dispensing Power, especially in the Case of Sir Edward Hales; but it seems the Common-council of London are forbid to take the usual Oaths, and yet requir'd to act; which is an unqualify'd Capacity. We were in hopes we had lost a rude Army, but we have found a ruder; twenty Places cry out of them; and Kingston certainly with great Justice, that in two Nights time was two hundred Pounds the worse for them. And, for cheating we have got qualifying, that they that won't enter into Associations to protect the Prince of Orange, without one Word of our King, were to have no Employment; so that if the Prince should take the Crown, I am bound to defend him against my own King, and my sworn Allegiance, tho' he come in the Right of his Crown. Believe me, my Lords, it is the boldest Bid that ever Men made: I see Forty-one was a Fool to Eighty-eight; and that we Churches of England Protestants shall cancel all the Merits of our Fathers, overthrow the Ground and Consequence of their most exemplary Loyalty to King Charles the First and Second, render their Death the Death of Fools, trample their Memories and Blood under our Feet, subject ourselves to the just Reproach of the Fanatics, whose Principles and Practices we have outdone, even to that King that we fore'd upon them, and by our Example had brought them to live well withal. God help us; this, my Lords, makes me say, that either we must turn from being Church-of-England Men, or steer another Course, for it is but too plain that Presbytery is leading us out of our ancient Way; and, whether we believe it or no, our Church sinks, and will more, for that is the Interest that suits best with a Dutch Humour and Conjunction; and be sure, if we are so base to leave our King, God will be so just as to leave us; and here, my Lords, I shall leave you, with this humble Motion, That we make an humble Address to his Majesty to return home to us, that we may act securely, and not go out of the good old Way, which may entail Misery upon us and our Posterity. I should think we have had enough of sending our Princes abroad, in that much of the Inconvenience we have lain under since their Restoration has been chiefly owing to it: We have driven him where we would not have him go, and we do what we can to provoke that League we have been afraid of, and made a great Part of the Reason of this strange Alteration in the Kingdom. Some tell us, it is too late; but I cannot comprehend the good Sense of such an Objection: Is it at any time too late for a King and his People to agree? After bloody Battles it has not been thought so, in all Times and Nations; and why it may not be without them, I never heard a good Reason yet: If his going was unreasonable, it has hurt him more than us, since we may thence hope for the better Terms: If it was not a Fault to go, it will be a great one in us, if we can have him home upon good Terms, and will not; for, if I may with leave speak it, his Return is as much our Convenience as his Advantage.

The offensive Part of him is gone, that is to say, the Power of Popery, and what remains is our great Interest to keep and improve to our own Benefit and Safety: I mean, my Lords, his undoubted Title and Kingship. And whatever some hot Men say, that are more govern'd by private Avarice and Revenge than the public Good, of these Kingdoms; I cannot but renew my Motion to your Lordships, That we may send a Duke, an Earl, a Viscount, a Baron, and two spiritual Lords, to invite his Majesty home, upon the Constitution of the Government. And, my Lords, forgive me if I say, that if we can but get our Juries, Sheriffs, Judges, High Courts of Chancery and Parliaments, settled as they ought to be, the Army at least reduced, the Militia better regulated, and a due Liberty of Conscience established to all Protestant Dissenters, (I say so far to Papists only, as the Law against Conventicles does admit, we may yet be happy; and upon these Terms, my Lords, and no other, will his Highness the Prince of Orange become truly meritorious with the English Nation.

A.D. 1688-9. unanimous Concurrence to that other Reſolution of the Commons, That the Government of a Popiſh Prince was inconſiſtent with the Welfare of a Proteſtant Kingdom: And yet farther to make their Peace with the Public, as well as to humour the new Court, they order'd, That the Day of Thankſgiving on the ſixth of February Inſtant, on which Day the LATE King James the Second came to the Throne, ſhould not be obſerv'd; and caus'd the ſaid Order to be inſerted in the next Gazette.

But the Commons were not in a Humour to be gratify'd by Halves: The Amendments were immediately taken into Conſideration, and, notwithſtanding all the Minority could urge, were rejected with all the Warmth imaginable; for which a Committee was appointed to prepare Reaſons, to be offer'd at a Conference with the Lords.

Thus ended this buſy Week. The next Day was Sunday; and both Houſes took Advantage of it; not to reſt from their Labours, but to gain Time to ſtrengthen their reſpective Cabals, and further their ſeveral Purpoſes.

The oppoſing Lords, who had now the Aſcendant in the Houſe, had ſtill a Regency in View, as their main Point, and ſubordinately caſt their Eyes on the two Princeſſes. Againſt a Regency, the two great Rivals, Hallifax and Danby, as we have ſeen, co-operated; but, at the ſame time, labour'd ſeparately; the former for the Prince, and the Latter for his Conſort. "The Earl of Danby, ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times, ſent one over to the Princeſs, and gave her an Account of the preſent State of that Debate; and deſir'd to know her own Senſe of the Matter; for, if ſhe deſir'd it, he did not doubt but he ſhould be able to carry it for ſetting her alone on the Throne. She made him a very ſharp Anſwer; ſhe ſaid, ſhe was the Prince's Wife, and would never be other than what ſhe ſhould be in Conjunction with him, and under him; and that ſhe would take it extremely unkindly, if any, under a Pretence of their Care of her, would ſet up a divided Intereſt between her and the Prince. And, not content with this, ſhe ſent both Lord Danby's Letter, and her Anſwer, to the Prince. Her ſending it thus to him was the moſt effectual Diſcouragement poſſible to any Attempt for the future to create a Miſunderſtanding or Jealouſy between them." He adds, the Prince bore this with his uſual Phlegm: For he did not expoſtulate with the Earl of Danby upon it, but continu'd ſtill to employ and to truſt him.

The Behaviour of the Princeſs of Orange during theſe Debates, and of the Prince.

And again, "During all theſe Debates, and the great Heat with which they were managed, the Prince's own Behaviour was very myſterious. He ſtaid at St. James's; he went little abroad; Acceſs to him was not very eaſy; he heard all that was ſaid to him, but ſeldom made any Anſwers; he did not affect to be affable or popular; nor would he take any Pains to gain any one Perſon over to his Party; he ſaid, he came over, being invited, to ſave the Nation; he had now brought together a free and true Repreſentative of the Kingdom; he left it therefore to them to do, what they thought beſt for the good of the Kingdom; and, when things where once ſettled, he ſhould be well ſatisfy'd to go back to Holland again. Thoſe who did not know him well, and who imagin'd that a Crown had Charms which Human Nature was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt, look'd on all this as an Affectation, and as a diſguiſed Threatning, which imported that he would leave the Nation to periſh, unleſs his Method of ſettling it was follow'd."

A.D. 1688-9.

Thus, with regard to his Highneſs, we are here taught to conclude, that a Crown was, in his Eſteem, a thing of ſo little Value, that he ſcarce thought it worth ſtooping for: And yet we learn from the ſame Author, that thoſe who were deepeſt in his Intereſt, and thoſe who were moſt ſollicitous to obtain his Favour, equally endeavour'd, with all their Might, to procure it for him: Beſides, we cannot forget what he has before told us, That the Lawyers would have had him ſeize it in Right of Conqueſt, and that he rejected their Advice, only, that he might get a ſurer Hold, by a fairer, more popular, and more peaceable Title: Speaking alſo of Lord Hallifax's Eagerneſs to get the ſtart of Lord Danby in his Highneſs's good Graces, and, in order thereto, of his Project to compliment him with the Throne, at the Expence of the two Princeſſes, he proceeds as follows: "How far the Prince himſelf entertained this, I cannot tell; but I ſaw it made a great Impreſſion on Bentinck. He ſpoke of it to me, as aſking my Opinion about it, but ſo, that I plainly ſaw what was his own; for he gave me all the Arguments that were offer'd for it, as that it was moſt natural that the Sovereign Power ſhould be only in one Perſon; that a Man's Wife ought only to be his Wife; that it was a ſuitable Return to the Prince for what he had done for the Nation; that a divided Sovereignty was liable to great Inconveniences; and tho' there was leſs to be apprehended from the Princeſs of any thing of that kind, than from any Woman alive, yet all Mortals are frail, and might, at ſome time or other of their Lives, be wrought on.

To all this I anſwer'd with ſome Vehemence, that this was a very ill Return for the Steps the Princeſs had made to the Prince three Years ago; it would be thought both unjuſt and ungrateful; it would meet with great Oppoſition, and give a general ill Impreſſion of the Prince, as inſatiable and jealous in his Ambition. There was an ill Humour already ſpreading itſelf thro' the Nation, and thro' the Clergy: It was not neceſſary to increaſe this; which ſuch a Step, as was now propos'd, would do out of Meaſure. It would engage the one Sex generally againſt the Prince; and, in time, they might feel the Effects of that very ſenſibly; and, for my own Part, I ſhould think myſelf bound to oppoſe it all I could, conſidering what had paſs'd in Holland on that Head. We talked over the whole thing for many Hours, till it was pretty far in the Morning.

A.D. 1688-9. I saw he was well instructed in the Argument; and he himself was possessed with it. So next Morning I came to him and desir'd my Congé. I would oppose nothing in which the Prince seem'd to be concern'd, as long as I was his Servant; and therefore I desir'd to be disengag'd, that I might be free to oppose this Proposition with all the Strength and Credit I had."

Every body knows, that Mr. Bentinck was the Prince's second self; if therefore he us'd such Language as is here ascrib'd to him, it can be no Injury to his Highness to conclude, that he was the Prompter. But the Duke of Bucks goes much farther, and speaks much plainer: He is express, that the Princess had a better Interest than her Consort, tho' he was here arm'd, and she was absent; and that for this Reason she was kept in (n) Holland, till he had master'd that Difficulty, which vex'd him more than any other.

"One of the Prince's Arguments, proceeds his Grace, (tho' he gave some more solid ones that seldom fail to persuade) was indeed a little extraordinary; for he very gravely endeavour'd to make his Friends believe, that he would leave them all in the Lurch, by returning with his Army into Holland, rather than yield the Title to his own Wife: And a while he oppos'd, tho' to no Purpose, even her being join'd with himself in the Sovereignty; which shews the extreme Restlessness of Ambition, even in its highest Scenes of Success: For tho' an almost extravagant Expedition had thus luckily succeeded, even beyond his utmost Hopes, yet, upon this Jealousy, he grew more uneasy than, perhaps, ever in his Life before.

On this account he grew jealous of his most intimate Confidents among the English, because they had so much Regard to his Wife, with whom he lived always coldly and a little imperiously (imitating in that Henry the Seventh) tho' her constant and most remarkable Compliance with him, even against her own Father and Principles also, had been a mighty Help to all his Designs.

At this time, among other Consultations that were held in several Places about these Matters, there was one appointed at Mr. William Herbert's Lodgings at St. James's, who was then sick of the Gout, and so concern'd at the great Favourite's urging, it was best to make the Princess no Sovereign, and only a Queen-Consort, that, rising out of Bed with Earnestness, he protested against ever drawing a Sword on the Prince's Side, if he could have imagin'd him capable of such Usage to his Wife. This so alarm'd and convinc'd Mr. Bentinck of the Impossibility of obtaining a Point, which even so interested a Courtier as Herbert, refus'd to comply in, that in half an Hour's time he brought them Assurance from the Prince of his not insisting on it, and of his being content with a conjunctive Sovereignty, on condition he might have the sole Administration; which last they consented to, because she herself so A.D. 1688-9. desir'd it."

In the first of these three Paragraphs we have an Explanation of that Passage in the Paper of Queries above recited, which says, the Prince would be the unkindest of Men, if he withdrew his Protection from those who had venturd their All for his Sake: And tho' Bishop Burnet, when touching transiently on the Prince's Talk of returning to Holland when things were once settled, will have it, that those who took this for a disguis'd Threatning, did so, because they did not know him well; yet even Bishop Burnet himself, in the same Page, against his Will, authorizes that very Interpretation as follows: "After a Reservedness that had continued so close for several Weeks, that no body could certainly tell what he desir'd, he call'd for the Marquis of Hallifax, and the Earls of Shrewsbury and Danby, and some others, to explain himself more distinctly to them.

He told them, he had been till then silent, because he would not say or do any thing that might seem, in any sort, to take from any Person the full Freedom of deliberating and voting in Matters of such Importance: He was resolv'd neither to court nor threaten any one; and therefore he had declin'd to give out his own Thoughts: Some were for putting the Government into the Hands of a Regent; he would say nothing against it, if it was thought the best Mean for settling their Affairs; only he thought it necessary to tell them, that he would not be the Regent; so, if they continu'd in that Design, they must look out for some other Person to be put in that Post. He himself saw what the Consequences of it were like to prove; so he would not accept of it. Others were for putting the Princess singly on the Throne, and that he should reign by her Courtesy. He said, no Man could esteem a Woman more than he did the Princess; but he was so made, that he could not think of holding any thing by Apron-Strings; nor could he think it reasonable to have any Share in the Government, unless it was put in his Person, and that for Term of Life. If they did think it fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them in it; but he would go back to Holland, and meddle no more in their Affairs. He assur'd them, that whatsoever others might think of a Crown, it was no such thing in his Eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleas'd without it. In the End he said, that he could not resolve to accept of a Dignity, so as to hold it only [during] the Life of another; yet he thought, that the Issue of Princess Anne should be preferr'd, in the Succession, to any Issue that he might have by any other Wife than the Princess. All this he deliver'd to them in so cold and unconcern'd a manner, that those, who judg'd of others by the Dispositions that they felt in themselves, look'd on it all as Artifice and Contrivance."

Thus, if his Highness did not make use of disguis'd

(n) Bishop Burnet says, she was shut in there, during the East Winds, by the freezing of the Rivers, and by contrary Winds, after the Thaw came.

A.D. 1688-9. disguis'd Threatnings, he did of open ones; if he did not covet a Crown upon such Terms as were then offer'd, he did upon his own; and if this was not all Artifice and Contrivance, how are we to account for his Lordship's next Paragraph, which runs in these Words, "This was presently told about, as it was not intended to be kept secret. And it helped not a little to bring the Debates at Westminster to a speedy Determination?" His Lordship adds, "Some were still in Doubt with relation to the Princess: In some it was Conscience; for they thought the equitable Right was in her: Others might be mov'd by Interest, since, if she should think herself wrong'd, and ill used in this Matter, she, who was like to outlive the Prince, being so much younger and healthier than he was, might have it in her Power to take her Revenge on all that should concur in such a Design. Upon this, I, who knew her Sense of the Matter very perfectly by what had pass'd in Holland, as was formerly told, was in a great Difficulty. I had promis'd her never to speak of that Matter, but by HER ORDER; but I presum'd, in such a Case, I was to take ORDERS FROM THE PRINCE: So I asked him, what he would order me to do? he said, he would give me NO ORDERS in that Matter, but left me to do as I pleas'd. I look'd on this as the allowing me to let the Princess's Resolution in that be known; by which many, who stood formerly in Suspence, were fully satisfy'd. Those to whom I gave the Account of that Matter were indeed amaz'd at it, and concluded, that the Princess was either a very good, or a very weak, Woman. An Indifference for Power and Rule seem'd so extraordinary a thing, that it was thought a certain Character of an Excess of Goodness or Simplicity." And yet he would have us believe, that the Prince was so excessively simple, or good, as to be equally indifferent to Power and Rule; in Opposition to the whole Current of his whole Life.

But, over and above this formal Speech of his Highness to his own Partisans, the affected Publication of it, and the busy Part our Historian himself took the liberty to act, in breach of the Trust repos'd in him, yet other Proofs of Artifice and Contrivance are to be traced in the Records of these Times: For tho' it should be allow'd, that the Prince could not prevail on himself to solicit the Suffrages of the English Peers in person, his Agents made no scruple to do it for him: Among their Converts, express Mention is made of the Dukes of Ormond, Southampton, Grafton, and Northumberland, who were at first for a Regency. Dr. Burnet himself adds, "That the poor Bishop of Durham, who had absconded for some time, and was waiting for a Ship to go beyond-sea, fearing public Affronts, and had offer'd to compound by resigning his Bishopric, was now prevail'd on to come, and, by voting the new Settlement, to merit at least a Pardon for all he had done: And, from this Acknowledgment, we are authoris'd to conclude, that the several other Lords, which were, in the end, prevail'd upon to declare for the Prince, either made their Peace or their Court, on the like selfish Considerations.

Crowds wait on the Prince.

Possibly some Progress was made in the great Work of rectifying the Balance of the House of Lords, and of adjusting the Succession with the several Party-leaders, on this important Sunday; for, on that very Day, the Squadron appointed to convoy the Princess from Holland set sail: But, whether she was then sent for, because it was presum'd a Compromise was in view, or to assist his Highness, according to her usual Complacency, against herself, it is certain that, when their Lordships assembled the next Day, the Temper of the Majority appear'd the (p) same as before; and it seem'd to lie on the Commons to argue them out of it.

A Squadron sent to bring over the Princess.

A Conference is the usual Expedient on these Occasions: The Commons demanded one; which was granted of course; and the Reasons they assign'd for rejecting the Amendments of the Lords were in substance as follow, viz. To the First, which respected only the King's withdrawing, because the Word deserted did not fully express the Conclusion necessary to be infer'd from the Premises, to which their Lordships had agreed; whereas the Word abdicated respected the Whole; for which purpose they had made choice of it: And to the Second, 1. Because the Vacancy of the Throne might be infer'd even from that Part of their Vote which their Lordships had agreed to; for, if he had

The Commons Reasons for rejecting the Lords Amendments.

(p) "February 2, 3, (says Sir John Reresby) I saw the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Bedington, the Earl of Scarsdale, and some other Lords, who had all been active in the Prince's Cause, which they now seem'd in some measure to repent. Some of them said, The thing had run a Length they little expected; others, That they could never have believ'd the Prince would have contended for the Crown; but all agreed in Opinion, it was to be set on the Head of the Princess, and so defend in its right Course: And the Earl of Scarsdale particularly told me, the Princess of Denmark was very sensible of the Error she had committed in leaving her Father, to make herself of a Party with the Prince, who now in return was endeavouring to put her by her Right, and to obtain Priority of Succession before her."

And again afterwards: "There were most certainly great and violent Discontents at this time, and the Causes thereof were these: The Prince had declar'd he had no Design upon the Crown, and now fought it as he could: he came to settle the Protestant Religion, and yet brought over four thousand Papists with him in his Army, a Number not far short of what the King had in his; but then the former were Foreigners, the latter, for the most part, English; public Declaration had been made, that the Birth of the Prince of Wales was false or supposititious; that there was a private Treaty made with France to enslave England; that the Murder of the late King, and of the Earl of Essex, would be amply made out: and yet nothing of all this appear'd, excepting some small Circumstances relating to the Earl of Essex: Then the Prince kept his Dutch Forces in Town, while the English were march'd off to remote Quarters; his Highness declar'd he intended to keep his own Men here, and to send ours to Holland and Ireland; the Princess Anne of Denmark was postpon'd in the Succession; several Noblemen were disappointed of Posts and Preferments they deservedly expected for joining with his Highness, because they would not vote so readily for him as he imagin'd: In short, the Letters his Majesty sent to the two Houses were not so much as open'd; and Trade, the Dutch being a frugal People, seem'd to be much abated in London, to what it had been in the King's time: These were the Causes of the Discontents that now broke out and appear'd."

A.D. 1688-9 had deserted the Government, he had in true Construction deserted the Throne. 2. Because they need not take upon them to prove the said Vacancy, as to any other Person, since their Lordships had already admitted it, by their addressing the Prince of Orange to take upon him the Administration, &c. 3. Because there was no Person in the Throne, to extend Protection to the People; and, consequently, there was no Person to whom they ow'd the Allegiance of Subjects; the one being the Condition of the other.

Counter-Reasons of the Lords for insisting on the said Amendments.

It is easy to prolong a Dispute, when it is not the Interest of those concern'd to bring it to an End: When these Reasons were reported, instead of acquiescing, the opposing Lords undertook to confute them; and so far carry'd their Point, that they procur'd a Committee of their own to prepare Counter-Reasons for insisting on their Amendments, to the following Effect, viz. For insisting on the first, Because the Word abdicated was not known to the Common-law of England; and, in the most common Acceptance of the Civil-law, imply'd a voluntary, express Act of Renunciation, which was not the present Case, nor did follow from the Premises: For insisting on the second, against the Vacancy of the Throne, Because that, tho' they had agreed the King had deserted the Government, and had therefore apply'd to the Prince of Orange to take upon him the Administration, it could only be inferr'd from thence, that the Exercise of the Government by King James the Second ceas'd, and that the Lords were willing to secure the Nation against his Return; but not that there was either such an Abdication by him, or such a Vacancy in the Throne, as render'd the Crown elective; to which they could not agree, because, by the Constitution, the Monarchy was hereditary; and because no Act of the King alone could bar or destroy the Right of his Heirs: From which Considerations it appear'd, in answer to the third Reason alledg'd by the Commons, that if the Throne was vacant, by the Abdication of King James II. Allegiance was due to the Person to whom the Right of Succession did belong. Who this Person was they did not take upon them to specify: But, as they had avoided all Discussion of the Birth of the Prince of Wales, and had thereby, in effect, excluded him as well as the King, it must be concluded, that they meant the Princess of Orange, whose lineal Clame, next to a Regency, furnish'd them with the most plausible Pretences to found their present Opposition upon Principle, which was in truth the Result of Disappointment.

Unsatisfactory to the Commons.

These Reasons were communicated to the Commons at a second Conference; and, when reported to the House, produc'd another vehement Debate; Finch, Seymour, and several of their Party, adopting their Lordships Reasons, and arguing with the utmost Vehemence against the Vacancy; but to as little purpose as the new Courtiers had contended for it among the Lords; the Question to agree with their Lordships on that Point being carry'd in the Negative, by two hundred and eighty-two Voices against one hundred and fifty-one. A.D. 1688-9.

A free Conference was now the last Resource of both Houses, to avoid a Rupture, which at this Crisis would, in all Probability, have thrown the Nation into the utmost Confusion; and both made use of their most able and most experienc'd Members to be their Managers, as if the Event had depended on the Force of Truth, and not the Bias of Party.

A free Conference.

Mr. Hampden open'd the Conference with an introductory Speech, importing in general, That the Commons were induc'd to maintain their Vote, because they conceiv'd the Meaning of the Word abdicated was not restrain'd to a voluntary, express Resignation only, in Word or Writing, but extended also to such Overt-acts as were tantamount to it; because, if the Throne had been full, their Lordships would have justify'd their Amendment by telling the Commons by whom it was fill'd; and because they did not apprehend that the present Vacancy had any Tendency to render the Crown elective.

Mr. Sommers who spoke next, to obviate the Objection made by the Lords, that the Word abdicated was not a Law-Term, observ'd, That the very same lay against the Word desert, which their Lordships had substituted in the Room of it; and, after an elaborate Comment on both, tending to shew that the Commons had done no Violence to the Former, by the Sense in which they had us'd it, and that the Latter was of too doubtful and various a Signification to be us'd in the present Case at all, concluded, that the King, by breaking the original Contract, by violating the fundamental Laws, and by withdrawing his Person, had thereby renounced to be a King according to the Constitution, which was to all Intents and Purposes an Abdication.

Mr. Serjeant Holt follow'd in the same Track, and came to the like Conclusion; for, according to him, Government and Magistracy, were a Trust, and he that acted contrary to that Trust, disclam'd or renounc'd it: He might have said forfeited it.

Here the Earl of Nottingham interpos'd, and previous to any farther Litigation, desir'd to be inform'd, What the Commons meant by the Conclusion of their Vote, that the Throne was thereby vacant? Whether they meant that it was so vacant as to null the Succession in the hereditary Line? Which, according to the Lords, was to make the Throne elective.

Mr. Serjeant Maynard reply'd, That the Constitution, notwithstanding the Vacancy, was the same; that the Laws, which were the Foundations of the Constitution, were the same; that the Commons did not say, that the Crown was always and perpetually elective, but that there was a Breach in the Government, which it was necessary to fill; and that, when it was filled, the Constitution would be the same as before.

Here the Bishop of Ely took the Word and

A.D. 1688-9. in oppoſition to what Mr. Sommers had advanc'd, demanded, Whether, according to the Sentiments of Grotius whom he had quoted, the going away with a Purpoſe to return, or under the Influence of Force or Fear, did not void the Notion of an Abdication? But no direct Anſwer was given. Serjeant Maynard ſaid, That was no Part of the Caſe declar'd by the Commons in their Vote; and the Biſhop did not think fit to inſiſt on his Queſtion: On the contrary, he contented himſelf with playing the Critic on the Word abdicate; affirm'd, that in the Opinion of the Lords it was of too large a Signification for the Caſe in hand; argued, that in a ſucceſſive Kingdom an Abdication could only infer a Forfeiture as to the Perſon himſelf; and concluded with intimating, that, if this was declar'd to be the Senſe of both Houſes, all farther Conteſt would be at an end.

The Earl of Rocheſter, who ſpoke next, would not admit that Abdication did imply a perfect Renunciation, nor that the two Houſes were thereby authoris'd to break the Line of Succeſſion, and fill the Throne, as they pleas'd; but inſiſted, that, upon any Deſcent of any kind, Allegiance was due by Law to the legal Heir; and, conſequently, that there was no Vacancy.

The Earl of Nottingham then propos'd, as he had before done in the Houſe of Lords, That, in order to ſhorten the Debates, the abdicating or deſerting Point might be poſtpon'd, till that of the Vacancy was adjuſted. But this was objected to by Sir George Treby, as an Inverſion of Order; it being to enquire of the Concluſion, ſaid he, before the Premiſes were ſettled; for, according to the Words of the Vote, the Vacancy was the Reſult of the Abdication. This drew on a Reply from the Earl, and a Rejoinder from Sir George; but without drawing the Diſpute to any Iſſue. Upon which the Earl of Rocheſter called upon the Commons to give their own Meaning of the Word abdicate: Adding, "I believe my Lords would be induc'd to agree that the King hath abdicated, that is, renounced the Government for himſelf, if you mean no other than that.—But if you mean any thing more, tho' their Lordſhips ſhould agree to the uſing the Word abdicated, yet this would prove a greater Argument againſt their agreeing in the other Point, about the Vacancy of the Throne."

Here there was a Pauſe;—Of which Mr. Hampden took the advantage to ſay, "If the Lords have nothing farther to offer upon this Point, it will be fit for us to go on to the other Amendment;" And, no Lord offering to ſpeak, Mr. Sacheverel open'd the Debate on that Amendment, by urging, That the Commons very much wonder'd that they ſhould be charg'd by the Lords, with a Deſign to alter the Conſtitution by rendring the Kingdom elective, when no ſuch thing was meant by them, or could be deduc'd from their Words. He alſo undertook to ſhew the Inſufficiency of their Lordſhips Reaſons for inſiſting on their Amendments; and argued, that if, as they ſtated the Caſe, the King had only deſerted the Exerciſe of the Kingſhip, but ſtill continued in the Office; then all the Acts of the Convention were unjuſtifiable, and the Nation could have no Relief, unleſs their Lordſhips, by their own Authority, ſhould ſet up another Regency; which, by the Laws of England, they could not. A.D. 1688-9.

Mr. Pollexfen, with ſome Shrewdneſs, but more Perplexity, obſerv'd, That if the King had only deſerted the Exerciſe of the Government, as their Lordſhips in their Reaſons ſuggeſted, the Right ſtill remain'd in him: That, however, no ſuch Inference could be made, even from their own Vote; ſince they did not therein ſay, that he had deſerted the Exerciſe of the Government, but the Government itſelf; which, according to them, were different things: That if their Lordſhips Purpoſe at that time had been to ſignify, that only the Exerciſe ceas'd, ſurely they would have aſcertain'd their Meaning, by making uſe of the Word: That it was their Buſineſs to reaſon from the Words of the Vote: That thoſe Words indicated, not that he had exercis'd the Government, but that he had deſtroy'd it: That, conſequently, his Deſertion was not a ceaſing to reign, but a ceaſing to tyrannize: That, moreover, no Diſtinction could be made between Government and the Exerciſe of the Government: That whoſoever depriv'd the King of the one depriv'd him alſo of the other, and conſequently was equally guilty in the Eye of the Law; which their Lordſhips would do well to conſider for their own ſakes: That, if the King had ſtill a Right to be a King, the Commons could not agree to debar him the Exerciſe of that Right: That if, on the contrary, by breaking the original Contract, ſubverting the Conſtitution, &c. he had abdicated that Right, they might lawfully go on to ſettle the Peace and Welfare of the Nation: And, laſtly, That, if the Right was ſtill in him, the ſetting up a Regency without his Conſent, or till his Return, would be introductive of a new Principle of Government, which would turn our ancient, limited Government, by Monarchy, into a Commonwealth.

Here the Earl of Clarendon cited that Paſſage in the ſecond Reaſon of the Commons for diſagreeing with their Lordſhips, in which they ſay, That they need not prove, that as to any other Perſon, (beſides the King) the Throne was alſo vacant; and aſk'd, Whether this did not imply a Vacancy throughout, as well as with reſpect to King James? And, if ſo, it muſt neceſſarily follow, added his Lordſhip, that the Kingdom muſt thereby become elective ſtill, or the Government be chang'd into a Commonwealth.

Serjeant Maynard reply'd, That, if there had not been a Defect of Government, there would have been no need to apply to the Prince of Orange to take upon him the Adminiſtration: That the Word elective was none of the Commons Word: That they had not the thing in their Thoughts: That the Extent of their Meaning was, to provide a Supply for the Defect brought upon the Government

A.D. 1688-9. Government by the late King's Mal-administration: That there was a Neceſſity that ſuch a Proviſion ſhould be made; and that, if it was made, it would not render the Kingdom perpetually elective.

Here Mr. Pollexfen again call'd upon the Lords to declare, Whether they agreed that the Throne was vacant, as to King James? And, if it was fill'd by any body elſe, to name by whom; but could obtain no direct Anſwer: The Lords had all along acted as if the Throne was vacant; and yet could not be brought to acknowledge it in Words, becauſe the Stream of their Intereſt now ſet another Way: In agreeing to the Vacancy, they gave up the Point of Succeſſion; and, in denying it, they paſs'd a Cenſure on all they had hitherto done. The Lord Clarendon, who undertook to remove the Difficulty which was thus faſten'd upon them, had recourſe to ſuch Evaſions, as rather diſgrac'd than ſerv'd his Cauſe: He would not allow that the Throne was vacant, even as to King James's; but, for Diſcourſe ſake, he would ſuppoſe it: He aſk'd, Whether in that Caſe the Vacancy was not to be ſupply'd by thoſe that ſhould have come if he were dead? and then deſtroy'd that Queſtion by another, Whether there was any body who had the Right of filling it up? All he ſaid ſeem'd to argue Perplexity, or Diſingenuity; or both. To the latter of his Lordſhip's Queries, Serjeant Maynard reply'd, That it was not as yet properly before them; and to the former, That, in the ordinary Way, the Monarchy deſcended to the apparent Heir; but, in the preſent Caſe, it could not; for, ſaid he, we have a Maxim in Law as certain as any other, which ſtops the Courſe, Nemo eſt hæres viventis.

The Earl of Pembroke anſwer'd, That, according to their Lordſhips Conceptions, it was the ſame thing for the King to be dead in Law as in Fact; and that his Heirs were as much his Heirs in one Caſe as the other: That as to the Queſtion, Who was the Heir? or, which is the ſame thing, By whom was the Throne filled? tho' they did not, or could not, name the particular Perſon, it did not follow that there was no ſuch Perſon to name. Maynard, on the contrary, maintain'd his former Propoſition; more indeed by Aſſertions than Arguments; ſaying, among other things, Your Lordſhips will neither agree that the Throne is vacant, nor tell us how it is full: King James is gone; we know of no other; what ſhall the Nation do in this Uncertainty?--- No Man can ſucceed, as the King's Heir, while the King lives.--- The Crown cannot deſcend till he dies.--- &c.

The Earl of Nottingham, recurring to the firſt Article in diſpute, would not allow that the Lords, by making uſe of the Word deſert, had already confeſs'd that the Throne was vacant: On the contrary he affirm'd, they had fully explan'd themſelves on that Head, by urging, that the ſaid Word might have a different Senſe, and did not neceſſarily imply the entire renouncing of a Right, but the bare ceaſing of the Exerciſe: That, therefore, in applying to the Prince to ſupply the Exerciſe, they neither admitted the Throne to be vacant, nor committed any Treſpaſs: For, in the Abſence of the King, they were the King's and Kingdom's great Council, and might have made that Application without the Commons.---- He then touch'd on what Mr. Pollexfen had ſaid, That there was no Diſtinction in Law between the Kingſhip, and the Exerciſe of it; and that it was as much a Crime to take away the Exerciſe as the Kingſhip; but made no Attempt to anſwer it, ſaying, They were not diſcourſing of a Regency, but a Vacancy: After which, he proceeded to adopt Lord Pembroke's Notion, That the Civil Death of the King ought to have the ſame Operation as his natural Death: And thereupon to aſk, Whether, if the next Heir ſhould be ſet aſide in this Caſe, and another ſhould be put in, whether the Right of Succeſſion would alſo be transferred to his Heirs? if not, whether the new King ſhould be King only during King James's Life? or, if during his own, and King James ſhould die firſt, what would become of the hereditary Monarchy? If the Throne was vacant, whether they were oblig'd to fill it? If ſo, whether they ought to fill it according to their old Laws, or according to the Humour of the Times? &c.

A.D. 1688-9.

To all this Mr. Sacheverel reply'd, That the Buſineſs before them was ſimply to determine, whether the Throne was vacant; and that if it was not, as the Scope of their Lordſhips Arguments ſeem'd to inculcate, they need not amuſe themſelves, or the Nation, with purſuing a Train of imaginary Conſequences: And the Earl again deſiring that the Vacancy might be ſuppos'd, in order to the paſſing on to the next Step, the ſame Gentleman again put in his Proteſt; as did alſo Mr. Sommers, who, from the Caſe of Richard II. obſerv'd, that the Word vacant was known to our Common-law, tho' the Word abdicate was not. This gave the Debate a new Turn; for Advantage was taken by the Lords Rocheſter and Clarendon to ſhew, that the Vote of Vacancy, which took place then, made way for filling the Throne by Election, to the Prejudice of the right Heir; which was the very thing apprehended now.

This, Sir Robert Howard, who ſpoke next, acknowledg'd; but then he obſerv'd, that the Election of Henry IV, upon that Occaſion, was very different from the Elections of other Countries: He alſo acknowledg'd, that he thought all which had been done ſince the King left the Government had been legally done: But then he aſk'd, if there had been an unqueſtionable Heir, to whom the Crown had legally deſcended, whether their Lordſhips would have ventur'd on the Exerciſe of his Right, without a Commiſſion from him? All knew, he ſaid, that an Heir Male had been pretended; but all were not ſatisfy'd with that Pretenſion: An Examination, he inſinuated, would perhaps bring them into greater Difficulties than thoſe they now labour'd under; and muſt we ſtay, added he,

A.D. 1688-9 he, till the Truth of the Matter be found out? And again; Uſe what Words you will; fill up, nominate, or elect; it is the thing we are to take care of, and it is high time it were done.--- Your Lordſhips, I hope, will give us leave to remember Salus Populi eſt ſuprema Lex.--- If neither you nor we can do any thing in this Caſe, we have met to no Purpoſe.— Your Lordſhips ſay you will never make a Precedent of Election, or take upon you to alter the Succeſſion.---- Have not you yourſelves already hinted the very Succeſſion, and cut off ſome that might have a lineal Right? Have you not concurr'd with us in our Vote, That it is inconſiſtent with our Religion and our Laws to have a Papiſt to reign over us? Muſt we not then come to an Election, if the next Heir be a Papiſt? Nay, ſuppoſe there was not a Proteſtant Heir to be found, would not your Lordſhips break the Line? If then your Lordſhips, in ſuch a Caſe, muſt break thro' the Succeſſion, I think the Nation has Reaſon to expect you ſhould take care to ſupply the preſent Defect, where the Succeſſion is uncertain: For, otherwiſe, we that us'd to boaſt of living under the beſt of Governments muſt be left without any.--- Your Lordſhips, it ſeems, cannot agree with us to ſupply the Gap; and we muſt not do it ourſelves, by Election, which is the only Way left to provide for our Settlement: So that, upon the Whole, nothing remains but to break up in Confuſion, and ſo leave the Nation to extricate itſelf, as well as it can, out of the preſent Diſtraction: But then at whoſe Door that will lie, I muſt leave to your Lordſhips Thoughts.

To all this, two different Replies were made: It was the Earl of Pembroke's Opinion, That the Vote concerning a Popiſh Succeſſor amounted to no more than a Declaration of the Senſe of each Houſe; and could ſerve no farther than to be a Foundation of ſome future Law: That their immediate Buſineſs was to put things in a legal Method; which could only be done by naming the legal Succeſſor, in order to the calling a Parliament, wherein the whole Matter might be ſettled: But, according to the Earl of Clarendon, it was not in the Power of either Houſe, or of both together, to diſpoſe of the Inheritance of the Crown.

Sir Richard Temple, on the other hand, maintain'd, That they had as much Power as their Predeceſſors, to provide for all Emergencies, and to ſupply all Defects; affirm'd, as others had done before, that all which had hitherto been done demonſtrated a Vacancy; that there was no Intention to change the Government, nor juſt Ground to ſuſpect it; and that the Commons had all the Reaſon to inſiſt, that their Lordſhips ſhould concur in the Vote. Sir Thomas Lee ſaid ſeveral things to the ſame Purpoſe. Sir George Treby again recurr'd to the Precedent of Richard the Second; urg'd, that they ſaid no more than their Anceſtors had ſaid before them: And, in anſwer to what had been objected to that Precedent, That the whole Proceeding had been repeal'd by Edward IV. reply'd, that all the Acts and Attainders againſt the Lancaſter-Line had been alſo repeal'd by Henry VII. The Earl of Pembroke would not hear of Precedents or Proofs ſo remote; but alledg'd, that the Laws in being were Part of the original Contract: That the Oath of Allegiance, which ty'd the Subject to be true and faithful to the King, his Heirs and Succeſſors, was a Part of thoſe Laws; and that therefore they could not of themſelves, without breaking the ſaid Contract in their Turn, break the Succeſſion; which, being ſettled by Law, could not be alter'd but by another Law, which the two Houſes could not make. Sir George Treby rejoin'd, That, if none were to be allow'd for Acts of Parliament, but ſuch as were made by hereditary Kings in the right Line, the greateſt Part of our Laws and Records would be loſt: And Mr. Serjeant Maynard added, "If we look into the Law of Nature, (that is above all human Laws) we have enough to juſtify us in what we are now doing; and to provide for ourſelves and the public Weal, in ſuch an Exigency as this." A.D. 1688-9

Here the Earl of Nottingham again interpos'd: But tho' he began with theſe healing Words, "After this long Debate, pray let us endeavour to come as near as we can to an Agreement," he could not help reflecting on the Management of it, and ſhewing his Deſpair of the Iſſue. He then enlarg'd on the extreme Tenderneſs ſhewn by our Laws to the Inheritance of the Crown, ſaying, That the Courſe of it ran ſtronger in the right Line of Birth than any other Inheritance; that no Attainder of the Heir could bar his Succeſſion; and that the very Deſcent of the Crown remov'd that Defect; that, therefore, the King's Iſſue could not ſuffer for his Fault; and that conſequently there was no Vacancy. He farther inſinuated, that the Conceſſions made by the Commons in the Courſe of the Debate, did not agree with their Vote; for, if it was a lineal Inheritance, as they had all own'd, the Throne was full; and if they did not mean to alter the Conſtitution, as they had all declar'd, it was their Buſineſs to preſerve the Succeſſion in its ancient Courſe: And upon the whole Matter he concluded as follows:

"You ſeem to underſtand your own Words to mean leſs than they do really import.

I do not find that you mean to make the Kingdom elective; and yet you talk of ſupplying the Vacancy by the Lords and Commons.

You do not ſay, that the King has left the Crown for himſelf and his Heirs; and yet your Words ſpeak of a Vacancy, and nothing of the Succeſſion; but you do not tell us what you mean.

Therefore if this Matter were explain'd, that my Lords may know how far the Intention of the Vote reacheth, that it may not, abroad, or hereafter, be conſtrued to go beyond ſuch Meaning, that is, as to the King himſelf, and not to his Heirs, perhaps there might quickly be a happier Accommodation than

A.D. 1688-9. than can be expected while things remain thus, ſtill in doubt, and in the dark.

Gentlemen, if any of you can ſettle this Matter in its true Light, it would do very well; and it is you muſt do it; for the Words are yours, and ſo we muſt be told your Signification, and Intention by yourſelves.

If you mean by Abdication and Vacancy only that the King has left the Government, and it is devolv'd upon the next Succeſſor, that may perhaps ſatisfy my Lords, and we may agree upon ſome Settlement.

I muſt confeſs any Government is better than none; but I earneſtly deſire we may enjoy our ancient Conſtitution.

Therefore I again renew my Requeſt, that you would come to ſuch an Explanation, as may breed an Union between the two Houſes, for the Strength of your Conſultation and Reſolutions in this great Emergency.

If the Kingdom were indeed elective, we were in a Capacity of electing, but pro hac vice; according to the Conſtitution, this Queſtion would be greater than what it was before; but then the great Debate in it would only be, who ſhould firſt have the Honour of laying the very Foundation of the new Government.

But as this Caſe ſtands upon the foot of our ancient Laws, and fundamental Conſtitution, I humbly beſeech you to conſider, whether at the ſame time that in this way you get an eſtabliſhed Government, you do not overturn all our legal Foundations."

Mr. Paul Foley reply'd, That there was no ſuch Danger; that, on the Contrary, they were purſuing thoſe Methods which agreed with our Laws and Conſtitution; for, ſaid he, tho' the Monarchy of this Nation be hereditary in the ordinary Courſe of Succeſſion, yet there may fall out a Caſe wherein that cannot be comply'd with, and a plain Vacancy may enſue; for, put the Caſe the whole Royal Line ſhould fail (as they are all mortal, as well as we ourſelves are) ſhould we in that caſe have no Government at all? And who then ſhould we have but the Lords and Commons? And I think that Caſe comes neareſt to the Caſe in queſtion, where the Succeſſor is not known; for if he had been, we ſhould have heard of him before now.

And Mr. Gyles Eyre, yet farther added, "The Throne may be vacant as to the Poſſeſſion, without the Excluſion of one that has a Right to the Succeſſion, or a Diſſolution of the Government in the Conſtitution; neither will there be Room for the Objection of a King de facto, and not de jure, which ſome of the Lords were pleas'd to expreſs their Fears of.

This Gentleman that ſtands by me (Mr. Sommers) inſtanc'd a Record that was miſtaken as a Precedent for the Proceeding in this Caſe: It was only mention'd by him to ſhew, that by uſing the Word vacant, the Commons did no more than our Anceſtors did before us; and therefore it was not an unknown Word or Thing to have the Throne vacant.

We do apprehend we have made a right and apt Concluſion from the Premiſes, for otherwiſe all the Vote is but hiſtorical. A.D. 1688-9.

We declare the late King hath broken the original Contract, hath violated the fundamental Laws, and hath withdrawn himſelf out of the Kingdom, that he hath abdicated, and actually renounc'd the Government.

What occaſion was there for ſuch a Declaration as this, if nothing were concluded from it? That were only to give the Kingdom a compendious Hiſtory of thoſe Miſeries they have too well learnt by feeling them.

Therefore there was a Neceſſity to make ſome Concluſion, and none ſo natural as this, that we are left without a King in the Words of the Vote; that the Throne is thereby vacant; which it may be as to the Poſſeſſion, and yet the Right of Succeſſion no way prejudic'd."

The Conference broke up.

Here the Conference broke up, and the Commons were left in Poſſeſſion of the laſt Word, which ſeems to be the only Token of Victory that remain'd with them. According to the admir'd Author of the Diſſertation on Parties, the whole Diſpute about the Words abdicate, deſert, and vacancy, was fitter for a School than a Houſe of Parliament, and might have been expected in ſome Aſſembly of Pedants, where young Students exercis'd themſelves in Diſputation, but not in ſuch an auguſt Aſſembly as that of Lords and Commons met in ſolemn Conference upon the moſt important Occaſion. But ſurely theſe Words floated only on the Surface of the Diſpute, and there was ſomething more at the Bottom. It is plain both Sides had their Reſerves: Even thoſe that maintain'd the Vacancy did not carry their Concluſions ſo far as they might, which gave their Adverſaries ſome Advantage over them: And thoſe again, who affected ſo tender a Concern for the Monarchy, and the Lineal Succeſſion to it, ſcarce made any Difficulty to ſet aſide the King and the Male-Line: Provided there was but a Clame by Inheritance, they never troubled themſelves about the Juſtice of it. Henry the Fourth they ſaid was an Uſurper, not becauſe Richard the Second was ſtill living, but becauſe the Earl of March, who was the next in Blood, was living alſo: And yet they rather choſe to ſuppoſe him a King by Inheritance, than by Election; becauſe he made ſuch a Clame, and the Earl of March did not appear to make any Clame at all; which Argument they us'd, becauſe even they were inclin'd to paſs over the Prince of Wales, as non-apparent, and, therefore, to be eſteem'd non-exiſtent; and to fill the Throne with the Princeſs of Orange; the Earl of Nottingham expreſly ſaying, that the Caſe of Richard II. came up to what he would have the declared Senſe of both Houſes upon the Queſtion, viz. That the Throne might be vacant with reſpect to the King abdicating; but not ſo vacant but that the Clame of the immediate Succeſſor might immediately take place.

To cloſe on this important Head: The Commons had prudently adjourn'd till the next Day, that the Lords might have Time

A.D. 1688-9. to receive the Report of their Managers first, and to come to some healing Resolution thereon, which might not only prevent a final Breach, but serve as a Basis for the new Establishment.

Accordingly, when the said Report was made, the Question which came next before their Lordships was, Whether they should adhere to their Amendments? which kindled another long and fierce Debate: The Earl of Danby first, and the Marquis of Halifax afterwards, declar'd for the Negative, labour'd with all their Might to reason the House into a Concurrence with the Commons, and were follow'd by all the rest of the new Courtiers, and their new Allies; while, on the contrary, the Managers of the late Conference maintain'd the same Opinions which they had maintain'd before, with rather more Heat and Obstinacy than ever; and call'd upon the House to assert their Importance and Independency, by adhering at all Hazards. At last the Question was put; and, notwithstanding all the Arts which had been us'd by those in Power, and the Successes they had met with, the two Parties were still so near an Equality, that the Former carry'd it by so very small a Majority, according to the Historian of his own Times, as of two or three.

On the Report, the Lords resolve to continue, by a small Majority:

[Vol. i. p. 822.]

When the Chain of Opposition was thus broke thro', the Difficulty was not so great to keep the Passage open: To concur with the Commons in the two Points, of Abdication and Vacancy, now follow'd as of course; and when it was thereupon propos'd to fill the Throne with the Prince and Princess of Orange, it was carry'd in the Affirmative by no less than Twenty Voices, viz. Content Sixty-five, Not content Forty-five: So suddenly were the Eyes of many of their Lordships open'd! And so instantly did they manifest their Penitence, by making an Atonement for their past Offences!

And to fill up the Vacancy of the Throne with the Prince and Princess of Orange.

By most Authors this last Motion is ascrib'd to the Marquis of Hallifax: But our Historian last-quoted is express, that, when it came to be debated who should fill the Throne, the said Marquis, to get the start of Lord Danby in the Prince's Favour, mov'd, that the Crown should be given to his Highness first, and the two Princesses after him; in which he was seconded by none but the Lord Colpeper. But by whomsoever it was made, it appears from the Resolution which it produc'd, That, if the Commons were foremost to vacate the Throne, the Lords were foremost to fill it; and, consequently, that their Merits and Services were equal, in accomplishing this almost-miraculous Revolution.

[Ibid. p. 818, 819.]

One Day, viz. the Sixth of February, produc'd this great Turn in favour of the new Court; and so near did the Prospect now appear of a Settlement, that the Commons, for their first Business, the next Day, reviv'd their Committee for preparing general Heads of such things, as were absolutely necessary to be consider'd, for the better Security of our Religion, Laws and Liberties: But, near as it was, there were still some Difficulties to be surmounted. The Lords had not thoroughly digested their own Vote in favour of the Prince and Princess of Orange; nor had made any Provisions for the Descent of the Crown after them: Tho' both were nam'd in the Vote, it was not yet decided whether they should be joint Sovereigns, or whether the Prerogatives of the Sovereignty should be lodg'd in him only: The several Parties were still as (p) eager in their several Pursuits as ever: Even those who

(p) As appears by the two following Papers, which were publish'd after the two Houses had declar'd the Throne vacant:

"Reasons for crowning the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen JOINTLY; and for placing the executive Power in the Prince ALONE.

Whereas the grand Convention of the Estates of England have asserted the People's Right, by declaring, 'That the 'late King James II. having endeavour'd to subvert the 'Constitution of the Kingdom by breaking the original 'Contract between King and People; and by Advice of 'Jesuits, and other wicked Persons, having violated the 'fundamental Laws; and, having withdrawn himself out 'of this Kingdom, has abdicated the Government, and 'that the Throne is thereby vacant:' For which Misgovernment he has forfeited the Trust of the Regal Inheritance and of the executive Power, both in himself, and in his Heirs, lineal and collateral; so that the same is devolv'd back to the People, who have also the legislative Authority: and consequently may of Right give and dispose thereof, by their Representatives, for their future Peace, Benefit, Security, and Government, according to their good Will and Pleasure. And forasmuch as it is absolutely necessary, that the Government be speedily settled on sure and lasting Foundations, and consequently, that such Person or Persons be immediately placed in the Throne in whom the Nation has most Reason to repose an entire Confidence: It therefore now lies upon us to make so judicious a Choice, that we may, in all human Probability, thereby render ourselves a happy People, and give our Posterity Cause to rejoice, when they shall read the Proceedings of this wise and grand Convention. Who is it therefore that has so highly merited the Love and good Opinion of the People, the Honour of wearing the Crown and swaying the Scepter of this Land, as his Illustrious Highness the Prince of Orange? who with so great Expence, Hazard, Conduct, Courage, and Generosity, has happily rescued us from Popery and Slavery: and with so much Gallantry reliev'd us to our ancient Rights, Religion, Laws, Liberties, and Properties: for which heroic Action we can do no less, in Prudence, Honour, and Gratitude, than pray him to accept our Crown.

II. It is better to settle the Exercise of the Government in one who is not immediate in the Line, than in one that is: 1. Because it is a clear asserting of a fundamental Right, that manifests the Constitution of the English Government, and covers the Subjects from Tyranny and Slavery. 2. It cuts off the Dispute of the pretended Prince of Wales. 3. The old Succession being legally dissolv'd, and a new one made, the Government is secur'd from falling into the Hands of a Papist.

III. The making the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen jointly is the Nation's Gratitude and Generosity: and by recontinuing the Line in Remainder is manifested the inestimable Value the People have for the two Princesses, notwithstanding the Mal-administration of the unhappy Father.

IV. The present State of Europe in general, and of these Kingdoms in particular, require a vigorous and masculine Administration. To recover what is lost, relieve what is in danger, and rectify what is amiss, cannot be effected but by a Prince that is consummate in the Art both of Peace and War. Tho' the Prince and Princess be King and Queen jointly, and will equally share the Glory of a Crown, and we the Happiness of their auspicious Reign: yet the Wisdom of the grand Convention is manifested

First, In the placing the executive Power in one of them, and not in both: for two Persons, equal in Authority, may differ in Opinion, and consequently in Command: and it is evident no Man can serve two Masters.

Secondly, 'Tis highly necessary and prudent, rather to vest the Administration in the Husband than in the Wife.

1. Because a Man, by Nature, Education, and Experience, is generally render'd more capable to govern than the Woman.

Therefore, 2. The Husband ought rather to rule the Wife, than

A.D. 1688-9. who were for excluding the Princess from her titular Share of Royalty, or at least some who had adopted their Notions, in hope of throwing all things again into Confusion, were not without Hopes of inducing the Commons to join with them; and those among the Lords, who were now become the Minority, resolv'd nevertheless to oppose the new Settlement to the last.

Thus when the Vote of Concurrence and that of filling up the Vacancy were severally to be sent down to the Commons, together with the new Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, they not only shew'd the same Dissatisfaction with every one of those Measures, but enter'd their Protest against them:

The opposing Lords enter their Protest.

And how this could be done, without their A.D. 1688-9.
subscribing their Names, is scarce conceivable: Notwithstanding which, we are told by one Author, that, tho' call'd upon to do [Echard.]
so by one of their Leaders, they refus'd: And, by another, "That he is sorry for it, [Oldmixon.]
because it would have been a fine (q) Roll to have oblig'd Posterity with."

The Vote to fill up the Vacancy was conceiv'd in the following general Words: "Resolv'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal assembled at Westminster, That the Prince and Princess of Orange shall be declar'd King and Queen of England, and all the Dominions thereunto belonging." The Oath of Allegiance in their (r): "I A. B. do than the Wife the Husband, especially considering the Vow in Matrimony.

5. The Prince of Orange is not more proper to govern as he is Man and Husband only, but as he is a Man, a Husband, and a Prince, of known Honour, profound Wisdom, undaunted Courage, and incomparable Merit; as he is a Person that is naturally incliu'd to be just, merciful and peaceable, and to do all public Acts of Generosity for the Advancement of the Interest and Happiness of human Societies; and therefore most fit under Heaven to have the sole Executive Power."

Reasons humbly offer'd for placing his Highness the Prince of Orange, SINGLY in the Throne during his Life.

"I. It will be a clear Assertion of the Peoples Right, firm Evidence of a Contract broken, and a sure Precedent to all Ages, when, after a most solemn Debate, the Estates of England declare, That the King having abdicated the Government, and the Throne being thereby legally vacant, they think fit to fill it again with one who is not immediate in the Line.

II. It will be a Caution to succeeding Kings, of what fatal Consequence a general Derogation from the Laws may be, when they find, by this Instance, the Exercise of the kingly Office in Danger, not only with Reference to themselves, but precarious, to their Family by the Misgovernment: And Generations to come shall praise our Conduct, when reading the History of this Day, it appears we understood our Case; had Honour and Honesty to maintain it, and Wisdom enough to transmit it perfect to our Posterity.

III. It will be the highest Obligation upon the two Princesses that can be expected from a sensible People; when, next to asserting our own Right, by a Fact (which is absolutely necessary, and above all other human Arguments) they see themselves of inestimable Value with us, by resembling the Line in Remainder; and that their own strict Adherence to the Protestant Religion and Interest, outweighs the Demerits of their unhappy Father.

IV. The Princess of Orange will share in all the Glory of a Crown without the Trouble of it: Easy from the Popish Reflection, That she sits in her Father's Throne while he lives. And it concerns the Kingdom, as well as the Princes, to take care, that she be at rest from those Solicitations on the Behalf of Papists, which, under the Countenance of her Father, will perpetually disturb her tender Breast. Nor is there any Room for the Princess of Denmark to think herself neglected; the Exchange being attended with many Advantages, such as it would be lost Time to repeat, they are so very obvious, and likewise too many for the Compass of this Paper.

V. If the Prince of Orange be not King in his own Right, his Interest cannot be entirely ours; for though his Gallantry be an Assurance of Sincerity to us, yet, if there remain any Probability of his returning to Holland, as upon the Death of his Wife, if she only be Sovereign, his Interest must be divided: Nor will it, according to the Art of Government, become the Prudence of any Nation to open the Secrets of their Policy to one, whom they may be so unfortunate as to part with into a Country that may possibly interfere with us.

VI. It is dangerous to the Government itself to vest the Exercise of the Sovereignty in Both, for they may differ in Sentiments of things; and if there be a Possibility of Division, it would be an unaccountable Weakness, and great Oversight, not to secure ourselves in so important a Point.

VII. It is repugnant to grant the Crown to SOME, and fix the Administration in ONE; for the Administration is an Incident inseparable from the Sovereignty. To be a King or Queen, and not to have the Exercise of King or Queen, is a Contradiction; a Departure from all the Rules that were ever laid down in Government, unless in case of personal Incapacity, and therefore below a masculine way of reasoning.

Lastly, It supports the noble Maxim, That a neighbouring Nation may take Arms to assist the Rescue of a People oppressed by Tyranny. And foreign Princes will be apt to look into themselves, when they hear, by our Example of Gratitude, that they are no longer safe, than just to their Subjects."

(q) Such a Roll is, however, forth-coming in Lord Somers's Collection, Vol. xxxv, under the Title of A List of the Lords that enter'd their Protest against the Vacancy of the Throne, February 7, 1688, and consists of, the Dukes of Somerset, Ormond, Beaufort, Grafton and Northumberland (the three last of whom we have before found nam'd among the Converts to the new Court, the Archbishop of York, the Earls of Exeter, Clarendon, Salisbury, Nottingham, Litchfield, Rochester, Feversham, Berkeley, Pembroke, Scarsdale, Abingdon and Craven; the Bishops of Winchester, Lincoln, Norwich, Ely, Chichester, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, St. Davids, Gloucester, Landaff and Bristol (who has also been nam'd as the only one of that Bench, who follow'd the Standard of his Lordship of London) and the Lords Dartmouth, Grifin, Maynard, Brooke, Jermyn, Arundel, Chandos, Leigh, and Delaware; in all thirty-eight.

(r) How this Form came to be agreed to, and what Effects it produc'd, we find thus explain'd by the Historian of his own Times: "The last Debate was concerning the Oaths that should be taken to the King and Queen. Many Arguments were taken during the Debate from the Oaths in the Form in which the Allegiance was sworn to the Crown, to shew, that in a new Settlement these could not be taken. And to this it was always answer'd, that Care should be taken, when other things were settled, to adjust these Oaths, so that they should agree to the new Settlement. In the Oaths, as they were formerly conceiv'd, a previous Title seem'd to be asserted, when the King was sworn to, as rightful and lawful King. It was therefore said, that these words could not be said of a King who had not a precedent Right, but was set up by the Nation. So it was moved, that the Oaths should be reduced to the ancient Simplicity, of swearing to bear Faith and true Allegiance to the King and Queen. This was agreed to. And upon this began the Notion of a King de facto, but not de jure. It was said, that according to the common Law, as well as the Statute in King Henry the Seventh's Reign, the Subjects might securely obey any King that was in Possession, whether his Title was good, or not. This seem'd to be a Doctrine necessary for the Peace and Quiet of Mankind, that so the Subjects may be safe in every Government, that bringeth them under a superior Force, and that will crush them, if they do not give a Security for the Protection that they enjoy under it. The Lawyers had been always of that Opinion, that the People were not bound to examine the Titles of their Princes, but were to submit to him that was in Possession. It was therefore judged just and reasonable, in the Beginning of a new Government, to make the Oaths as general and comprehensive as might be; for it was thought, that those who once took the Oaths to the Government, would be after that faithful and true to it. This Tenderness which was shewed at this time to a sort of People that had shew'd very little Tenderness to even of weak or ill-inform'd Consciences, was after much abused by a new Explanation, or rather a gloss of Equivocation, as to the Signification of the Words in which the Oath was conceived. The true Meaning of the Words, and the express Sense of the Imposers was, that, whether Men were satisfied or not with the putting the King and Queen on the Throne, yet now they were on it, they would be true to them, and defend them. But the Sense that many put on them was, that they were only to obey them as Usurpers, during their Usurpation, and that therefore, as long as they continued in quiet Possession, they were bound to bear them, and to submit

A.D. 1688-9. do sincerely promise and swear, to bear true Allegiance to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary." And that of Supremacy consisted of two Parts: The first, an Oath of Abhorrence of that damnable Doctrine, that Princes excommunicated, or depriv'd, by the Pope, might be depos'd or murder'd by their Subjects, or any other whatsoever; and the second a Declaration, That no foreign Prince or Power had, or ought to have, any Jurisdiction here.

And now appear'd, that, forward as the Commons had been to declare the Vacancy, they were not altogether so forward to fill it: A Transfer of the Crown, unaccompany'd with any Conditions in favour of the Subject, in whose Name, and for whose sake it had been pretended, that this great Enterprize had been undertaken and accomplish'd, was what they were asham'd to join in: Partly therefore for Decency's sake, it may be presum'd, and partly to form the Concerts usual on such critical Occasions, they postpon'd the Consideration of the Lords Message, and adjourn'd till the Afternoon: This short Interval did not however prove sufficient to complete those Concerts: When therefore the House met again, the first Business they went upon was, to receive the Report of the Committee appointed to draw up the Clames and Demands of the Subject under the new Settlement. This Report was made by Sir George Treby, and by Order was divided into two Branches; one declaratory of ancient Rights, and one introductory of new Laws: All the several Articles of both which were agreed to; with this Addition, That the Crown should never descend to any Person who either was or had been a Papist. The Lords Vote for filling the Throne was then taken into Consideration, and gave rise to a warm, perplex'd, and fruitless Debate: For so many different Notions were started, all were so tenaciously maintain'd, and most of them were so disagreeable to the new Courtiers, that the Question was put to adjourn, and carry'd without a Division.

The Commons demur to the Lords Vote of filling up the Vacancy.

This gave farther time for new Managements: One of King James's prime Advocates is express, that the Prince sent Lord Wharton to several Lords, and Mr. Coulin to Seymour, Hampden, Boscawen, Powle, Swinfen, and other Commoners, to let them know, That, if the Houses insisted so much upon Limitations, he would return again, and leave them to the Mercy of King James. And another says, "That even those People, who would be thought a free Parliament, were over-aw'd and govern'd by the Prince, and receiv'd Instructions from him and his Creatures, after their Country had chosen them, is evident to all that recollect how little the Country dreamt of making him King, at the time of their Choice." "Those, continued he, who had the most abandon'd their Loyalty, design'd to break thro' their Duty, and our Constitution, no farther than crowning his Princess: But out comes a Pamphlet, written (as he supposes) by Ferguson, to persuade the People how much more it was for their Interest to chuse him King; and then the Conventioners soon chang'd their Notes; and those of them that would not comply, were bully'd by the Prince, or by Lord Delamere; and, indeed, both Houses by Lord Lovelace, with his (*) Posse mobilitatis." It is not however to be suppos'd, that this is literally true; nor, on the other hand, can it be disputed, that his Highness was in love with the Crown, and all its Powers. Even Bishop Burnet himself, speaking of the Declaration of Rights, which was to accompany the Settlement, acknowledges, That some officious People, at that time, study'd to hinder it, by urging, That they had already lost three Weeks in their Debates: That the doing this with the Exactness that was necessary would take up more Time than could be spar'd, or would be dispatch'd in too much Hurry for Matters of so nice a Nature, &c. and by moving that the Affair might be postpon'd till after the Settlement.

A.D. 1688-9. [Great Britain's just Complaint.]

[Short View of the Conversation, Single Half-sheet in L. Som. Collect. p. 35.]

It is moreover certain, that when the House met

mit to them; but that it was lawful for them to assist King James, if he should come over to recover his Crown, and that they might act and talk all they could, or durst, in his Favour, as being still their King de jure. This was contrary to the plain Meaning of the Words, Faith, and true Allegiance, and was contrary to the express Declaration in the Act that [afterwards] enjoined them: Yet it became too visible, that many in the Nation, and particularly among the Clergy, took the Oath in this Sense, to the great Reproach of their Profession. The Prevarication of too many in so sacred a Matter, contributed not a little to fortify the growing Atheism of the present Age. The Truth was, the greatest Part of the Clergy had entangled themselves so far with those strange Conceits of the divine Right of Monarchy, and the Unlawfulness of Resistance in any Case: And they had so engaged themselves, by asserting these things so often and so publicly, that they did not know how to disengage themselves in Honour or Conscience.

A Notion was started, which by its Agreement with their other Principles had a great Effect among them, and brought off the greatest Number of those who came in honestly to the new Government. This was chiefly managed by Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, now translated to Worcester. It was laid thus: The Prince had a just Cause of making War on the King. In that most of them agreed. In a just War, in which an Appeal is made to God, Success is consider'd as the Decision of Heaven. So the Princess's Success against King James gave him the Right of Conquest over him: And by it all his Rights were transferr'd to the Prince. His Success was indeed no Conquest of the Nation, which had neither wrong'd him nor resisted him: So that, with relation to the People of England, the Prince was no Conqueror, but a Preserver, and a Deliverer, well receiv'd and gratefully acknowledg'd. Yet, with Relation to King James, and all the Right that was before vested in him, he was, as they thought, a Conqueror. By this Notion they explain'd those Passages of Scripture that speak of God's disposing of Kingdoms, and of pulling down one and setting up another; and also our Saviour's arguing from the Inscription on the Coin, That they ought to render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's; and St. Paul's enjoining the Romans to obey the Powers that then were, who were the Emperors that were originally the Invaders of Public Liberty which they had subdu'd, and had forc'd the People and Senate of Rome by subsequent Acts to confirm an Authority that was so ill begun. This might have been made use of more justly, if the Prince had claim'd the Kingship to himself, upon King James's withdrawing; but did not seem to belong to the present Case. Yet this had the most universal Effect on the far greater Part of the Clergy.

(*) There is an Entry in the Journals of the Commons, that when their Committee went up to the free Conference with the Lords in the painted Chamber, the Passages and Room itself were so crouded, that it was impossible for them to make their way thro': And an express Order was made for removing all Strangers; upon the Strength of which, the Communication was again open'd between the two Houses.

A.D. 1688-9. met the next Day, viz. the 8th, and resum'd the Debate, so much was said to shew the Necessity of expediting the Settlement, and so many Members appear'd to be of Opinion, that Expedition was of more Consequence than any thing else, that, upon the Issue, it was resolv'd, That all such Heads as were introductory of new Laws should be omitted; and that only the Declaratory should be connected with the Instrument of Government; which was, in effect, leaving the Subject as much at the Mercy of the Prerogative as before. As an additional Sweetener to his Highness, they moreover voted, That, tho' the Regal Style should run in the Name of the King and Queen jointly, the Regal Power, and Negative Voice, should be vested in the King only: And, finally, they so far comply'd with his Demands (to the Lords Halifax, Shrewsbury, Dorset, &c. before spoken of,) as to give him Possession for Life, by extending their Grant to the Survivor.

But comply with Alterations.

For the Remainder in the Succession, in case the Queen dy'd without Issue, they were pleas'd to bestow it on the Princess of Denmark and her Issue; and, in default of such Issue, to the Issue of the King, in case he should have any by another Venter.

The Method of connecting all these Particulars with the Lords Vote, was by Amendments; and it is remarkable, that the drawing up of those Amendments was referr'd to a new Committee, of which Mr. Sommers was chosen Chairman, instead of Sir George Treby, who had serv'd in that Capacity before: And so successfully did they perform their Commission, that their Report was agreed to the same Day; and, immediately thereupon, both the Vote and Amendments were deliver'd at a Conference to the Lords. It is further remarkable, that this was no sooner done, than the House was upon the Question adjourn'd, Yeas 185, Noes 94; and that tho' they sat the next Day, they did nothing but decide the Merits of a double Return for Pool in Dorsetshire. The whole Stream of public Business, and the whole Attention of the Public with it, follow'd the Vote of Succession and Declaration of Rights up to the Lords, where the Amendments were immediately taken into Consideration, and gave Rise to fresh Debates, which lasted till (t) Monday the 11th following: At which time both were again sent down to the Commons with yet other Amendments, to the Number of Twenty in all; fourteen of which were adopted, and six rejected; two of the last with Reasons, and four without. This spun out the Business one Day longer; for, the drawing up these Reasons was refer'd to the last-mention'd Committee, and they did not make their Report till the next Day; but when they did, their Reasons were adopted as the Reasons of the House; in consequence of which the Settlement, yet again alter'd and amended, was once more submitted, at a Conference, to the Lords: And the Result of all was, that their Lordships, or rather the Majority of them acquiesc'd, on Condition that these last Alterations and Amendments might be inserted as their own: That the Commons, at a free Conference, comply'd with this Condition; and that the Form of the Proclamation of the new King and Queen was agreed upon, at a final Conference between the Committees of the two Houses. But every one of these Steps was travers'd by the opposing Lords. The final Vote, says the Historian of his own Times, by which the Prince and Princess of Orange were desir'd to accept of the Crown, and declar'd to be King and Queen, went very hardly: And we are told by Mr. Echard, That it was propos'd by one of those Lords to the rest of his Compeers, to leave the House in a Body, as a kind of perpetual Protest to all that should be done afterwards; and that it was overrul'd by the Lords Pembroke and Nottingham, who said, That such a Step would be of ill Consequence; that they could never answer it; and that the Government must be supported.

Both Houses finally agree.

All was finish'd on the twelfth; and on the same Day the Princess of Orange arriv'd at Whitehall from Holland, (having been met and welcom'd at Greenwich by the Prince and Princess of Denmark) and took Possession of that Palace, as we are told, with such an Air of Levity and Unconcern, as expos'd her to much Censure. The Duchess of Marlborough says, "She ran about her Apartment, looking into every Closet and Conveniency, &c. as People do when they come into an Inn, without seeming once to reflect how lately her Father had been driven out of it." And even Bishop Burnet insinuates the same thing, with this Addition, "That he took the Liberty to expostulate with her upon it; and that her Answer was, She did as she was directed by the Prince (who thought this Appearance of Gaiety necessary at that time, in order to remove a Notion which had been inculcated, that she was not well pleas'd with the late Transaction) and that possibly her Desire to oblige, had led her to over-act a Part which was not very natural to her."

The Princess of Orange arrives from Holland.

[V. i. p. 825.]

The next Day the two Houses went in State to make a free Gift of the Crown to their Highnesses; the Marquis of Halifax, as Speaker of the House of Lords, leading the way; Mr. Powle, as Speaker of the Commons, following next: After whom came the Peers, according to their several Ranks, and then the Commons. The Banquetting-house was the Stage where this memorable Scene was (t) In which Interval, we are told by Sir John Reresby, the Marquis of Halifax, who had been so active in the new Settlement, had a Meeting at his House with the Lady, who remain'd so staunch a Friend to the abdicated King: at which, his Lordship confess'd there were but small Hopes of a lasting Peace from this Settlement, tho' by far the best that could be form'd at that time of the Day: Adding, that as he was aware of the great Interest she had with the King, he hop'd she would upon Occasion be his Friend, as he would be hers, whenever she might stand in need of him." [Reresby's Memoirs, p. 317.

A.D. 1688 was to be play'd. At the upper End of which the Prince and Princeſs under a large Canopy of STATE to receive them. All being admitted and diſpos'd, the Clerk of the Crown, with a loud Voice, read the Declaration of Rights, which there is a Neceſſity to inſert at large as follows:

Declaration of Rights,

Whereas the late King James II. by the Aſſiſtance of divers evil Counſellors, Judges, and Miniſters employ'd by him, did endeavour to ſubvert and extirpate the Proteſtant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom; by aſſuming and exerciſing a Power of diſpenſing with, and ſuſpending of, Laws, and the Execution of Laws, without Conſent of Parliament; by committing and proſecuting divers worthy Prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excus'd from concurring to the ſaid aſſum'd Power; by iſſuing and cauſing to be executed a Commiſſion under the Great Seal, for erecting a Court call'd, The Court of Commiſſioners for Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes; by levying Money for, and to the Uſe of, the Crown, by Pretence of Prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the ſame was granted by Parliament; by raiſing and keeping a Standing Army within this Kingdom in time of Peace, without Conſent of Parliament; and quartering Soldiers contrary to Law; by cauſing ſeveral good Subjects, being Proteſtants, to be diſarm'd at the ſame time when Papiſts were both arm'd and employ'd contrary to Law; by violating the Freedom of Election of Members to ſerve in Parliament; by Proſecution in the Court of King's-Bench, for Matters and Cauſes cognizable only in Parliament, and by divers other illegal and arbitrary Courſes.

And whereas of late Years, partial, corrupt, and unqualify'd Perſons have been return'd, and ſerv'd on Juries in Trials; and particularly divers Jurors in Trials for High-Treaſon, which were not Freeholders: And exceſſive Bail hath been requir'd of Perſons committed in criminal Cauſes, to elude the Benefit of the Laws for the Liberty of the Subject; and expenſive Fines have been impos'd, and illegal and cruel Puniſhments inflicted, and ſeveral Grants and Promiſes made of Fines and Forfeitures, before any Conviction or Judgment againſt whom the ſame was to be levy'd: All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known Laws and Statutes, and Freedom of this Realm.

And whereas the late King James II. having abdicated the Government, and the Throne being thereby vacant, his Highneſs the Prince of Orange (whom it hath pleas'd Almighty God to make the glorious Inſtrument of delivering this Kingdom from Popery and Arbitrary Popery) did, by the Advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and divers principal Perſons of the Commons, cauſe Letters to be written to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, being Proteſtants, and other Letters to the ſeveral Counties, Cities, Univerſities, Boroughs and Cinque-Ports, for the chuſing of ſuch Perſons to repreſent them as were of right to be ſent to Parliament, to meet and ſit at Weſtminſter, Jan. 22, 1689, in order to ſuch an Eſtabliſhment, as that their Religion, Laws, and Liberties might not again be in Danger of being ſubverted; upon which Letters, Elections have been accordingly made: And thereupon, the ſaid Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, purſuant to their reſpective Letters and Elections, being now aſſembled in a full and free Repreſentation of this Nation, taking into their moſt ſerious Conſideration the beſt Means for the attaining the Ends aforeſaid, do, in the firſt Place, as their Anceſtors in like Caſes have uſually done, for the vindicating their ancient Rights and Liberties, declare:

That the pretended Power of ſuſpending Laws, or the Execution of Laws by regal Authority, without Conſent of Parliament, is illegal.

That the Pretended Power of (t) diſpenſing with Laws, or the executing of Laws by regal Authority, as it hath been aſſum'd and exercis'd of late, is illegal.

That the Commiſſion for erecting the late Court of Commiſſioners for Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, and all other Commiſſions and Courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

That the levying Money to, or for, the Uſe of the Crown, by Pretence of Prerogative, without Grant of Parliament, for longer Time, or in any other Manner, than the ſame is, or ſhall be granted, is illegal.

That it is the Right of the Subject to petition the King, and all Commitments and Proſecutions for ſuch petitioning are illegal.

That the raiſing and keeping a Standing Army within the Kingdom in time of Peace, unleſs it be by Conſent of Parliament, is againſt Law.

That the Subjects, being Proteſtants, may have Arms for their Defence ſuitable to their Condition, and as allow'd by Law.

That the Election of Members of Parliament ought to be free.

That the Freedom of Speech, or Debates, and Proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeach'd or queſtion'd in any Court or Place out of Parliament.

That exceſſive Bail ought not to be requir'd,

(t) Upon this Head Biſhop Burnet either adopts or falls into a very great Miſtake; for he obſerv'd that, in ſtating the Grievances and Rights of the Subject, the diſpenſing Power came to be diſcuſs'd, and that the Matter was found ſo intricate, that for Diſpatch Sake, it was at that time let fall, he proceeds to ſay, "King James's Party took great Advantage from that, and ſaid, That tho' the many Clamours of the Nation was againſt the Diſpenſing Power, yet when the Convention brought things to a Settlement, that did not appear to be ſo clear a Point as had been pretended: And it was not ſo much as mention'd in this Inſtrument of Government; ſo that by the Confeſſion of his Enemies, it appear'd to be no unlawful Power; nor was it declar'd contrary to the Liberties of the People of England." Whereas its not being mention'd then was only upon the Oppoſition that was made, that ſo more time might not be loſt, nor the Inſtrument be clogg'd with diſputable Points." In Oppoſition to this, we find it both mention'd and declar'd to be illegal; but then it muſt, withal, be conſeſs'd, That the Clauſe of Limitation, as it has been aſſum'd and exercis'd of late, does admit that there was a Power of that nature in the Crown.

A.D. 1688-9. quir'd, nor exceſſive Fines impos'd, nor cruel and unuſual Puniſhments inflicted.

That Jurors ought to be duly impannel'd and return'd, and Jurors which paſs upon Men in Trials for High Treaſon, ought to be Freeholders.

That all Grants and Promiſes of Fines and Forfeitures of particular Perſons before Conviction, are illegal and void.

And that for Redreſs of all Grievances, and for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving of the Laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently.

And they do claim, demand, and inſiſt upon all and ſingular the Premiſes, as their undoubted Rights and Privileges; and that no Declarations, Judgments, Doings, or Proceedings, to the Prejudice of the People in any of the ſaid Premiſes, ought in any wiſe to be drawn hereafter in Conſequence or Example.

To which Demand of their Rights they are particularly encourag'd by the Declaration of his Highneſs the Prince of Orange, as being the only Means for obtaining a full Redreſs and Remedy therein.

Having therefore an ENTIRE CONFIDENCE, that his ſaid Highneſs the Prince of Orange will perfect the Deliverance ſo far advanc'd by him, and will ſtill preſerve them from the Violation of their Rights, which they have here aſſerted, and from all other Attempts upon their Religion, Rights, and Liberties,

The ſaid Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve;

That William and Mary, Prince and Princeſs of Orange be, and be declar'd, King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the Crown and Royal Dignity of the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions, to them the ſaid Prince and Princeſs during their Lives, and the Life of the Survivor of them; and that the ſole and full Exerciſe of the Royal Power A.D. 1688-9. be only in, and executed by, the ſaid Prince of Orange, in the Names of the Prince and Princeſs during their Lives; and after their Deceaſes, the ſaid Crown and Royal Dignity of the ſaid Kingdoms and Dominions to the Heirs of the Body of the ſaid Princeſs; and for Default of ſuch Iſſue, to the Princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the Heirs of her Body; and for Default of ſuch Iſſue, to the Heirs of the Body of the ſaid Prince of Orange.

And the ſaid Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, do pray the ſaid Prince and Princeſs of Orange to accept the ſame accordingly.

And that the Oaths hereafter mention'd, be taken by all Perſons of whom the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might be requir'd by Law, inſtead of them; and that the ſaid Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy be abrogated."

[Here follow'd the Oaths to the Effect already ſpecify'd.]

Thus, in the very Inſtrument which is call'd the New MAGNA CHARTA of the Subjects Liberty, we have the Mortification to find entire Confidence take place of expreſs Contract; and we ſearch in vain for thoſe other (u) Conditions and Limitations which ſhould have render'd our Conſtitution unchangeable and immortal.

and Tender of the Crown.

To conclude: When the Clerk had finiſh'd his Legend, it is ſaid the Marquis of Halifax made a Tender of the Crown to their Highneſſes; but in what Words is not ſpecify'd; and as to the new King's Compliment of Thanks, in return for ſo illuſtrious a Donation, in a Manuſcript Copy of the Journals of the Commons, we find an Entry of it to this Effect: "That he thank'd them heartily for their great Kindneſs to him, and Confidence in him: That he accepted of the Crown, on the Conditions mention'd in their Declaration: And that, as (u) Diſcourſing of which Omiſſions, another Writer on the King's Side, writes as follows: "The Faults of Omiſſion are theſe: They have made a King, but have not made it impoſſible for that King to be like the Kings that went before him, he having the ſame Power over the Rights of the People, and they lying as open to the Mercy and Stroke of Ambition and Arbitrary Power as before, which is only changing of Hands, and not Things, Men, and not Meaſures and Securities. That this is the Caſe, let it be conſider'd he is unaccountable, which contradicts their Principles they chuſe him upon; he has the ſame Power over Parliaments that his Predeceſſors had, which are accounted the true Conſervators of the Peoples Freedoms; their Elections are as inſecure as ever; their Meetings as uncertain, being neither yearly, triennially, nor triennially; neither are they Maſters of their own Seſſions to adjourn and prorogue as they pleaſe; and if they have prepar'd the moſt uſeful or neceſſary Law in the World, as the Caſe now ſtands, he may refuſe to paſs it, by proroguing or diſſolving them, which renders the whole Conſtitution of Parliaments precarious, and at his Will and Pleaſure. Much leſs does the Parliament nominate his Council, or is he oblig'd to act in the Intervals of Parliaments by the Advice and Approbation of a Council, but on the contrary to theſe Rights and Securities, he can call, prorogue, and diſſolve Parliaments at Pleaſure, whoſe very Elections lie as open to Fraud and Violence as ever; Charters and Corporations being in no better Condition than they were. He picks and chuſes his Council; he names all the great Officers of the State, Navy, Army, and Church, as well as of his Houſhold; and he abſolutely commands the Militia as yet; which is having the whole in his Power, for thereby he has a Mortgage upon every Man, the Gain or Honour of his Office being a Bribe to bias him to the Pleaſure of the Prince, that already they have not been able to keep themſelves from the Diſtinction of Court and Country Party, who the other Day objected it to their Enemies as a Vice in Government. This has ſomething in it very abſurd, and it reproaches the Honeſty or Underſtanding of ſome People, that when they ſay they can make Kings, they either cannot or will not take care to limit and regulate them to our Safety; by which Means the King, that is made by the People, may rule without them, inſtead of ruling for them, and govern jure divino, though he be created jure humano, which renders his Execution independent of his Commiſſion, and himſelf in all things impunible. We have herein left the Principles that lead us to leave King James, and changed the very Meaſures upon which we changed the Government. We make uſe of Republican Reaſons for our Alteration, and for ought I ſee, we go upon Tory Methods to eſtabliſh it, which renders our Caſe much worſe than it was in the time of King Charles and King James, in that then we had but few that were ſuſpected, to be ſure not below'd, and they ſtill not feared from his Humour, and the laſt, at laſt as terrible apprehended from his Intereſt: But this Gentleman enters upon the Reputation of Proteſtancy, and has our own Choice and Religion both to blind us. Being then moſt popular, and not more limited, we are not more ſafe, but our Liberties muſt be expos'd; and unleſs ſuch a King has irreſiſtible Grace, or ſtronger Tyes upon him, the Reaſons of our preferring him may be the Inſtances of our Danger. [Engliſhman's Complaint, L. Somers's Collection, Vol. 35.

A.D. 1688. as he came hither for the Defence of the Proteſtant Religion; ſo he would ever ſtudy to preſerve it, together with the Laws of the Land, and the Liberties and Properties of the People."

But there is Reaſon to think, that this was inſerted rather for what ſhould have been his Anſwer, than what was: For in the ſame Journal, February 14, we find the Speaker complaining the Houſe, That he ſhould have no Copy of the Prince's Speech, as he there call'd it, againſt To-morrow, when he would report it to the Houſe: And accordingly, in the next Day's Journal, we find him repeating it in theſe Words:

The Prince's Acknowledgment,

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

This is certainly the greateſt Proof of the Truſt you have in me that can be given; which is the thing that makes us value it the more: And as I had no other Intention in coming hither, than to preſerve your Religion, Laws, and Liberties; ſo you may be ſure, that I ſhall endeavour to ſupport them; and ſhall be willing to concur in any thing that ſhall be for the Good of the Kingdom, and to do all that is in my Power to advance the Welfare and Glory of the Nation."

A.D. 1688.

The proclaiming the new King and Queen was all that remain'd; which was perform'd with unuſual Ceremonies (ω), for both Houſes aſſiſted in it, on the ſame Day that the Tender was made, and was celebrated, according to Cuſtom, with all the Appearances of general Joy.

And Proclamation.

(ω) After the following Form: "Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God in his great Mercy to this Kingdom, to vouchſafe us a Miraculous Deliverance from Popery and arbitrary Power; and that our Preſervation is due, next under God, to the Reſolution and Conduct of his Highneſs the Prince of Orange, whom God hath choſen to be the glorious Inſtrument of ſuch an ineſtimable Happineſs to us and our Poſterity: And being highly ſenſible and fully perſuaded of the great and eminent Virtue of her Highneſs the Princeſs of Orange, whoſe Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion will no doubt bring a Bleſſing along with her upon this Nation. And whereas the Lords and Commons now aſſembled at Weſtminſter, have made a Declaration, and preſented the ſame to the ſaid Prince and Princeſs of Orange, and therein deſired them to accept the Crown, who have accepted the ſame accordingly: We therefore, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, together with the Lord Mayor and Citizens of London, and others of the Commons of this Realm, do with full Conſent publiſh and proclaim, according to the ſaid Declaration, William and Mary, Prince and Princeſs of Orange, to be King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, with all the Dominions and Territories thereto belonging; who are accordingly ſo to be own'd, deem'd, and taken by all the People of the aforeſaid Realms and Dominions, who are from henceforth bound to acknowledge and pay unto them all Faith and true Allegiance, beſeeching God, by whom Kings reign, to bleſs King William and Queen Mary with long and happy Years to reign over us."

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND: DURING THE REIGN OF King WILLIAM and Queen MARY.

A.D. 1688-9. THUS ended the INTER-REGNUM: And as the Throne was now fill'd with a Prince, who had made it his Glory to be thought a Deliverer; who had been plac'd in it as an expreſs Conſervator of thoſe Rights and Privileges, which he had been the Inſtrument of reſtoring; who had no other Title to it than the Good-will of the People he was to govern; and who had for his ſworn Friends and Servants, the very Party who had ſo obſtinately wreſtled with his late Predeceſſors; it was reaſonable to conclude, from the Outſide of Things at leaſt, that mutual Amity and mutual Acknowledgments would have been the Fruit of mutual Obligations; that Abuſe of Power would no more render Government a Grievance; nor Abuſe of Liberty furniſh Pretences to take it away.

The firſt Act of the new Reign. The firſt public Act of the new Reign was a Proclamation, which began with theſe Words: Foraſmuch as it hath pleas'd GOD to call us to the Throne; and which ſignify'd his Majeſty's Royal Pleaſure to be, That all Proteſtants, who were in Office on the firſt of December laſt, ſhould continue therein, till his farther Pleaſure was known.

The new Privy-Council. As no mention is made of a Privy-Council in this Inſtrument, which is dated February 17; it muſt be preſum'd, his Majeſty had not as yet completed his Liſt: But, on the fourth Day after, the ſaid Liſt was made public, and conſiſted of the following Perſons: The Prince of Denmark, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquiſſes of Hallifax and Winchester; the Earls of Danby, Lindſey, Devonſhire, Dorſet and Middleſex, Oxford, Shrewſbury, Bedford, Bath, Macclesfield, and Nottingham; the Viſcounts Falconberge, Mordaunt, Newport, and Lumley; the Biſhop of London; the Lords Wharton, Montagu, Delamere, and Churchill; Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Sydney, Sir Robert Howard, Sir Henry Capel, Mr. Powle, Mr. Ruſſel, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Boſcawen. A.D. 1688-9.

The Majority, it is eaſy to ſee, were of thoſe who had ventur'd fartheſt in the Cauſe of Liberty: And, as to the Archbiſhop and the Earl of Nottingham, they were nam'd by way of Sweetener to the Church; for, ſays Biſhop Burnet, it was thought adviſable [P. ii. p. 3.] not to provoke ſo great a Body too much. In the Diviſion of Power, the ſame Maxim was alſo purſued: For, as the Earl of Shrewſbury was appointed one of the Secretaries of State, the Earl of Nottingham was appointed the other; but not till after an Attempt had been made to gratify him at a cheaper Rate. It had been early foreſeen, that all thoſe who had been inſtrumental in ſetting the Crown on the King's Head would expect to be Gainers by the Service; and theſe were ſo many, that the Paſture was not large enough for

A.D. 1688-9. the Flock: To make as much Room as poſſible, therefore, it was reſolv'd to put all the great Offices, ſuch as the Treaſury, Admiralty, nay the very Chancery, into Commiſſion: To be at the (x) Head of the laſt was the Compliment firſt made to Lord Nottingham; and, when it was found he ſet a higher Value upon himſelf, it was thought advisable to go up to his Price, by giving him the Seals.

A Mixture, which produc'd an immediate Ferment.

But the very Expedient, which was adopted to keep the Peace without-doors, bred Diſcontents and Diſorders within: Thoſe who thought they had a Right to have their own King in their own Hands only, could not bear to ſee ſo conſiderable a Province beſtow'd on one who had been ſo active in oppoſing him; and, what was worſe, who was by Profeſſion ſo much more a Friend to the Prerogative than they.

The ſame Perſons were alike diſguſted, that the Privy-Seal was once more given to the Marquis of Hallifax; for though they gladly embrac'd his Services, while the Settlement ſtood in need of his Aſſiſtance, they were for retaining him no longer than he was neceſſary: His deſerting his firſt Friends, in the Reign of King Charles; his oppoſing the Excluſion-Bill with ſuch Zeal and Succeſs; the Advice he had given in relation to the Quo Warranto's, particularly in that againſt the City of London; and the Eagerneſs he had ſhewn in procuring the Surrender of Charters; were ſtill freſh in their Remembrance: And, as they could not look back on his paſt Behaviour without Reſentment, ſo neither could they look forward on what was ſtill to be expected from him, without Apprehenſion; for, if his Abilities were vaſt, his Genius daring, and his Addreſs matchleſs, his Ambition was inſatiable; and there was a Neceſſity for thoſe that ſerv'd with him to ſerve under him.

The Earl of Danby, who, more out of regard to his Credit and Experience than his late or former Services, had been made Lord Preſident, was equally obnoxious to the Majority of his new Collegues: Many of them were his ancient Enemies, and for that Reaſon would rather have reviv'd his Impeachment, than given way to his being reinſtated in Favour and Power: They knew Stateſmen never forgave, and they did not care to ſee him in a Capacity to take his Revenge: Tho' he had made free with his Allegiance, he was beſides for ſtretching the Prerogative to its full Extent; and, tho' he had given up the Doctrine of paſſive Obedience, he was ſtill for maintaining the ancient Alliance between the Crown and the Church, as the only ſure Method of providing for the Security of both.

What is ſtill more remarkable, tho' theſe three great Men could not be ignorant of the Jealouſies that were conceiv'd of them, and the Animoſities that were propagated againſt them, they never once entertain'd a Thought of ſtrengthening themſelves by the Aſſiſtance of each other; on the Contrary, they made their Court at each other's Expence, and ſeem'd to have nothing more at Heart than the meditating each other's Downfall. In Point of Strength, the Earl of Nottingham had a whole Party for his Support, who, diſguſted as they were with the late Tranſactions, were more pleas'd to have a Friend and Patron to have recourſe to, in ſuch a Poſt, than diſpleas'd that he had yielded ſo far to the Times, as to ſerve at all. The Marquis of Hallifax, without the Doors of the Cabinet, had ſcarce any Intereſt at all; for, as he was hated by one Party for having been ſo inſtrumental to their Sufferings, ſo he was hated equally by the other, for having gone ſuch Lengths in forwarding and completing the preſent Eſtabliſhment. But then the King himſelf ſeem'd to have a high Opinion of his Parts, and to place a great Degree of Confidence in his Councils. The Earl of Danby had both an Intereſt in his Majeſty, and a Degree of Credit among the Partizans of the Church; but then the Earl of Nottingham was more conſider'd by the laſt, and the Marquis of Hallifax by the firſt; which induc'd him (Danby) to think they were both in his way, and that his Buſineſs was to ſupplant both if poſſible. He was moreover diſcontented upon another Account: He had aſſur'd himſelf of being once more Lord High Treaſurer; but upon his applying for that Poſt had been told, He could not be gratify'd with it, becauſe it was more for his Majeſty's Service to put the Office in Commiſſion: And as to the Place of Preſident, he was ſo little pleas'd with it, that he told Sir John Rereſby, the King had forc'd it upon him, againſt his Will, ſaying, It could be by no Means for his (the King's) Intereſt, for him to be out of all Buſineſs.

The Diſpoſition of Places and Preferments.

To proceed: The Earl of Devonſhire was made Lord Steward of the Houſhold; the Earl of Dorſet, Lord Chamberlain; Lord Newport, Treaſurer of the Houſhold; Mr. Wharton, Comptroller; Sir John Lowther, Vicechamberlain; Lord Montagu, Maſter of the Wardrobe; the Biſhop of London, Dean of the Chapel; the Lord Lovelace, Captain of the Band of Penſioners; the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Oxford, the Lords Mordaunt, Lumley, Churchill, and Mr. Sidney, Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber, and Lord Willoughby of Ereſby, Chancellor of the Duchy. As to the great Favourite, Bentinck, he was not only the firſt Commoner on the Liſt of Privy Counſellors, but with thoſe very honourable and advantageous Appendages to his Name, of being Groom of the Stole, and Privy Purſe. Mr. d'Auverquerque, another of his Majeſty's Dutch Servants, was appointed Maſter of the Horſe; Mr. Zuylſtein, Maſter of the Robes; and Mr. Schomberg, Maſter of the Ordnance. The Earl of Wiltſhire, Son to the Marquis of Winchester, was made Lord Chamberlain to the (x) According to the Author of the Life of King William, the Seals were offer'd to him firſt, and afterwards to Lord Hallifax: But there is more Reaſon to follow Burnet, who is expreſs, that he was only offer'd to be the firſt Commiſſioner, and who makes no mention of Lord Hallifax at all.

A.D. 1688-9. the Queen; Mr. How, Vicechamberlain; Mr. Villiers, Maſter of the Horſe; and the Counteſs of Derby, Siſter to the Duke of Ormond, Groom of the Stole.

The Commiſſioners of the great Seal, were Serjeant Maynard, Sir Anthony Keck, and Sir William Rawlinſon. Admiral Herbert was put at the Head of the Admiralty, and for his Aſſiſtants, Vaughan, Earl of Carberry, Sir Michael Warton, Sir Thomas Lee, Sir John Lowther, and Mr. Sacheverel.

At the Head of the Treaſury was plac'd the Lord Mordaunt; and the reſt of the joint Commiſſioners were, Lord Delamere, who was alſo Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Godolphin, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Hampden. Lord Godolphin, it muſt be remember'd, had enter'd into this Commiſſion firſt, under the Earl of Eſſex in 1679, on the Removal of Lord Danby, had been firſt Commiſſioner in Auguſt, 1684, and had ſerv'd with the Popiſh Lords Bellaſis and Dover in 1686; ſo that under all Diſpenſations, his Accompliſhments were equally conſider'd by, and at the Devotion of, the Crown. Biſhop Burnet, ſpeaking of this laſt Promotion, ſays, He was brought in to the great Grief of the Lords Mordaunt and Delamere, who ſoon ſaw that the King conſider'd him more than them both: But then he adds, that thoſe two Lords, though both violent Whigs, became as violent Enemies, becauſe, according to him, the firſt gave the inferior Places freely, and the other ſold every thing that was in his Power.

Nothing, ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times, gave a more general Satisfaction than the naming of the Judges. The King order'd every Privy-Counſellor to bring in a Liſt of twelve; and out of theſe, continues he, twelve very learned and worthy Judges were choſen. He names Sir John Holt of the King's Bench with a particular Compliment; but no more. To complete the Liſt, therefore, it is neceſſary to add, That Holt had for his Aſſiſtants Sir William Dolben, Sir William Gregory, and Gyles Eyre, Eſq; That Sir Henry Pollexfen was made Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas: That the Puiſnes under him, were Sir John Powel, Sir Thomas Rokeby, and Peyton Ventris, Eſq; And that Sir Robert Atkins as Lord Chief Baron, Sir Edward Nevil, Nicholas Lechmere, Eſq; and Sir John Tourton, fill'd the Exchequer-Bench. Sir John Trenchard was made Chief Juſtice of Cheſter, Sir George Treby Attorney-General, Mr. Sommers Sollicitor-General, and Mr. Powle, the Speaker, Maſter of the Rolls.

The Cuſtoms were put under the Direction of Mr. Booth, Sir Richard Temple, Sir Robert Southwell, Mr. Pelham, Sir Robert Clayton, and Sir Patience Ward: And the Exciſe under that of Sir Henry Vane, Sir Henry Aſſhurſt, Sir Humphrey Edwin, Thomas Frankland, John Danvers, Francis Perry, and John Willcocks, Eſqrs;

In the Church but one Vacancy had fallen, viz. the Dioceſe of Saliſbury, which, by the Death of Dr. Ward, was beſtow'd by his Majeſty on Dr. Burnet, of his own Motion, as the Doctor himſelf writes, and in Terms more obliging than uſually fell from him. But tho' the Dean and Chapter were as prompt to elect as the King to nominate, Archbiſhop Sancroft refus'd to conſecrate him, whether with or without Reaſons, is not ſpecify'd. Loth, however, to incur the Penalties of a Premunire, which he had reaſon to be ſure would follow, he at laſt ſo far gave way to his Majeſty's Pleaſure, as to commiſſion the Biſhop of London, with any three of the other Biſhops of his Province, to do what he himſelf thought (y) unlawful. And thus our Hiſtorian, in Acknowledgment of his many Services, became a Lord of Parliament.

A.D. 1688-9.

The very Names of the ſeveral Perſon thus promoted under the new Eſtabliſhment, are ſufficient to ſhew in what Channel the main Current of Favour ran; and it may be reaſonably ſuppos'd, that ſo manifeſt a Declaration in favour of one Party, did not a little contribute to exaſperate the other: Both, at firſt, had appear'd temperate alike; there was no Wind as long as there was no Tide; but when the Latter began to ſhew itſelf, the Former began to riſe; This grew fierce as That grew ſtrong; and as Diſappointment begat Oppoſition, it became the Buſineſs of Oppoſition to propagate Confuſion.

In plain Engliſh, thoſe who had one while been the Advocates for implicit Obedience, and then the Champions in Arms for their Religion and Liberty, now affected to feel the Qualms of Loyalty again, and endeavour'd with all their Might to embarraſs a Settlement, which they were not likely to find their Account in; while, on the other hand, a great Part of thoſe, who had hitherto plac'd the Sum of Patriotiſm in avoiding the Snares of a Court, in turning a deaf Ear to the Charms of Power, and in keeping perpetual watch and ward to ſecure the Conſtitution againſt the Encroachments of the Prerogative, now ſuffer'd the Rigours they had glory'd in, to melt in the Sunſhine, which had withſtood the Storm.

Expedient to turn the Convention into a Parliament.

This Diſpoſition of Power, though here thrown all together for the ſake of Method, did not, however, immediately follow the Proclamation of the new King, but gradually, as Pretenſions could be ſettled, and as his Majeſty's Service requir'd. What came firſt under Deliberation was the Expediency of turning the preſent Convention into a Parliament. This, we may fairly ſuppoſe, was in the Cabinet rather a Reſolution than a Queſtion: But when it came to be diſcuſs'd by the new Privy-Council, ſuch among them as were for ſhuffling the Cards a-new, not only made it one, but maintain'd the Negative; urging plauſible enough, That a legal Parliament alone could make the Settlement legal,

(y) This was ſo mean, ſays Biſhop Burnet, that he himſelf was aſham'd of it afterwards: But he took an odd Way, continues he, to overthrow it: For he ſent for his original Warrant, and ſo took it out of the Office, and got it out of his own Hands. Vol. ii. p. 8.

A.D. 1688-9. legal, which this Assembly could never be made, for want of the King's Writ of Summons, without which no Parliament could legally be held. The Majority were, however, of Opinion, That Forms ought to give place to Essentials; and that the Experiment of a new Election was too dangerous to be try'd: Upon which it was resolv'd, that the King should go with the usual State to the House of Peers, and by the usual Method of Speech from the Throne to both Houses, should open a way to make them a Parliament, as they had made him a King.

While this Matter was yet in suspense, both Houses had adjourn'd, at his Majesty's Desire, till the 18th; and then it was that, having taken possession of the Throne, he order'd the Commons to attend him, and spoke to the following Effect: "That he was come there to assure them, that he should never do any thing that might lessen their good Opinion of him: That he thought it necessary to acquaint them, the Condition of Affairs abroad, and particularly that of Holland, was such, that, unless some speedy Care were taken of them, they would run a greater hazard than the Convention would have them expos'd to: That they themselves must be sensible, that the Posture of Affairs here would require their serious Consideration; and that a good Settlement was necessary, not only for the Peace at home, but for the Support of the Protestant Interest both here and abroad: And particularly, that the State of Ireland was such, that the Dangers were grown too great to be obviated by any slow Method. Therefore he must leave it to them to consider of the most effectual Ways of preventing the Inconveniences that might arise by Delays; and to judge what Forms might be proper to bring those things to pass, which were for the Good of the Nation," &c.

This Speech, we are told, was receiv'd with a Murmur of Applause, by those who had follow'd the Speaker to the Lords Bar upon this Occasion; and who, on all such Occasions, are taken for the Commons of England; and, when reported to the House, produc'd a solemn Vote of Thanks, which pass'd nemine contradicente. After which, they made an Order to take it into Consideration the next Day, and adjourn'd.

Parliament-Craft is a Term very well understood by those who are vers'd in parliamentary Affairs: And it must be own'd, that those who had now the Direction of the House of Commons were no Strangers to it. Tho' the opposing Lords had not formally left the House in a Body, as one of them had advis'd, so many chose to absent themselves, after the final Vote of Vacancy, that the new Courtiers had the House in a manner to themselves, and resolv'd to make the most of the Opportunity: Accordingly the King was scarce withdrawn, before a Bill was brought in (says one, simply enough, by the Directions of the Privy-Council) to remove and prevent all Questions and Disputes concerning the Assembling and Sitting of this present Parliament; which was read twice the same Day, and a third time the next, and sent down to the Commons for their Concurrence: The Commons had, however, first resolv'd themselves into a Committee of the whole House; and had this Question under Debate (which was put by Mr. Hampden, their Chairman,) viz. "Whether a King, elected and declar'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons assembled at Westminster, January 22, 1688-9, coming to and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, did not make as complete a Parliament, and legislative Power and Authority, to all Intents and Purposes, as if the said King should cause new Summons to be given, and new Elections to be made by Writ?" As no Man is fond of the Trouble and Charge of an Election, it was obviously the particular Interest of every particular Member to vote in the Affirmative: But, in many, Zeal and Resentment got the better of all personal Considerations. Thus, Seymour, Clarges, Finch, Musgrove, &c. thinking it the last great popular Point they had to manage, warmly insisted, that the King's Writ was as necessary to the Being of a legal Parliament, as the King's Presence: And, consequently, that the Convention, not having been assembled by such a Writ, could never, by any Management, be converted into such a Parliament. The new Courtiers reply'd, That if, as all agreed, the Essence of a Parliament consisted in the solemn Meeting and co-operating of King, Lords and Commons, the present Convention was essentially a Parliament: That the Difference of the Lords and Commons being called by Writ, or by Letter, was nothing material; since both Writ and Letter were to the same Effect; and that, in some ancient Records, it is mentioned, That Parliaments should be summon'd by Letters; particularly in King John's Great Charter, in the Seventeenth of his Reign, he promises to summon the Bishops, Abbots, Earls, &c. by his Letters: That the Prince of Orange not being King at the time of his sending forth his Letters matter'd not; for he was the Person to whom the Administration of the Government was then committed: That it was evident, that, in many Parliaments, it was not so material how the King, Lords, and Commons came together, as that they were together: That the manner of calling together the three Estates of the Realm by the Prince of Orange's Letters was a much fairer Proceeding, considering the State of Affairs as to the calling of them together, than was in several Cases wherein they were never doubted to be a Parliament when join'd with a King: That Edward II. being imprison'd by his Queen, Son, and Nobles, they issued forth Writs, in the imprisoned King's Name, to summon the Lords, and to chuse Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses to meet at Westminster (16th of January, 1325). That this, one would think, was pretty hard, and an absolute Force upon the King, by making use of his Name against his Will, so that it could not be said to be his Act; yet, the Lords and Commons being met, they deposed

[Life of King William, v. ii. p. 5.]

A.D. 1688-9. depoſed Edward II, and declared his Son, Edward III, King; and this new King, and the Lords and Commons, ſo irregularly convened together, made ſeveral Acts of Parliament, and have been ever ſince adjudged a good Parliament to all Intents and Purpoſes, without any ſubſequent Act of Confirmation. That, in like manner, Richard II. being taken Priſoner by Henry duke of Lancaſter, the Duke iſſued forth Writs in the King's Name (the King then in Priſon) to ſummon the Lords, and to elect Repreſentatives for the People, to meet at Weſtminſter the 13th of September, 1399. That thoſe being met by this irregular Summons, they depoſed Richard II, and declared the Duke of Lancaſter King; and that new King, and the Lords and Commons, ſo irregularly convened, being join'd together, were alſo, and are to this Day, adjudged a good Parliament to all Intents and Purpoſes. Laſtly, That the Lords and Commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter the 15th of April, 1660, were conven'd by Writs in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, who were Uſurpers; yet, when King Charles II. came to them, and they receiv'd him as King, he and they together were adjudg'd a Parliament, and they enacted that they ſhould be ſo taken, and they made many Laws, which were put in Execution; and they continued as a Parliament until the 29th of December following; and though moſt or all thoſe Acts were afterwards confirm'd by a ſubſequent Parliament conven'd by the King's Writs in May, 1661, yet that Confirmation, according to many good Judgments, was rather to ſatisfy ſome Scrupulofity, than out of Neceſſity; moſt of the ſaid Acts having, in a great meaſure, had their Effects before the ſubſequent Parliament began: Therefore, that if, upon the Prince of Orange's being declar'd and proclam'd King, he came to the Convention of Lords and Commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter; if the ſame Number of Lords was ſummon'd, that of right ought to be ſummon'd to Parliament, and the ſame Number of Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes duly choſen, as ought to be choſen to repreſent the Commons in Parliament, then conſequently there were all the ſubſtantial and eſſential Parts of a Parliament met together: And being ſo, where was the Neceſſity, Advantage, or Prudence to diſſolve theſe, and thereby give new Trouble of new Summons and new Elections, loſe a great deal of Time, ſuffer irrecoverable Loſs and Damage to Ireland, and the Allies abroad; and after all, at the next Meeting, be but where they now were, as to the eſſential Parts of a Parliament; there being nothing more to be had at any other time, but what they had already?"

Before this Debate was brought to an Iſſue, Sir Robert Atkins, and Sir William Dolben brought down the Bill before-mention'd from the Lords: Upon which the Committee broke up; the Speaker reſum'd the Chair; the ſaid Bill was immediately read for the firſt time; and was order'd, Nemine Contradicente, to be ready a ſecond time the next Day; at which time, certain Amendments were offer'd, were receiv'd; and referr'd to a Committee to draw up: Upon the 22d this Committee made their Report; on the ſame Day, the Bill having paſs'd through all the Forms, was ſent up to the Lords; and on the next it receiv'd the Royal Aſſent. A.D. 1688-9.

And thus, to uſe an Expreſſion of Biſhop Burnet, thoſe who had ſubmitted to a King de facto, were obliged to ſubmit to a Parliament de facto likewiſe. The enacting Clauſes of it are in Subſtance theſe, viz. 1. That the Lords and Commons conven'd at Weſtminſter, January 22, and there ſitting February 13, are the two Houſes of Parliament, to all Intents and Purpoſes, notwithſtanding any want of Writ or Writs of Summons, or any other Defect or Default whatſoever. 2. That the preſent Act, and all other Acts to which the Royal Aſſent ſhould be given, before the next Prorogation ſhould be underſtood, and adjudg'd in Law to begin on the ſaid 13th of February. 3. That inſtead of the old Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, the Members ſhould take the new, before recited; and in this Act incorporated, under the ſame Penalty. And laſtly, there was a Proviſo, That the preſent Parliament might be diſſolv'd after the uſual manner, as if the ſame had been ſummon'd by Writ.

When this Meaſure was firſt talk'd of, and while it was in Agitation, the Malcontent-Party among the Commons publicly gave out, that, in caſe it ſhould paſs, they would no longer countenance the Proceedings of ſuch a Parliament, by continuing to ſit in it. Accordingly, it was no ſooner paſt, and a Day appointed for a Call of each Houſe, than, as well to keep their Words, as to avoid taking the Oaths, ſeveral of them retir'd to their Country Seats; ſome with the Leave of the Houſe, and ſome without. But that this occaſion'd the dilatory Proceedings of the ſubſequent Part of the Seſſion, as ſome Authors have inculcated, is neither reaſonable to be ſuppoſed, nor poſſible to be prov'd: On the contrary, we ſhall find that the Dilatorineſs thus complain'd of, aroſe from the Diſſenſions which broke out among the new Courtiers themſelves, and not from the Seceſſion of their Adverſaries. Many Members retire. [Life of K. William, Kennet, Oldmixon.]

Theſe new Courtiers were, it ſeems, of two ſorts; the one, moderate Churchmen, who were only for changing the Perſon of the King, in order to get rid of the Danger of Popery, and withal to enlarge the Circle of their own Intereſt and Importance: The other were ſaid to be of a republican Caſt, both in Church and State; poſſibly, becauſe they were for bridling the Prerogative effectually for the time to come, and for reducing the Power of the Clergy, which had ſo often been collegu'd with that of the Crown, to the Oppreſſion of the Subject.

As the Hopes of both reſted ſolely on the Prince's Succeſs, they had co-operated with a good Degree of Cordiality, as long as any Degree of Danger appear'd of their being out-

A.D. 1688-9. out-voted by the Common Enemy: But, when that Enemy quitted, or rather ſeem'd to quit, the Field, and the Breach between the King and the Church was underſtood to be in a fair way of becoming perpetual, as well thro' the Oppoſition which they had given to the Vote of Vacancy, as the Reluctance they ſtill ſhew'd to ſubmit to the new Settlement, the two Parties immediately ſeparated; the former becoming thorough Courtiers, and making it their whole Buſineſs to undertake for the Cabinet; and the latter, whether upon Principle or Diſguſt, is hard to determine, as induſtriouſly labouring to carry all thoſe popular Points, which ſhould have been made the Condition of beſtowing the Crown.

A Diviſion among the new Courtiers.

This appear'd the very next Day after the Bill for declaring the Convention a Parliament receiv'd the Royal Aſſent; for it being then propos'd in the Houſe of Commons, to take his Majeſty's Speech into immediate Conſideration, a Diſpoſition was ſhewn to enter on the Conſideration of Grievances firſt. This produc'd a ſhort Debate, which ended in a Reſolution to go upon the Speech the next Day; and in the mean while Leave was given to bring in two Bills, one for altering the Oaths, and another for repealing the Act of 25 Car. II. for regulating Corporations; which latter Bill, as we ſhall find, was to prepare the way to put the Elections, all over the Kingdom, into the Hands of the preſent Majority.

On the Morrow, the Houſe, according to Order, reſolv'd itſelf into a general Committee, in which the Affair of the Revenue was warmly and freely diſcuſs'd: The Courtiers ſuggeſted, that, together with the Crown, it was devolv'd on their preſent Majeſties, at leaſt during the Life of King James, for which Term the far greater Part of it had been granted: But their Antagoniſts would not admit, that the Grants, which had been made for the Life of one Prince, were leviable for the Uſe of another; on the contrary, they urg'd, That when the Throne was vacated thoſe Grants were vacated likewiſe; and that the Public had as good a Right to make a new Diſpoſition of the Revenue, as of the Crown, &c. Upon the Whole, it was reſolv'd, that the Revenue was expir'd: And a Complaint being made, that certain Strangers were in the Gallery, the Committee broke up abruptly, to avoid (x) perhaps any further Concluſions on ſo tender a Point: For the Courtiers were ſo uneaſy in their preſent naked and deſtitute Condition, that the Houſe was no ſooner reſum'd, than they made a Motion for ſettling a Revenue upon the King and Queen; and it was reſolv'd, that the ſame ſhould be taken into Conſideration the next Morning: Thoſe, however, who had the King once more within their Circle, were not for letting him looſe again, without exacting Securities for his good Behaviour: Inſtead, therefore, of gratifying the Impatience of the Courtiers, or the Cabinet, they ſtudiouſly endeavour'd to ſpin the Matter into Length, and reſolv'd not to proceed but on due Information, and with all the Precaution and Circumſpection imaginable. Thus, all that this ſecond Day produc'd was, in the Committee, an Order to Sir Robert Howard, Auditor of the Exchequer, to bring in a State of the Revenue; and a Reſolution to ſit again on the Morrow: And even when the King, by Meſſage, the ſame Day, gave the Houſe to underſtand, That the late King had ſet ſail from Breſt, with French Troops, in order to land in Ireland, tho' they unanimouſly reſolv'd to aſſiſt his Majeſty with their Lives and Fortunes, in ſupport of his Alliances, in reducing of Ireland, and defending their Religion and Laws; they accompany'd that Reſolution only with a temporary Aid of 420,000 l. to be levy'd by a monthly Aſſeſſment; and took yet farther Time to deliberate on what was farther to be done to make good their Vote.

A Meſſage from the King, importing, that K. James had ſet ſail for Ireland.

Biſhop Burnet ſuppoſes this Behaviour of theirs to have been the Reſult of long Oppoſition, and habitual Jealouſy of thoſe in Power: But, if it was, ſurely, in a limited Monarchy like this, nothing is more laudable than ſuch a Jealouſy, nor more conſiſtent with the Elements of the Conſtitution, nor the Truſt thereby repos'd in the Houſe of Commons.

Determin'd however as they appear'd, not to ſacrifice all Regards to King William, they did not forget that they were to ſecure the Nation againſt the Return of King James. Thus, to render the Offer of their Lives and Fortunes, juſt mention'd, more ſolemn and more important, they gave it the Form of an Addreſs, call'd upon the Lords to concur in it, and, when their Lordſhips had accordingly concurred, both Houſes waited upon the King, in a Body, with it. On the Receipt of another Meſſage from his Majeſty by Mr. Hampden (ſignifying, That he had cauſ'd ſeveral Perſons to be apprehended and ſecur'd, on credible Information that they were conſpiring againſt the Government, in favour of the late King James; that his Majeſty was under great Difficulties how to behave in the Caſe, ſince he was unwilling to do any thing unwarrantable by Law, or that ſhould be inconſiſtent with the Safety of the Government, which he apprehended the allowing them the Privilege of the Habeas Corpus Act would be; and that he thought fit to aſk their Advice therein;) they moreover departed ſo far from the Intractability they are accus'd of, as to ſuffer a Bill to be brought in to ſuſpend that Favourite-Act; which under the late King, when both Monmouth and Argyle were actually in Arms againſt him, had never been attempted, nor ſo much as thought of: Indeed, ſome of them mov'd upon that Occaſion, That it might never be drawn into (x) The Serjeant was, however, immediately order'd to take any Stranger into his Cuſtody, who ſhould be ſeen either in the Houſe, or the general Committee.

A.D. 1688-9

Precedent or Example hereafter; as alſo, that the Expences and Fees of all Perſons ſo committed might be defray'd by the Public: But both theſe Motions were over-rul'd; and the only Mitigations that could be procur'd were, a Proviſo that the ſaid Act of Suſpenſion ſhould not any way affect the Privilege of Parliament; and that the Act itſelf ſhould be no longer in force than till the 17th of April next enſuing.

The Lords ſuſpending it without the Ceremonial of an Act.

The Lords, in the mean time, to whom the like Meſſage was alſo ſent, by the Lord Mordaunt, went a great deal farther; for they immediately appointed a Committee to prepare an Addreſs, "Expreſſing their moſt humble Thanks for his Majeſty's great Care of their Liberties, and for his gracious Communication of this Matter; and humbly adviſing and deſiring his Majeſty to take ſuch extraordinary Care of the Government in this Conjuncture, by ſecuring all diſaffected Perſons, as might prevent any Diſturbance of the public Peace; and that ſuch Perſons as were, or ſhould be, ſo committed, might be retain'd till the firſt Day of next Term, if his Majeſty ſhould ſee Cauſe." They alſo, by Meſſage, deſir'd the Concurrence of the Commons to the ſaid Addreſs: But there this extraordinary Strain of entire Confidence came to a full Stop: The Commons were juſtly aſham'd to authorize, after ſuch a Manner, a diſpenſing Power in the Crown, which they had ſo recently and expreſly condemn'd: And it muſt be acknowledg'd, that the Method taken by them, to arm the Government with ſufficient Powers for its own Preſervation, was more agreeable to the Dignity of the Legiſlature, and leſs detrimental to the Clames and Rights of the Subject.

The Perſons at this time ſecur'd were, the Earl of Arran, Sir Robert Hamilton, and two other Scotſmen: But whether they were ſecur'd on poſitive Evidence, or only on Suſpicion, is not ſufficiently clear'd: They were known to be diſaffected: They had their private Meetings and Cabals, as had been hinted in his Majeſty's Meſſage: And it is inſinuated elſewhere, that the Government was furniſh'd with Matter againſt them out of certain intercepted Letters from France: The Earl had, beſides, render'd himſelf perſonally obnoxious to the new King: For having been aſſaulted in his Chair, ſome few Days before, by certain Ruffians unknown, he had been raſh enough to place it to his Majeſty's Account; and to ſurmiſe, that he had give Direction to have him aſſaſſinated, for his inviolable Fidelity to his old Maſter. All were committed to the Tower; and ſeveral more of the Scotiſh Nobility and Gentry, who were on the Point of ſetting forward to aſſiſt at the approaching Convention for that Kingdom, were detain'd,

Lord Arran, &c. committed to the Tower. [Hereby.]

A.D. 1688-9.

The Truth is, that the new King already found his Throne ſhake under him: By loſing the Biſhops, he had loſt the whole Herd of their Followers and Admirers, who had once ſo warmly eſpous'd his Pretenſions, and who, on the contrary, appeared now as warm for a new Revolution. His very Friends, who had hitherto labour'd with as much Earneſtneſs to place him on the Throne, as if the Salvation of the World depended on it, now embarraſs'd him as much with their Broils, as they had before oblig'd him with their Services. His Enemies were every where hard at work to make a Diverſion in England and Scotland, while King James made uſe of his French Auxiliaries for the Service of France, in labouring to extirpate the Proteſtant Intereſt in Ireland. Even his Cabinet partook of the Ferment of the Times; and thoſe who enjoy'd the higheſt Places in it, either confeſs'd they were uneaſy in them, or thought it neceſſary to take Precautions for their Security in caſe of a Change. There are many Paſſages in Sir John Rereſby, which ſerve to exemplify the general Diſpoſition of Things, as well as his own particular Diſcontent. Speaking of Lord Danby, he ſays, he found him extremely cool'd with regard to Affairs, as now manag'd. And this Obſervation he founds on the Expreſſions which dropt from his own Mouth, to the following Effect: "That being embark'd with his All, he was ſorry to ſee things no better conducted: That Ireland was in a manner become invincible by our Neglect of ſending Forces thither before now: That with regard to this, and other material Points, equally unheeded, he had been preſſing with the King to a Degree even of Incivility: That he had told his Majeſty, He plainly ſaw he did all he could to encourage the Preſbyterians, and to diſhearten the Church, which could not but be abſolutely prejudicial both to himſelf and the Government; tho' he at the ſame time obſerv'd that his Majeſty interſer'd but little in Councils, being prevented therefrom partly by Inclination, and partly by want of Health: That he was doubtful of the Continuance of Affairs as they now ſtood: That if King James would but quit his Papiſts, he might ſtill retrieve all: That the Diſcontents of the People grew daily greater and greater; and that King William, Lord Hallifax, and all the reſt of the new Court were moſt ſtrangely infatuated with a Perſuaſion of their own Security (a)."

The new Settlement already in danger.

Sir John is, moreover, communicative enough to acknowledge, that on the firſt of March, which was the very Day that King William

(a) "He particularly animadverted (proceeds Sir John) on the laſt mentioned Lords, for inſiſting with ſuch Violence, in a Speech of his, That the Prince ſhould be intituled legal and rightful King of this Realm, ſaying it was mere Nonſenſe; for that had the Prince of Wales been made King, he could never have been deem'd our lawful Sovereign, while his Father liv'd. But his Lordſhip nevertheleſs appear'd very ſerious and urgent about the Legality of taking the new Oaths; and condemn'd the Biſhops for their Squeamiſhneſs in that reſpect, tho' they themſelves had had ſo large a Hand in bringing about this great and extraordinary Change; and thereupon quoted Lord Nottingham's Speech, when, in the Houſe of Lords, had obſerv'd, That tho' he had never in the leaſt conſented to this Revolution, but had with all his Might oppos'd the Prince's Acceſſion, as contrary to Law; yet ſince his Highneſs was here, and we muſt owe our Protection to him as King de facto, he thought it but juſt and legal to ſwear Allegiance to him."

A.D. 1688-9 William apply'd to the two Houſes to remove his Difficulties in relation to the Habeas Corpus Act, he had another Interview with the Lady, who was ſo deep in the Confidence of King James; that ſhe told him, "His Majeſty had ſent for certain Jewels "which he had left in her Hands." That ſhe ſhew'd him his Letter, which was dated February 17, N. S. That by the ſaid Letter it appear'd he was to ſail for Ireland the next Day; and that he depended upon his old Friends to aſſiſt his Cauſe: That ſhe farther told him, "That the French King had "ſupply'd his Majeſty with a great Treaſure "of Money, and 6000 Swiſs PROTESTANTS: "That he intended to go thro' Ireland for "Scotland, there to call a Parliament inſtead "of the propos'd Convention: That from "thence he would march into England, and "put himſelf entirely into the Hands of the "Proteſtant Intereſt; and that as ſhe had a "Friendſhip for the Lord-Privy-Seal, ſhe "had a mind to diſcloſe herſelf to him, if "with any Safety ſhe might do ſo." That he (Sir John) undertook to bring them together: That the very ſame Evening he aprriv'd to his Lordſhip accordingly: Tho' I muſt own, continues he, the Topic being of ſo nice and tender a ſort, I did it with great Caution. However, I gave him plainly to underſtand, That the chief Motion which induc'd the Lady to deſire a Meeting with him, was to impart to him what might be for his own Good, and the Service of the Public. Hereupon he began to be more free and open with me than he had hitherto been, on this Chapter; and I told him, in (b) general, that great Deſigns were on foot; he ſaid, he believ'd it, and that though Men ſeem'd to be for the preſent Intereſt, as moſt prevalent, it was not altogether diſcreet to venture too far; that if Matters really were as I had ſaid, it was but ſafe to carry it fair with thoſe in the Oppoſition, and to let ſome People know he ſpoke always with great Reſpect of King James; that if it came to Blows, it was uncertain who would ſtrike hardeſt; and that he ſhould be glad to meet the Lady at my Houſe, whenever ſhe pleas'd."

Sir John afterwards acquaints us, That they met accordingly, March the 3d: That ſhe dealt very frankly with him, but durſt not tell him all ſhe knew: And that his Lordſhip renew'd his former Requeſt, That ſhe would be his Friend in caſe any Alteration of Affairs ſhould by any Means be brought to paſs. And again in another Paſſage, That his Lordſhip begg'd of him to endeavour a Reconciliation between him and a Lady whom he had formerly brought to him about ſome Buſineſs, wherein ſhe thought herſelf ill us'd; FOR that ſhe had a good Intereſt with King James." He alſo adds, "There ſeem'd now to be great Diſcontents among all ſorts of Men; Affairs look'd ſomewhat embroil'd; and I heard A.D. 1688-9 Lord Privy-Seal ſay, That in the Poſture the Nation now ſtood, the King (James) if but a Proteſtant, could not be kept out four Months: Nay, Lord Danby went farther, and averr'd, That if he would but give us Satisfaction as to our Religion, as he eaſily might, it would be very hard to make Head againſt him: Sayings which I thought very extraordinary to fall from ſuch great Men, and of the Times too."

The Truth is, theſe great Men, like moſt other Men, had their own private Views ever uppermoſt in their Thoughts. And if Lord Halifax by one Means endeavoured to ſecure a Retreat, there is reaſon to think, that Lord Danby did the ſame by another; for about this time, when he thought the new Settlement in ſuch imminent Danger, he procur'd a Grant of the Government of Hull; as a Place of Retreat, in the Opinion of the Lord Privy-Seal, and his Friend Re-reſby, where he might make his own Terms, in caſe of a Change of the Times.

There is yet another Circumſtance to be mention'd, which farther illuſtrates the Condition of the new King's Affairs. In proportion as the Bulk of the Nation grew diſcontented, the Diſcontents of the Army grew more violent and more formidable. In order, therefore, to eject this evil Spirit, before it became too mighty to be maſter'd, and withal to replace the Dutch Troops which the States pretended to ſtand in need of, and which his Majeſty could not part with, it was propoſed to ſend over the moſt refractory of the Britiſh Troops into Holland: Of theſe (c) Dumbarton's Regiment, which the Duke of Monmouth had once commanded, and which he had ſo high an Opinion of, that he thought with them alone he might have carry'd his Point at Sedgmoor, were the moſt apprehended, and therefore, were order'd to be ſhipp'd off firſt: But, inſtead of obeying thoſe Orders, they mutiny'd at Ipſwich, ſeiz'd on the Money appointed for their Pay, diſarm'd ſuch of their Officers as refus'd to join with them, declar'd for King James; and with four Pieces of Cannon march'd off towards Scotland: And ſo alarming or ſo perplexing was the News of this Incident, that the King caus'd it to be communicated to the two Houſes, who in Concurrence immediately addreſs'd him upon it, call'd it a Rebellion, and deſir'd his Majeſty to declare by Proclamation, That the ſaid Soldiers, and all that adher'd to them, were Rebels and Traitors. But his Majeſty had already caus'd three Regiments of Dutch Dragoons to purſue them, under the Command of Ginckle; and might have ſet forth ſuch a Proclamation by virtue of his Prerogative, had they been his own Subjects: But they were Scots (which Kingdom had not yet ſubmitted in form to the new Government); and if they themſelves had ſubmitted

A dangerous Mutiny in the Army.

(b) And afterwards more circumſtantially, "That ſome who were outwardly great Friends to the preſent Government were treating for Terms on the other Side; which I communicated (ſays he) to his Lordſhip, and particularly made mention of ſome he little ſuſpected."

(c) Then Marſhal Schomberg's

A.D. 1688-9. mitted, it was rather the Effect of Neceſſity than Inclination. The King, however, thus warranted by his Parliament, did accordingly ſet forth ſuch a Proclamation, which, after ſtrictly charging and commanding all and every of his Officers and People to aid and aſſiſt in ſuppreſſing the ſaid Rebellion, and ſeizing the ſaid Rebels, concludes in theſe Words, "We, reſolving to make the ſaid Criminals ſevere Examples of our juſt Indignation, to the Intent that all Perſons hereafter may be left without Excuſe, if they ſhould be found offending in ſuch manner."

It ſeems a Train of Communication had been laid between this and ſuch other Corps as were to follow them to Holland; but either thro' Cowardice or Treachery, it did not take; which ſtruck ſuch a Damp into thoſe Heroes, that, tho' they were thirteen hundred ſtrong, inſtead of making a deſperate Stand, as their Condition ſeem'd to require they ſhould, and as their Officers importun'd them to do, they threw down their Arms, ſurrender'd at Diſcretion, and were diſpatch'd on their former Errand, by way of Puniſhment. Such a Dread, however, did this abortive Attempt leave upon the Minds of thoſe in Power, that Advantage was taken to bring in a Bill for the puniſhing Mutiny and Deſertion; which found an eaſy Paſſage thorough both Houſes; where, till now, an Army was conſider'd as the mere Creature of the Throne, and conſequently a riotous Aſſembly, which rather deſerv'd the Cenſure, than the Acknowledgement of our Laws.

Suppoſe the

But gives riſe to the Mutiny-Bill.

While theſe things were paſſing, his Majeſty endeavour'd to moliify the eager Spirit which occaſionally broke forth among the Patriots in the Houſe of Commons, by a ſolemn Meſſage, ſignifying his Readineſs to acquieſce in any Meaſure they ſhould think fit to take in relation to the Hearth-Money Duty, either by a new Regulation of it, or the taking it totally (a) away; becauſe he had been inform'd, it was very grievous to the People; and in return was complimented with an Addreſs of Thanks, which paſs'd Nemine Contradicente; and in which they call'd it, an unprecedented Offer for the Eaſe of his People; and aſſur'd him, they would make ſuch Returns, and be ſo careful of the Support of the Crown, as ſhould make it evident to the World, to the Diſcouragement of his Enemies, and the Satisfaction of all good Men, that his Majeſty reign'd in the Hearts of his People.

The King offers to relinquiſh the Hearth-money Duty.

His Majeſty had alſo, in Anſwer to the Addreſs of both Houſes, which contain'd the Tender of their Lives and Fortunes, expreſs'd himſelf in the following plauſible manner:

His Majeſty's Anſwer to the Offers of Lives and Fortunes.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"If any thing could add to the Eſteem and Affection I have for Parliaments, and particularly for this, they would be much increas'd by the Kindneſs you ſhew to me, and the Zeal you expreſs for the Publick Good in the Addreſs you have made; which in the Matter, as well as the Manner, hath every thing in it that ought to recommend it to me.

A.D. 1688-9.

I aſſure you I will never abuſe the Confidence that you ſhall put in me; being fully perſuaded that there is no ſure Foundation of a good Agreement between a King and his People but a mutual Truſt: When that is once broken, a Government is half diſſolv'd: It ſhall therefore be my chief Care never to give any Parliament Cauſe to diſtruſt me; and the beſt Method I can chuſe for that Purpoſe, is never to expect any thing from them, but that which ſhall be their own Intereſt to grant.

I came hither for the Good of the Kingdom, and, ſince it is your Deſire that I am in this Station, I ſhall purſue the ſame Ends that brought me.

God hath been pleaſed to make me inſtrumental to redeem you from the Ills you fear'd, and it is ſtill my Deſire, as well as my Duty to preſerve your Religion, Laws and Liberties; which were the only Inducements that brought me into England, and to theſe I aſcribe the Bleſſings that have attended this Undertaking.

When I ſpoke laſt to you, I told you of the Neceſſity of aſſiſting our Allies, and more eſpecially the States of Holland, whoſe Readineſs to relieve you, at their too great Hazard and Expence, from the Extremities you lay under, needs no other Argument to move you to the Conſideration of it.

As I was then a Witneſs of their Zeal and Affection to promote the Expedition, and ſecond my Endeavours, even with a Neglect of their own Safety; ſo I am now ſenſible of the inevitable Ruin they have drawn upon themſelves, by giving you this Aſſiſtance, if you ſhould not return it to them.

They have really exhauſted themſelves to ſuch a Degree, both as to Men and Money, that it is not eaſily to be imagin'd; and I am confident your Generoſity will have as little Bounds towards them, as theirs had towards you; and that you will not only enable me to make good the Treaty with them, and repay what they have actually laid out upon this Occaſion, of which an Account ſhall be given to you. But that you will farther ſupport them to the utmoſt of your Ability againſt the Power of their Enemies, who muſt be yours too, by their Intereſt and their Religion, and do certainly deſign the Ruin of Holland to be a Step to your Deſtruction.

I need not take pains to tell you the deplorable Condition of Ireland, which by the Zeal and Violence of the Popiſh Party there, and by the Aſſiſtance and Encouragement they

(a) The Commons chuſe the Latter, as the moſt effectual Way to eaſe the People; and it was accordingly repeal'd, but not without Oppoſition in the Houſe of Lords: where it paſſed a very unuſual Debate: The King's Miniſters and Servants contending for the Repeal; and the oppoſing Lords for the Continuance of it, under the Preſence, That it was the only ſure Fund for raiſing Money: but, in reality, that the King might not have the Credit of it.

A.D. 1688-9. they have from France, is brought to that Pass, that it is not advisable to attempt the reducing it, otherwise than by a very considerable Force, which I think ought not to be less than 20000 Horse and Foot; which, by the Blessing of God, will make the Work shorter, and in Consequence, the Charge easier, tho' the first Expence must, of Necessity, be great.

You must consider that, towards the more speedy and effectual Success in relation to Ireland, as well as with a regard to France, there must be such a Fleet, as may, in conjunction with that of the States, make us entirely Masters of the Sea, that nothing can be sent from France either to Ireland or any where else, that may give Disturbances to us, or our Allies.

I must also recommend the Consideration of the Revenue to you, that it may be so settled, as that it may be collected without Dispute.

My Lords and Gentlemen, These things will amount to a great Sum, and must of Consequence be a present Weight upon the People; but, considering that neither your Religion, nor your Safety, can probably be secur'd without these Means, I conclude you will think nothing can be too great a Price for their Preservation: And I will engage my foreword to you, that whatever you shall give in order to these public Ends, shall be strictly apply'd to them; and that as you so freely offer to hazard all that is dear to you, so I shall as freely expose myself for the Support of the Protestant Religion, and the Safety and Honour of the Nation."

March the eighth, this Answer was reported to the House of Commons by the Speaker, and the next Day Leave was given to bring in a Bill, for collecting the several Branches of the Revenue, which were due and payable by Law in the Reigns of Charles II. and King James II. to the Use and Service of the Crown, till June 29, 1689, with a Clause of Indemnification to such as had already collected the said Revenues.

On the fourteenth, the Dutch Bill of Charges came also before them; the Sum Total of which was upwards of seven Millions of Guilders, or about 686,500 l. Sterl. according to a late Computation. The next Day it was resolv'd, nemine Contradicente, that a Sum not exceeding 600,000 l. should be given to his Majesty to discharge it: And that so considerable an Abatement as 86,500 l. was made, seems to indicate, that some Items were either unreasonable in themselves, or unreasonably inflam'd.

The Dutch Bill of Charges provided for. [Timberl.]

On the twenty-first, an Estimate of the Charge of six Regiments of Horse, two of Dragoons, and twenty of Foot (sixteen of which were to be rais'd, making in all 22330 Men, besides Officers, to be employ'd in Ireland) which, for one Year, amounted to 714,117 l. 6 s. 4 d. was given in, and was allow'd by the House: But when the Supply for that Service came to be debated, instead of providing for the whole Year's Service, they provided but for Half. They acknowledg'd, however, that the like Provision for the Remainder would be necessary, in case the War should last so long: And by proceeding in this manner, they propos'd at once to gratify the King, and continue themselves necessary to his Service: But as this did not come up to the Trust and Confidence which his Majesty expected from, and had demanded of, them, he appear'd more sensible of the Affront than of the Obligation. They, nevertheless, adher'd to this Maxim; and when the Estimate for the Navy came under Consideration, instead of 1,128,140 l. (which was the Sum demanded for fifty Men of War of the 2d, 3d, and 4th Rates, fifteen small Ships, and eight Fireships, to be mann'd with 17,155 Men, and to be employ'd in the narrow Seas and the Mediterranean; and also one 3d, nineteen 4th, two 5th, Rates, and two Fireships for the Plantations and Convoys, to be manned with 4,540) they gave but 700,000 l.

as also the Army and the Navy for half the Year only.

It is observable, that many of those who have bestow'd the highest Praise on the opposing Members in the Reign of King Charles the Second, are the most angry with the Opposition given to King William: And it is, at this Day, generally believ'd, that disappointed Churchmen, and deserting Loyalists, were the only Persons who join'd in it; whereas nothing is more certain, than that the very Men who have been censur'd for being thus cautious in the Management of the Supplies, were most of them Revolutionists and Revolutioners, and who thought they could no otherwise be consistent with themselves.

The Opposition at this Period was, in Truth, of two different Kinds, and was carry'd on by two different Parties, who were irreconcilable Enemies to one another. While these Money Matters were under Consideration, the Debate was carry'd on by Whig against Whig (to adopt Party Reproaches (while the Tories contented themselves with looking on, in Expectation of making their own Advantage: But when the King endeavour'd to open a Gap in the Law for admitting the Dissenters into the Government (whether in Consequence of former Engagements, or whether to open an easier Passage for the Money Bills at the same time, is hard to determine) then the Tories interpos'd in behalf of the Church, and endeavour'd to possess the Nation with a Belief, That they had as much to apprehend from Presbyterians now, as from Papists before.

From several Opinions in this Parliament.

It has been already observ'd, that many of this Party absented themselves, as soon as the Vote was carry'd, for turning the Convention into a Parliament; and their Adversaries immediately resolv'd to prevent their Return, if possible: But the Method they took operated in a manner quite contrary to their Expectations: The Call they caus'd to be made in each House, for the Members to take the Oaths, was made in a Persuasion, that those who had so openly oppos'd the new Establishment, would never submit to it; in which case, they concluded, the whole Game would be in their own Hands, and they might play it as they pleas'd: But, aware of this, the Absentees, of the lower House at least, thought it more advisable to yield to the Time, than to

A.D. 1688-9. to ruin their Cause by adhering to their Principles: Accordingly, they return'd in Swarms; and, under the Umbrage of the famous Statute of Henry VII. which provides, that no Person that should assist, in Arms or otherwise, the King for the Time being, should therefore be impeach'd or attainted, swore Allegiance to the King in Possession, while they acknowledg'd the Right to be in another; and to maintain that Government, which in Conscience they thought themselves oblig'd to subvert: "Which, says the elegant Author before-quoted, was to remove the Boundaries of Right and Wrong, and, as far as in them lay, to teach Mankind to call Good evil, and Evil good.

[Dissert. on Parties, p. 72.]

The Commons in general take the new Oaths:

Of the whole House of Commons, not above two Persons, viz. Sir Henry Monson and Lord Fenshaw, are mention'd for having declin'd the Oaths, and these were expelled for not complying: But, among the Lords, no less than eight Bishops, namely, Sancroft the Metropolitan, Thomas of Worcester, Lake of Chichester, Turner of Ely, Lloyd of Norwich, Ken of Bath and Wells, Frampton of Gloucester, and White of Peterborough (e), and several temporal Peers, refus'd to swear; and notwithstanding they were often summon'd to attend the House, neglected coming: Though even the Archbishop himself condescended to make some frivolous Excuses by Letter, which was directed, not to the Speaker of the House of Lords, or the Lord Privy-Seal, but to the Marquis of Halifax, and which was voted unsatisfactory.

But many Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, decline it.

"Upon the Bishops refusing the Oaths, [Vol. ii. p. 7.] says the Historian of his own Times, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, requiring all Persons to take them by a prefixed Day, under several Forfeitures and Penalties. The Clergy that took them not, were to fall under Suspension for six Months, and at the End of those they were to be deprived. This was follow'd with a particular Eagerness by some, who were known Enemies to the Church: And it was then generally believ'd, that a great Part of the Clergy would refuse the Oaths. So they hop'd to have an Advantage against the Church by this means."

Pretences to favour the Dissenters.

But these known Enemies of the Church were not the only Persons who lay in wait for the Advantage; for the King himself, when he came to the House March 16, to pass the Act for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, thought himself authoris'd, by the intractable Behaviour of the Clergy and their Followers, to become the avow'd Advocate for the Dissenters, and to urge the Necessity of admitting all Protestants into the public Service. His Words were these:

A.D. 1688-9.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

Exhorts'd by the King.

"Now I have the Occasion of coming hither to pass these (f) Bills, I shall put you in mind of one thing, which will conduce as much to our Settlement, as a Settlement will to the Disappointment of our Enemies. I am, with all the Expedition I can, filling up the Vacancies that are in Offices and Places of Trust, by this Revolution. I hope you are sensible there is a Necessity of some Law to settle the Oaths to be taken by all Persons to be admitted to such Places. I recommend it to your Care to make a speedy Provision for it: And as I doubt not but you will sufficiently provide against Papists, so I hope you will leave room for the Admission of all Protestants that are willing and able to serve. This Conjunction in my Service, will tend to the better uniting you among yourselves, and the strengthening you against your common Adversaries."

Our Historian himself mentions this Circumstance; but erroneously states it as an additional Period to a Speech of the King's, concerning the Affairs of Ireland: "The other affects, that it was by Mr. Hampden's Perswasion, that his Majesty took so impolitick a Step, and that it was done without the Participation of his Ministry; which will scarce seem credible to those who consider the entir'd Stare of his Affairs at that time, and how sensible he must needs be, that so capital a Point could never be carry'd without the joint Assistance of them all. The Bishop adds, "That what was understood by it, was the taking off the Sacramental Test, which was necessary by Law to qualify Men for Employment, and which was look'd upon as the chief Security the Church of England had, by excluding all Dissenters from all Employments." And again, "It was try'd, if a Bargain could be made for excusing the Clergy from that, provided the Dissenters might be excused from the Sacrament." As also, "That the Measure itself had a very ill Effect: That it was rejected by a great Majority in both Houses: That it very much heightened the Prejudices against the King, as bearing no great Affection to the Church, when he propos'd the opening such a Door, which they believ'd would be fatal to them; and that the (e) Smith of Carlisle, and Watson of St. David's, also stood out for some time, but submitted at last: Of the Latter, Sir John Reresby writes as follows:

"It happen'd this Day, (March 28.) that I met with the Bishop of St. David's, who told, if I thought he might safely take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, he being one of the Prelates that had hitherto stood out, and were now cited to appear before the House of Lords? I told him, it were fittest for me to be advis'd by him in such a Case, and that certainly his own Conscience could not but dictate to him right: But I found he was already resolv'd; and accordingly he went the next Day and comply'd." [Mem. c. 1. p. 519.

"These Bishops (says Bishop Burnet) did one thing very inconsistent with their other Actions, and that could not be easily reconcil'd to the Rules of good Conscience. All Prelations are directed to Bishops, or to their Chancellors. But by a general Agreement, in the Year 1660, the Bishops resolv'd to except out of the Patents that they gave their Chancellors, the Power of giving Institution into Cures, which, before that, the Chancellors were impower'd to give in the Bishop's Absence. Now the Bishops were bound to see that the Clergy, before they gave them Institution, took the Oaths to the Government. In order therefore to decline the doing this, and yet avoid the Actions of Quare Impedit, that they would be liable to, if they did not admit the Clerks presented to them, they gave new Patents to their Chancellors, empowering them to give Institution; which they knew could not be done, but by tendring the Oaths. So they gave Authority to Laymen to admit Men to Benefices, and to do that which they thought unlawful, as was the swearing to an Usurper against the lawful King. Thus it appear'd, how far the Engagement of Interest and Parties can run Men into Contradictions." [Vol. ii. p. 7.]

(f) The second was, to reverse the Attainder of Lord Russel; and in the Preamble calls his Execution a Murder.

A.D. 1688-9 the rejecting this, made the Act imposing the Oaths, to be driven on with the more Zeal."

But the Truth is, that we find other Ministers, besides Mr. Hampden, deeply engag'd in this Measure, particularly, Lord Halifax (g); and that more than one Effort was made in each House to bring it to bear; which seems to argue, that it was concerted in the Cabinet at least; and demonstrates, that Mr. Hampden was not the King's only Adviser in it. Some Authors are express, That it was according to his Majesty's Desire signify'd in Council, that a Bill was offer'd in the House of Lords, on the 14th of March for abrogating the former Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and appointing other Oaths in their stead.

Progress of the Oath-Bill in both Houses.

But if it should be taken for granted, that the King did advise upon this Matter in Council, before he propos'd it in Parliament, it is, on the other hand, scarce supposable, that this Bill in the House of Lords should be the Consequence of his Majesty's Desire so signify'd: For the Court Bill was the severe one already mention'd, which was brought up from the Commons to the Lords by Mr. Hampden in Person: And this is rather to be consider'd as a Counter-bill, to screen the Clergy from the Penalties of the former. It is moreover certain, that when the Lords Mordaunt, Delamere, and certain other ministerial Lords, endeavour'd to graft a Clause upon it, to remove the Necessity of taking the Sacrament as a Qualification for an Office, it was rejected by a great Majority; as was also another Clause, which partook of the nature of a Compromise; for as no Man was thereby to be admitted into an Office, who had not taken the Sacrament after the Mode of the establish'd Church, so it was provided, that the producing a Certificate under the Hand of a Minister, and two other credible Witnesses, that the Party therein specify'd, had so receiv'd the Sacrament, was to be deem'd a sufficient Qualification. As a farther Proof, that this was, in the main, an Anti-Court Bill, the said Lords enter'd their (b) Protests against the rejecting the said Clauses;

(g) Which the new Courtiers at first depended so much upon as a Step, that the Form of an Act was actually drawn up, and ready to be laid before each House, in the following Words:

"Whereas the Statute made in the 25th Year of the Reign of King Charles the second, intituled, An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, was devised and made to prevent Papists from being put into Places and Offices of Trust, by the Means or Power of the late King James, then Duke of York, and a professed or known Papist; but by reason of some things therein is found to exclude divers Protestants who are able and willing to serve their present Majesties faithfully: And whereas there is now no Danger to be feared of the present King and Queen's employing or entrusting of Papists, but special and great Cause, in that Juncture of Affairs, that their Majesties should have the entire and unanimous Assistance of all their Protestant Subjects, for the common Defence of themselves, their Government, and their Kingdoms: To the End therefore, that their Majesties may not be deprived of the Service of any who are faithful unto them, and well affected to their Government; especially when there is so great Occasion, by reason both of secret Conspiracies of Persons ill affected at home, and of open Invasion threatened by the potent and active Enemies abroad:

"Be it enacted by the King and Queen's Majesty, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That it shall and may be lawful to and for such persons as Justices, during their Reign, to grant Commissions, or otherwise to authorize any Person or Persons, whom they shall think fit, not being Popish Recusants, to hold and execute any Office or Employment under them, without receiving the Sacrament, or having any Certificate thereof, as by the said Act is required; and that all Persons so commissioned or authorized, to hold or execute any Office or Employment under their Majesties, shall and may hold and execute the same, according to their several respective Commissions, &c. wherein they shall not receive the Sacrament, or have any Certificate thereof, as by the said Act is required, without being subject to any Disability, Forfeiture, or Penalty for so doing: Any thing in the said Act, or any other Act, to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

Provided nevertheless, and be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That if any Person, being in truth a Popish Recusant, though he be not then convicted or so reputed, shall accept of any Commission, Office or Place under their said Majesties, and shall exercise the same contrary to the said Act, and shall afterwards be thereof convicted, every such Person, being thereof convicted, shall be subject to all the Disabilities, Forfeitures, and Penalties expressed in the said Act, any thing in the Act to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. [Coll. of Land. Southern's Collection, Vol. I. part. 2. pag. 518.

(b) Viz. To the First:

"That a hearty Union among Protestants was a greater Security to the Church and State than any Test that could be invented: That this Obligation to receive the Sacrament was a Test on the Protestants rather than on the Papists: That, as long as it was continued, there could not be that hearty and thorough Union among Protestants, as had always been wish'd, and was at this time indispensibly necessary. And, lastly, that a greater Caution ought not to be required, than such as were admitted into Offices, when from the Members of the two Houses of Parliament, who are not oblig'd to receive the Sacrament, to enable them to sit in either House.

Delamere, Stamford, North and Grey, Coventry, Wharton, Lovelace, Vaughan."

To the Second:

"That it gives great Part of the Protestant Freemen of England Reason to complain of Inequality and hard Usage, when they are excluded from public Employments by a Law; and also, that it grieves the King and Kingdom of divers Men fit and capable to serve the Public in several Cases; and that for a mere Scruple of Conscience, which could by no means render them suspected, much less disaffected to the Government: That his Majesty, as the common indulgent Father of his People, having expressed an earnest Desire of Liberty to tender Consciences, and of his Protestant Subjects; and the Bishops having, divers of them, on several Occasions, profess'd an Inclination to, and declar'd the Reasonableness of, such a Christian Temper; they apprehended it would raise Jealousies in Mens Minds, of something disagreeable from the Case of Religion, or the Public, or a Design to heal our Breaches, when they should find that, by continuing secular Employments to ecclesiastical Conformity, those were drawn out from civil Affairs, whose Doctrine and Worship might be tolerated by Authority of Parliament, there being a Bill before them, by Order of the House, to that Purpose; especially when, without this exclusive Vigour, the Church is secured in all its Privileges and Preferments, no body being hereby let into them who is not strictly conformable: That to set Marks of Distinction and Humiliation on any Sorts of Men who have not render'd themselves justly suspected to the Government, as it is at all times to be avoided, by the making full and equitable Laws; so might it be of so ill effect to the reformed Interest at home and abroad in this present Conjuncture, which stood in need of the united Hands and Hearts of all Protestants, against the open Attempts and secret Endeavours of a restless Party, and a potent Neighbour, who was more zealous than Rome itself to plant Popery in their Kingdoms; and labour'd with his utmost Power to settle his Tyranny upon the Ruins of the Reformation all through Europe: That it turn'd the Edge of a Law (they knew not by what Fate) upon Protestants, and Friends to the Government, which was intended against Papists, to exclude them from Places of Trust, as Men avowedly dangerous to our Religion and Government; and the taking the Sacrament, which was ordain'd only as a Means to discover Papists, and now made a distinguishing Duty amongst Protestants, to weaken the Whole by casting out a Part of them: That Mysteries of Religion and divine Worship are of a sacred Ground, and of a Nature so wholly distant from the [illegible] Affairs of politic Society, that they cannot be [illegible] those Parts; and therefore the Church, by the Law and the Gospel, as well as common Prudence, ought to [illegible] to suffer either tender Consciences within [illegible] Offence to those without, by making their [illegible]

A.D. 1688-9. Clauses; and if the new Bishop of Salisbury (Burnet) divided with, or undertook for, the Majority, possibly it was either to ingratiate himself with his Brethren, with whom he was on very ill Terms, or for want of better Instructions. He had but just taken his Seat upon the Bench; he was not yet consecrated; and while the Cabinet was split into such a variety of Factions, it was no easy Matter to know which had the Lead. But what is still more convincing than all, at the same time that the Party which supported this Bill, rejected the Clause for repealing the Sacramental Test, in Opposition to the King's Desire, they took all possible care to excuse the Clergy from taking those very Oaths which the Bill pretended to establish.

Indeed, the Historian-Bishop, in giving an Abstract of the Debate, has put such Arguments into the Mouths of those he cooperated with, as seem to indicate, that they had nothing in view, but the Establishment and Security of the new Settlement: But, to say nothing of the Arts made use of on such Occasions, before he quits the Subject, he authorises a Suspicion, that he was impos'd upon by them, and in a manner insinuates, that he therefore gave up the Cause (i).

In fine, this Indulgence to the Clergy was the other Part of the Bargain abovemention'd; and it was thought so unreasonable in the Undertakers on that Side, to insist on carrying their own Point, after they had refus'd, to vouchsafe an Equivalent to those on the other, that the Contention between them was carry'd to a higher Pitch than ever. It is true, the severe Bill which the Commons had prepar'd to compel the Clergy to come in, was sent up to the Lords on the eighteenth, and, possibly, help'd to bespeak the Negatives abovementioned: But then the ill Reception given to the King's Speech, serv'd to quicken the Bill: And, in short, when two Parties are thoroughly exasperated against each other, both are so ready to strike, that it becomes hard to pronounce who gave the first Blow. A.D. 1688-9.

It was the twenty-fifth when the Bill was sent down to the Commons; and, as the Lords had soften'd it, under the Pretence of complimenting the King with a discretionary Power, to cause the Tender of the Oaths to be made, to whom, and when he pleas'd) the Clergy were either set free from the Snare, or his Majesty was to incur the Odium of hunting them into it: When, therefore, it was read a second time and committed, which was on the twenty-ninth, the Managers of the former Bill made use of all their Eloquence, and all their Interest to graft upon it, by way of Amendment, the penal Clauses which had been before explan'd away by the Lords, and made a shift to succeed. Upon the 15th of April, the Bill, so amended, was again sent up to the Lords, who, having amended those Amendments to their own Mind, a second time, return'd it to the Commons, who rejected most of them; and, at a Conference, on the twentieth, offer'd their (k) Reasons, which had been drawn up by Sir George Treby, for so doing. On the A.D. 1689.

with secular Interests. That they could not see how it could consist with the Law of God, common Equity, or the Right of any free-born Subject, that any one be punish'd without a Crime: That if it be a Crime not to take the Sacrament according to the Usage of the Church of England, every one ought to be punish'd for it, which no body affirms: And if it be no Crime, those who were capable, and judg'd fit for the King's Service, ought not to be punish'd with a Law of Exclusion, for not doing that which is no Crime to forbear: And lastly, That if it be urg'd still, as an effectual Test, to discover and keep out Papists, the taking of the Sacrament in those Protestant Congregations, where they are Members, and Known, would be at least as effectual to that Purpose.

Oxford, Mordaunt, Lovelace, Montagu, Wharton, Paget."

(i) As he tells the Story, indeed, Posterity would be wholly at a Loss to know in what Channel the Affair ran: He utterly forgets, that there were two Bills; that Mr. Hampden's was dropt by the Lords, who proceeded upon their own; and tho' he mentions Conferences with the Commons, leaves his Readers to explore how they began, and how they ended: Witness the Story itself, which is verbatim as follows:

"That which was long insisted on in the House of Lords was, That instead of the Clause positively enacting that the Clergy should be oblig'd to take the Oaths, the King might be empower'd to tender them, and then the Refusal was to be punish'd according to the Clause as it stood in the Act. It was thought, such a Power would oblige them to their good Behaviour, and be an effectual Restraint upon them: They would be kept quiet at least by it: Whereas, if they came under Deprivation, or the apprehensions of it, that would make them desperate, and set them on to undermine the Government. It was said, that the Clergy, by the Offices of the Church, did solemnly own their Allegiance to God, in the Sight of all their People; that no Oath could lay deeper Engagements on them, than those Acts of religious Worship did: And if they should either put over those Offices, or perform them otherwise than as the Law required, there was a clear Method, pursuant to the Act of Uniformity, to proceed severely against them. It was also said, that in many different Changes of Government, Oaths had not prov'd so effectual a Security as was imagin'd: Distinctions were found out, and Senses were put on Words, by which they were interpreted so as to signify but little, when a Government came to need Strength from them: And it till became those, who had formerly complained of those Impositions, to urge this with so much Vehemence. On the other hand, it was urg'd, That no Man ought to be trusted by a Government, chiefly in so feared a Concern, who would not give Security to it; especially, since the Oath was brought to such low and general Terms. The Expedient that was proposed would put a Hardship upon the King, which was always to be carefully avoided. The Day prefixed [August the 1*st.*] was at the Distance of some Months: So that Men had Time sufficient given them to study the Point: And, if in that time they could not satisfy themselves, as to the Lawfulness of acknowledging the Government, it was not fit that they should continue in the highest Posts of the Church. An Exception of Twelve was proposed, who should be subject to the Law, upon refusing the Oaths, when requir'd to it by the King: but that was rejected: And all the Mitigation that was obtained was, a Power to the King to reserve a third Part of the Profits of any twelve Benefices he should name, to the Incumbents who should be deprived by virtue of this Act: And so it pass'd. It was the chief Manager of the Debate, in favour of the Clergy, both in the House of Lords, and at the Conferences with the Commons. But, seeing it could not be carried, I acquiesced the more easily, BECAUSE, tho' in the Beginning of these Debates I was assured, that those who seem'd resolved not to take the Oaths yet pray'd for the King in their Chapels; yet I found afterwards, this was not true, for they named no King nor Queen: and so it was easy to guess, when they meant by such an indefinite Designation. I also heard many things, that made me conclude they were endeavouring to raise all the Opposition to the Government possible." [Vol. II. p. 9, 10.

(k) Viz. 1. That it has been the Policy of the Common-Law, and Statute Law, to oblige Men to swear Allegiance to the King.

2. Allegiance is the common and necessary Duty of all Subjects, and is most strictly to be required of Archbishops, Bishops, and those who have ecclesiastical Dignities, Benefices, or Promotions, in regard they are highly entrusted in the Administration of the Government, draw great Depen-

A. D. 1689. twenty-second, the Lords insisted on their former Amendments: And at another Conference, which, if the Journals do not lye, was managed by the Lord Nottingham, not the Bishop of Salisbury, deliver'd in their (l) Counter Reasons, which were over-rul'd on the Report by the Commons, without a Division. This produc'd a free Conference, at the Desire of the Latter; who adhering to their Clauses, the Lords, at last, receded from theirs, A. D. 1689.

dencies, and are exemplary to the rest of the People: And several of them are, by Law, to administer the Oath of Allegiance to other Persons.

Allegiance is also strictly to be requir'd of all Governors, Professors and Fellows in Universities, and School-masters, because to them the Education of the Youth of the Kingdom is committed; and therefore, they ought to be known Persons of Loyalty and Affection to the Government.

5. The taking the Oaths publicly in open Court will better manifest Allegiance than the taking them privately before Persons appointed by Order in Council, and will be much more for the Ease of the Persons who are oblig'd to take the Oaths.

6. The best and most certain Means to have the Oaths taken, is to impose it upon Persons concern'd to render themselves to take the said Oaths under Penalties. But, if the Oaths are not to be requir'd, unless tender'd, the said Persons might by Absence, and otherwise, avoid the taking them with Impunity.

7. The Clause which the Commons sent to your Lordships allows much more Favour to the Archbishop, or Bishops, and those that have ecclesiastical Dignities, Benefices, or Promotions, than to any Lay Peers, or other Persons having Offices and Employments, and is more gentle in the Penalty than the Statutes heretofore made in like Case.

8. It is unreasonable and unsafe to distinguish the Archbishops, Bishops, and Persons having ecclesiastical Dignities, Benefices, or Promotions, and such as are entrusted with the Education of Youth, from the rest of the Subjects in the Declaration of their Allegiance, and may tend to make a Division in the Kingdom, and may raise and countenance Factions both in Church and State.

9. It may tend to expose the King's Person and Government to Hatred and Danger, and occasion a general Discontent.

(l) As follow: "In answer to the first and second Reasons alledg'd by the House of Commons, 'tis agreed that the Policy of the Law requires Men to swear Allegiance, and that it is the common and necessary Duty of all Subjects, and especially of the Clergy. But the Lords do not exempt them from taking these Oaths, but only differ with the House of Commons about the Method by which they should be tender'd.

To the third Reason, if the Lords should agree that it is better to tender the Oaths in open Court than privately, yet that is not a sufficient Reason against the tendering them by Persons appointed by the King in Council, because the Officers and Judges of the Court may be so appointed by virtue of the Clause offer'd by the Lords; or if it is not clearly enough express'd, it may be express'd more explicitly.

To the fourth, the Clergy will be requir'd to take the Oaths by both Order in Council as is propos'd by the Lords, and their not appearing when so summon'd, will amount to a Refusal; or if it should not, the Lords would agree to any such Addition as would make it so.

As to the other Reasons, the Clergy and the Members of the Universities are not distinguish'd from the Laity, because upon all Promotions to any Degree of Preferment, they will be, equally with others, oblig'd to take the said Oaths; and even those that are already in such Stations, will be oblig'd to take the Oaths when requir'd by Order in Council; and it seems to conduce more to the Settlement and Safety of the Government, that the King should be empower'd to put the Fidelity of the Clergy to a Trial immediately, than to leave any, who are ill-affected, to such time as to the first of August, to be all that while undermin'd.

The Clergy are oblig'd by the Prayers which they must read in the daily Service, to make such express and solemn Declarations of their Fidelity to the King and Queen by Name, that the putting them to the taking the Oaths is not so necessary to the public Safety, as in other Persons who are not bound to make such frequent Declarations of their Fidelity.

In so critical a time as the present, it is not to be doubted, but upon any Case of apprehending their ill Affections to the Government, the tendering the Oaths by Order in Council, will not only take off all Imputation of Hardships from his Majesty, but justify, and even require a more rigorous way of Proceeding against those that shall give any Cause of Offence.

Since, during Queen Elizabeth's long and glorious Reign, in which she had both the pretended Title to the Queen of Scots, and the deposing Power assum'd by the Pope to apprehend, this was found to be the safest way for the public Quiet; and the ill Effects of leaving the tendering of Oaths to the Queen's Discretion, not having appear'd in all that time of so much Danger, and so many Conspiracies against her Person; the following a Pattern taken from the best Part of our History, seems more suitable to the present time, than the following other Methods; which the Lords think a sufficient Answer to the last Reason given by the House of Commons."

Thirty-six Lords adopted these Reasons, and thirty-two rejected them; among whom were the Lords Mattlesfield and Mordaunt, who enter'd their joint Dissent, for the following Reasons:

1st, Because by the same Reason that any Part of the Subjects might be excused from giving Assurance of their Allegiance and Fidelity, all might, and the Government be left precarious.

2dly, Because the Clergy, and especially the Bishops, receiving their Benefices, Dignities and Preferments from the Public, ought to be the first and forwardest, both by their Doctrine and Example, to teach others their Obligations, to be zealous in preserving the Government as well as Religion establish'd by Law.

3dly, Because the Pretence of Scruple and Tenderness of Conscience could have no other Foundation in the present Case, but the Supposition of some former Obligations: No one ever scrupling to give all manner of Pledges of his Allegiance where he thought it due: Those therefore that scrupled ought the more to be press'd, and the sooner to be brought to the Test, unless any one could think it reasonable that the Government should favour, increase and indulge those that would not give the usual Security that they were not Enemies to it.

4thly, Because, however the King might, that Part of the People who had sworn Allegiance to him could not, have Reason to be satisfy'd, when they saw another Part of the Nation under looser Obligations to the Government than they; nothing being so apt to raise Fears, Jealousies and Disorders in a State, as unnecessary Distinctions, or any Cause of Suspicion of want of Unanimity or Fidelity amongst themselves, in the greatest Concernments of the Kingdom, especially in the Titles of the Crown, and at such time as this, when they were entering into War with a potent Enemy, who openly owned and supported a contrary Title.

5thly, Because it would discourage the Allies, and give them a lower Opinion of our King's Interest in his People, or Authority over them, than was for the Advantage of this Kingdom in particular, or the Protestant Religion through Europe; when they should understand that those who were look'd on to be the Directors of other Mens Consciences, could not bring their own to acknowledge him in the first and fundamental Act of Obedience; and what must they conclude, when they heard the Parliament had dispensed with such an exemplary Part of the Nation in a Business of such Moment?

6thly, Because it might be of ill Consequence, if the Parliament should set any thing like a Mark of Distinction on that sacred Order, by allowing them now a Dispensation from taking a very moderate Oath of Allegiance, when, in a late Reign, were too forward and zealous by Addresses, preaching and promoting new Oaths to carry Loyalty and Obedience to Monarchy, to a Pitch unknown to our ancient Laws, or former Ages.

7thly, Because there being no other Assurance of any one owning himself subject to any Government, but either acting under it, or swearing to it, it was very necessary, that those who forbear to act, should, of all others, be most strictly required to take the Oaths, that the Public might have that Security of their Allegiance from those that refuse the Oaths.

8thly, Because it was unreasonable, that, for a Part of the Clergy, the Nation should be exposed to the Inconveniencies of the Want of Justice, and the Danger of Disorders for want of settling the Militia; the Renewing of all Commissions being delay'd, to the great Prejudice of the Government and the People, till this Act were past; and therefore they did not see why that House should not comply with the Commons in the present Necessity, tho' their Vote should be hard on a Part of the Subjects; whereas the utmost could be pretended in this Case was, only contending for an extraordinary Favour, and an unheard-of Allowance to inconsiderate Men.

9thly, Because it was neither what History could produce, nor any Policy justify, to allow any Part of the People, who claim Protection from the Government, to be excused from giving the common and necessary Assurance of Allegiance and Fidelity to it; and it was hard to think how any one that intended to be faithful to it should come to scruple renouncing the Government, so as to desire to be excused from being under the same Tie with other of their Fellow-Subjects."

A. D. 1689. theirs, under the following Proviſo (which they nevertheleſs acknowledg'd was contrary to the Courſe or Practice of Parliaments) viz. That it ſhould be left to the King to allow any twelve of the Clergy who ſhould refuſe the Oaths preſcrib'd by this Act that he pleas'd to name, one third of the Profits of their Benefices for their Subſiſtence, during his Majeſty's Pleaſure.

In this Interval the Commons had a Bill before them for ſettling the Coronation Oath: King James had made free with it; and it was apprehended other Kings might do the ſame: Care was, therefore, taken by thoſe who manag'd for the Church, after the Words, "Will you, to the utmoſt of your Power, maintain the Laws of God, the true Profeſſion of the Goſpel, and the Proteſtant, reformed Religion," to add, ESTABLISHED BY LAW. This not a little diſconcerted the other Party, and perhaps gave ſome Umbrage to the (m) King himſelf, who was, at that time, deep in the Project of a Comprehenſion, and who could not but foreſee, that theſe Words would throw an additional Obſtacle in his way. When therefore the Bill had been read twice, an engroſs'd Proviſo was offer'd by way of Rider; by which it was to be declar'd and enacted, That no Clauſe in the ſaid Act ſhould be underſtood to bind the Kings and Queens of this Realm, ſo as to prevent their giving their Royal Aſſent to any Bill which ſhould at any time be offer'd by the Lords and Commons in Parliament, for the taking away or altering any Form or Ceremony in the eſtabliſhed Church, ſo as the Doctrines of the ſaid Church, a public Liturgy, and the epiſcopal Government of it be preſerv'd. This gave riſe to a warm and fierce Debate; in the Middle of which, the Lords, by Meſſage, deſiring a preſent Conference on another Bill then depending, for removing Papiſts from London, &c. Advantage was not only taken to comply with the Deſire of the Lords, but to move the Houſe to proceed on the Report of the Managers thereon: This Motion was made by thoſe who had propos'd the Rider, and who, by this time, finding themſelves out-number'd, had a mind to poſtpone the Debate, till they were better prepar'd for the Deciſion: But this their Antagoniſts would not agree to, and the Houſe dividing, it appear'd the Church was ſtrongeſt by (n) twenty Voices. Some more Time was then ſpent in Altercations; but without Effect. The Majority would not even permit the Rider to be read a ſecond time; and on the contrary, purſuing their own Point, while it was in their Power to carry it, diſpatch'd the Bill at once, to the Houſe of Lords.

Proviſo offer'd to the Coronation-Oath-Bill, and rejected.

This was done on the 29th of March: On the ninth of the next Month (April) it receiv'd the (o) Royal Aſſent (together with an Act to naturalize Prince George of Denmark; and another to beſtow the ſame Favour on Mr. Schomberg, Mr. Bentinck, &c.) And on the eleventh the (p) Ceremony itſelf was perform'd in the Abbey after the uſual Forms; the far greater Number of the diſaffected Peers, and among the reſt Dr. Lamplugh, who had been made Archbiſhop of York by King James, for running away from Exeter, on the Prince of Orange's Approach, waving their Scruples, for the ſake of ſeeing the Shew. By a Clauſe in the Coronation-Act, it was left in the King's Breaſt to be crown'd either by an Archbiſhop or Biſhop; and Sancroft perſevering in his Reſolution not to acknowledge a Settlement which he had no hand in making, his Majeſty choſe the Biſhop of London to officiate in his Room.

A. D. 1689.

Prince George naturaliz'd.

The King and Queen crown'd.

It is remarkable, that the Commons, who had given his Majeſty the Crown, were not permitted to aſſiſt in putting it on; the Speaker on the fifth giving the Houſe to underſtand, "That his Majeſty had appointed a Gallery for their Reception in the Abbey, and another in Weſtminſter-hall, and a Dinner to be provided for them in the Court of Exchequer; but that his Majeſty did not think it altogether convenient for the Houſe to bear any Part in the Proceſſion." On the next Day after the Coronation, they had however a Proceſſion of their own; for the whole Houſe, in a full Body, walk'd from Weſtminſter-hall to the Banqueting-houſe, to congratulate their Majeſties on that happy Occaſion, and were moſt graciouſly receiv'd; for as their Orator overflow'd with Prayers and Praiſes, his Majeſty did the ſame with Promiſes and Acknowledgements.

The Commons not permitted to aſſiſt at the Solemnity, but complimented with a Gallery and a Dinner.

To purſue the Current of Buſineſs: The Comprehenſion Project, juſt mention'd, had the faireſt Face of any that ever was produc'd in Parliament, and ſeem'd to bid the faireſt for Succeſs. The People were told it was to put an End to all Diſtinctions among Proteſtants, and conſequently all the Feuds and Broils which thoſe Diſtinctions gave riſe to, by uniting Prelatiſt and Preſbyterian

A.D. 1689. terian in one Opinion, one Form, and one Intereſt. To the Latter this ſeem'd a Matter of Grace and Favour; and the Former affected to come into it with all the Readineſs imaginable: Even ſuch of the Biſhops as forſook their Seats in Parliament to avoid taking the Oaths, recommended it, before they did ſo. The Earl of Nottingham, who brought the Bill into the Houſe of Lords, had the Thanks of the Houſe for ſo doing: When the like Bill was propos'd in the Houſe of Commons, it was receiv'd, Nemine Contradicente: And as to the King, we have ſeen ſufficient Cauſe to conclude, that he was ſincerely diſpos'd to give it all the Aſſiſtance in his Power.

But however cordial his Majeſty's Endeavours ought to be eſteem'd, the two Parties accuſe each other mutually of Inſincerity. It was ſaid on one Side, "The Diſſenters deſir'd no ſuch Favour, if they could but get rid of the Teſt, whereby they hop'd to be put into a Condition of diſputing thoſe Points in another manner." And on the other, [Burnet, vol. ii. p. 11.] "That thoſe who mov'd for the Bill, and afterwards brought it into the Houſe, acted a very diſingenuous Part; for while they ſtudy'd to recommend themſelves by this Show of Moderation, they ſet on their Friends to oppoſe it; and ſuch as were ſincerely and cordially for it, were repreſented as the Enemies of the Church, who intended to ſubvert it." And again, "The Clergy [Burnet, Part ii. p. 38.] began now to ſhew an implacable Hatred to the Nonconformiſts, and ſeem'd to wiſh an Occaſion to renew old Severities againſt them." To ballance which, the Advocates A.D. 16 for the Clergy alledg'd, "That the Nonconformiſt Miniſters (and among the reſt their Mufti Baxter) as ſilent as they were all the Reign of King James, in relation to the Church of Rome, were pleas'd now to waſte their Ink in belpattering the Church of England. So little thought they of an Accommodation, which they render'd yet more deſperate, by ordaining at this very Juncture, near fifty young Students into their Miniſtry, altho' the Point of Ordination was the moſt difficult to be adjuſted of the Matters in diſpute." And yet the Religion they both taught was Self-denial, Humility, Brotherly-Love and Charity. To the Diſgrace of that Religion, indeed, they were Rivals for (q) Power and Dominion: Theſe had an Opportunity to aſpire, which they were reſolv'd to uſe; and Thoſe had Poſſeſſion, and the Laws to protect them in it; which they were reſolv'd never to part with. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Laity labour'd in vain to join them, and that every Attempt of that kind ſhould only make the Breach wider than ever.

As to the Bill itſelf, we are told by the Hiſtorian of his own Times, in the Name of the Earl of Nottingham, that it was the ſame which that Lord had prepar'd for the Houſe of Commons, in the Reign of King Charles the Second, to allay the Heats of both Parties, during the Debates of the Excluſion: But whatever Authority is deriv'd from that Circumſtance, or the Recommendation of the ſucceeding Biſhops, or the Acknowledg-

(q) Agreeable to this plain but true Remark, we find the Caſe ſtated in a Paper called, The Danger of a Comprehenſion; which was ſet forth while the Bill was depending, and of which the Contents are as follow:

"Many Reaſons lead me to oppoſe a Comprehenſion; and the Firſt of them is the very Reaſon I perceive which others have given for it. That it fortifies the Church of England againſt Diſſenters; for ſince our Fear was of Popery, to tranſlate it ſo early againſt Proteſtants of other Communions is to tell them, that having rid ourſelves of Papiſts we are making new Levies againſt them, and that we only haſten while to recruit our Numbers, and when in a Poſture to attack them, they ſhall not fail to feel the Weight of our Power and Comprehenſion. By this means, of very good Friends againſt Popery, we ſhall grow Parties and Enemies; and if this be not to be moſt carefully avoided in our preſent Condition, I am miſtaken both in my Religion and Politics.

II. But ſecondly, What need is there of a Comprehenſion, which carries in it a Variation of the old and ſettled Methods of the Church, only to let in ſo many Men to Church Benefices; for, when all is done, that muſt be the Mark they aim at, that preſs it on the Side of the Preſbyterian, ſince an Act of Indulgence would elſe anſwer that Gentleman as well. And if it were a conſcientious Deſire on the other Side to enlarge the Church, it would become a Duty with her to fling off all the reſt that others ſcruple, upon as good Grounds, and which cannot be ſaid to be eſſential to Faith or Worſhip, and ſo make but one Work of it for this Age. Since Conſcience therefore does not ſeem to be the Ground of this Comprehenſion on either Side, it muſt needs have but an ill Bottom to ſtand upon.

III. We are not, nor cannot be, aſſured, That the Alteration this brings to the Church of England will ſtop here; for more Knowledge or Deluſion prevailing among themſelves or others, will call for the Uſe of the ſame Prudence; and ſo ſhe can never be certain and ſtable, but ſubject to change with the Paſſions and Motions of Opinion or State.

IV. It has ſomething in it of Irreverence and Levity, for two Churches to bargain about Faith and Worſhip, to take or leave, add or diminiſh, and both Parties to ſhew themſelves ſtiff or careleſs about the ſame things, as Humour or Intereſt govern them; which, in Men pretending to Religion, cannot fail to ſcandalize thoſe that are not ſo believing or zealous as they ought to be.

V. I conſider the very differing Temper of the two Parties, whether it flow from Succeſſion of Education given by the Authors or Founders of them, or the Influence of their Principles, or that one has been uſed to Rule and Dominion, and the other to want the firſt and feel the laſt, or from all of them; but 'tis certain, there is a Latitude and an Hoſpitality, a Paſſion and Reverence to Majeſty, almoſt to an implicit Obedience, in the Church of England, and in the Preſbyterian Communion, a Stiffneſs, a Meddling, a Conſcientiouſneſs not ſparing their Superiors; naturally indeed inclined to Kings, but loving them no further than their Pope, to whip them. And it is this Diſpoſition that has ever made that Society troubleſome both to Church and State. Now as Men that are not of a like Temper, live beſt with one another at ſome Diſtance, ſo the Church of England will be leſs perplexed, and the Preſbyterian leſs controuled, in an Act of Indulgence, than in one of Comprehenſion.

VI. If the Comprehenſion be not ſtated upon an Unity of Practice, it can never endure. For look how many different Practices there are, ſo many Parties in a ſhort time there will be; and ſuch a Comprehenſion can only ſerve to break and diſſolve, inſtead of ſtrengthening, the preſent Church. Common Senſe teaches us, That one Enemy within-doors is ſtronger than ten without-doors; and ſuch every Perſon comprehended muſt render himſelf after a while, upon a differing Practice from the Old-ſtanders of the Communion. If I ſaw more Piety and Charity in both Parties than formerly, I would forbid myſelf this Liberty; but when I find Paſſions as ſtrong, and Intereſt as prevalent on each ſide, as ever, I muſt beg their Pardon, if I ſay I cannot think their Notion of a Comprehenſion reaſonable.

Laſtly, No body has ever yet ſucceeded upon this Deſign. It has been endeavour'd by great Men of ſeveral Perſuaſions, at ſeveral times; as Cheſſeter, Cotton, Bradſhaw, Whitlock, Thurloe, Pilkington, Grotius, Salmaſius, Dowzy, and others, as well between Papiſts and Proteſtants, as Lutherans and Calviniſts, but ever to no purpoſe: And though the Moderate ſhould come in, their People would, in all Probability, ſtand to their Share that are left out by this Act of Comprehenſion. Wherefore I conclude, It is an Attempt that ſhews, in ſome Men, more of Fancy than Judgment, and Intereſt than Religion; and that Iron and Clay will as ſoon cement, as an Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery will or can join to conſtitute one national Church in England." [Out of Lord Sommers's Collection, Vol. XXXV. Tract. 17.

D. 1689. ments of the House to the Lords who brought it in, it had not been long committed before many of those Peers, who had so warmly espous'd the Notion, appear'd as averse to the bringing it into Use; and excus'd themselves for so doing, on account of what they call'd the manifest Partiality shewn by certain of the Court-Lords to the Dissenters and their Cause. Even the Author last quoted acknowledges some Progress was made in it.

Burnet's Account of it. "But, continues he, a Proviso was offer'd, that, in Imitation of the Acts passed in King Henry the Eighth and King Edward the Sixth's time, a number of Persons, both of the Clergy and Laity, might be impowered to prepare such a Reformation of things, relating to the Church, as might be offered to King and Parliament, in order to the healing our Divisions, and the correcting what might be amiss or defective in our Constitution. This was pressed with great Earnestness by many of the temporal Lords. I at that time did imagine, that the Clergy would have come into such a Design with Zeal and Unanimity: And I feared this would be looked on by them, as taking the Matter out of their Hands: And for that reason I argued so warmly against this, that it was carry'd by a small Majority to let it fall. But I was convinced soon after, that I had taken wrong Measures; and that the Method propos'd by these Lords, was the only one like to prove effectual: But this did not so recommend me to the Clergy, as to balance the Censure I came under, for moving, in another Proviso of that Bill, that the Subscription, instead of Assent and Consent, should only be to submit with a Promise of Conformity. There was a Proviso likewise in the Bill for dispensing with kneeling at the Sacrament, and being baptized with the Sign of the Cross, to such as, after Conference upon those Heads, should solemnly protest, they were not satisfied as to the Lawfulness of them. That concerning kneeling, occasion'd a vehement Debate; for, the Posture being the chief Exception that the Dissenters had, the giving up this was thought to be the opening a way for them to come into Employments. Yet it was carry'd in the House of Lords; and I declared myself zealous for it; for since it was acknowledg'd, that the Posture was not essential in itself, and that Scruples, how ill grounded soever, were raised upon it, it seem'd reasonable to leave the Matter as indifferent in its Practice, as it was in its Nature." A. D. 1689.

In Deference to the Authority of this great Prelate, it was perhaps necessary to insert his Words; but having done so, it may be more necessary to add, 1. That he has inverted the Order of the Clauses he speaks to; for, according to the Report, that relating to the Posture of receiving the Sacrament, which is allow'd to be so extremely favourable to the Views, as well as the Scruples, of the Dissenters, was debated, before the Proviso for admitting Laymen into the Commission was heard. 2. That, important, as he represents himself in the whole Course of the Proceeding, it was, notwithstanding, carry'd in the Committee, for continuing the old Posture of kneeling: That is to say, they rejected the Clause, which left it as a Matter indifferent to the Communicant: And when it was restor'd by the House on the Question, to agree with the Committee therein, it was because the Numbers on the Division were equal; in which Case, according to an ancient Rule of the House, the Decision was to be in the Negative. And, 3. Tho' his Lordship is pleas'd to ascribe the turning of the Scale in favour of the Clergy, in the Affair of the Commission, to the Warmth of his own Arguments, the Point was (r) carry'd exactly in the same manner with the former. defective.

(r). On which Occasion the following very sensible Protest was enter'd by the Lords Winchester, Mordaunt, and Lovelace:

1*st*, Because the Act itself being, as the Preamble sets forth, design'd for the Peace of the State, the putting the Clergy into the Commission, with a total Exclusion of the Laity, lays this Humiliation on the Laity, as if the Clergy of the Church of England were alone Friends to the Peace of the State, and the Laity less able, or less concerned to provide for it.

2*dly*, Because the Matters to be considered being barely of human Constitution, viz. the Liturgy and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which had their Establishment from the King, Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, assembled in Parliament, there can be no Reason why the Commissioners for altering any thing in the Civil Constitution should consist only of Men of one sort of them, unless it be suppos'd that human Reason is to be quitted in this Affair, and the Inspiration of Spiritual Men to be alone depended on.

3*dly*, Because, tho' upon Remish Principles, the Clergymen have a Title alone to meddle in Matters of Religion, yet with us they cannot, where the Church is acknowledg'd and declar'd to consist of Clergy and Laity; and so those Matters of Religion which fall under human Determination, being properly the Business of the Church, belong equally to both; for in what is of divine Institution, neither Clergy nor Laity can make any Alteration at all.

4*thly*, Because the pretending that Differences and Delays may arise by mixing Lay-men with Ecclesiastics, to the frustrating the Design of the Commission, is vain and out of doors; unless those that make use of this Pretence suppose the Clergy-part of the Church have distinct Interests or Designs from the Lay-part of the same Church; and this will be a Reason, if good, why one or other of them should quit the House for fear of obstructing the Business of it.

5*thly*, Because the Commission being intended for the Satisfaction of Dissenters, it would be convenient that Laymen of different Ranks, may, perhaps of different Opinions too, should be mixed in it, the better to find Expedients for that End, rather than Clergymen alone of our Church, who are generally observ'd to have very much the same way of reasoning and thinking.

6*thly*, Because it is the most ready way to facilitate the passing the Alterations into a Law, that Lay-Lords and Commons should be join'd in the Commission, who may be able to satisfy both Houses of the Reasons upon which they were made, and thereby remove all Fears and Jealousies ill Men may raise against the Clergy, of their endeavouring to keep up, without Grounds, a distinct Interest from that of the Laity, whom they so carefully exclude from being join'd with them in Consultations of common Concernment, that they will not have those have any Part in the Declaration, who must have the greatest in determining.

7*thly*, Because such a restrained Commission lies liable to this great Objection, that it might be made use of to elude repeated Promises and the present general Expectation of Compliance with tender Consciences, when the providing for it is taken out of the ordinary Course of Parliament, to be put into the Hands of those alone, who were latest in admitting any need of it, and who may be thought the more unfit to be the sole Composers of our Differences, when they are looked upon by some as Parties.

8*thly*, Because, after all, this carries a dangerous Supposition with it, as if the Laity were not a Part of the Church, nor had any Power to meddle in Matters of Religion; a Supposition directly opposite to the Constitution both of Church and State, which will make all Alterations utterly impossible, unless the Clergy alone be allow'd to have Power to

A. D. 1689. mer. There was no ſmall Majority; for the Numbers were equal as before.

The Alarm was by this time taken in the Houſe of Commons; and ſo much did the ſuppos'd Danger of the Church weigh with thoſe who had ſeceded, in utter Deſpair of the State, that they crowded again to their Seats, and in Conjunction with thoſe, who, either thro' Principle or Diſappointment, had turn'd their Backs on the new Court, not only made a ſhift to keep the miniſterial Party at bay, but, occaſionally, became Maſters. Thus, while the Comprehenſion-Bill was yet depending in the Houſe of Lords, and before the Commons had appointed a Committee to prepare one of their own, the Bill to reſtore Corporations having been read and committed, they made a Motion, That it be an Inſtruction to the Committee, that none ſhould be admitted to any Place of Magiſtracy, unleſs he had, within a Twelvemonth before, receiv'd the Sacrament, according to the Church of England; and after a ſmart Debate, carry'd it by two Voices, Yeas 116, Noes 114: Encourag'd with which Succeſs, a few Days after, they collected their whole Party together, and, by Surprize it muſt be ſuppos'd, (unleſs there was a flying Squadron, which ſometimes charg'd with one Party, and ſometimes with the other; for the Bill of Oaths which bore ſo hard on the Clergy, was carried thro' afterwards) obtain'd an Addreſs to his Majeſty, ſetting forth, "That they did, with the utmoſt Duty and Affection, render to his Majeſty their moſt humble and hearty Thanks for his gracious Declaration and repeated Aſſurances, that he would maintain the Church of England eſtabliſh'd by Law, which his Majeſty had been pleas'd to recover from the dangerous Conſpiracy that was laid for its Deſtruction, with the Hazard of his Royal Perſon: That the Doctrine and Practice of the Church of England had evinc'd their Loyalty beyond the Contradiction of her moſt malicious Enemies; and that the Misfortunes of former Princes could be attributed to nothing more than their Endeavours to ſubvert and diſable the Members thereof, for contributing to their Support and Defence: That they therefore pray'd his Majeſty to continue his Care for the Preſervation of the ſame, whereby he would effectually eſtabliſh his Throne, by ſecuring the Hearts of his Majeſty's Subjects, within theſe his Realms, who could no way better ſhew their Zeal for his Service, than by a firm Adherence to that Church, whoſe Conſtitution is beſt ſuited to the Support of this Monarchy: That they likewiſe humbly pray'd, that, according to the ancient Uſage and Practice of the Kingdom in time of Parliament, his Majeſty would be graciouſly pleas'd to iſſue forth his Writs for calling a Convocation of the Clergy, to be advis'd in Eccleſiaſtical Matters; and aſſuring his Majeſty, that it was their Intention, forthwith, to proceed to the Conſideration of giving Eaſe to Proteſtant Diſſenters."

A Promiſe added to the Corporation-Bill.

An Addreſs from both Houſes to call a Convocation.

A. D. 1689.

That the ſaid Addreſs might alſo challenge the more Regard from his Majeſty, they ſent it up to the Lords for their Concurrence, which, in ſpite of all Oppoſition, it receiv'd; and thus, under the joint Sanction of both Houſes, it came before the Throne.

It is ſaid, an Affair of this nature was ſo little expected at Court, that the King was unprepar'd with an Anſwer, and did not return any till the next Day: But nothing is more frequent than ſuch Delays, and nothing more reaſonable than that Kings ſhould allow themſelves a proper time to take Advice in Caſes of this critical Nature. The ſaid Anſwer was in Subſtance as follows: "That tho' his Majeſty had many Occaſions of aſſuring them, he would maintain the Church of England as by Law eſtabliſh'd; yet he was well pleas'd with repeating thoſe Promiſes which he was reſolv'd to perform, by ſupporting that Church, whoſe Loyalty, he doubted not, would make him able to anſwer their juſt Expectations: That as his Deſign of coming over was to reſcue them from the Miſeries they labour'd under, ſo it was a great Satisfaction to him, that by the Succeſs God had given him, he was in a Station of defending that Church, which had effectually ſhewn her Zeal againſt Popery, and ſhould be always his peculiar Care: And he hop'd the Eaſe they deſign'd to Diſſenters, would contribute very much to the Eſtabliſhment of the Church; and, therefore, he earneſtly recommended to them, that the Occaſions of Differences, and mutual Animoſities might be remov'd; and, that as ſoon as might be, he would ſummon a Convocation."

His Majeſty's Anſwer

But neither his Majeſty's Recommendations, nor Upbraidings, had any Effect: The Sacramental Teſt they underſtood to be the Occaſion of Difference, which they were ſtill call'd upon to remove, in order to make room for the Admiſſion of Diſſenters into Employments: And they were ſtill as determin'd as ever to keep the Door ſhut againſt them; which, according to Court-Interpretation, was an unreaſonable Stiffneſs, and what juſtly expos'd the Church to the Indignation of thoſe that were uppermoſt. Thus the Lord Privy-Seal, Halifax, diſcourſing with his Friend, Sir John Rereſby, was free enough to ſay, That if the Church was a Sufferer, ſhe might thank herſelf for it; her Pretences being too large. And we find a farther Comment on the Criſis in general, in a ſubſequent Conference between the ſaid Lord and the Biſhop of Saliſbury (Burnet) make Laws in Matters of Religion, ſince what is eſtabliſhed by Law cannot be taken away or changed, but by Conſent of Laymen in Parliament, the Clergy themſelves having no Authority to meddle in this very Caſe, in which the Laity are excluded by this Vote, but what they derive from Laymen.

Winchester, Mordaunt, J. Lovelace.".

Under which the Earl of Stamford wrote as follows:

"I diſſent for this and other Reaſons: Becauſe it is contrary to the three Statutes made in the Reign of Henry VIII. and one in Edward VI. which empowers thirty-two Commiſſioners to alter the canon and eccleſiaſtical Laws, of whereof ſixteen to be of the Laity and ſixteen of the Clergy.

A. D. 1689. (Burnet) the Substance of which is thus given by Sir John, who was also present at it. "The Bishop complain'd heavily of the slow Proceedings of the House of Commons, saying, The Dutch would clap up a Peace with France if they did not mend their pace; observ'd, that the Church of England was in the Fault, and express'd himself, as if he thought they meant a Kindness to King James, by their Method of Procedure. Lord Privy Seal agreed with him in his Sentiments, and added, that the Church-People hated the Dutch, and had rather turn Papists than receive the Presbyterians among them; but that on the other hand these were to the full as rank and inveterate against those, and would mar all their Business, by their Inadvertence with regard to the Bill of Comprehension, and their ill-timing of other Bills; in short, that they would disgust those from whom they looked for Indulgence. They were both angry with the Commons Address to the King the Day before, desiring him to support and defend the Church of England according to his former Declaration, and to call a Convocation of the Clergy, which the Bishop said would be the utter Ruin of the Comprehension Scheme. In fine, the Marquis took notice, that, at the rate we proceeded, the Government could not but be very short-lived."

A. D. 1689.

To close on this perplexed Pursuit thro' the double Maze of two thwarting and interfering Factions, the Comprehension Scheme was indeed ruin'd; and after all this Struggle in their Favour, the Dissenters were forc'd to compound for a bare (s) Toleration, which Ease given to the Dissenters by a Bill of Toleration.

(s) What they aspir'd to was, an Act for Comprehension and Indulgence (or Toleration) jointly; and they reprinted the Draught of such an Act while these Matters were under Debate, which was first set forth in a Book call'd the Samaritan, 1682, and which we are told, was the Result of much Agitation in the House of Commons, so long ago, for the Base of Dissenters; having been put together by Consent of such who best knew their Grievances, and laid by till a proper Crisis should offer for bringing it once more into play.

The said Draught was as follows:

The Bill for Comprehension and Indulgence.

"Whereas the Peace of the State is highly concern'd in the Peace of the Church; therefore, at all times, but especially in this Conjuncture, it is most necessary to be preserv'd. In order therefore to remove Differences, and Dissatisfactions, which may arise among Protestants; Be it enacted, by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That if any Person shall (without making any Interpretation of his own, unless it be such as shall be allow'd by his Diocesan, which if it be Orthodox he shall do) subscribe and declare his Assent, and Consent unto, and Approbation of, the Articles of Religion, mention'd in the Statute made in the 13th Year of the late Queen Elizabeth, except only the 34th, 35th and 36th Articles; and also, except these Words in the 20th Article, viz. The Church hath Power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controversies of Faith; in like manner, as he is already oblig'd to subscribe and declare his Assent and Consent unto, and Approbation of, all the said thirty-nine Articles. Every such Person shall be as capable of taking any Degree, in either University, or being ordained Priest or Deacon, or of being collated, admitted, or put into, and to hold and enjoy any ecclesiastical Benefice, or Promotion, as if the said Person had subscribed and declared his Assent and Consent unto, and Approbation of, all the said Articles of Religion.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That every Person ordained, between the Year of our Lord 1644, and the first of May, in the Year 1660, according to the Form of Ordination, used by laying on of Hands by the Presbytery, shall be as capable of any ecclesiastical Benefice or Promotion, as if he had been ordained, according to the Form of making and ordaining Priests and Deacons in the Church of England. And that every Person ordained only by Presbyters, since the Year of our Lord 1660, shall not be admitted to any Benefice, unless he receive a second Imposition of Hands from some Bishop, to recommend him to the Grace of God, for the Work or Exercise of his Office, in the Place or Charge unto which he is called; and the Bishop shall frame his Words accordingly.

And whereas, by a Statute made in the 13th and 14th Year of his late Majesty's Reign, entitled, An Act for the Uniformity of the Public Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies; and for establishing the Form of ordaining and consecrating Bishops, Priests, and Deacons in the Church of England, there are two Declarations impos'd upon several Persons, and in such manner as is there specify'd.

Be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That no Person, that shall hereafter be presented, or collated, or put into any ecclesiastical Benefice or Promotion, shall declare his unfeigned Assent or Consent to the use of all things contained and prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, nor make and subscribe the other Declaration or Acknowledgment, viz. (I. A. B. do declare, That it is not lawful to take up Arms against the King, &c.) according to the Forms in the said Act, in the 13th, and 14th Year of his Majesty's Reign, directed and appointed: But that both the said Declarations shall be wholly omitted; any thing in the aforesaid Statute to the contrary, notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That no Person shall hereafter be capable of being collated, admitted, or put into any ecclesiastical Benefice, or Promotion, before such time as the said Person shall have taken the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance before the Bishop of the Diocese (who is hereby impower'd to administer the same) and shall also make and subscribe the Declaration mention'd in an Act of Parliament, made in the 30th Year of the Reign of King Charles the Second, entitled, An Act to prevent Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament. And the Name of every Person, so taking the Oath, and making and subscribing the Declaration aforesaid, shall be enrolled, with the Day and Time of his taking the same, in Rolls to be kept by the respective Bishops of each Diocese, for that purpose.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That no Person shall hereafter be oblig'd to take the Oath of Canonical Obedience, or to make the Subscription requir'd by the Canons, or to go to the Bishops for a Licence to preach, being already lawfully ordained; any Statute or Custom to the contrary, notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That from henceforth, no Person wear a Surplice, during the time of reading Common Prayer, or preaching, or performing any Religious Worship, in any Church or Chapel whatsoever; except only in the Chapel of the King's Majesty, and all Cathedral Churches of this Realm of England, and Dominion of Wales.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That from henceforth no Minister, or other ecclesiastical Person, shall be oblig'd or compell'd to use the Sign of the Cross in Baptism; or any Parent oblig'd to have his Children christen'd by the Minister of the Parish, if the said Minister will not use or omit the sign of the Cross, according to the Desire of the Parents, who in that Case may procure some other Minister to do it: Nor shall the Child of any Person be refused Baptism for want of any Godfathers and Godmothers, so long as the Parent is present to fill their place.

And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That no Minister or ecclesiastical Person, that shall officiate in the Administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, shall refuse it to any Person that desires to be admitted to the same, although such Person shall not use the Gesture of kneeling in the Act of receiving, nor come up to the Communion-Table, but shall go to such convenient Place of the Church, where such Person is, and there give it him in some other decent Gesture of ordinary use in the reformed Churches. Nor shall any Minister be troubled for the with-holding his own Act, in delivery of the Sacrament, from any whom he judges notoriously unworthy or unfit for it; nor for suspending his reading the Sentence of Excommunication, against any of his Parish, until he be satisfy'd in the Case, that his Crime deserves it.

And to the Intent, that Uniformity may (so far as it is needful, and so far as it can) be still maintain'd; be it enacted moreover, by the Authority aforesaid, That every Parson, Vicar, and Lecturer, shall conform to the Liturgy of the Church, in the ordinary Lord's-Day-Service, reading the same by himself, or Assistant, as by Law it is established; reserving a necessary and just Liberty for his Conscience in any

A. D. 1689. which they at last obtain'd by the Act for exempting their Majesties Protestant Subjects from the Penalties of certain Laws; and which provided, That none of the said Laws should be construed to extend to any Person or Persons dissenting from the Church of England that should take the Oaths to the present Government, and subscribe the Declaration of 30 Car. II. provided that no Assembly of Persons, so dissenting, should be in any Place for religious Worship, with barr'd or bolted Doors, &c.

"This Bill (says Bishop Burnet) gave the King great Content: He, in his own Opinion, always thought, that Conscience was God's Province, and that it ought not to be imposed on: And his Experience in Holland made him look on Toleration, as one of the wisest Measures of Government: He was much troubled to see so much ill Humour spreading among the Clergy, and by their Means over a great Part of the Nation. He was so true to his Principle herein, that he restrained the Heat of some, who were proposing severe Acts against Papists. He made them apprehend the Advantage, which that would give the French, to alienate all the Papists of Europe from us; who from thence might hope to set on foot a new Catholic League, and make the War a Quarrel of Religion; which might have very bad Effects. Nor could he pretend to protect the Protestants in many Places of Germany, and in Hungary, unless he could cover the Papists in England from all Severities on account of their Religion. This was so carefully infused into many, and so well understood by them, that the Papists have enjoy'd the real Effects of the Toleration, tho' they were not comprehended within the Statute that enacted it."

But the Fruits of his Majesty's Forbearance were not confin'd to the Papists and Dissenters only; on the contrary, he was Politician enough to court all Parties in Turn, on a Presumption, that he should thereby concenter all their Affections in himself.

According to his first Declaration, the wicked Counsellors and wicked Instruments of King James, were the only Persons against whom he made war, and on whom the Weight of his Indignation was to fall. When, therefore, he had dispossess'd that Prince, against whom he profess'd to have no Designs, the Party who had help'd him to break thro' one Half of his Engagements, call'd upon him to fulfil the other; and, making use of the Ascendancy they at first had in the House of Commons, appointed a Committee of Grievances, to prepare the way; who, so early as the fifth of March, made the following Report: A. D. 1689.

"Resolv'd, That it is the Opinion of this Committee, that the Rights of the City of London in the Election of Sheriffs in the Year 1682, were invaded, and that such Invasion was illegal and a Grievance.

2. Resolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That the Judgment given upon the Quo Warranto against the said City, is a Grievance.

3. Resolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That the late Prosecutions of Quo Warranto's against the other Cities, the two Universities, &c. &c. and the Judgments thereon, and the Surrender of the Charters, to the Violation of their antient Rights, are illegal, and Grievances.

4. Resolv'd, That the Commissions and Instructions for regulating Corporations, and putting Tests, in order to electing Members of Parliament, are illegal, and a Grievance.

5. That the promising of Votes to take off the Penal Laws and Tests, is a Violation of the Rights of Parliament, and a Grievance.

6. That the collecting the Customs, and Part of the Excise, between the Death of King Charles II. when those Duties were determin'd, and the Parliament that was call'd afterwards, was illegal, and a Grievance.

7. That the levying Money otherwise than as the Law allows, and the disarming of Protestants, the quartering of Soldiers, and the pressing of Horses and Carriages, contrary to Law, are Grievances.

8. That the House be mov'd to appoint a particular Committee to examine into the Matters aforesaid, and who were the Authors and Advisers thereof."

To all which several Articles, the House agreed, and a Committee was appointed accordingly.

Sir

any Matter or Words, which himself esteems unlawful (and to to him it is Sin) and also for Prudence, in the whole Management, to act with respect to Time, Place, and Circumstances, so as appears most conducive to Edification. And as long as the main Body of the Service appointed is there read, and the Substance of the Offices be there performed, he shall not be punishable for any Breach otherwise of the Acts of Uniformity: any thing in the said Statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.

And forasmuch as there are some Ministers of a good Life, that cannot, according to their Judgments, allow of our Parochial Churches, nor the Book of Liturgy; but do choose to Worship God, and Jesus Christ, in the way of their gathered and separate Congregations, and crave the Protection and Clemency of the King upon their Allegiance as other Subjects,

Be it enacted furthermore, by the Authority aforesaid, That for the Happiness and Quiet of the Realm, and the Reduction of these Men by other Means than those that have hitherto proved unsuccessful, all Prosecutions of the Penal Laws against the Nonconformists, or every sort that profess the Protestant Religion, be suspended, until, by a further Act of Parliament, those that are fit to be tolerated, and the intolerable shall be distinguish'd; and such Order to be taken as is necessary to the settling a firm and lasting Union in the Nation." See a Tract call'd Toleration Explain'd, in which we also find an Historical Account of the said Draught in the following Words:

"Be it known therefore, or remember'd, That there being two Bills in the House of Commons upon the Anvil, in Charles the Second's time; the one of them for Comprehension, the other for Indulgence (the Titles were otherwise worded, but the Intent such). The Bill for Indulgence was so well attended by an Industrious Member of the House, that nothing was wanting to the compleating of it; but the Bill for Comprehension being drawn up by Gentlemen that did not, and could not, fully understand the Scruples of the Nonconformists, was both imperfect and neglected; only one Person without-doors, having procur'd a Copy, and finding it so, did, by applying himself to several Members about it get something to be changed, or put into it, at the Committee; and afterwards, with Consent and Assistance of some of his Brethren, improved and perfect it against the sitting of the Parliament at Oxford; but they sitting not, it was thought good to put it as a Memorial into that Book (the Samaritan), and for that End, as it mention'd.

A. D. 1689. Different Accounts of the Motives for eſtabliſhing this Committee.

Sir Joſeph Tredenham was Chairman of this Committee; and, if there was any Truth in the Pretenſions of the Party who ſet it on foot, the Deſign of it was, firſt, to vindicate his Majeſty's Honour (t). "He had called God to witneſs, ſay they, That he came to execute Juſtice upon thoſe evil Miniſters of the late King, who had ſubverted the Government in order to introduce Popery and Slavery. 2. That the Nation might have the Benefit of the Juſtice ſo ſolemnly promis'd them; ſeeing the Terror of exemplary Puniſhments was likely to be their greateſt Security againſt the like Offenders. And, 3. That the worſt Inſtruments of the two former Reigns might not be in a Capacity to inſinuate themſelves into the King's Councils, and to miſlead him into the ſame Exceſſes, under Pretence of being experienc'd in Government, and zealous by Principle for Monarchy." But Mr. North, who, for Family Reaſons, has contriv'd to ſlide a Scene or two of this Reign into his Examen, is poſitive, that the Scheme was, That the Appointment of the Sheriffs in 1682 ſhould be voted illegal; and the Fines of the Rioters, as alſo the Damages given for the Arreſt of the Lord-Mayor, arbitrary and unjuſt; and that an Enquiry ſhould be made, by whoſe means theſe arbitrary Doings were compaſs'd, in order to make way for a Courſe of Petitions, from the Sufferers, for a Bill, in conſequence of thoſe Petitions, to reimburſe them for their ſaid Fines, Damages, and Charges, out of the Eſtates of the Delinquents.

[P. 622, 623.]

But if it ſhould be allow'd, that in Party-Purſuits the Words Honour, Juſtice and public Good, are rarely made uſe of for any other Purpoſe, than to gild over their Cauſe; and that this little, narrow, dirty Proſpect of gratifying the Malice, and ſerving the Intereſt, of one Set of Men at the Expence of another, was really one Motive of the Enquiry, it was certainly that which weigh'd the leaſt with thoſe who were at the Bottom of it: And it is abundantly more reaſonable to conclude, that they were chiefly directed by the laſt of their own Suggeſtions, above recited; which indicates plainly enough, that they were ſenſible the new King was as fond of Power as the old; that they fear'd he would therefore chuſe to be ſerv'd by thoſe who were the beſt Friends to the Prerogative; and that they found they could no otherwiſe maintain their Poſts, than by the utter Ruin of thoſe who lay in wait to ſupplant them.

Biſhop Burnet is expreſs, that angry Men about this time gave out, That the King intended to make uſe of a Set of Prerogative-men, as ſoon as he legally could: He names the Earls of Monmouth and Warrington upon this Occaſion; and adds, that they were in- A. D. 1689. fuſing Jealouſies of the King into their Party, with as much Induſtry, as the Earl of Nottingham was infuſing Jealouſies into the King of them.

It is certain, that Lord Nottingham's dextrous Hint, That thoſe who had ſcrupled to to make the Prince King would make none to ſerve him on his own Terms, had ſunk deep into his Majeſty: And no ſooner did he become ſenſible, that the entire Confidence of his Makers was at an end, than he grew weary of their Tuition, and labour'd to balance their Aſcendancy in the Houſe of Commons, by making Friends with the contrary Party. He wanted Theſe now to ſecure to him all the Prerogatives of the Crown, as he had wanted Thoſe to put him in poſſeſſion of the Crown itſelf; and made it appear, that, tho' he came profeſſedly to ſcourge paſt Abuſes, and prevent future, he could not bear any one of the Meaſures that was neceſſary for thoſe Ends.

The Prerogative-men had already made Advances to him, under the Umbrage of Lord Nottingham; and, according to Lord Warrington, in his Impartial Enquiry, when they could not prevent the Settlement of the Crown upon him, would have heap'd all Powers upon him confuſedly, without mention of, or regard to, the Kingdom's Rights, or the ancient Form or Contract between King and People, upon Oath: "They boaſted themſelves, continues his Lordſhip, to be the only Men for Monarchy, who always defended the Prerogative": And again, "They made deceitful Offers of their Services at Court, but withal complain'd, that they were diſabled for want of Indemnity: That they were in continual Danger of being proſecuted for their Lives and Eſtates, by Men that would admit of no Moderation: That ſome Members durſt not diſpleaſe the Houſe in arguing for the Crown, as they would be glad to do, while ſuch Rods hung over their Heads: That they endeavour'd to blaſt and ſcandalize the other Party, as Men that would come to no Settlement; that would tear all they had done to pieces, only to gratify their Revenge; and as ſetting up a Faction, and keeping the Nation in a Flame, in order to keep thoſe out of Power who were deſirous, above all things, of demonſtrating their Attachment to his Majeſty's Intereſt and Service: And, finally, That their great Deſign was, to get Poſſeſſion of the Cabinet, in order to be once more Lords of thoſe they had formerly oppreſs'd, and to render the preſent Reign as arbitrary as the laſt."

At the ſame time alſo that theſe Practices were carry'd on within-doors (u), Papers were

A Letter to a Member of Parliament on the Account of ſome preſent Tranſactions.

Honour'd Sir,

"The Experience I have had of your impartial Dealings, encouraged me to make this Addreſs to you; and however aſſuming it may be thought, yet I am ſure 'tis no unſeaſonable Application: How unhappy ſoever the ſeveral late Turns of our Affairs have been, I am ſenſible you have had no Share in them, and therefore when any of thoſe Tranſactions are brought upon the Stage, I dare in every thing appeal to you as an unprejudiced Spectator.

What you have hitherto done, I doubt not is the Effect of a moſt deliberate Conſideration; and tho' ſome Objections are made, yet I hope that evident Neceſſity, which is

A. D. 1689. were distributed without, setting forth the Imprudence and Impolicy, and even the Danger of proceeding to Extremities with a whole Party: And so much Regard did his Majesty affect to pay to these several Remonstrances, that, on the 25th of March, which was the 9th Day after he had made his Speech in favour of the Dissenters, he sent the following Message to the House by Mr. Hampden, viz.

A. D. 1689. Recommends a Bill of general Indemnity.

" WILLIAM R.

His Majesty, out of an earnest Desire to deliver his People from the Guilt, Reproach and Penalties, which many of them may be liable to, and to put an end to all Controversies arising between his Subjects, by reason of any Disorders in the late Times, and to take away all Distinctions, and Occasions of Discord, among them; to the end that they, always able to over-rule Forms, will easily justify the Integrity of your Actions.

Most Men are by this time satisfy'd that Popery and Slavery are vanquish'd, and that nothing is wanting but a healing Cordial to settle the Constitution, after the Strains of a violent Purgation: but in some Men the Humours are so floating, that when one angry Part is relieved, another immediately becomes uneasy; and this Unhappiness of Temper is so afflicting, that there can never be a perfect State of Health, when by all the Lenitives you apply, you cannot make the Pain leave the Man, but only change its Station.

I was in Hopes that our present good Fortune would have made all the Protestants so loving, that Memory of former Injuries could never sower their Good-nature; since Men of all Divisions among them have been unwarily injurious to each other; this should facilitate their Reconciliation, and instead of ripping up old Sores, should rather hide those, which perhaps may appear of a greener Complexion. 'Tis too much like the common Artifice of scolding, to be quick in throwing Calumnies; and 'twas only the Thief that never entered into Paradise, who could upbraid when he himself was in the same Condemnation.

I must confess there are some Dealings that are enough to ferment even the Blood of a Stoic: To hear a Regulator cant against surrendering of Charters; to find a Man accus'd of holding Correspondence with Papists, by one that sat at Meat with the Pope's Nuncio; to see a late Addresser (who in spite of all Laws, would allow of the Dispensing Power) furious for some disputable Customs in particular Corporations: I say, to see Men under these Circumstances prosecuting some few Miscarriages, which are so old, that nothing but Malice could remember, must tempt a Man to believe, that either they have no Sense of their own Faults, or else that they are afraid to be call'd to account, and so by putting others first, would willingly postpone their Punishment.

I am told that Sir John Moor, Sir William Pritchard, and some others, are accused for Mal-Administration in their Offices seven or eight Years since: So stale a Resentment is not worthy of your Consideration; and since their Accusers are so good at recollecting of Crimes, I wonder they had not run back to Original Sin, and prosecuted them for being the Progeny of Adam; this Fault is much more demonstrable; and if Regeneration be an Excuse, they can in the other Case too produce Variety of Pardons.

But when the Matter comes before you, I do not doubt but you will transfer such trivial Grievances to their proper Place, and not suffer private Piques to disturb the Settlement of three Kingdoms. This Business is become the Discourse of the whole Town, and, doubtless, shortly will be that of the Country too; some rejoice at the Gentlemens Misfortune, others, and perhaps the more considerate, are exceeding sorry; such Contrariety of Passions must needs be very clashing, and not fit Ingredients for that happy Union, which his Majesty has graciously designed.

And indeed such unhappy Recollections must needs breed ill Blood; for these Gentlemens Actions for which they are accused, have been countenanced by many, and approv'd of by most; so that the Censures you pass upon them, will vertually reach all the rest, and upon a fair Poll they will be found too numerous to be disobliged.

If several of those Men to whom this Passage may be very pleasing, should, perhaps since the Date of these Miscarriages, be found themselves criminal in a higher Degree, these provoking Accusations may tempt Men to bring on further Complaints, and when you are once beset with Indictments, besides the Loss of your Time, you must either lie under the Censure of being partial, or extend your Animadversions perhaps further than you at first intended.

The great Objection against these Gentlemen is, That what they did, was to serve a Popish Interest: I must confess that I think the Papists have been a long time undermining us, but I believe when these Gentlemen were in Office, they lay deeper under Ground than they have done some time since, when others became the Favourites; and when the Design began visibly to appear, they worthily refus'd their Assistance; so that how foul soever you may fall upon their Mistakes, their Integrity is spotless; and though Excess of Loyalty might induce them to be influenced by the King, 'tis plain they had nothing to do with the Papist.

If these Gentlemen consented to some things which were fatal in their Consequence, 'tis plain that others received what they had done, and improv'd them to greater Inconveniencies. They are accus'd for an undue Choice of two Sheriffs. Others had consented to put upon us four Parliament Men by illegal Elections. Now after a due Consideration of Circumstances, that which appears to be the most dangerous Mistake, ought in Reason to be the Subject of your first Enquiry; and then in common Conviction, which do you think is most to blame, he that unwarily sets a House on Fire, or another who feeds the Flame when he sees it kindled?

Perhaps those Persons who would have you censure these Gentlemen, may think their Crimes to be notorious, and that there is nothing to be found on their own Side but Innocence: Whereas 'tis difficult to imagine, that Men in such great Heats always kept within their due Compass; and if Men of all Sides have been faulty, this unreasonable Prosecution will oblige these Gentlemen to discover for their Defence what they are willing to conceal out of Charity; so that the natural Consequence of this Contest, will be the reviving of old Quarrels, the very Thoughts of which to an honest Man must be but a very uncomfortable Prospect.

To prosecute old Grudges at a time when we have Criminals of so high a nature to encounter, will be both a Scandal to ourselves, and a Comfort to our Enemies; it will shew that Revenge with us is not so much a Passion as a Principle, and that we can at any time let Popery gather Strength, so that we can but humble one another. Indeed these Gentlemens Accusers may think it too early to call to account the late Instruments of our Miseries; and since Crimes are to be punished according to their Antiquity, ten Years hence may be the proper time of their reckoning: But wise and indifferent Men will think that Crimes are to be consider'd, more according to their Bulk than standing; for an old Fault has lost its Malignity, Time has wiped off the Stain, and the Man is become innocent by Prescription; so that to pursue a Man with Anger, after a long Truce and a tacit Reconciliation, is neither just nor generous; 'tis too much like French Faith to fall upon the Allies as soon as the common Enemy is vanquish'd.

Neither can it be for the Interest of their Majesties to have their Subjects picquering one with another; their Affairs are not yet so well settled as to bear the Effects of private Animosities; and if their Enemies may expect Tenderness from the Mildness of their Reign, 'tis a little too preposterous to bring, perhaps, their best Friends immediately into Trouble. You are now upon a noble Project of uniting Protestants, and therefore I hope you will not think that Anger is a convenient Preparative to Love, and that the best Expedient to make them Friends, is to divide them into Factions.

That this will be the probable Consequence of so ungrateful a Review of former Proceedings, seems very evident; for, first, a great Part of the Nation have not so terrible an Idea of the Matter in Question, and then to be severe upon Persons for a moot Fault, will found very harsh, especially when their late worthy Behaviour had sufficiently atton'd for greater Miscarriages; and, secondly, a great many considerable Men of the same, and other Corporations, are in the same Instances culpable; so that if you extend your Punishments only to these Gentlemen, and your Pardon to the rest, yet you involve them too in the same Guilt, which, to a generous Mind is equally afflicting; and tho' you do not punish, yet you will be thought to insult and expose them to the Reproaches of every insolent Reflector.

And therefore I hope for the Safety of the Nation, for the Sake of their Majesties, and the Interest of Religion, you will not countenance every angry Spirit, which by its long Continuance seems to be stiffened into Malice and Revenge; that your glorious Endeavours may not be frustrated by the Remembrance of former Misunderstandings, which I am afraid on all Sides are easier forgot than justify'd: that we may henceforth avoid the Contrivance of the Jesuits, which is always active and working: for he who hath not Strength to conquer, may yet have the Cunning to divide.

March the 14th, 1689. I am, Sir, Your much obliged Servant.

And receives the Thanks of the Houſe, nem. con.

The Reſult of this Meſſage was, an immediate Vote of Thanks; which paſs'd nemine contradicente, and which was afterwards drawn up into the Form of an Addreſs, and ſo preſented to the Throne: One Party joining in it for their own ſakes, and the other in compliment to his Majeſty: Both, indeed, were at this Criſis artfully drawn into a State of Dependance and Expectation; for, while the firſt was amus'd with the Proſpect of a general Indemnity, the laſt was kept in humour with the Hope of a Comprehenſion for the Diſſenting-Paſtors, and of Admiſſion into the Magiſtracy and Government for their Flocks: And when, with a View to interrupt this ſhort Interval of Tranquillity, ſome Perſons mov'd, That a Proviſion ſhould be made for the Princeſs Anne of Denmark; it was without Succeſs: For, inſtead of complying with the Queſtion, it was poſtpon'd till the Conſideration of the Revenue ſhould come before the Houſe: And when the great Court-Point of entering into a War with France came to be diſcuſs'd, which was on the 16th of April, it was reſolv'd, nemine contradicente, (three hundred and fifty Members being preſent) that, in caſe his Majeſty thought fit to engage in the ſaid War, the Houſe would give him all ſuch Aſſiſtance, in a parliamentary Way, as ſhould enable him to ſupport and go thro' with the ſame.

Reſolution to ſupport his Majeſty in a War againſt France.

Certain remarkable Circumſtances relating thereto.

It is obſervable, that, tho' the Houſe reſolv'd itſelf into a general Committee, to conſider of the State of the Kingdom with reſpect to France and our Alliances abroad; that tho' the King, in his Anſwer to the Addreſs of Lives and Fortunes, had requir'd to be enabled to make good the Treaty with the States, and that they would farther ſupport their high and mighty Lordſhips to the utmoſt of their Ability; and that tho' the Hiſtorian of his own Times is pleas'd to ſay, that his Majeſty caus'd all his Alliances, old and new, to be laid before the Parliament; the Houſe had only an Extract of the defenſive Treaty between England and Holland, concluded at Weſtminſter, March 9, 1677-8, laid before them; by which, in caſe of an Attack, the King of Great Britain was oblig'd to furniſh the Republic with 10,000 Men, and the Republic his Majeſty with 6000; and both Parties reciprocally twenty Men of War, well equipped and provided. A.D. 1689.

It is farther obſervable, that while this Clauſe lay yet upon the Table, and it might be reaſonably preſum'd that the Houſe would make it the Ground of their Proceedings, a new Treaty was ſign'd between his (x) Majeſty and the States, by which it is provided, that Great Britain ſhould furniſh fifty Men of War, fifteen Frigates, and eight Fireſhips, and 17,505 Seamen, according to the Eſtimate already mention'd; and Holland but thirty Men of War, nine Frigates, four Fireſhips, and 10,572 Men; for which Alteration, no other Cauſe is aſſign'd in the Preamble of the ſaid Treaty, but the three following, viz. That the King had been requir'd above two Months before to fulfil the former Treaty. 2. That his Majeſty found it to be juſt to execute the ſaid Treaty: And 3. That his Majeſty was willing to give their Lordſhips yet greater Marks of his unfeigned Friendſhip, and deſirous to help them ſo much the ſooner to a good Peace. Now it does not appear that any Mention was ever made in Parliament of this Treaty till the ſecond of July following: And then by way of Anſwer to an Addreſs of the Commons, requiring to be inform'd what Number of Men of War, and of what Force, the States HAD ſet forth, an Extract of this Treaty was given, which ſpecify'd what Number they STOOD ENGAG'D to ſet forth. And to cloſe on this Head, it is equally obſervable, that when the Houſe, at the ſame time, apply'd to his Majeſty by Addreſs, to cauſe an Article to be inſerted in all his Treaties with his Allies for carrying on the War with France, to prohibit all Commerce with that Kingdom, he was pleas'd to anſwer, "That he had already taken care of that Particular in his Treaty with the Dutch." Whereas not the leaſt Hint of any ſuch Clauſe is to be found in the ſaid Treaty, as it ſtands in our Collections: And it was not till the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt next enſuing, that a Convention to that Purpoſe was made between his Majeſty and the States. His Majeſty was indeed as good a Dutchman as ever, tho' no better Republican. When he was on the Point of taking Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Throne, he had communicated the glad Tidings by Letter to his good Friends the States, aſſuring them withal, That his new Dignity, inſtead of diminiſhing his Affection for the Republic, or his Concern for its Preſervation and Proſperity, would enable him to diſcharge his Office of Stadtholder with more Weight and Succeſs than before; and that he would make it the Buſineſs of his Reign to eſtabliſh and maintain a perfect Intelligence between the two States. Poſſibly, there was a ſecret Stipulation, that in caſe he ſucceeded in his Deſigns in England, he ſhould

D. 1689. should forego the Stadtholdership; and possibly it was in this Expectation that the Louvestein-Faction, his antient Enemies, had co-operated in the Expedition with as much Zeal as his own. It is certain, that this Dispatch was no sooner receiv'd in Holland, than his Enemies there, spoke of him with more Bitterness than ever; giving out, (u) "That he had stript the Republic of its Money, Ships, and Troops, not only to make himself Master of England, but to reduce his own Country also to a blind Submission to his Sovereign Will and Pleasure: And hence he lay under a sort of Necessity to expedite the Payment of the Dutch Demands, and even to admit them into a Share of the Profit of his Voyage, to maintain his Credit at home.

Mr. Hampden's Address. To return to the Commons: Mr. Hampden, who had made the first Motion for taking the War into Consideration, was plac'd at the Head of the Committee appointed to draw up the Address, on the Vote of the House. On the nineteenth the said Address was reported, and prov'd one of the most outrageous Invectives that had ever been set forth against a crown'd Head. It began with a Detail of the Mischiefs brought upon Christendom for many Years back, by the French King, together with a Charge against him of aspiring to arbitrary and universal Monarchy; to compass which, 'tis said, he had been guilty of all kinds of Violence and Treachery: Witness his groundless Declaration of War against the States, 1672, and his manifold Infractions of the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle; his Surprize of Strasbourg; his building the Fort of Hunningben; his Invasion of Flanders and Holland since the last Truce of 1684; his attacking the Fort of Philipsburg without any Declaration of War; his wasting the Palatinate, and murdering an infinite Number of People there; his unjust and violent seizing the Principality of Orange; his Treacheries by his Embassadors resident in foreign Courts; his bombarding Genoa, and obliging the Doge to make his Submission to him in Person at Versailles; his Practices against England; his refusing to accede to any just Treaty of Commerce; his corrupt Influence on our Kings, Charles and James; his Enmity to our Parliaments; his seizing on Part of Hudson's Bay; his commencing the War in Ireland; and, above all, his Declaration of War against the Crown of Spain, which was wholly grounded on the Catholic King's Friendship to his Majesty's Person, and his Resolution to favour him; and in which his Majesty was most injuriously term'd, THE USURPER OF ENGLAND: An Insolence never to be enough resented and detested by his Majesty's Subjects, &c.

Recommitted. In short, the Poignances which were so relishing to the Palate of the Court, disgusted the Commons; and the said Address being recommitted, the following more temperate one was presented by Sir Henry Goodrick, and agreed to, on the 24th, viz. A. D. 1689. and another more temperate one received.

"We your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful Subjects, the Commons, &c. most humbly lay before your Majesty our earnest Desire, that your Majesty will be pleased to take into your serious Consideration the destructive Methods taken of late Years by the French King against the Trade, Quiet, and Interest of this your Kingdom, and particularly the present Invasion of the Kingdom of Ireland, and supporting your Majesty's rebellious Subjects there; not doubting in the least, but that through your Majesty's Wisdom, the Alliances already made, with such as may hereafter be concluded on this Occasion by your Majesty, may be effectual to reduce the French King to such a Condition, that it may not be in his Power hereafter to violate the Peace of Christendom, nor prejudice the Trade and Prosperity of this your Majesty's Kingdom.

To this End we most humbly beseech your Majesty to rest assur'd upon this our solemn and hearty Promise and Engagement, That when your Majesty shall think fit to enter into a War against the French King, we will give your Majesty such Assistance, &c." according to the Words of the Vote.

"W. R.

The King's Answer. I receive this Address as a Mark of the Confidence you have in me; which I take very kindly, and shall endeavour by all my Actions to confirm you in it: I assure you that my Ambition shall never be any Argument to incline me to engage in a War, that may expose the Nation either to Danger or Expence. But, in the present Case, I look upon the War to be so much already declar'd by France against England, that it is not so properly an Act of Choice, as an inevitable Necessity in our Defence.

I shall only tell you, that as I have ventur'd myself, and all that is dear to me, to secure this Nation from what it suffer'd, I am ready still to do the same, in order to the preserving it from all its Enemies; and as I cannot doubt of such Assistance from you, as shall be suitable to your Advice to me to declare War against a powerful Enemy, so you may rely upon me, that no Part of that which you shall give for the carrying it on with Success, shall be diverted by me to any other Use."

Thus the splendid Notions, which the Bearer of this Message had, some time before, suggested in one of his Speeches, to dazzle the Public, were tacitly given up by the King; and, instead of chusing to put so great an Adventure, as the entering into a War with France, on the Foot of making new Conquests, or recovering the Provinces we had lost, his Majesty chose to state it as a de-

(u) Neuville, from whom this Passage is taken, would have us believe, that he sent back the Dutch Troops as soon as he was made King; and that they arriv'd in the Dutch Ports while these Murmurs were yet circulating: But, tho' this was true of their Ships and some of their Troops, it was not true of all; for the greatest Part of them continued here long after.

A. D. 1689. a defensive War, and to apologise for the Inconveniences it was like to produce, even tho' he would have it thought, that those Inconveniencies were unavoidable.

And now we are on the Point of embarking in the Troubles of the Continent, it is fit to look round and take a slight Survey of the Prospect.

Towards the Close of the preceding Reign, we left the French laying waste the Electorates of Palatine, Mentz and Triers, and insisting on the Admission of the Cardinal of Fierstemburg into that of Cologne, as the only Expedient of Peace. In the Beginning of This, Mention was made of their declaring War against the States, for taking Part with the Emperor against the said Cardinal, and in Support of the Prince of Bavaria. We have recently heard of their doing the same against Spain [April the 15th, N. S.]: And, as if all this was not Business enough, of their furnishing King James with Ships, Men, and Money to complete the Reduction of Ireland.

Declaration of the Empire against France. We are now to observe, on the other hand, that, the Princes of Germany being convinc'd, that they were at last likely to have their Quarrel supported by the whole Strength and Wealth of England, the Dyet solemnly call'd upon the Emperor, to make Peace with the Turks, (who had already offer'd, by their Embassadors, to give up all the Towns which had been reduc'd by the Imperial Forces in the Course of the War, as a Consideration for it) and to enter the Lists against France; resolving, in such case, to second his Imperial Majesty in the most effectual manner, on the behalf of the whole Empire; and to declare the said Crown together with it's Adherents and Favourers, Enemies of the holy Roman Empire, (FOR that they had, by innumerable Contraventions and Infractions of the Treaties of Munster, Osnabrug, Nimeguen, and the Truce, as well in ecclesiastical as temporal Affairs, and by their Invasion of the Empire, without any just Cause, and by committing all sort of (x) Hostilities, in a most unchristian Manner, forfeited the Right and Benefit accruing to them by the said Treaties, and made themselves Enemies of the Empire:) And that this War should be deemed, and look'd upon, and publish'd, as a common War of the Empire against them.

Of the States. This Resolution was taken February the 2d, N. S; and, on the 12th of March following, the States-General also set forth their Defiance against the common Enemy, in effect, for the following Reasons, viz. 1. That his most Christian Majesty had committed manifold Infractions on the Treaty of Commerce between the two Powers; and had slighted, with the utmost Contempt, all the Instances made by the States on occasion thereof. 2. That the said King had involved the Subjects of the Republic in the terrible Persecution which he had rais'd against those of the reformed Religion. 3. That the said King had farther shew'd his ill Designs against this State, by the continual Motion of his Troops towards their Frontiers, thereby to oblige them to make extraordinary Preparations by Land and Sea, to the exhausting of their Revenues. 4. That he had sometimes, with fair Words and solemn Assurances, and even by Overtures of an Alliance, endeavour'd to amuse them; but that, whenever they went about to provide for their own Security, and the farther strengthening of the Treaty of Nimeguen, by making defensive Alliances with any of the Princes their Neighbours, he had always oppos'd them, and even threaten'd them with a War on account thereof. And, lastly, That the said King had, in full Peace, caus'd the Ships, Goods, and Persons of the Subjects of the State, who were residing in France upon the public Faith of the Treaties, to be seized, and the Masters and Seamen of the said Ships to be imprisoned, and most barbarously treated, to force them to change their Religion; and the said Ships, Goods, and Effects, to be sold; altho' it is expressly stipulated by the Treaty of Commerce, that, in case of a War, the Subjects on both Sides shall be allow'd six Months time to retire with their Goods, or otherwise to sell or dispose of them: Which was follow'd with the plundering and burning of divers Villages within the Territories of this State; and afterwards with a Declaration of War, for which no other Reason was given, than that the States had made extraordinary Preparations by Land and Sea; altho' they had assured the said King, that they were only intended for their own necessary Defence, and that they would not concern themselves with the Election of Cologne.

A. D. 1689.

Of the Elector of Brandenburgh. On the 13th of April, the Elector of Brandenburgh, who of all the Princes of Europe was the most closely united with King William, declar'd himself oblig'd to make use of the Power which God and Nature had put into his Hands, and to take up Arms in defence of his Subjects, and for opposing the perfidious and cruel Attempts of France; which were such, as had never before been heard of among Christians.

May the 3d, the Marquis de Castanaga, of Spain. Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, set forth a Counter-Declaration to that of France, in the Name of the King his Master. His most Christian Majesty had charg'd his Catholic Brother, with entering into Alliances that were scandalous in themselves, and injurious to their Holy Mother the Church: The Marquis on the contrary alledg'd, That those Alliances had no other Aim or End than the Security and Repose of Christendom, and the reciprocal Interest of the Powers concern'd in them; while France not only laid waste the Empire, without the least Regard to (x) Among which, particular Mention is made of the disturbing their Imperial Chamber of Justice at Spire, and carrying away the public Records, and Money deposited there.

A. D. 1689. to the Obligations of Religion and Humanity, the Laws of War, or the sacred Ties of solemn Treaties, but of the most shocking Oppressions and Cruelties; and, withal, of intriguing with the Turks themselves, to continue the War in Hungary, with the whole Force of the Ottoman Empire.

An Alliance offensive and defensive between the Emperor and States-general.

All this while, an Alliance offensive and defensive was negociating at Vienna between the Emperor and the States-general; by which it was provided, That they should co-operate with all their Forces against France and its Allies; that they should never engage in a separate Treaty with that Crown, under any Pretence whatsoever; that no Peace should be admitted, till those of Westphalia, Osnabrug, Munster, and the Pyrenees, had been vindicated: That, in case any Negociation of Peace or Truce should be enter'd into, by common Consent, the Transactions on both Sides should be communicated bona fide: That the Crown of Spain should be invited to accede to this Treaty by his Imperial Majesty, and the Crown of England by the States-general, &c. There was also a separate Article, in which it was agreed, that, in case the King of Spain dy'd without Issue, the States-general should assist the Emperor, with all their Forces, to take possession of the Spanish Monarchy, and to use their friendly Endeavours with the Electors their Allies, that his eldest Son Joseph should be speedily chosen King of the Romans; and their utmost Force, if France should by Threats or Arms oppose it.

King William declares War against France.

This was sign'd on the 12th of May N. S. and on the 17th, or 7th O. S. England enter'd also into the Lists against the common Enemy of the Christian World, as we find him call'd on that Occasion, on the following Grounds, viz. 1. For the Welfare of the People; which could never be effectually secur'd, but by preventing the Miseries which threaten'd them from abroad. 2. In resentment of the unjust Methods taken by the French King to gratify his Ambition, by invading the Territories of the Emperor, and declaring War against the Allies of England, without any Provocation receiv'd, and in manifest Violation of the Treaties confirm'd by the Guaranty of the English Crown. 3. The many Injuries done by him to his Majesty and his Subjects, without any Reparation; such as the Encroachments made on the Newfoundland Fishery [where, till of late, the French never us'd to fish, without Licences from the English Governor of that Province; for which they paid Tribute, in acknowledgment of the sole Right of the Crown of England to that Island]; the invading the Caribbee Islands; the taking forcible Possession of his Majesty's Territories of the Province of New York, and of Hudson's Bay; the countenancing the Seizure of English Ships by French Privateers, the forbidding the Importation of a great Part of the Manufactures of England, and imposing exorbitant Customs on the rest; the disputing, by his Orders, the Right of the Flag, in violation of his Majesty's Sovereignty of the narrow Seas; the unchristian Prosecution of many English Subjects for Matters of Religion, contrary to the Law of Nations, and express Treaties; " and lastly, (to use the very Words of the (*) Declaration) as he (the French King) has, for some Years last past, endeavour'd, by Insinuations and Promises of Assistance, [not by express Treaty, it seems,] to overthrow the Government of England; so now, by open and violent Methods, and the actual Invasion of our Kingdom of Ireland, in support of our Subjects in Arms, and in Rebellion against us, he is promoting the utter Extirpation of our good and loyal Subjects in that our Kingdom."

A. D. 1689.

Reflections thereon.

Thus, from being the Preserver of Holland and the Deliverer of England, we find his Majesty aspiring to be the Avenger of Europe: Many of the Causes here alledg'd had no immediate Relation to England; many more had taken place under the Reign of King James, and, as far as appears, had never been complain'd of by him; and whatever might be said of the Perfidies of the French with respect to Spain, and of their Cruelties with respect to Germany, it was, at least, as lawful for them to act as Auxiliaries to that unfortunate Prince, as for the States to lend their Forces to his Highness of Orange: The most Christian King was moreover under all the Ties that could either oblige a Man or a Prince to receive him into his Protection, and to espouse his Cause: For, if his Bigotry to the Superstitions of the Romish Church was the great Mark at which all the Batteries of his Enemies seem'd to be levell'd, his Attachment to the Court of France was the real Cause of his Ruin; as we find it in effect (a) acknowledg'd under the Emperor's own Hand, in answer to a Letter of the King's, requesting his Imperial Majesty's Aid to re-instate him in his Throne: And, in point of Policy, France could no way so effectually deprive the Confederacy against her, of the powerful Assistance of England, as by causing a Diversion in Ireland: But a War with France was a favourite Measure, both within-doors and without; and we are easily induc'd to swallow what is palatable: The People had then no Notion of the Difficulty, Danger, and Cost of the Experiment; and had been artfully work'd into an Impatience to make it: The two Nations were ancient, hereditary Enemies; and of course look'd with Malignity on each other's Acquisitions: We were too rich and too happy in their Eyes; they too great and too successful in ours. Thus, mutual Malevolence answer'd the End of mutual Provocations; and, with or without a Cause, they were ready for a Quarrel on both Sides: The Stories which were told of their growing Greatness, to frighten us into a Rupture by way of Precaution, had their Effect,

(*) Which we are told, was drawn up by Mr. Solicitor-General Somers.

(a) In Words to this effect: That if his Majesty had put a stop, by Force, or by his Authority, to the many Infractions of the Treaty of Nimeguen, his Subjects would have been satisfy'd, and the Peace of his Kingdoms preserved.

A. D. 1689. Effect, 'tis true; but, on the Principle they were founded, they excited Anger rather than Fear: They alarm'd our Pride, they rous'd our Emulation, and produc'd such a Disposition, that, for the sake of ruining them, we did not care if we ruin'd ourselves.

The Reduction of Ireland should have been the great national Object at this Crisis, and as such had been over and over again recommended to his Majesty's Consideration, tho' without Success. When the ill Effects of consiling in Hamilton's Negociations with Tyrconnel appear'd, a Declaration was set forth, requiring all the Irish to lay down their Arms, and submit to the new Government, by a certain Day in April. This bears Date February 22, and on the 27th his Majesty put thirty Ships into Commission for the Irish Service, and gave the Command of them to Admiral Herbert; but such were either the Perplexities of the Cabinet, or so much greater was the Regard paid to the Affairs of the Continent, that the Admiral was not in a Condition to sail, with a Part of his Fleet only, till the Beginning of April following.

King James's Expedition to Ireland.

But the French, in the mean while, were as diligent as we were remiss, tho' Bishop Burnet affirms the contrary; their Fleet was ready to put to Sea by the latter End of Febr. N. S. consisting of fourteen Men of War, seven Frigates, and three Firethips, besides Transports, &c. King James himself set out from St. Germains on the last Day of that Month, arriv'd at Brest the fifth of March, and on the seventh embark'd in order to set sail, but was detain'd in Port by contrary Winds, and a vain Fear of the English and Dutch Fleets, till the 17th, and met with so unfavourable a Passage, that he did not land at Kinsale till the 22d.

As to the Strength he brought with him, A. D. 1689. there are various Accounts of it: Sir John Reresby, it may be presum'd, speaks extravagantly of it, when he says, That besides the Fleet, before-mention'd, the French King assisted King James with a Sum of 200,000*l.* in ready Money, and 50000 Pistoles as a Present for his Pocket, together with Plate, Tents, and a most royal and splendid Equipage, as also with eight experienced Field Officers, one hundred of inferior Note, a Guard of one hundred Swiss, a Band of skilful Pioneers, 15,000 of his own natural Subjects, Arms for 40,000 more, Cannon and Ammunition in great Abundance: And that, over and above all this, he made him an Offer of 15,000 French, which the King refus'd, saying, He would succeed by the Help of his own Subjects, or perish in the Attempt. Sir John had, before, talk'd of 5000 Swiss Protestants, though he overlooks them now: And Bishop Burnet asserts, That, notwithstanding the (b) Opposition of Mr. de Louvois to all his Measures, he got about 5000 Frenchmen to be sent over with him: But, according to other Authors, though his Officers were of that Nation, the Soldiers that accompany'd him were British, and did not exceed fifteen hundred in all: And, according to a very circumstantial Journal of King James's Expedition, which pass'd the Licence Office March 22, we are to believe he had but twelve hundred, with Arms for as many more, and about four hundred thousand Crowns in Money.

A certain anonymous Writer has been so cruel as to suggest, That, in Consideration of this slender Aid, King James oblig'd himself by (c) Treaty, to make over the Kingdom of Ireland to his most Christian Majesty, after his full Restoration to those of England

Falsly accus'd of having made over that Kingdom to France by Treaty.

(b) Which Opposition is thus accounted for by his Lordship:

"The French Ministry was at this time much divided. Louvois had the greatest Credit, and was very successful in all his Counsels: So that he was most consider'd. But Seignelay was believ'd to have more personal Favour, and to be more entirely united to Madam Maintenon. These two were in a high Competition for Favour, and hated one another. Seignelay had the Marine, to the other had the Army for his Province. So King James, having the most Dependance on the Marine, and looking on the Secretary for that Post as the most powerful Favourite, made his chief Application to him; which set Louvois to cross and retard every thing that was propos'd for his Service. So that Matters for him went on slowly, and very defectively. There was another Circumstance in King James's Affairs, that did him much Hurt. Lauzun, whose Adventures will be found in the French History, had come over to King James, and offer'd him his Service, and had attended on the Queen, when she went over to France. He had obtain'd a Promise of King James, that he should have the Command of such Forces as the King of France would affist him with. Louvois hated Lauzun; nor did the King of France like to employ him: So Louvois sent to King James, desiring him to ask of the King of France, Soubeyras, a Son of his, whom he was breeding to serve in War, to command the French Troops. But King James had so engaged himself to Lauzun, that he thought he could not in honour depart from it. And ever after that, we were told, that Louvois study'd, by all the Ways he could think of, to disparage him, and all the Propositions he made."

(c) In the following Words:

"Before King James went for Ireland, the French King oblig'd him to enter into a Treaty; an Extract of which I saw in Manuscript, as it was given to a Gentleman by a Person of Quality, who had it from an Acquaintance of his, that came from the Court of St. Germains, and told him 'was communicated to him by a Relation of the Marquis de Louvois, who found it among the Marquis's Papers. Whether it was only a rough Draught of an intended Treaty, or a Copy of a Treaty actually concluded, I shall not pretend to decide; but leave the Reader to judge of the Genuineness of it, by the Actions of King James and his Accomplices, before and after he was King.

The Articles of the private Treaty, between the French King and the late King James: upon the latter's going to Ireland, in the Year 1688-9.

Imprimis, King James, in consideration of the Assistance given and to be given him, by his most Christian Majesty, conformable to Articles made by that King on his Part, for the Recovery of his Britannic Majesty's Dominions; has agreed, as soon as he shall be restor'd, and fully resettled in his Kingdoms, and not before, that he may not give any Umbrage to the English Nation, to quit all Manner of Claim to the Title or Arms of France, and take effectual Care to put the same out of the Royal Escutcheon of England.

II. That he shall resign and quit the Sovereignty of the narrow Seas to his most Christian Majesty; and to that Purpose shall give Orders to Ships of War to strike to the French Flag.

III. That he shall be oblig'd to assist his most Christian Majesty with thirty capital Ships of War, and twenty thousand Land-men, in any War he shall be engaged in, and this shall be at his own proper Cost and Charge.

IV. That he shall make or enter into no Alliance against France; nor, with any other Prince or State, without the Privity or Consent of his most Christian Majesty; but faithfully observe a perpetual League, offensive and defensive, with the Crown of France.

V. That he shall admit into his standing Forces, whose Number and Strength shall from time to time be regulated and limited by him, in concert with his most Christian Majesty, a constant Body of ten thousand French, and five thousand Catholic Switzers, more or less, in proportion to the Troops of his own Subjects: And shall deliver up Dover Castle, Plymouth and Portsmouth, to be garrison'd by French Soldiers, as cautionary Towns, for the Security of the Performance of this Treaty.

VI.

A. D. 1689. England and Scotland, and to submit to a Variety of other scandalous Impositions, which cannot be read without Indignation: And a (d) Cotemporary of our own has been rash enough to give this wicked and improbable Fiction more Countenance than it deserves. Mr. de Avaux, so often mention'd, did, indeed, accompany the King to Ireland, in quality of Embassador Extraordinary from the most Christian King, and together with the Junto of French Officers, was allow'd a far greater Ascendancy in his Counsels, than was consistent either with his Honour or his Interest. But this arose from the Necessity of that King's Affairs, and was the natural Consequence of his Dependence on France. He that was before a Brother, was now a Master; and what was call'd his Opinion or Advice, was, in Effect, a Law.

The principal Persons that attended him, besides Mr. d'Avaux, were the Duke of Berwick, and Mr. Fitz James, Grand Prior; the Duke of Powis; the Earls of Dover, Melfort, Abercorn, and Seaforth; the Lords Henry and Thomas Howard; the Lords Drummond, Dungan, Trendraught, Buchan, Hunsdon, and Brittas; the Bishops of Chester, and Galway; the late Lord Chief Justice Herbert; the Marquis d'Estrades; Mr. de Rozen, Mareschal de Camp; the Lieutenant Generals Maxwo, Pusignan, and Lori; Pountee, Engineer-General; the Marquis d'Albeville; Sir John Sparrow, Sir Roger Strickland, Sir William Jennings, Sir Henry Bond, Sir Charles Carney, Sir Edward Vaudrey, Sir Charles Murray, Sir Robert Parker, Sir Alphonso Mosolo, Sir Samuel Foxon, and Sir William Wallis; the Colonels Porter, Sarsfield, Anthony and John Hamilton, Simon and Henry Lutterel, Ramsey, Dorrington, Sutherland, Clifford, Parker, Purcel, Cannon, and Fielding; the Lieutenant-Colonels Skelton, Hunsdate, Byrne, Scot, Trapps, and Leonard; the Majors Arthur, Gordon, Ennis, Douglas, Connock, Fountain, Regan, Frayne, O'Bogherne, Ingram, Pendergast, Gifford, Bourk, Dempsey, Cunningham, and Hillersden.

With regard to the State of Ireland, at the King's landing, it was almost as favourable to him, as he could have wish'd; the Coast was wholly open; not an English or Dutch Man of War was station'd upon it: His Lieutenant Tyrconnel was more absolutely Master than ever: He had caus'd all the Protestants in all the Provinces and Towns which profess'd Obedience to him, to be disarm'd in one Day: He had form'd an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse, which were enough to have swallow'd up those in the North who had taken to Arms, and declar'd for the new Government; and his Majesty's Reception at Kinsale, at Cork, and yet more remarkably at Dublin, was such, as seem'd to argue, that the Lives and Fortunes of the People in general were at his Devotion. A. D. 1689.

He made his Entrance into Dublin, March the 16th, O. S. and, if we are rightly inform'd, was met at the Castle Gate by a whole Train of Popish Bishops and Priests in their Pontificals, bearing the Host, which, as if he was more infatuated than ever, he publicly ador'd. After which he assisted at a solemn Te Deum, and not only manifested on all Occasions, as usual, an extravagant Zeal for the Popish Religion, but a settled Purpose to make it the chief, if not the sole, Religion of his Government. In the first Council he held, he dismiss'd the Lord Grenard, and Judge Keating, who had advis'd the Lord Lieutenant to an Accommodation with the new Government, and other Protestants from the Board, to make Room for Mr. d'Avaux, the Bishop of Chester, and Colonel Dorrington; to whom were, by Degrees, added, the Dukes of Powis, and Berwick, the Earls of Abercorn, Melfort, Dover, Carlingford, and Clanrickard, Lord Tho. Howard, and the Lords Kilmallock, Merrion, Kenmure, and Clare, Lord Chief Justice Herbert, Marquis d'Albeville, and Colonel Sarsfield: And when the Bishop of Meath, at the Head of the Protestant Clergy, implor'd his Royal Protection, and Leave to lay before him their just Complaints of the Injuries they receiv'd, his Answer was, "I will protect all Men in their Religion and Properties; and as for the Wrongs that have lately been suffer'd by several, it is impossible, in these Times of Commotion, but such will Makes his Entrance into Dublin, and is attended by French and Popish Councils only.

VI. That he shall permit his most Christian Majesty, at all Times, and upon all Occasions, the free Use of his Ports, for the Retreat of his Ships; and shall supply him with able Workmen, to repair or build Ships, as he shall require it.

VII. That in regard of the Situation of the Irish Ports, and their Conveniency for the French Fleets; as also in consideration of the Agreement of the Irish with the People of France in Religion, he shall, after his full Restoration to the Kingdoms of England and Scotland, be oblig'd to assign Ireland over to his most Christian Majesty; in compensation of all the Money he has already expended, or shall further expend, in recovering the said Kingdoms of England and Scotland. And because of the Situation of the Islands of Sicily and Sardinia, in the Mediterranean Sea, for the Commerce of the English Navigation and Trade into the Levant; his most Christian Majesty obliges himself to conquer those Kingdoms for his Britannic Majesty, at his own proper Expence, and with his own Troops; and to give them up entirely, in lieu of the said Kingdom of Ireland.

VIII. That, towards the further[ing] a stricter Friendship and Alliance between the two Nations of France and England, and for perpetuating a mutual and sincere Correspondence, (in case of a violent or natural Death of either the Prince of Orange or Prince of Denmark) one or both of the Princesses Royal shall become Widows, and that their Persons shall be seiz'd: That then they shall be convey'd, with all Expedition and Secrecy, into France, and put into the Power of his most Christian Majesty, to be marry'd to such a Prince, or Princes, as he shall think fit.

IX. That the eldest or surviving Issue of such Marriage shall succeed to the Crown of Scotland; to which, in such Case, his most Christian Majesty shall assert Ireland; and England, and the American Dominions, remain to the Prince of Wales.

Additional Articles.

That all landed Men in Ireland, of the Protestant Religion, shall be oblig'd to turn Catholics, or sell their Estates, at a set Price, to the Irish Catholics, or others, as his most Christian Majesty shall appoint.

All Protestants shall have Leave to depart freely, with their Effects.

Lastly, All such Protestants as will stay shall have Liberty of Conscience for the Space of twenty Years, till the Kingdom is better peopled with French, and other, Catholics." [Memoirs of Ireland.

(d) "This Treaty appear'd so improbable, that the Reality of it was doubted by many: But it must be own'd, that King James's Conduct in Ireland confirm'd the Suspicions of others, that he had actually enter'd into such an Engagement." [Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, p. 80.

A.D. 1689. will happen: But I ſhall, as far as I can, prevent and redreſs them. However, if I am invaded in this Kingdom, as I have been in England, I muſt ſecure myſelf as well as I can." It is obſerv'd, that theſe Men had all the Merit of Paſſive Obedience to plead, as having continu'd irreproachably loyal, under the moſt ſenſible Provocations: And, it muſt be acknowledg'd, that ſuch a Reception, after ſuch Uſage, was enough to bring the Doctrine into Diſgrace for ever. This was beſides ſo much the more remarkable, becauſe he gave the moſt favourable Ear to the Remonſtrances of the Popiſh Biſhops (which were alſo enforc'd by Mr. D'Avaux at his firſt public Audience) in favour of his Catholic Subjects, and againſt the Oppreſſions of the Engliſh: And becauſe that of five Proclamations which were iſſu'd the ſecond Day after he came to Dublin, all the Subjects of Ireland who had lately abandon'd that Kingdom, were requir'd by the firſt to return home, under Aſſurance of Protection, and on pain of Outlawry, and Confiſcation; and all, of what Degree or Perſuaſion ſoever, were farther requir'd to join with him againſt the Prince of Orange. In ſhort, he ſeem'd to act in all things, as a Prieſt ſhould act, with an almoſt total Diſregard to his temporal Intereſt; for how much ſoever this Partiality might contribute to the Eaſe of his Affairs in Ireland, it could not but ſerve to ruin all Hopes of his Return to England, where the Catholics had gain'd no Ground, notwithſtanding the freſh Broil which had broke out between the Churchmen and Preſbyterians. As to the four other Proclamations, the ſecond was full of Acknowledgments to the Roman Catholics, for having, with ſuch Vigilance and Chearfulneſs put themſelves in Arms; but withal requir'd ſuch as were not in actual Pay, and under regular Command, not to ſurrender their Arms, but to lay them up in their ſeveral Abodes; becauſe it was acknowledg'd, that even this meritorious arming, had given riſe to ſeveral Robberies. By a third, the Country was invited to ſupply his Army in the North with Proviſions; and the Soldiery were forbid to take any from them without Payment for the ſame. By the fourth, the value of the ſeveral Coins at that time current in Ireland, was rais'd after the Rate of 10*d*; in twenty-one Shillings; no doubt, that the French Aids might go the farther. And by the fifth, a Parliament was ſummon'd to meet his Majeſty at Dublin on the ſeventh of May, for regulating Matters Eccleſiaſtical, &c.

Biſhop Burnet pronounces, That the Iriſh were as inſolent as they were undiſciplin'd; and leaves us to conclude, that this Inſolence of theirs conſiſted in thinking they were now to be Maſters of the King's Councils; and in diſputing that Point with the French. But ſurely no Thought could be more natural, no Diſpute could be more reaſonable than this: They had ventur'd their All in his Support; they ſtood more nearly related to him in the Capacity of Subjects than the French as Allies; and they had no ſeparate Intereſt to ſerve. His Lordſhip adds, "That they were ſoon on very bad Terms, and ſcarce ever agreed in their Advices:" As alſo, "That King James's whole Party in Britain preſs'd his ſettling the Affairs of Ireland the beſt he could, and his bringing over the French and ſuch of the Iriſh as he could beſt govern and depend upon, to the North of England, or the Weſt of Scotland." But if he was really thus preſs'd, it was to no manner of Effect: He choſe rather to linger in Ireland, where he was ſtrongeſt, than expoſe himſelf, where he was ſure to be weakeſt, to Dangers and Difficulties, which he thought inſurmountable. His Party in Scotland had made their Applications both to him and the French Court, before he left St. Germains, and had offer'd to do Wonders in his Behalf, in caſe they might have the neceſſary Countenance and Encouragement to put them in Motion. But good Words, fair Promiſes, and about ſix thouſand Pounds in Money, we are told, was all the Encouragement and Countenance they met with. Lindſay their Agent, not only took London in his way back, but made his Application to Biſhop Burnet; and to procure a Ray of his Favour, let him into the Secret of King James's intended Expedition to Ireland; with ſuch Succeſs, that his Lordſhip ſent him to the Secretary's Office, not, as it appears to make farther Diſcoveries, but to be furniſh'd with a Paſs; for that was the Reſult, it ſeems, of his Attendance; and his Lordſhip has the Grace to take Shame to himſelf for having been ſo egregiouſly impos'd upon, and for having contributed by his Credulity to the Deſigns of the Malcontents to ſubvert the new Eſtabliſhment.

A.D. 1689. He is ſummon'd by his Party to come over into England or Scotland.

He gives us farther to underſtand, that when it was reſolv'd, that the King ſhould continue in Ireland, and ſhould undertake the Reduction of Londonderry, which had held out againſt the Lord Lieutenant, ever ſince the firſt Alarm of a general Maſſacre in the December before, two different Advices were offer'd, viz. one to march againſt it with ſuch a Force as ſhould be irreſiſtible; and the to cauſe it to be ſo block'd up on all Sides, as to ſtarve them into a Surrender: And that both, by a ſort of Fatality, which hung over that King, were rejected for the ſake of a third, which, we are aſſur'd by the ſame Authority, was the only bad one that could be propos'd. This was to preſs the Town by a ſlow Siege; which was given out, would bring the Iriſh into the Methods of War, and would accuſtom them to Fatigue and Diſcipline.

But inſtead of complying, reſolves to reduce Londonderry.

It is acknowledg'd on all Hands, that the Inhabitants of Londonderry had no ſooner taken a Reſolution to ſhut their Gates againſt the Earl of Antrim's Regiment, and to defend themſelves in caſe of an Attack againſt the Lord Lieutenant and all his Force, than they appriz'd the Government here of that Reſolution, of the Hazard they ran by ſo doing, and of the Neceſſity of ſending them Supplies of all ſorts: Notwithſtanding which early Application, they were left to ſhift for themſelves till the Middle of April, having all that time receiv'd only a Supply of Arms and Ammunition by one Captain James Hamilton. Two Regiments were at last sent them under the Command of their respective Colonels, Cunningham and Richards. These were embark'd at Liverpool on the third of that Month, and arriv'd in Lough-Foyl on the fifteenth; by which time King James, with his whole Army, having taken Colerain in his March, and invested Killmore, was almost in Sight. One Lundy had been appointed Governor of the Place by King William, who, it seems, was either Coward, or Traitor, or both. The Historian of his own Times is express, That he had undertaken to betray it to King James; but if he had, it appears he had neither Address enough to serve one King, nor Courage enough to serve the other. Mr. Walker, Rector of Donalmore in the County of Tyrone, and Colonel of a Regiment of his own raising, had brought the Intelligence to Derry of King James's Approach, and would have persuaded Lundy to take the Field, which he was of Opinion might have been done with Success, before King James's Army was fully form'd; there being in that Place between 5 and 6000 fighting Men; and Lord Kingston, and Sir Arthur Rawden having 2500 Foot, and about 1300 Horse in Readiness to join him. Instead, however, of hearkening to this Advice, Lundy held a Council of War, at which assisted the Colonels Cunningham and Richards, and in which it was concluded, That for want of Provisions, the Place was not tenable; that therefore the two Regiments should not be landed; and that the principal Officers should privately withdraw themselves, as well for their own Preservation, as to give the Inhabitants an Opportunity to make the better Terms. The next Step was to send a Person to the King to receive his Proposals, and withal, to desire that his Majesty would cause his Army to halt within three Miles of the Place, till the Treaty should be perfected: But his Majesty, in Contempt of that Preliminary, came before the Town with his Forces that very Day, the 18th, and was so roughly receiv'd by the Inhabitants, that both he and they thought it adviseable to retire to St. John's Town. By this time the Populace were so enrag'd against Lundy and his Accomplices, that they were glad to make their Escapes as well as they could, and were (e) follow'd by Cunningham and Richards, who refus'd to take the Command of the Place, under Pretence that their Orders were to obey Lundy.

The Siege of Derry.

A.D. 1689. Two Regiments arrive from England to their Assistance.

But return with their Officers without debarking.

The Townsmen had now the Mortification to see the very Forces they had so long look'd for, desert them, without making the least Attempt in their Favour, or even supplying them with the Stores and Provisions which they had brought for their Relief. But tho' thus abandon'd and sacrific'd, instead of desponding, they grew more resolute than ever, receiv'd Walker for their Governor, and one Baker for his Assistant, and prepar'd to sell their Lives as dear as possible; for having determin'd not to surrender, and being convinc'd how little they were to depend on being reliev'd, this seem'd to be all they had left to do.

A.D. 1689.

And this Resolution of theirs appears so much the more astonishing, because they had not above twenty great Guns in all; Scarce one of those was well mounted; they had no Engineers, and not above ten Days Provision; at least according to the Estimation of Lundy, their late Governor. King James was no Stranger to all these Circumstances; and therefore attended the Siege himself till the 29th, in daily Expectation of taking possession: But growing weary at last of daily Disappointments, he then return'd to Dublin, having first express'd his Displeasure with so dilatory a Proceeding, as we are told, by saying, That, if his Army had been English, they would, by that time, have brought him the Town, Stone by Stone.

Two Days after, Cunningham and Richards sail'd for Liverpool. Admiral Herbert did the same from Spithead, with a Squadron of twelve Men of War, one Fireship, two Yachts, and two Smacks; which was all the Strength that in all this time could be got ready for this important Service, and which was far from being equal to it. His Commission was, to go in quest of the French Fleet, which was then preparing to make a (f) second Trip to Ireland, by way of Convoy to certain Transports, laden with Arms and Ammunition, and a large Sum of Money, and which was considerably reinforc'd, in expectation of a Rencounter with the English, tho' the War had not as yet been declar'd in form. Other Ships were indeed appointed to follow the Admiral, as fast as they could be equipp'd: But, not to insist that he might have fallen into the Hands of the Enemy he sought, before those Ships came up; even when they did come up, he found himself greatly over-match'd, and had like to have paid dear for his Experiment. He was at first driven by Stress of Weather into Milford-Haven; and, having refitted, purpos'd to stand over to France, in order to intercept the Enemy as they came out of Brest; but the Wind coming Easterly, and he concluding that they would take advantage of it to put to Sea, he stood away for Kinsale on the 24th of April, in hope to fall in with them as they came upon the Coast: And Admiral Herbert's Expedition.

(e) Bishop Burnet says, they all went off together: But, according to other Authors, Lundy went off first, in disguise, with a Load of March at his Back; and, having made the best of his Way to Scotland, was there seiz'd, and sent Prisoner to England.

(f) According to Mr. Tindal, "Admiral Herbert, having receiv'd Notice that King James was landed in Ireland, hasten'd to that Coast with all the Strength which could be possibly collected, in hopes to intercept the Ships of War which were his Convoy, in their Return." But this is contrary to all Authorities, French and English. He made no such Haste: Those Ships of War return'd immediately: This second Fleet was out but twelve Days in all: And if Mr. Tindal had attended to a Quotation of his own, from Father Daniel, in his next Column but one, he would have understood, that the Fleet here spoken of came as Convoy to the Transports above-mention'd.

A. D. 1689. And ſo right was the Judgment he made, that on the 29th his Scouts made ſignal that they diſcover'd a Fleet, keeping their Wind. This induc'd the Admiral to do the ſame, to prevent their getting into the Port laſt-mention'd; and ſo far this Working of his had its Effect: But then he could not hinder them getting into Bantry-Bay the next Day; nor did he ever come in ſight of them at all, till he ſtood in to engage them; which was on the firſt of May, at Day-break. The French were at Anchor; but no ſooner did they ſee the Engliſh Sails appear, than they weigh'd, form'd their Line, bore down with a full Sail, and when within Muſket-ſhot of the Defiance, the headmoſt Ship of our Fleet, gave the Signal of Battle, and follow'd it with an immediate Diſcharge of great and ſmall Shot; which was return'd with equal Fury, but not with equal Succeſs. The French had the Wind; and Admiral Herbert thought, that, if he could deprive them of that Advantage, he ſhould have nothing to apprehend from the Odds they had of Strength and Number. On this Preſumption he made ſeveral Tacks, in order to weather them, if poſſible, or at leaſt oblige them to fight him Broad-ſide and Broad-ſide: But as they would not gratify him in the laſt of theſe Points, ſo neither could he carry the firſt. The French were already, it ſeems, as good Sailors as we, if not better, (for their Line was form'd from the Beginning, and ours was never form'd at all,) and maintain'd their Poſt ſo well, that Herbert, after two Hours warm Engagement, thought fit to alter his Steerage, and ſtand off to Sea; ſtill, however, with a Hope of ſome Opportunity to gain the Wind of the Enemy, and to make good his Line (for ſo runs his own Account of the Action); but ſtill without the deſir'd Succeſs: The Enemy gave him no Opening, but on the contrary oblig'd him to keep a running Fight to Leeward, till five in the Afternoon, when the French Admiral, (Mr. Chateau-Renault) contented with the Honour of the Day, tack'd about, and ſtood farther up into the Bay; And, ſays the Gazette, "Admiral Herbert's Ship, and ſome of the reſt, being diſabled in their Rigging, we could not follow them: But we continued ſome time after, before the Bay, and our Admiral gave them a Gun at parting." But this is only to be eſteem'd the Colouring of a Defeat; which, in ſuch Times as theſe, was not only excuſable but neceſſary: And, as an additional Softening, the Public was farther told, that the Enemy wanted neither Courage nor Skill, to make uſe of all Advantages, of the Place, the Wind, their Fireſhips, and their being, at leaſt, doubly as ſtrong as the Engliſh; they having (g) twenty-eight Ships, of which eighteen are ſaid to have been as large as Herbert's own Ship, the Elizabeth, and five Fire-ſhips; whereas he had but eight Third-rates, ten Fourth-rates, one Fifth-rate, and two Tenders.

He is overſpread by the French at Bantry-Bay.

As to the Loſs, it was inſignificant on both Sides: For the Engliſh, who were worſted, acknowledge but one Captain, (Aylmer, of the Portland), one Lieutenant, and ninety-four Seamen, kill'd, and about two hundred and fifty wounded: And, on the other hand, that of the French is ſumm'd up in the ſetting fire to one Ship, the Diamond, and the damaging two others ſo far, as to oblige them to quit the Line. But then, as to the Conſequences of the Engagement, by which alone the Importance of it is to be eſtimated, the French accompliſh'd all they propos'd; they debark'd their Stores ſafely, they defended themſelves bravely, and they had the Seas left open to them to return triumphantly; while the Engliſh could neither prevent their Debarkation, which was what they undertook, nor impede their Return, which was manifeſtly their Intereſt; but, on the contrary, retreated towards Scilly, which was the Place of general Rendezvous for the Fleet; and tho' it was given out in the London Gazette, that they would ſoon make a ſecond Attempt on the Enemy, no ſuch ſecond Attempt was made. Herbert was brave even to Raſhneſs, as the Action we have juſt treated of, is ſufficient to demonſtrate; for which Reaſon no doubt can be made, that he burnt with Impatience to engage again: And that he did not engage again, ſeems to argue, that either he had ſuffer'd more in the late Action than he car'd to own, or that he was diſappointed of the Reinforcements which he expected to find at the Place of Rendezvous: The laſt of theſe Concluſions is perhaps the Truth; for, over-and-above all the other Difficulties that embarraſs'd every Branch of the public Service, the Seamen had ſhewn a Backwardneſs to engage in it; and almoſt every Article from the Sea-ports, in the Gazettes of theſe Times, as well as the Proclamations for their Encouragement, evinces what Artifices the Government was forc'd to make uſe of, to reconcile them to it: When, therefore, the Admiral came into Portſmouth, as he did in a few Days after the Fight, it may be ſuppos'd, that he came in doubly enflam'd with his Defeat and his Diſappointment; that his Officers of all Ranks, and their ſeveral Crews, partook of the ſame Ill-humour; and that the Murmurs and Complaints, which probably broke out on every Side, made it neceſſary for his Majeſty to go thither in perſon to appeaſe them: It is true we are told by ſome, That he went to haſten the refitting of the Fleet: But the Gazette aſſures us, that he ſtaid there no longer than while he din'd with Admiral Herbert, on board the Elizabeth, and while he rode round the Fortifications; for he return'd the ſame Day to Colonel Norton's, where he had lain the Night before; and that, in this ſhort Interval, he declar'd his Royal Intention of conferring on the Admiral the Title and Dignity of an Earl of this Kingdom, as a Mark of his great Satisfaction in his Conduct and good Affairs of Scotland.

It is now Time to turn to the Affairs of Scotland.

The 14th of March was the Day appointed for the Meeting of the Convention there; and tho' it was to be form'd at the Requiſition of King William, there is a Paſſage in Lord Belcarres's Memoirs, which ſignifies, that King James alſo allow'd his Partiſans to make all the Intereſt they could, that Members might be rightly choſen. In the ſame Paſſage it is alſo ſaid, That all thoſe Partiſans of his did accordingly reſolve to act accordingly: But then he adds, That it was ſo long before this Reſolution was taken, that many loyal Gentlemen refus'd to co-operate when call'd upon; which, continues he, gave the Prince of Orange's Party, and the Fanatics, great Advantage; and he concludes, notwithſtanding, That if Forces had not been ſent down, and if thoſe Fanatics had not been admitted to vote (which, however unprecedented, according to his Lordſhip's State of the Caſe, had been agreed to by the Scotiſh Lords and Gentlemen at Whitehall) the Elections would have gone in King James's Favour.

The Duke of Gordon was ſtill Maſter of Edinburgh Caſtle, and ſtill adher'd to his old Maſter; which would have been a terrifying Circumſtance to the Friends of the new Government, if he had taken care to have ſtor'd it with Proviſions; but having neglected that important Service, he ſtood at the Courteſy of the Citizens for the Neceſſaries of Life, and, for that Reaſon, durſt not make uſe of his great Guns to keep them to their good Behaviour.

Yet farther to counterpoiſe the Dread of the Caſtle, as alſo to keep up the Spirits of their own, and to intimidate the contrary, Party, the Duke of Hamilton and other Weſtern Lords and Gentlemen, we are told, brought publicly into Edinburgh ſeveral Companies of Foot and quarter'd them in the City, beſides great Numbers which they kept hid in Cellars and other obſcure Places to be ready in caſe of need.

The Earl of Belcarres, and the Viſcount Dundee undertook for the contrary Party, and were altogether as active on their Side, though in a different way; for, being the weaker, their Buſineſs was to lye on the Defenſive; to keep as cloſely united as poſſible; to lye in wait for ſuch Advantages as might be drawn from a dextrous Management of the Seſſion; and above all things, to keep the Duke of Gordon firm to their Intereſt, who had been highly tempted, had already betray'd ſome Irreſolution, and wanted Firmneſs in his Compoſition. A. D. 1689.

The Convention meets at Edinburgh.

This was the Aſpect of things on both Sides, when the Day of meeting came; and the Lords and Commons being met accordingly in one Houſe, agreeable to the Cuſtom of that Kingdom; the Biſhop of Edinburgh officiated as Chaplain, and made uſe of the Opportunity to pray, that God would have Compaſſion on King James, and that he would reſtore him. After Prayers, the firſt great Point to be ſettled, was the Choice of a Preſident: The Marquis of (b) Athole was ſet up by one Party; not becauſe they had any Confidence in his Parts or Honeſty, ſays Lord Belcarres, but becauſe he was the only Man fit to be oppos'd to the Duke of Hamilton, who was ſet up by the other. Both attended the Deciſion with the utmoſt Anxiety; for upon this ſingle Queſtion, the Fate of the Seſſion was ſuppos'd to lye; not only from the Influence of the Chair, in the Courſe of their Proceedings, but as from thence the Temper of the Houſe would become manifeſt. The Event was favourable to the new Courtiers; contrary, ſays the Author laſt quoted, to their own Expectations; and the Duke carry'd it by forty Voices: Upon which, "above twenty more, continues his Lordſhip, who had engag'd to us, and voted for us, ſeeing we were the weakeſt Party, and that the other had both Forces and the Shew of Authority on their Side, left us."

The Duke of Hamilton choſen Preſident.

The Matter which came next under Conſideration, was their own (i) Security, with reſpect to the Cannon of the Caſtle; and, upon the Reſult, the Earls of Lothian and Tweedale, were warranted by a formal Act to repair to the ſaid Caſtle, and to require the Duke of Gordon, and others of his Perſuaſion, entruſted with the keeping thereof, in the Name of the Eſtates of the Kingdom, to quit the ſame in twenty-four Hours, as not being qualify'd by Law to hold that Truſt, and to leave the Charge thereof to the next commanding Officer, being a Proteſtant: And in Conſideration of his and their yielding Obedience, the ſaid Eſtates gave aſſurance, that he and they ſhould ſtand indemnify'd for whatever they had hitherto done contrary to Law as Papiſts. And while theſe two Lords were on this Errand, the Houſe proceeded farther to name a Committee (k) of (b) It has been formerly obſerv'd, that in Belcarres's Memoirs, the Names of the Noblemen treated of are ſeldom inſerted at length. Thus, in the Paſſage here quoted, inſtead of ſaying the Marquis of Athole, it is ſaid the Marquis of A——e: And tho' Mr. Tindal has in his Text, inform'd his Readers that the ſaid Marquis was the Man ſet up againſt Duke Hamilton, he has yet in his Notes, (where this very Paſſage and many more, from the ſame Author, are inſerted in the Lump) converted Athole into Annandale.

(i) Or rather, according to the Earl of Belcarres, to gratify the Earls of Lothian and Leven, who were Candidates for the Government of it; as alſo to oblige King William, who was impatient to have it reduc'd, as it was the only Place of Conſequence in the whole Iſland, which held out for King James againſt him.

(k) According to the Account publiſh'd in the London Gazette, No. 2438, there were not above Twelve diſputed; but the Earl of Belcarres writes of that Matter as follows: "Some few Days were taken up in judging of Elections; which would have taken much longer time, if ſeveral, who ſaw there was no manner of Juſtice ſo much as pretended to among them, had not given it over and yielded; which made them grow ſtronger every Day. None concerned in that Affair of Elections behav'd ſo well as Mr. C——, H——e, (Hume, perhaps,) after his Brother the Earl of H——'s Death, the Title fell to him; but by reaſon of

A. D. 1689. of Elections to conſiſt of five, to be choſen out of every State. This gave riſe to a Queſtion, Whether the Lords Spiritual were a diſtinct Eſtate, or only a Part of the ſame Eſtate with the Lords Temporal: And the Latter appearing to be the Senſe of the Houſe, the oppoſing Party choſe to wave the Diſpute, without coming to Diviſion. The ſaid Committee was then choſen, and out of fifteen Members, which it was compos'd of, twelve were in the Intereſt of the new Government: And, as the laſt Effort of the Day on the loſing Side, a Motion was made, That, ſeeing the Town was full of People from all Parts of the Kingdom, who were, for the moſt part, in Arms, it might be thought fit, for preventing Diſorders, to command all ſuch to depart, as were not Reſidents, or that did not belong to the Members; which was alſo over-rul'd by the Majority; who declar'd, That the Caſtle ſhould firſt be deliver'd; but withal appointed a Committee to act as Conſervators of the Peace. Under this Head, Lord Belcarres obſerves, That the greateſt Error committed by King James's Friends, was their continuing to ſit, after this Motion was ſo over-rul'd: "For in Reaſon, ſays he, they ought all to have left the Convention, and gone and ſitten in ſome other Town by themſelves, which they might have done ſafely."

Lords Spiritual not allow'd to be a diſtinct Eſtate.

Treaty with the Duke of Gordon for the Surrender of the Caſtle.

In this Interval, the two Earls perform'd their Miſſion to the Duke of Gordon, who deſir'd twenty-four Hours to conſider of it: So ſays the London Gazette at leaſt: But Lord Belcarres is expreſs, That he actually promis'd to comply with their Demand by ten the next Morning; and yet farther expatiates on the Effect which this Promiſe had on the Party, as follows: "So ſoon as the Viſcount of Dundee and I heard them give this Anſwer to the Convention, we were mightily alarm'd, and ſent up one immediately to remember his Grace of his Engagement to us, and to lay before him the Ruin of your (King James's) Affairs, if once they got the Caſtle into their Hands. As Irreſolution was the Cauſe of his Promiſe to them, ſo what Arguments were us'd to him on the other Side meeting with his Deſire to ſerve you, brought him about again. His greateſt Obſtacle then was, how to come fairly off. The Earl of T——e with his flattering, inſinuating way, had got him to go too great a length: For that, it was adviſed, that next Day, when they came to demand the Caſtle, he ſhould tell, he would willingly give it up, but he could not ſee how he could be ſafe himſelf from the Rabble of the Town, and thoſe that were brought into it. But to free them from all Fear, that he ſhould give the Convention any Diſturbance, he ſhould offer Bail for twenty thouſand Pounds to live peaceably in it. But though he was very well ſatisfy'd with this Advice, yet that Night he grew again irreſolute, and ſent to tell us, that except we came to him immediately, he would not keep his Word. This was impoſſible to do, for they having placed the Town-Companies of Edinburgh upon the Caſtle Hill, ſuffer'd none they ſuſpected to go up; yet one ventur'd to him, to know what he had to ſay to us. He ſent us Word, that notwithſtanding of all that was paſt, he would deliver it up, except we Both gave it under our Hands, That it was of abſolute Neceſſity for your Affairs not to yield it up; which we both did that Night; and the next Morning the Viſcount of Dundee got into the Caſtle, and confirm'd him abſolutely in his Reſolution of keeping it out, by telling him the Reſolutions which were taken by your Friends of leaving Edinburgh, and ſetting up at Sterling."

A. D. 1689.

The Reſult of this Intrigue was, that when the two Earls return'd on the Morrow to know the Duke's Purpoſe, he deliver'd to them the following Paper, which is drawn up with ſo much Art, and in a Stile and Manner ſo much ſuperior to thoſe of the Earl of Belcarres, as manifeſts very clearly, that if he dictated the Matter, he did not hold the Pen:

"Edinburgh-Caſtle, March 17, 1689.

I am willing to comply with the Commiſſion I receiv'd by the Earls of Lothain and Tweedale, as to my Removal from the Caſtle of Edinburgh; tho' I cannot do ſo as a Papiſt, that being dangerous, and I not convicted; for, I hope, being in Employment, without taking the Teſt, contrary to an Act of Parliament, is no Conviction of Popery.

I receiv'd not long ago a Letter from the then Prince of Orange, deſiring that I would leave the Caſtle, which I promis'd to do, but expected ſome reaſonable things to be firſt granted to myſelf and Garriſon.

I hope I have not merited ſo ill of my Country as that I may not be truſted with the Caſtle, until a Return come to this Letter, which I expect every Hour; but if that cannot be granted barely on my Promiſe not to moleſt or harm any Perſon, eſpecially thoſe of this illuſtrious Aſſembly, I proffer Hoſtages of the Family, he did not take on him the Title, fearing to loſe a conſiderable Intereſt that was left him, with this Proviſion, that if the Eſtate of H——e came to him, then that Eſtate ſhould go to his younger Brother. So, not pretending to be a Peer, he was choſen one of the Commiſſioners for the Shire; but when it was brought before the Convention he was caſt, as one they expected would be none of their Friends. So ſoon as the Sentence was pronounc'd, he told the Preſident, ſince they had taken away one Way of his ſitting in that Convention he had a Right to, he ſhould try another, which they could not refuſe him; and ſo went out, and took place as Earl of H——e, with the Hazard of loſing the beſt Part of his Eſtate.

There was likewiſe another extraordinary Affair of that kind. One Mr. B——t of Tarwoodhead, that had pretended ſome Years before to be Lord Forreſter, but was ſummon'd before the Council for uſurping a Title he had no Right to, and diſcharged under a conſiderable Penalty never more to pretend to it. But thoſe at London, who had the writing of Letters, not knowing his Title, or, more likely, believing he would be of their Intereſt, procur'd him a Letter from the Prince of Orange to come to the Convention. So ſoon as he was challeng'd by Sir George Mackenzie, then Lord Advocate, he produc'd his Letter, which was voted a ſufficient Right to ſit. Several as unjuſtly as theſe were receiv'd: I only inſtance them to ſhew, how that Convention was conſtituted, moſt of the Commiſſioners having no Right."

A. D. 1689. Hoſtages of Bail to the Value of 20,000*l.* Sterling for my peaceable Deportment.

Otherwiſe I expect before any Removal, 1. A general Indemnity for myſelf and Friends, both Proteſtants and Papiſts; as likewiſe abſolute Security for our Lives and Fortunes in time coming, with Aſſurance the ſame ſhall be ratify'd in the next enſuing Parliament. 2*dly*. Security for all Proteſtants of the Garriſon, who incline to ſtay in it, to continue in their Employments; and for myſelf, and thoſe who ſhall go out with me, either Proteſtants or Papiſts, to go beyond Seas, or remain within the Kingdom, as our Occaſions ſhall lead us. 3. That the Garriſon be completely paid off all bygone Arrears, and have Liberty to diſpoſe of their Goods within the Caſtle as they pleaſe. Subſcrib'd,

GORDON.

To this, after due Deliberation, it was reply'd by the States, That it was not the Senſe of the Convention, that either his officiating as Governor, or his quitting that Office, ſhould import any Acknowledgment or Conviction, That he, or any under him, were Papiſts.

That they would not allow the ſaid Duke to hold the Caſtle, till he had an Anſwer to his Letter from the then Prince of Orange.

That the Indemnity he deſir'd ſhould extend only to the Garriſon and their Servants, whether Proteſtants or Papiſts: That the Perſons to be indemnify'd, ſhould be expreſsly nam'd, if the Duke deſir'd it: That there ſhould be a Clauſe to authoriſe him and them to clame a Ratification of the ſaid Indemnity in the next Parliament: That thoſe who retir'd with the Duke, and thoſe to leave the Kingdom, ſhould have ſafe Conduct for their Perſons, and Liberty to diſpoſe of their Effects; with an Exception to Arms, Ammunition and Stores; and that the Officers and Soldiers ſhould have their Arrears, but without Aſſurance of their being continu'd in Employment.

The Duke's Anſwer to this was, That he deſir'd twelve Days more to conſider of it. This produc'd new Meſſages, and new Anſwers; which ended in an open Rupture on both Sides; the Duke declaring in ſo many Words, That he would not deliver up the Caſtle at all; and the Convention in return ordering the Heralds at Arms, in all their Formalities, to ſummon him in the Name, and by the Authority of, the Convention, to ſurrender the Caſtle immediately, upon Pain of Treaſon. He refus'd, and in Conſequence, was proclam'd a Traitor and Rebel at the Market-Croſs the ſame Day; as were alſo all ſuch, as ſhould aid, abet, ſuccour, or correſpond, with him: And the Caſtle was block'd up on all Sides.

Thus ended this important Negotiation: And the next Day the Party being inform'd, that an Expreſs was arriv'd from London with King William's Letter to the Eſtates, they firſt introduc'd one Mr. Crane, an Engliſhman, and one of the abdicated Queen's Domeſtics, with a Letter from King James, and demanded to have it read; but the Preſident telling them, there was likewiſe a Letter from the King of England, a warm Debate enſued; which the Earl of Lothain had the Honour to finiſh, by moving, That ſince they met by the King of England's Deſire, they might pay him the Compliment of reading his Letter firſt; for, upon the Queſtion it was carry'd in the Affirmative; and the ſaid Letter was read accordingly, as follows:

Debate whether King William or King James's Letter ſhould be read firſt.

A. D. 1689.

Carry'd for the former.

"To the Meeting of the Eſtates of Scotland.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

We are very ſenſible of the Kindneſs and Concern that many of your Nation have evidenced towards us and our Undertaking, for the Preſervation of Religion and Liberty, which were in ſuch imminent Danger; neither can we in the leaſt doubt of your Confidence in us, after having ſeen how far ſo many of your Nobility and Gentry have owned our Declaration, countenancing and concurring with us in our Endeavours, and deſiring that we ſhould take upon us the Adminiſtration of Affairs, civil and military, and to call a Meeting of the Eſtates for ſecuring the Proteſtant Religion, the ancient Laws and Liberties of that Kingdom, which, accordingly, we have done.

Now it lies on you to enter upon ſuch Conſultations as are moſt probable to ſettle you on ſure and laſting Foundations, which we hope you will ſet about with all convenient Speed, with regard to the Public Good, and to the general Intereſt and Inclinations of the People, that after ſo much Trouble and great Sufferings, they may live happily and in Peace, and that you may lay aſide all Animoſities and Factions that may impede ſo good a Work.

We were glad to find that ſo many of the Nobility and Gentry, when here at London, were ſo much inclin'd to an Union of both Kingdoms, and that they did look upon it as one of the beſt Means for procuring the Happineſs of thoſe Nations, and ſettling of a laſting Peace among them, which would be advantageous to both, they living in the ſame Iſland, having the ſame Language, and the ſame common Intereſt of Religion and Liberty, eſpecially at this Juncture, when the Enemies of both are ſo reſtleſs, endeavouring to make and encreaſe Jealouſies and Diviſions, which they will be ready to improve to their own Advantage, and the Ruin of Britain. We, being of the ſame Opinion as to the Uſefulneſs of this Union, and having nothing ſo much before our Eyes as the Glory of God, the eſtabliſhing of the Reformed Religion, and the Peace and Happineſs of theſe Nations, are reſolv'd to uſe our utmoſt Endeavours in advancing every thing which may conduce to the effectuating the ſame. So we bid you heartily farewell. From our Court at Hampton, the ſeventh Day of March, 1689.

WILLIAM R.

King William's Letter being thus read, and a Committee appointed to draw up a reſpect-

ful

A. D. 1689. ful Answer, it was next debated, whether King James's should be shewn the like Favour? And the great Reason urg'd against it being drawn from a Notion, that it might contain some authoritative Clause to dissolve the Assembly, or annul their Proceedings, the same Lord who made the last Motion farther propounded, That, before the Reading of it, they should pass the following Act; and that the Members should sign it:

"Forasmuch as there is a Letter from King James the Seventh presented to the Meeting of the Estates, that they, before opening thereof, declare and enact, That, notwithstanding of any thing that may be contain'd in that Letter, for dissolving them, or impeding their Procedure, yet that they are a free and lawful Meeting of the Estates, and will continue undissolv'd, until they settle and secure the Protestant Religion, the Government, Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom."

This was accordingly agreed to; and having been sign'd almost unanimously by those present, the Letter brought by Crane was read, in these Words:

"JAMES R.

King James's Letter. My Lords and Gentlemen, Whereas we have been inform'd, that you the Peers and Representatives of Shires and Boroughs of that our ancient Kingdom, who are to meet together at our good Town of Edinburgh, some time in this Instant March, by the usurp'd Authority of the Prince of Orange; we think fit to let you know, that we have at all times rely'd upon the Faithfulness and Affection of you our ancient People, so much, that in our greatest Misfortunes heretofore, we had recourse to your Assistance, and that with good Success to our Affairs; so now again we require of you to support our Royal Interest; expecting from you what becomes loyal and faithful Subjects, generous and honest Men, that will neither suffer yourselves to be cajol'd nor frighted into any Action misbecoming true-hearted Scotchmen; and that, to support the Honour of the Nation, you will contemn the base Example of disloyal Men, and eternize your Names by a Loyalty suitable to the many Professions you have made to us, in doing whereof you will chuse the safest Part, since thereby you will evite the Danger you must needs undergo; the Infamy and Disgrace you must bring upon yourselves in this World, and the Condemnations due to the Rebellious in the next; and you will likewise have the Opportunity to secure to yourselves and your Posterity the gracious Promises we have so oft made, of securing your Religion, Laws, Properties, Liberties and Rights, which we are still resolv'd to perform as soon as it is possible to us to meet you safely in a Parliament of our ancient Kingdom: In the mean time fear not to declare for us your lawful Sovereign, who will not fail on our part to give you such speedy and powerful Assistance, as shall not only enable you to defend yourselves from any foreign Attempt, but put you in a Condition to assert our Right against our Enemies, who have depressed the same by the blackest of Usurpations, the most unjust as well as most unnatural of all Attempts, which the Almighty God may for a time permit, and let the Wicked prosper, yet then must bring Confusion upon such Workers of Iniquity. We farther let you know that we will pardon all such as shall return to their Duty before the last Day of this Month inclusive; and that we will punish with the Rigor of our Law all such as shall stand out in Rebellion against us or our Authority: So not doubting that you will declare for us, and suppress whatever may oppose our Interest; and that you will send some of your Number to us, with an Account of your Diligence, and the Posture of our Affairs, we bid you heartily farewell.

Given on board the St. Michael, the first of March, 1689.

By his Majesty's Command.

MELFORT.

A. D. 1689.

It is somewhat strange that Lord Belcarres makes no mention in his Book of this Letter; and stranger, that Bishop Burnet should not only affirm, it was deliver'd by Lindsey, instead of Crane, but that the Convention would not receive or read it, when he might have learn'd the contrary from the very Gazette.

As to its Effects; it produc'd none favourable to King James: On the contrary, as if more provok'd with the Menaces than mov'd with the Admonitions contain'd in it, they first order'd Crane to be taken into Custody, and, after some time, dismiss'd him with a Pass instead of an Answer. [Life of King William, v. II. p. 40. Gazette.]

His Partisans empowered to hold a Counter-Convention at Stirling:

But his Partisans had still, it seems, another Card to play: By an Instrument, dated in Ireland, he had authoris'd the Archbishop of Glasgow, the Earl of Belcarres, and Lord Dundee, to call a Convention of Estates at Stirling, in case his Interests and Pretensions should meet with no Consideration in the present; and those Lords now resolv'd to make use of it, in hope to divide and distract the Kingdom, at least; which was all that remain'd to be done, for the Support of their sinking Cause. Some Reference has been already made to this Resolution of theirs, in the Discourse which pass'd between the Duke of Gordon and Lord Dundee, when the Treaty for surrendring the Castle was in agitation: And something still remain'd to be done, before they could put it in practice. "It was of absolute Necessity, says Lord Belcarres, to be secure of the Earl of M--r (Marr) and Marquis of A--r, (Athole) the one having Command of Stirling Castle, and the other, that he might bring us Highlanders to be a Guard to the Town. The Earl of M---r, continues he, had all along appear'd one of the firmest in your (King James's) Interest from the time he came to London; for he gave us all the Assurances imaginable, that he would do according as the major Part thought fit. The Marquis of A--e also consented to leave Edinburgh, and go strait to Stirling; but he never continued six Hours in one Resolution, which broke all our Design; for his Wavering made our Departure be put off, still expecting he would be

A. D. 1689. be brought about to do it. At last a positive Hour was condescended on, and several made themselves ready, whom we hardly expected. After it was resolv'd to be gone, it was thought fit by all your Friends, that one should be sent to let you know the Reason of our leaving the Convention, and receive your Commands, which the Laird of Cullin undertook.

Before we were to go off, just as the Convention was sitting down, there came one to the Viscount of Dundee, telling him, that there were six or seven Men in a House intended to murder him and Sir G---e M---ie; (Mackenzie) and that, if he would get a Warrant, he might instantly carry them to the House where they were. So soon as the Convention met, he told this to the Duke of Hamilton, who propos'd it to the Convention; but they absolutely refus'd to meddle in it, but went to other Affairs. This made the Viscount of Dundee press yet the more to be gone, than before, so evident a Piece of Justice being refus'd him, though he offer'd to prove it at the Bar. Neither was there any of your Friends who could think themselves longer safe; which certainly the other Party was extremely glad to see; for all they desir'd was to have the House alone. It is not to be doubted but they made several such things to pass, purposely to frighten us; but it was hard trusting Men, who had the Power in their Hands, that they would stop to put in execution, what so many of them have professed, and at least were not condemned by the most moderate of the Party, when their Interest or Revenge was concerned. But, after all of us were fully determin'd to make the best of our way the next Morning, to Stirling, the Marquis of A---e's Heart fail'd. So some went down to him, thinking to get him to go along, he desir'd we might go to the Place we ordinarily met in, and stay yet another Day; which we all consented to; and that we might the better cover our Design of going away, we resolv'd to go for that Day to the Convention. Just as we were almost dispers'd and gone to the House, the Viscount of Dundee came in, who knew nothing of the Marquis of A---e's Delay, nor of your Friends Resolution to stay a little longer for him, but expected all were just a going. He was mightily surpriz'd at their Resolution, and told me, notwithstanding of that, he would go before; and if any got out of Town, he would wait for them. It was very evident his going away would give the Alarm, which made me extremely earnest, that he might stay one Day longer; but he had before made an Appointment with some to go with him; so he went strait away with about fifty Horse. As he was riding near the Castle of Edinburgh, the Duke of Gordon made a Sign to speak with him at the West Side of the Castle, where, tho' it be extremely steep, yet he told the Duke all that was resolv'd upon, and begg'd he might hold out the Castle till your Friends might get him reliev'd; which he positively promis'd to do. Whilst they were speaking, some of those who were set to blockade the Castle perceiv'd them, and came running into the Convention, and told them, that there was a great Number of Horse gathering together, and that the Viscount of Dundee was talking with Duke Gordon, which they look'd on as a horrid Crime, after they had outlaw'd him. Their Fears also increas'd, believing it was a general Design against them; and that which augmented their Fright the more was, that several Messengers brought word after each other, that they were still increasing. At last the Duke of Hamilton in a mighty Fury told the Convention, That now it was time to look to their own Safety, since the Papists and Enemies to the settling the Government were so bold as to gather together. That he doubted not but there were several there among them who were on the Design. Therefore was it his Opinion, that the Door should be immediately bolted, and the Keys laid on the Table: That some of their Number should be sent out to beat the Drums, to gather together all those well-affected to Religion and Liberty: And that he had brought some Foot from the West-country, fearing the Designs of their Enemies, to defend them. What he said was approv'd of by all their Party; several of them also bragg'd of the Numbers they had brought, and call'd them thrice as many as they were. The Earl of L---n (Leven) was pitch'd upon to go out and gather them together; which when he had done, there was never so miserable a Parcel seen; nor is it to be doubted, if your Friends had known their own Strength, and not believ'd your Enemies to be far stronger than they really were, they might, with all the Ease imaginable, that Day have effectually vindicated your Right, and defeated your Enemies. A. D. 1689.

Such of your Friends as were lock'd within the House, and guarded likewise without, look'd on themselves as undone; and the thing that sav'd them was, that they could come to no Resolution among themselves. But I cannot say much of their Intentions, having it from some, that chang'd Parties so often, that I can assert nothing on their Credit. The Fear being a little over, they seeing they had most of your Friends in their Power, and that there was no Tumult in Town, nor that the Viscount of Dundee grew any stronger, but was marching away; they order'd Major B---n to gather all he could together, and follow him; which he did, but never came within sight of him.

After that they had secur'd the Town, and thought themselves out of Hazard, Duke Hamilton dismiss'd (adjourn'd) the Convention, to the great Satisfaction of all your Friends, little expecting they would come off so easily; and all this Noise ended in nothing. But with that also ended all Hopes of setting up another Convention at Stirling; for the Marquis of A----e gave it quite over; the Earl of M--r made a Feint to get out of the Town, but went by the only Post that was guarded, and was stopp'd there, and brought back, and gave his Parole not to stir out of Edinburgh without Leave of the Convention. These two giving it over, every body that But are not able to effect it.

A. D. 1689. was apprehenſive ſhifted for themſelves, and lurked in Edinburgh. Next Day there was a mighty Change; for ſeveral, either out of Fear or Intereſt, left us: Thoſe of Note were, the Earl of M--r, and A-----e, who chang'd thoroughly, and went along with every thing that could be propos'd. Several alſo both of Barons and Burgeſſes did the like: So that by ſuch of their Friends as left the Houſe, which did likewiſe ſome of the Biſhops, they got their Meeting almoſt unanimous."

Meaſures taken by the States to ſtrengthen themſelves.

Thus far the Earl. And while theſe were the Machinations on one Side, nothing which had a Tendency to eſtabliſh their Authority and ſtrengthen their Hands, was omitted on the other: They approv'd and recogniz'd what the Nobility and Gentry had done at Whitehall, in praying his Majeſty of England to take upon him the Adminiſtration by a ſolemn Act; in which they thankfully acknowledg'd the great Benefit done to their Nation by the Prince of Orange, in delivering them from the eminent Encroachments on their Laws and fundamental Conſtitution, and from the near Dangers which threatned an overturning of the Proteſtant Religion; and alſo deſir'd his Highneſs to accept the Adminiſtration of the Government of that Kingdom. They requir'd by Proclamation all Perſons from 16 to 60 to be in Readineſs to take Arms when the Houſe ſhould call upon them. They gave the Command of the Horſe Militia to Sir Patrick Hume, notwithſtanding his Attainder for being concern'd with the late Earl of Argyle. They rais'd 800 Men for a Town-Guard, and gave the Command of them to the Earl of Lewen, who came over with King William. They put the Militia all over the Kingdom into ſuch Hands as they could rely on moſt. They ſent the Earl of Mar to take Poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Stirling. They receiv'd a Reinforcement of four Regiments of Foot, and one of Dragoons, from England, under the Command of General Mackay, whom they appointed to be their Commander in Chief. They ſent their Macers to require the (l) Attendance of ſuch as had left the Houſe. They ſet forth a Proclamation for ſecuring all diſaffected Perſons; and they diſpatch'd the following Reply by Lord Roſs to the Letter of his Majeſty of England, viz.

The Anſwer of the States to King William's Letter.

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

As Religion, Liberty, and Law, are the deareſt Concerns of Mankind, ſo the deep Senſe of the extreme Hazards theſe were expos'd to, muſt produce ſuitable Returns from the Kingdom of Scotland to your Majeſty, whom in all Sincerity and Gratitude, we acknowledge to be, under God, our great and ſeaſonable Deliverer. And we heartily congratulate, that as God has honour'd your A. D. 1689. Majeſty to be an eminent Inſtrument for the Preſervation of his Truth, ſo he has rewarded your Undertakings with Succeſs, in the conſiderable Progreſs which you have made in delivering us, and in preſerving to us the Proteſtant Religion.

We return our moſt dutiful Thanks to your Majeſty, for your accepting the Adminiſtration of public Affairs, and convening the Eſtates of this Kingdom; and we ſhall, with all convenient Diligence, take your gracious Letter into our Conſideration, hoping ſhortly, by the Bleſſing of God, to fall upon ſuch Reſolutions as may be acceptable to your Majeſty, ſecure the Proteſtant Religion, and eſtabliſh the Government, Laws, and Liberties of this Kingdom upon ſolid Foundations, moſt agreeable to the general Good, and Inclinations of the People.

As to the Propoſal of the Union, we doubt not your Majeſty will ſo diſpoſe that Matter, that there may be an equal Readineſs in the Kingdom of England to accompliſh it, as one of the beſt Means for ſecuring the Happineſs of theſe Nations, and ſettling a laſting Peace.

We have hitherto, and ſtill ſhall endeavour to avoid Animoſities or Prejudice, which might diſturb our Councils; that as we deſign the Public Good, ſo it may be done with the general Concurrence and Approbation of the Nation. In the mean time, we deſire the Continuance of your Majeſty's Care and Protection towards us in all our Concerns, whereof the kind Expreſſions in your Gracious Letter have given us full Aſſurance.

Sign'd in the Name of us the Eſtates of the Kingdom of Scotland, by our Preſident,

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,
Your Majeſty's moſt Humble, moſt Faithful and Obedient Servant.
HAMILTON.

Edinburgh, March 23, 1689.

Lord Belcarres, ſpeaking of this Letter, is pleas'd to ſay, That the Convention ſent it up, for fear the Prince of Orange ſhould think they went ſlowly on; and that it contain'd the Reaſon of their Delay, viz. The Oppoſition they had met with from thoſe who had oppos'd the ſettling the Nation: Whereas no ſuch Clauſe appears in the Letter; but, on the contrary, they ſeem to glory in the Unanimity wherewith all their Proceedings had been conducted.

On the third Day after Lord Roſs ſet out for London, the Lord Preſident mov'd, That a Committee might be nam'd to ſettle the Government; which, notwithſtanding the Seceſſion of ſo many (m) Members, met with (l) A Motion was alſo made, to expel all ſuch as had refuſ'd to ſign the Act aſſerting the Lawfulneſs of their Aſſembly; but let fall, as having a Tendency to do more Miſchief than Good.

(m) About fifty, according to ſome Authors; and, according to others, thoſe that remain'd look'd more like a Committee, than the Repreſentative of a Nation.—— But this laſt Aſſertion expoſes itſelf.— For, if they were ſo few, why were they not out-voted? And, if they were the Majority, with what Juſtice can the ſame Perſons call them the Rump and Fag-end of a Convention, as we find they do?

A.D. 1689. with some Opposition; for the Archbishop of Glasgow, Sir George Mackenzie, and a few more, stood their Ground, and resolv'd to trouble the Stream, at least, if they could not direct it their own Way: The Lord President's Motion was however carry'd without any Difficulty; and a Committee was immediately appointed, consisting of eight out of each State; that is to say, eight Lords, eight Knights, and eight Burgesses, to prepare and digest the Plan of a new Settlement.

A Committee appointed to prepare a Plan of Settlement.

This was done the 26th, and not before, tho' Bishop Burnet seems desirous to have it thought, that it was almost the first Business they went upon: And whereas he farther supposes, that the Division of the House into three Parties, one of which was compos'd of all the Bishops, and some of the Nobility, arose upon this Occasion, nothing is more certain, than that all the Bishops, except the Archbishop of Glasgow, and the Bishop of Edinburgh had left the House before this great Point came to be discuss'd. As for the two other Parties that he speaks of, namely those who were for making the Settlement before they treated of the Union, and those who were for adjusting the Union before they made the Settlement, they were both one as to civil Matters; for both were equally averse to King James, and equally resolv'd to place the Crown on the Head of King William. To blast the Latter, indeed, the said Prelate is pleas'd to say, That all who favour'd King James join'd with them; whereas Lord Belcarres is express, that they refus'd to join with them, tho' earnestly importun'd under the most plausible Pretences, as well knowing, says he, in effect, that those were as deep in the Interest of the Prince of Orange who espous'd the Union, as those who oppos'd it.

We cannot besides, forget, that King William, himself, in his Letter to the States, not only recommended the Union in express Terms, as equally beneficial to both Kingdoms, but more especially at this Juncture; so that those alone were the thorough Courtiers, who undertook for the Union and Settlement jointly; and those who were for proceeding on the last first, resolv'd only to graft the Court-Interest upon their own: The Truth is, K. William was desirous to preserve Episcopacy in Scotland, tho' not out of any Love to the Thing, perhaps, but for the sake of his own peculiar Service. We learn from Bishop Burnet, that soon after his coming to St. James's, the Episcopal Party of Scotland sent up the Dean of Glasgow to him, to know what his Intentions were with relation to them; that he, the Bishop, introduc'd them to his then Highness; and that he promis'd them to do all he could for their Preservation, provided a full Toleration was granted to the Presbyterians; and they concurr'd in the new Settlement of that Kingdom: For if they oppos'd that, and if by a great Majority in Parliament, Resolutions should be taken against them, he could not make a War for them, &c. It was also of Importance to him to render his Measures in Scotland as palatable as he could to the reigning Taste in England, which was known to be for Episcopacy; and his Letter, as we have seen, was calculated accordingly. A.D. 1689.

Now the Scots could settle the Government by themselves, but there was no prosecuting any Scheme of Union without a Concurrence of both Nations; and it was foreseen that England would never agree that the abolishing of Episcopacy in Scotland should be one of the Articles; as therefore the Majority of the Scotish Convention were as much bent on effecting that, as of settling their Crown on King William; they thought it their wisest Course, so to proceed in the one as should most effectually enable them to do the other: And as they were headed by the Duke of Hamilton, who found his own Account in doing so, the contrary Party could make no Figure against them.

Thus the Union-Project soon fell to the Ground; and that of the Settlement was prosecuted with all imaginable Diligence, at once to oblige the new Court and serve themselves. But even that, we are told by the Earl of Belcarres, had its Difficulties; for though the Committee were all of one Mind, as to the Vacancy of the Throne; they differ'd as to the Manner of accounting for that Vacancy. "Some, says the Earl of Belcarres, were for Abdication, as had been done in England; but that could not pass among the most violent of them; for it could not be imagin'd that your Majesty had left Scotland. Others were for making use of an old obsolete Word, (forefaulting) used for a Bird's forsaking her Nest. But Sir John Dalrymple ended the Debate, by such Reasons against both, that they agreed to his new Proposition, which was, That your Majesty, by committing such Acts as he named, forefaulted your Right to the Crown; making this childish Distinction, That they intended not to forefault you as a Traitor, but only declare you forefaulted; which would make the Affair clear, and take off any Pretensions the Prince of Wales might afterwards have."

Not to lose Time in pointing out the Exceptions which this Passage is liable to, in a very few Days after the Committee had sat, they agreed in the following Vote, viz.

"The Estates of the Kingdom of Scotland find and declare, that King James VII. being a professed Papist, did assume the Royal Power, and acted as a King, without ever taking the Oath requir'd by Law, and had, by the Advice of evil and wicked Counsellors, invaded the fundamental Constitution of this Kingdom, and altered it from a legal and limited Monarchy to an arbitrary despotic Power; and had govern'd the same to the Subversion of the Protestant Religion, and Violation of the Laws and Liberties of the Nation, inverting all the Ends of Government; whereby he had forefaulted the Right

They resolve that King James had forefaulted the Government.

A.D. 1689. RIGHT (u) of the Crown, and the Throne was become vacant."

This being reported to the House, together with the Reasons upon which it was founded, the Remains of King James's Party, who still attended, tho' in the last Agonies of Despair, made use of all the Arguments they could devise to confute the one and expose the other. The Bishop of Edinburgh, in particular, we are told, alledg'd, That the Vote prepar'd by the Committee related many unlawful Acts of which the King was innocent, and which were wholly to be charg'd on his Ministers: That supposing him to be guilty, they were not competent Judges of his Misdemeanours, being illegally conven'd; and that, therefore, the best Means the Convention could follow for the good of the Nation, was to desire and favour his Majesty's Return into his Dominions, who, out of Gratitude, would not fail to redress all their Grievances. We are also told, that these Allegations of the Bishop were boldly and smartly (o) confuted. And it A.D. 1689.

[Life of King William. Vol. Edinburgh, II. p. 51.]

(u) These remarkable Words are omitted by the Author of the Life of King William, and by Mr. Tindal, who copies him Word for Word: And, in the Recapitulation of this Vote inserted in the Instrument of Rights, where these Words again occur, instead of saying the Right of the Crown, they both say the RIGHTS of the Crown; which do not convey the same Idea. And there is so much the more Necessity to be particular in this Circumstance, because it shews, that the Scotch Nation thereby renounced this Family Root and Branch, tho' some of them have so often since endeavour'd to restore them.

(o) This refers to a Speech in Print, in which are the following Passages:

"I. They (the Advocates for Slavery and King James) will endeavour to persuade us, that Kings are eximed from Punishments here on Earth, and nothing they do can be quarrelled with by their Subjects; which indeed might with some Reason be urged among the Turks, who reserve nothing from the Power of their Sultans, and where 'tis Death to dispute their Commands, tho' never so arbitrary and tyrannical: But with what Impudence can such Stuff be impos'd on us, who never admit our Kings to the Government, till they swear to rule us according to Law, and no otherwise? The Laws are the only Security we have for our Lives and Properties, which if our Sovereign subverts, Subjects cannot be blam'd for making use of the ordinary Means to preserve them; and since this cannot be done without withdrawing Obedience from such a Magistrate as goes about to destroy them, such an Act cannot properly be laid to punish him, because we take nothing from him to which he has a just Claim, but only shun the Occasion of making ourselves miserable. The speculative Doctrine of passive Obedience has done too much Mischief among us, and what has befallen the King may be justly imputed to it; for the believing that without Opposition he might do what he pleas'd encourag'd him to take such Measures as have drawn all these Misfortunes on him.

II. Others are so fond as to believe, that we may be secure in calling the King back, provided they to limit him, that it will not be in his Power to hurt us. These Men do not consider how small a Compliment this is to a Man of the King's Temper, from an absolute Prince, as he was pleas'd to stile himself, to content himself with the bare Title of a King: and how insupportable the Change must be, if from being Master of all, he must force himself to comply with a thousand Matters, and see his Throne become his Prison. But how airy it is to fancy, that any Restrictions of our Contrivance can bind the King? For 'tis most certain they can never be voluntary; and what is constrain'd and done by Force is by Law declar'd to be void and null; to whose Assistance the Pope's dispensing Power being join'd, would quickly blow off these Samson Cords, and the Royal Power would again revive all its Vigor and Lustre.

III. The King is of a Religion that has in a famous Council decreed, That no Faith is to be kept with Heretics, much less with Subjects whom he looks upon as so many Rebels, and will not miss to treat them as such, whenever they give him the Opportunity of doing it. For his greatest Admirers do no wrong to that Height of Idolatry, to imagine him so much Angel, as not to take all Methods to revenge so great an Affront, and secure himself at our Cost from such a Resentment for the future; the Apprehensions of which Resentment will frame such Terms in Men's Minds, that nothing will be capable to divert them from entring All for an Ace-ount, and Popery and Slavery will be thought a good Bargain, if they can but save their Lives. Then we may lament our Miseries, but it will not be in our Power to help them: for a Prince of Orange is not always ready to rescue us, with such well Resolve and so great Hazard to his Person; and if our Misfortunes hurry us so far, we deserve rather his Pity than his Resentment.

IV. What Arguments has the King given since he left us, to persuade us he will be more faithful in observing his Words and Oaths, than hitherto he has been? Does he not, in a Letter lately printed here, expressly say, he has ruled so, as to give no Occasion of Complaint to any of his Subjects? Is not the same Letter sign'd by one who stretch'd both Conscience and Honour to Interest; whose pernicious and headstrong Counsels have pushed him on his Ruin, tho' all that has been done cannot make him sensible of it? Serve the reducing Heretics to the See of Rome is not less meritorious than before; nor King James the Seventh, by breathing the French Air, become less Bigot? It were a Dream to fancy it. For so long as the Vatican thunders Excommunications against all such as do not use their utmost Endeavours to extirpate Heresy, a Roman Catholic must have no Religion at all, if that be not terrible to him.

The fourth Argument they made use of to perswade such as are and shall be chosen Members of the Convention, That the Peace and Happiness of the Nation cannot be otherwise secured, nor Factions or Divisions extinguish'd. But what Factions do you observe, but such as they themselves do foment, on purpose to disturb our Harmony? All which would immediately die, if the Government were once settled on those who deserve it best: for then, if these Fogs continued still food of Popery and Tyranny, they would be chastis'd as Disturbers of the public Peace. The Argument may very justly be retorted; for, if the King return, we will burst out into a Flame; and England, which has already declar'd, will quickly be on our Top, as Enemy too potent and too numerous for us, tho' we were all united. Besides the Danger to which such a Procedure will expose us, we cut off all Hopes of an Union with that Nation, and thereby deprive ourselves of an unspeakable Advantage, which would redound to all Sorts of People, and would be the only Means to support an impoverish'd and sinking Nation. Neither is this the only Inconvenience, tho' it be a very great one; for if we unite ourselves in opposition to England, by restoring the King whom they rejected, it is not to be doubted but he will use his utmost Endeavour to recover that Kingdom, the Loss of which is so considerable. Now, seeing it were vain to suppose that the Scots alone were able to second his Designs, he must needs have recourse to the French and Irish, whose Religion will procure a more entire Confidence than his Majesty can repose in any others. These therefore must be receiv'd into our Bosom; and because Scotland is the most proper Place for invading England, it must be the Scene of all the Blood and Confusion that this melancholy Thought gives us a Prospect of. And what Treatment can such Sham-Protestants expect from these, who otherwise would have become their Friends and Allies? And what Figure will they pretend to make, when they set up for a separate Interest from all the confederate Protestants in the World besides?

The happy Success the Prince's Enterprize has met with has made a considerable Alteration in the Affairs of Europe; for the great Enemy of the Protestants, and even of Christianity itself, who had prepar'd nothing less to himself than an universal Monarchy, whom the strictest Leagues and Contracts cannot bind, but without Regard to God or Man, threatens all his Neighbours with utter Destruction; by the Scene's being changed among us, is so far humbled, that from a proud and insulting Enemy, he is become a Supplicant for Peace; well foreseeing, that, if Britain join with those other Princes, whom his Insolence, Cruelty and Avarice has so justly arm'd against him, his Ruin is inevitable. So that if we have not Soul enough to enjoy this great Blessing, and can easily part with the Glory of being once more the Arbiters of Europe, let us at least have so much Christian Love and Charity for the neighbouring Nations of our own Perswasion, as not to expose them to a necessary Participation of these Plagues, which our common Enemies are preparing for us, and which will certainly terminate in our Destruction.

Lastly, I beseech you to consider what Persons they are who would instil this Fallacy in you, and you will find them of three Kinds: First, Those who, postponing the common Good of the Nation, are wholly acted by Self-Interest, considering that in a Government where Justice and Mercy equally flourish, Virtue and Merit, not Villany, will be rewarded. Secondly, They who are ignorant of the Nature of Government, and never were at the Pains to inform themselves what Measures the Law of Nature and Nations have set to Men's Obedience, but are angry at every thing that thwarts their wild Notions, and will admit of nothing, tho'

A. D. 1689. [Gazette, Num. 2443.] The Estates adopt their Vote and fill the Throne with King William and Queen Mary.

it is certain, that the whole House, except twelve, says the London Gazette, except five, says Lord Belcarres, confirm'd the Vote of their Committee; and not only pass'd it into an Act the same Day, but order'd the said Committee to prepare another Act for settling the Crown upon King William and Queen Mary, to consider the Terms of the Destination of the Heirs of the Crown; and likewise to prepare and bring in an Instrument of Government, to be offer'd with the Crown for the securing of the People from the Grievances which they labour'd under. The Lord President himself, tho' not oblig'd to vote, was both the first to declare the Throne vacant, and the first to propose, that it might be filled with the King and Queen of England, or, according to the Words of the Nobleman just quoted, to make an humble Offer thereof to the Prince and Princess of Orange.

They are proclam'd at Edinburgh.

On the eleventh of April, which was the Coronation Day of their Majesties in England, the Act, Terms, and Instrument, abovemention'd, were reported to the States by the said Committee; and after having been distinctly read and consider'd, were unanimously approv'd. Even the Duke of Queensberry, and Marquis of Athole, who had excepted to the Vote of Vacancy, attending that Day; and taking Occasion to declare, in Imitation of some of their Neighbours, That tho' they were not satisfy'd with the said Vote, they now acquiesc'd in it, and agreed that none were so worthy to fill the Throne as King William and Queen Mary.

The great Point being thus carry'd, the next Step was to make it public by a solemn Proclamation of their new Sovereigns; which was done the same Day at the Market Cross of Edinburgh, by the Lord President in (p) Person, assisted by the Lord Provost, and all the Magistracy of Edinburgh, the Duke of Queensberry, the Marquises of Athole and Douglas, &c. A. D. 1689.

This Ceremony was follow'd by another Proclamation, " to certify the Leiges, That none should presume to acknowledge the late King James for their King or obey him, nor accept of, nor assist any Commissions from him, nor hold any Correspondence with him; and that none, upon their highest Peril, by Word, Writing, Sermon, or any other manner of way impugn or disown the Royal Authority of King William and Queen Mary, or to misconstrue the Proceeding of the Estates, or to create Jealousies or Misapprehensions of the Actings of the Government, &c.

The Estates also made an Order, requiring the Attendance of all their Members by the 22d, on Pain of Imprisonment: But this was rather to strike a Terror into the Absentees, than really oblige them to attend; for, having settled the Coronation Oath, having commission'd one Member out of each Estate, viz. The Earl of Argyle (who was permitted to take his Seat, notwithstanding the Attainder of his Father) for the Lords, Sir James Montgomery for the Knights, and Sir John Dalrymple for the Boroughs, to repair to London, to invest their Majesties with the Government, and appointed a Committee to take care of the public Peace, they adjourn'd to the 21st of May.

The Crown tender'd to the King and Queen at Whitehall.

On the eleventh of May the said Commissioners, attended by most of the Scotish Nobility and Gentry then resident in and about London, who were requir'd by a special Order of the Estates so to do, were solemnly introduc'd to their Majesties, and presented first a Letter from the said States (q) preparatory to what was to follow, then the (r) Instrument never so reasonable and convincing, if their dull Capacities cannot reach it. The third sort are such as have been instrumental in the enslaving their Country, and are afraid, if they be call'd to an Account, they may be brought to suffer condign Punishment; if such cannot succeed in their Design, they at least hope to be overlook'd in a general Confusion, so they leave nothing unessay'd that may tend to their own Safety; and if Heaven fail them, they summon Hell to their Aid; not Love to their Prince, but mere Ambition and Interest drive these Criminals to such Attempts; neither are they much to blame if they are at such Pains to sow Divisions among us: But no Person of Wit and Judgment, nor any good Man that is truly Protestant, and minds the good of his Country, will suffer himself to be so grossly impos'd on by such Firebrands, who would build their future imaginary Greatness on the Ruin of our Religion, Laws and Country."

(p) This, according to the Earl of Belcarres, was the meanest Action that a Duke could have stoop'd to: For, says he, he officiated as a Clerk, and read from the Cross, to the People, the Act of Convention.

(q) Viz. Beseeching their Majesties to sign and swear the Oath which the Law had appointed to be taken by the Kings and Queens at their Accession to the Crown, till such time as Affairs should allow that Kingdom the Happiness of their Presence, in order to their Coronation; declaring, that they were sensible of his Majesty's Kindness and paternal Care in promoting the Union, which they hop'd was reserv'd for him to accomplish; and thanking his Majesty for sending those Troops that might help to preserve them, and assur'd him, that as it was the Interest of England to contribute towards the Security of Scotland, so they should not be wanting, on their Parts, to give their Assistance for the reducing of Ireland."

(r) The said Instrument and List of Grievances were as follow:

"That King James had invaded the Constitution of that Kingdom, 1. By erecting public Schools and Societies of the Jesuits; and not only allowing Mass to be publicly said, but also converting Protestant Chapels and Churches to public Mass-houses, contrary to the express Laws against saying and hearing Mass. 2. By allowing Popish Books to be printed and dispersed by a Patent to a Popish Printer, designing him Printer to his Majesty's Household, College, and Chapel, contrary to Law. 3. By taking the Children of Protestant Noblemen and Gentlemen, sending them abroad to be bred Papists, and bestowing Pensions upon Priests, to pervert Protestants from their Religion by Offers of Places and Preferments. 4. By discharging Protestants, at the same time he employ'd Papists in Places of greatest Trust, both Civil and Military, &c. and intrusting the Ports and Magazines in their Hands. 5. By imposing Oaths contrary to Law. 6. By exacting Money without Consent of Parliament or Convention of Estates. 7. By levying and keeping up a standing Army in time of Peace, without Consent of Parliament, and maintaining them upon free Quarter. 8. By employing the Officers of the Army as Judges throughout the Kingdom; by whom the Subjects were put to death without legal Trial, Jury, or Record. 9. By imposing exorbitant Fines to the Value of the Parties Estates, exacting extravagant Bail, and disposing of Fines and Forfeitures before any Process or Conviction. 10. By imprisoning Persons without expressing the Reason, and delaying to bring them to Trial. 11. By causing several Persons to be prosecuted, and their Estates to be forfeited, upon Stretches of old and forfeited Laws, upon weak and frivolous Pretences, and upon lame and defective Proofs; as particularly the late Earl of Argyle, to the Scandal of the Justice of the Nation. 12. By subverting the Rights of the Royal Boroughs, the third Estate of Parliament; imposing upon them not only Magistrates, but also the whole Town-council and Clerks, contrary to their Liberties and express Charters, without any Pretence of Sentence, Surrender, or Consent: So that the Commissioners to Parliaments being chosen by the Magistrates and Councils, the King might, in effect, as well nominate the Estate of Parliament.

His Majesty's Speech to the Commissioners.

"When I engag'd in this Undertaking, I had particular Regard and Consideration for Scotland, and therefore I did emit a Declaration in relation to that, as well as to this Kingdom, which I intend to make good and effectual to them. I take it very kindly that Scotland has express'd so much Confidence in, and Affection to, me: They shall find me willing to assist them in every thing that concerns the well-being and Interest of that Kingdom, by making what Laws shall be necessary for the Security of their Religion, Property, and Liberty, and to ease them of what may lie justly grievous to them."

The Coronation-Oath.

The Coronation-Oath was then tender'd to their Majesties by the Earl of Argyle, importing in Effect, That they promis'd and swore, in Presence of the eternal God, to serve him to the utmost of their Power, according to his revealed Will, during the whole Course of their Lives: That they would maintain the true Religion of Christ Jesus, as then receiv'd and preach'd within the Realm of Scotland, and would abolish and gain-stand all

Besides that many of the Magistrates by him put in were Papists; and the Boroughs were forced to pay Money for the Letters imposing those illegal Magistrates upon them. 13. By sending Letters to the chief Courts of Justice, not only ordering the Judges to stop sine die, but also commanding how to proceed in Cases depending before them, contrary to the express Laws; and by changing the Nature of the Judges Patents ad vitam or culpam into a Commission de bene placito, to dispose them to a Compliance with arbitrary Courses, and turning them out of their Offices, if they refus'd to comply. 14. By granting personal Protections for civil debts, contrary to law.

All which were Miscarriages of King James, utterly and directly contrary to the known Laws, Freedom, and Statutes of the Realm of Scotland.

Upon which Grounds and Reasons the Estates of the Kingdom of Scotland did find and declare, that King James VII. being a profess'd Papist, did assume the Regal Power, &c. whereby he had forefaulted the Right of the Crown, and the Throne was become vacant, &c.

Therefore, in regard his Royal Highness, then Prince of Orange, since King of England, whom it pleased God to make the glorious Instrument of delivering these Kingdoms from Popery and arbitrary Power, by Advice of several Lords and Gentlemen of the Scots Nation then at London, did call the Estates of this Kingdom to meet upon the 14th of March last, in order to such an Establishment, as that their Religion, Laws and Liberties might not again be in danger of being subverted; the said Estates being at that time assembled accordingly in a full and free Representative of the Nation, taking into their most serious Consideration the best Means for attaining the Ends aforesaid, did, in the first place, as their Ancestors in like Cases had usually done, for the vindicating and asserting their ancient Rights and Liberties, declare, That, by the Law of Scotland, no Papist could be King or Queen of the Realm, nor bear any Office therein; nor that any Protestant Successor could exercise the Regal Power, till they had sworn the Coronation Oath. 2. That all Proclamations asserting an absolute Power to null and dissolve Laws, in order for erecting Schools and Colleges for Jesuits, converting Protestant Churches and Chapels into Mass-houses, and the allowing Mass to be said, and the allowing popish Books to be printed and dispersed, was contrary to Law. 3. That the taking the Children of Noblemen and Gentlemen and others, and keeping them abroad to be bred Papists; the making Funds and Donations to Popish Schools and Colleges; the bestowing Pensions on Priests; and the seducing Protestants from their Religion by Offers of Places and Preferments; was contrary to Law. 4. That the disarming of Protestants, and employing Papists in the greatest Places of Trust, both civil and military, &c. was contrary to Law. 5. That the imposing an Oath, without Authority of Parliament, was contrary to Law. 6. That the raising of Money, without Consent of Parliament or Convention, was contrary to Law. 7. That employing the Officers of the Army as Judges, &c. was contrary to Law. 8. That the imposing extraordinary Fines, &c. was contrary to Law. 9. That the imprisoning of Persons, without expressing the Reasons, &c. was the same. 10. That the prosecuting and seizing Mens Estates as forfeited, upon Stretches of old, obsolete Laws, &c. was contrary to Law. 11. That the nominating and imposing Magistrates, &c. upon Boroughs, contrary to their express Charter, was the same. 12. That the sending Letters to the Courts of Justice, ordaining the Judges to desist from determining Causes, and ordaining them how to proceed in Causes depending before them, &c. was contrary to Law. 13. That the granting of personal Protections was the same. 14. That the forcing the Subjects to depose against themselves in capital Causes, however the Punishments were restricted, was contrary to Law. 15. That the using Torture without Evidence, or in ordinary Crimes, was contrary to Law. 16. That the sending of an Army in a warlike manner into any Part of the Kingdom, in time of Peace, and exacting Locality and free Quarters, was the same. 17. That charging the Subjects with Law-boroughs at the King's Instance, and imposing Bonds without Authority of Parliament, and the suspending Advocates for not appearing, when Bonds were offer'd, was contrary to Law. 18. That the putting Garrisons into private Mens Houses, in time of Peace, without Authority of Parliament, was illegal. 19. That the Opinions of the Lords of the Sessions in the two Cases following were illegal, viz. That the concerting the Demand of the Supply of a forefaulted Person, altho' not given, was Treason; that Persons refusing to discover their private Thoughts, in relation to Points of Treason, or other Mens Actions, are guilty of Treason. 20. That the fining Husbands for their Wives withdrawing from Church was illegal. 21. That Prelacy, and Superiority of an Office in the Church above Presbyters, is and has been a great and insupportable Burthen to this Nation, and contrary to the Inclinations of the Generality of the People ever since the Reformation, they having reform'd Popery by Presbytery, and therefore ought to be abolish'd. 22. That it is the Right and Privilege of the Subject to protest for Remedy of Law to the King and Parliament, against Sentences pronounc'd by the Lords of the Sessions; provided the same do not stop Executions of the said Sentences. 23. That it is the Right of the Subject to petition the King; and that all Prosecutions and Imprisonments for such petitioning were contrary to Law.

Therefore, for the Redress of all Grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving the Laws, they claimed, That Parliaments ought to be frequently called, and allowed to sit, and Freedom of Speech and Debate allowed to the Members.

And then they further claim'd and insisted upon all and sundry the Premises, as their undoubted Rights and Liberties; and that no Declaration or Proceedings to the Prejudice of the People, in any of the said Premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into Example; but that all Forfeitures, Fines, Loss of Offices in Imprisonments, Banishments, Prosecutions, and rigorous Executions, be considered, and the Parties redress'd.

To which Demand of their Rights, and Redress of their Grievances, they took themselves to be encouraged by the King of England's Declaration for the Kingdom of Scotland in October last, as being the only Means for obtaining a full Redress and Remedy therein.

Therefore, forasmuch as they had an entire Confidence, that his Majesty of England would perfect the Deliverance so far advanced by him, and would still preserve them from the Violation of the Rights which they had asserted, and from all other Attempts upon their Religion, Laws and Liberties; the said Estates of the Kingdom of Scotland had resolved, 'That William and Mary, King and Queen of 'England, be declared King and Queen of Scotland, to hold 'the Crown and Royal Dignity of the said Kingdom to them 'the said King and Queen during their Lives, and the longest 'Liver of them; and that the sole and full Exercise of the 'Power to be only in and exercised by him the said King, in 'the Names of the said King and Queen during their Lives: 'And, after their Decease, that the said Crown and Royal 'Dignity to be to the Heirs of the Body of the said Queen; 'which failing, to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the 'Heirs of her Body; which also failing, to the Heirs of the 'Body of the said William King of England.'

And then withal they pray'd the said King and Queen to accept the same accordingly.

It was also declar'd by the Instrument, that the following Oath, 'I A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, that I will 'be faithful, and bear true Allegiance, to their Majesties 'King William and Queen Mary. So help me God.' should be taken by all Protestants, by whom the Oaths of Allegiance, and all other Oaths and Declarations, should be abrogated.

D. 1689. all falſe Religion: That they ſhould rule the People committed to their Charge according to the Will and Command of God, and the laudable Laws and Conſtitutions receiv'd in that Realm, not repugnant thereto: That they would procure to the Kirk of God, and all Chriſtian People, true and perfect Peace, to the utmoſt of their Power, in all time coming: That they would preſerve and keep inviolated the Rights and Rents, &c. with all juſt Privileges of the Crown of Scotland: That they would forbid and repreſs in all Eſtates and Degrees, Oppreſſion and all kind of Wrong: That they would command and procure, that Juſtice and Equity be kept to all Perſons without Exception, as the Lord and Father of all Mercies ſhould be merciful to them; and that they would be careful to root out all Heretics and Enemies to the true Worſhip of God, &c.

His Majeſty's Scruple concerning it.

Here the King, to his immortal Honour, took occaſion to declare, That he did not mean by theſe Words, that he was under any Obligation to be a Perſecutor; and the Commiſſioners replying, That neither the Meaning of the Oath, nor the Law of Scotland did import it, his Majeſty rejoin'd, That he took the Oath in that Senſe, and call'd upon the Commiſſioners themſelves, and others preſent, to bear witneſs that he did ſo.

Having thus thrown the whole Affair of the Settlement into one View, it is neceſſary to take notice of certain Incidents that happen'd while it was yet depending. Lord Dundee and his Followers had no ſooner left Edinburgh, than the Eſtates ſent a Herald and a Trumpet to command him to return, on pain of being out-law'd and denounc'd a Rebel; but he refus'd to obey it; and in a Letter to the Lord-Preſident, excus'd that Refuſal, by urging, "That after he had, in full Convention complain'd of Deſigns to murder him, and they had refus'd to take any one Step to do him Juſtice, he thought himſelf oblig'd to take Refuge elſewhere: That he could not think the Aſſembly itſelf free, as long as it was over-aw'd by the Followers of the Weſtern Members; and more eſpecially now it was ſurrounded with foreign Troops (alluding to thoſe under Mackay) and that he would nevertheleſs return immediately, on Aſſurance of Liberty and Juſtice." This, however, had no other Effect than to enrage the Aſſembly yet farther againſt him; for they immediately paſs'd an Act, declaring him Fugitive, Out-law, Rebel, agreeable to their former Menaces, which was publiſh'd at the Market Croſs at Edinburgh: And this, we are to underſtand by the Lord Belcarres, was ſo much the more rigid and unjuſt, becauſe he had, as yet, no Intentions to make any Attempt in favour of King James, but, on the Contrary, had expreſs Orders to keep as quiet as he could, till he could ſend him Aſſiſtance from Ireland: Nor, proceeds his Lordſhip, had he ever reſolv'd to meddle, if he had not been oblig'd to ſave himſelf from a Party that came to apprehend him.

Lord Dundee's Letter to the States.

But whatever King James's Orders were, or however ſeemingly quiet his Friends thought it adviſeable to remain, they did not give over their Machinations to break the Peace, and throw the Kingdom into Confuſion: For it is acknowledg'd by the Earl of Belcarres himſelf, that when the Project blew up, of opening a Counter-Convention at Stirling, their next Endeavour for the good of the Cauſe was, to prevail with the Duke of Gordon to fire upon the Town of Edinburgh, in order to break up That held there; and of which the Members who compos'd it were ſo apprehenſive, that they had already reſolv'd to retire to Glaſgow, in caſe any ſuch Attempt ſhould be made. The Counteſs of Errol, it ſeems, had kept a ſecret Correſpondence with that Duke ever ſince the Caſtle had been block'd up; and by her was this Piece of Advice convey'd: But however faithful his Grace was to his old Maſter, or zealous for his Service, he had no mind to make his own Caſe deſperate by ſo deſperate a Meaſure: On the contrary, he abſolutely refuſs'd (s) to give into it, or to do any thing but defend himſelf, till he had the King's Orders; and ſo ſays the Earl, our whole Deſigns were broke.

Which he refuſed.

On the Heels of this Diſappointment, one Brady, who had been diſpatch'd from Ireland by King James, with freſh Inſtructions to his Friends in Scotland, fell into the Hands of the Convention. He had been betray'd by one who had borne him Company, on Purpoſe to worm out his Secret. But tho' he had been abundantly too communicative to him, he had nevertheleſs made ſuch a Reſerve, as was ſufficient to barter for his own Indemnity; for, when taken and ſearch'd, nothing was found upon him; all his Papers being conceal'd within a falſe Bottom to his Valiſe. That, therefore, he might find Favour in the Sight of the Lord Preſident, and the reſt of the Committee who examin'd him, he ſet them at Eaſe at once, by diſcovering all he knew; producing his Letters, and particularizing from whom he receiv'd them, and to whom they were to be deliver'd: Which laſt Circumſtance was of ſo much the greater Moment, becauſe they were without Superſcriptions. According to Lord Belcarres, however, they contain'd no more, in the main, than a Repetition of the King's former Commands, to attempt nothing till they receiv'd farther Orders; except, that he alſo mention'd five hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe, which he had in Readineſs to embark, and which were to aſſiſt them in making thoſe Orders effectual. But this was ſufficient to ſhew, that King James had a Party devoted to his Intereſt, and engag'd to aſſiſt him, as ſoon as call'd upon: And there were beſides yet other Letters from Lord Melfort, both to Dundee and Belcarres, of

One Brady ſeiz'd with Letters from King James and Melfort.

Their Contents.

(s) He was even ſo complaiſant to the Townſmen, that, when he had receiv'd the News of the King's landing in Ireland, and thought himſelf oblig'd to teſtify his Joy by a general Diſcharge of his Artillery, he ſent to apprize the Magiſtrates thereof, to prevent even their very Fears of his having any hoſtile Intentions againſt them.

A. D. 1689. of a moſt extraordinary Tendency, and which were, indeed, ſufficient to alarm any Government, and any Nation whatever. In one of theſe, to Clavering, (Dundee) ſays the Secretary, "You will aſk me, without queſtion, How we intend to pay our Army? But never fear that, ſo long as there are Rebels Eſtates; we will begin with the great ones, and end with the little ones, &c. And in another to the Lord Belcarres, "The Eſtates of the Rebels will recompenſe us. Experience has taught our illuſtrious Maſter, that there are a good Number of People that muſt be made Gibeonites, becauſe they are good for nothing elſe: You know that there are ſeveral Lords that we mark'd out, when we were both together, that deſerve no better.----Theſe will ſerve for Examples to others." It is true, that, by way of Extenuation, Lord Belcarres writes,---- "But what the Earl of Melfort's Intentions were in theſe Expreſſions, I cannot determine; but to juſtify him and myſelf, I declare, that he never in his Life made the leaſt Inſinuation to me of any ſuch Propoſitions; but whatever he intended by them, nothing could have been more to the Prejudice of your (King James's) Affairs, nor for my Ruin; which did ſhew, that nothing but Cruelty would be us'd, if ever your Majeſty return'd." He alſo makes the Duke of Queenſberry, who undertook to be his Advocate to the States, ſay in his Vindication, "That he doubted not but the Earl of Melfort had writ theſe Letters on purpoſe to ruin him (Belcarres) and that if Letters writ by another could faſten a Crime on him they were ſent to, it was in every Man's Power to ruin his Enemies, when and how he pleas'd: And immediately after inſinuates, That the Snare was laid for him, becauſe he had been one of thoſe who had made a joint Remonſtrance to King James, to lay aſide that Lord (Melfort) becauſe he was univerſally obnoxious to both Kingdoms. But whatever Truth there might be in theſe Allegations, they had no Effect: He was known to be an irreconcileable Enemy to the Preſbytery as well as Dundee, who is charg'd with having kill'd above a hundred Men in cold Blood, at a Field-Meeting; and it was reſolv'd to make Examples of them both. Accordingly, Parties were ſent to ſeize them: Belcarres fell into their Hands, and was thrown into the common Goal: But Dundee, who was ſurrounded with a Party of his own Regiment, ſtood upon the Defenſive, and not only made his Eſcape to the Highlands, but thought himſelf at Liberty to have recourſe to Arms, without waiting either for the Succours or Orders, which King James had promis'd.

Copies of theſe Letters of Brady's were alſo diſpatch'd to King William, and by him communicated to the Houſe of Lords, who, thereupon, brought in a Bill to empower his Majeſty to apprehend ſuſpected Perſons; which paſs'd both Houſes, and receiv'd the Royal Aſſent, in one (f) Day. A. D. 1689. Copies of theſe Letters ſent into England.

It is obſerv'd by Lord Belcarres, that till the King (William) had got his Buſineſs done, he ſo manag'd both Parties (Epiſcopal, and Preſbyterian Whigs) that each believ'd they had the ſole Poſſeſſion of his Favour, and of courſe ſhould have the ſole Exerciſe of his Power. But no ſooner was his Buſineſs done, than he undeceiv'd them both, and ſhew'd that he would be engroſs'd by neither.

The Duke of Hamilton expected to be made the new King's Commiſſioner, when the Convention ſhould be turn'd into a Parliament; and, likewiſe, to have all the Places in the Kingdom at his Diſpoſal: But his Majeſty made him Commiſſioner only, and diſpos'd of all the other Places himſelf; which, ſays Burnet, were ſplit into Commiſſions, that many might have a Share; whereby none were ſatisfy'd, and all became contemptible. Sir James Montgomery, one of the three Commiſſioners ſent up with the Tender of the Crown, who had been a principal Manager of the Settlement, expected no leſs than the Secretary's Seals for his Reward; which, to his infinite Mortification, were beſtow'd on Lord Melvil; one of thoſe who had taken Refuge in Holland, from the Violences of the two laſt Reigns, whoſe chief Merit conſiſted in his being a leſs rigid Preſbyterian than Montgomery, and his having join'd in adviſing an Expedition, which had anſwer'd ſo well: He is characteris'd by Burnet, as a narrow-hearted Man, who conſulted his own Intereſt only, without any Regard to that of his King or Country; and, by Others, as one whoſe only Qualifications for ſo conſiderable a Station were, Ductility and Servility; and who ſacrific'd all Conſiderations to his own inſatiable Avarice, and that of his Family. With him was colleagu'd in the King's good Graces, Dalrymple Lord Stair, (formerly Lord Preſident of the College of Juſtice, and now deſtin'd to the ſame Poſt, the Father of Dalrymple the Commiſſioner, now alſo made the King's Advocate) on whom his Majeſty reſolv'd to rely chiefly for Advice, tho' he had heard great Complaints of him, and tho' thoſe Complaints were not without Foundation. It is in this Language the ſame Prelate ſpeaks of him; but, according to Lord Belcarres, he was, tho' a Fanatic, generally (t) abhorr'd by them; being a Man of neither Religion or Honour; having comply'd in all things with all Governments, for fifty A Preſbyterian Oppoſition form'd in the Scots Parliament.

(t) Which is fully verify'd by the following Invective, publiſhed by that Party againſt him in the Year 1689:

"And as Stair's aſſuming the Office of Preſident, upon the illegal Choice of the aforementioned King (Charles), was both an Affronting and Betraying of the known Laws of the Kingdom; ſo his whole Behaviour in that Station was of one Piece and Compleſtion with his entring upon it, being a continued Series of Oppreſſion and Treachery to his Country. For, beſides, that all his Verdicts between Subject and Subject, were more ambiguous than the Delphic Oracles, and the Occaſion of the Commencement of innumerable Suits, in place of the determining of any, he was the principal Miniſter of all Lauderdale's Arbitrariouſe, and of King Charles's Uſurpations. Nor was there a Rapine or Murder

A. D. 1689. fifty Years before, and caball'd with all Parties, without being true to any. But though both theſe were Preſbyterians, they did not think it adviſeable to form the whole Regency of Scotland of none but ſuch: On the contrary, they admitted ſuch of the Epiſcopal Nobility to the Council-board, as were of the moſt pliant Tempers, that they might humour one Party, while the great Scope of their Endeavours was to ſerve the other: But this trimming Expedient anſwer'd in Scotland even worſe than it had done in England; for, as, on the one hand, the Preſbyterians would not bear the leaſt Intermixture of the Epiſcopal Leaven among them; ſaying openly, That it was not fit that thoſe ſhould be Counſellors to the King, who withſtood his Admiſſion to the Crown; ſo, on the other, as only the leaſt ſignificant of that Party were thus promoted, and theſe had not Credit or Intereſt enough to carry a ſingle Vote, or Spirit enough to attempt it, the reſt, who had been uſed to have all Power and Importance center'd in themſelves, could neither bear to be overlook'd, nor to be repreſented by Cyphers.

Thus the Settlement was no ſooner made than the Seeds of Diſcord were ſcatter'd all over it; and even in that barren Soil took as deep root, and produc'd Miſchiefs as abundantly, as in the fatteſt and beſt.

Scotiſh Affairs miſrepreſented by Biſhop Burnet.

In the Note which contains the Scotiſh Inſtrument of Government and Claim of Rights, we have ſeen the following Clauſe: "That Prelacy and Superiority of any Office in the Church, above Preſbyters, is and has been a great and inſupportable Grievance and Trouble to this Nation, and contrary to the Inclinations of the Generality of the People, ever ſince the Reformation, (they having reform'd Popery by Preſbytery) and therefore ought to be aboliſh'd." And upon this Clauſe the Hiſtorian of his own Times is pleas'd to comment as follows: "It was an abſurd thing to put this in a Claim of Rights, for which not only they had no Law, but which was contrary to many Laws then in being: So that, tho' they might have offer'd it as a Grievance, there was no Colour for pretending it was a national Right. But they had a Notion among them, that every Article that ſhould be put into the Claim of Rights became an unalterable Law, and a Condition upon which the Crown was to be held: Whereas Grievances were ſuch things as were ſubmitted to the King and Parliament, to be redreſs'd or not, as they ſhould ſee Cauſe: But upon the Biſhops, and thoſe who adher'd to them, having left the Convention, the Preſbyterians had a Majority of Voices to carry every thing they pleas'd, how unreaſonable ſoever; and, upon this, the aboliſhing Epiſcopacy in Scotland was made a neceſſary Article of the new Settlement." Now, not to inſiſt, that the Majority, who had taken this Notion into their Heads, and who had it in their Power to do ſuch unreaſonable things, were the Founders of the new Settlement, and conſequently knew beſt on what Conditions they made it, the King himſelf ſeems to have had the ſame Notion, at the time of his accepting the Offer they made him, as will appear, by his own Inſtructions to his Commiſſioner, in the proper Place: And whereas the Biſhop is farther pleas'd to inſinuate, That his Majeſty was under no Obligation to comply with their Claims, by ſaying, That, WHEN the Coronation-Oath was taken, they were NEXT to offer the PETITION for the Redreſs of Grievances, it appears by the Gazette, That he has inverted the Order of the Proceeding, for the ſake of that Inference: For therein we are expreſly informa'd, that the Coronation-Oath was tender'd to their Majeſties, AFTER the Scotiſh Commiſſioners had preſented the ſeveral Papers they were charg'd with: And, if his Majeſty had not underſtood thoſe Claims to be Conditions, he would certainly have ſignify'd as much, with the ſame Freedom, that he excepted to the Clauſe in the Oath, in relation to the rooting out of Hereſy.

A. D. 168

The ſaid Author moreover miſrepreſents the Matter of Fact, in ſaying, "Lord Melvil hop'd to have gain'd the Preſbyterian Party, by ſending Inſtructions to Duke Hamilton to open the Seſſion with an Act in favour of Preſbytery. But the Majority reſolv'd to begin with their temporal Concerns." In the Scotiſh Remonſtrance of Grievances, the firſt Article was as follows: "The Eſtates of the Kingdom of Scotland do repreſent, That the Committee of Parliament, called The (u) Articles, is a great Grievance Murder committed in the Kingdom, under the Countenance of Royal Authority, but what he was either the Author of, the Aſſiſter in, or ready to juſtify. And from his having been a military Commander, for aſſerting and vindicating the Laws, Rights, and Liberties of the Kingdom againſt the little, pretended Inventions of Charles I. he came to overthrow and trample upon them all, in the Quality of a civil Officer, under Charles II. Nor is there a Man in the whole Kingdom of Scotland, who hath been more acceſſary to the Robberies and Spoils, and who is more ſtain'd with the bloody Meaſures, of the Times, than this Lord Stair, whom his Majeſty hath been impos'd upon, to conſtitute again Preſident of the College of Juſtice. And, as an Aggravation of his Crimes, he hath perpetrated them under the Veil of Religion, and by Forms of Law; which is the bringing the Holy and Righteous God to be an Authorizer and Approver of his Villanies, and the making the Shield of our Protection to be the Sword of our Ruin. [Proceedings in the Scotiſh Parliament vindicated, p. 36.

(u) "But that we may diſcourſe intelligibly of that Committee called The Articles, it will be neceſſal to give ſome brief Account both of what it originally was, and what by degrees it grew up, or rather degenerated into, till it became at laſt an inſupportable Grievance to the Nation, and rendred Parliaments either wholly uſeleſs, or mere Inſtruments for purſuing and executing the King's Will. Now by what appears, either from our Hiſtory, Records, or Statute-books, there was no ſuch thing anciently as a Committee, or Lords of Articles, but every thing was as well originally moved, as debated and concluded in full Parliament. For the firſt mention we meet with in our Records of Lords of the Articles is, in the Year 1466, and the Reign of King James III: Where we find, that, upon the Convention of the Eſtates of Parliament, they not only choſe ſo many from among themſelves, to be Judges in civil and criminal Cauſes, who are ſtyled Domini ad Querelas, there being then no judicial Court, ſave what the Parliament conſtituted from time to time out of their own Body: But that they alſo elected three Perſons for the Clergy, three for the Barons, and three for the Burgeſſes, to conſider of and prepare Matters fit and needful for the Houſe to bring into Debate, and to come to Votes and Reſolutions about. By which it ſeems that this Committee of the Articles had no auſpicious Beginning, having its Riſe under one of the worſt of

A. D. 1689. Grievance to the Nation; and there ought to be no Committee of Parliament, but such as are freely chosen by the Estates to prepare Motions and Overtures that are first made in the House." And the second, "That the first Act of Parliament in 1669 (by which, thro' Lauderdale's Management, the King's Supremacy was carry'd so high, that it was in his Power to prescribe what Mode of Religion he pleas'd) is inconsistent with the Establishment of the Church Government now desired, and ought to be abrogate." And the King's Instructions to his Grace the Lord Commissioner, preserve the same Order: For, after the fundamental Clause, for turning the Meeting of the Estates into a Parliament, follows immediately that relating to the Articles: And after a third, as necessary as the first, for recognising the King and Queen's Royal Authority, and appointing the Oaths of Allegiance, follows that which permits the Establishment of their Church A. of all our Kings, and who came to the most unhappy and unfortunate End: However, there appears no such thing here, as that the Officers of State were to be supernumerary to those chosen by the Parliament; or that the King, either by himself or by one representing him, chose any of them; but it is evident from the Record, that they were wholly and entirely elected by the States themselves in Parliament assembled. And tho' the being an Officer of State was never esteem'd a Ground disabling and incapacitating a Person from being a Member of the Committee of Articles; yet, upon a Perusal of the Records, I do not find, that any Officers of State made a Part of the Lords of the Articles, until the Year 1567; and their being then of that Number was not ratione Officii, but by reason of the Parliament's having elected them into that Station. For whosoever consults the Records of Parliament of the Years 1467, 1475, 1524, 1526, 1528, 1537, 1542, 1543, will find, that the Officers of State were so far from being supernumerary in the Committees of the Articles, that they were not so much as elected into that Trust, nor had any Room or Place allow'd them there; tho' it appears by the Records of all those Parliaments, that there were Members chosen by, and out of, the respective Estates, sometimes in larger and sometimes in lesser Numbers, to make up and constitute such Committees. Yea, I cannot but add, That our not meeting with any Mention of the Lords of Articles of the Parliaments assembled and held 1469, 1471, 1474, 1481, 1483, 1488, 1489, 1491, 1493, 1505, 1515, 1528, 1535, 1540, 1546, 1551, is an undoubted Evidence, that the having Committees of the Articles was not a thing of indispensible Necessity, or to which Parliaments were legally obliged; but that it was a Matter of arbitrary Pleasure; and that they were chosen or omitted, as the House thought to be most useful and convenient for the Management and Dispatch of their Affairs. And though it cannot be deny'd, but that, after the Year 1567, some of the Officers of State were now and then thought worthy, by reason of their moral and intellectual Abilities, to be chosen among others for Lords of the Articles, as in the Parliaments held in the Years 1581 and 1593; yet it is most evident, that they were not elected into that Committee by virtue and Reason of their Offices; much less, that there as supernumerary to those chosen by the Estates; forasmuch as in other Parliaments, particularly in those held in the Years 1587, 1592, and 1594, there is no Intelligence, Report, or Remembrance of them, in the Registers and Lists of those of whom the forementioned Committees were made up and constituted. And that which puts it beyond all Possibility of being controuled (save either by ignorant or by impudent and self-condemned Men) that no Officers of State had Right anciently to be of the Committee of Articles, unless positively chosen by the Estates of Parliament, is the 57th Act of Parl. 11 of James VI. where, Provision being made by Law about the Number whereof that Committee should be constituted, it is, without the least Mention or Suggestion of those Officers of State, enacted and ordained, 'That the 'Number of the Lords of Articles be equal in each Estate, 'and that the fewest Number of every Estate be fix, and the 'greatest Number ten.' Yea so far were those, called Lords of Articles, from having originally the sole Power of preparing Matters, and of bringing in Motions and Overtures, to be considered and debated in Parliament, exclusive of other Members of the House, who were not of that Committee; that both at first, and for a long Tract of Time afterwards, they were not so much as a Committee of Articles of and to that Parliament by which they were chosen, and of which they were sitting and actual Members; but were only to in reference to the next Parliament that should succeed; against whose Meeting they were to prepare such things as they should judge to be most fit and expedient to be then taken into Consideration; but still with a Right, as well as with a Liberty, reserv'd to that future Parliament, not only to receive or reject what should be thus motivated and offer'd unto them; but to admit whatsoever Overtures they pleas'd, that should be made unto any of the Members of their own House. It was the ancient Custom and Practice of Scotland, that the sitting Parliament, antecedently to its Dissolution and separating, elected so many from among themselves, who were, in the Interval betwixt that and the next Parliament, to make Enquiry into the Necessities of the Leiges, and into the State of the Kingdom; and accordingly to draw up and prepare such Overtures, as should carry that Relief and Remedy in them, which might give a Redress unto Grievances, be a Means of preserving the Nation in Safety, and of promoting the Prosperity of the Subjects. Now, from this harmless Beginning of the Committee of Articles, it hath, through the Usurpation of our Kings, especially after their Succession to the Crown of England, and the Remove of their Royal Abode thither, and through the Officiousness of public Ministers to the Prince, and Treachery to their Country, grown up at last to that Exorbitancy, that it is not only become burthensome but intolerable. For, by reason of the Parliament's coming at last to commit the Inspection into all Affairs, and preparing all Remedies unto Grievances, into a few Hands, and those to be unchangeable during a whole Session, our late Monarchs obtain'd such a Handle whereby they might encroach upon the Jurisdiction of Parliaments, and the Liberties of the People, that they soon improv'd it to the illuding of all the Good that the Kingdom was to expect from Parliaments, and to the making those who were design'd to be the Means of our Safety, become the Instruments of our Ruin. For the Accomplishment whereof, and the more effectual rendering the Lords of Articles Vassals unto the Monarch's Will, and Tools for executing his Pleasure, the first prevail'd to have the Officers of State admitted into that Committee as Supernumeraries; and that, without being nominated and elected by the Estates in Parliament, they should have a Right to sit there ratione Officii, by virtue of the Employments they held in the Government. For King James the Sixth, being by the Adulation of the English Bishops, brought entirely over to their Interest, as well as to their Opinions about Church-discipline and Worship; and having a mind, in requital to the Church of Scotland for all the Kindness they had express'd to him both in his Infancy and riper Years, to obtrude upon them the English Ceremonies; he did, in order to the more easy effectuating of it, flatter, cajole and bribe, as well as huff and awe the Parliament, anno 1621, to allow the Officers of State to sit as Supernumeraries, without being chosen in the Committee of Articles. And thus he forced those Innovations, commonly known by the Name of the five Articles of Perth, upon the poor Church of Scotland; having, by those Supernumerary Officers, not only so moulded the Committee of Articles as to pass and present them, but thereby laid the Foundation of their being ordained and enacted in the House. And to make the Lords of Articles yet more grievous and intolerable, King Charles the First (whose Invasions upon the Rights and Liberties of his People prov'd fatal both to him and them) overthrew the ancient Method of their Elections, and brought the Choice of them into such a Channel, as could issue in no less than Tyranny in the Sovereign, and Slavery in the Subjects. For whereas by Law and Custom, the Lords were to chuse the Lords, and the Barons to chuse the Barons, &c. Charles the First did, in his Parliament held Anno 1633, when he was in the height of his Greatness, change and innovate this Method; and, having divested the whole respective Estates of chusing severally their respective Commissioners, he assum'd a Power to himself, with a Right of consigning it over to his Commissioner in Parliament, for chusing eight Bishops, consigning to the said eight Bishops a Power of chusing eight Noblemen; and restraining to the said eight Noblemen, together with the aforesaid eight Bishops, a Power of chusing eight Barons and eight Burgesses; and that these, in conjunction with the Officers of State as Supernumeraries, should be the whole and sole Lords of Articles, exclusive of all others. Finally, to render that Committee yet more insupportable, the sole Right as well as Liberty of bringing in Motions, of making Overtures for redressing Wrongs, and of proposing Means and Expedients, either for the Relief or the Safety and Benefit of the Subject, is entirely retain'd unto, and lodg'd wholly in, this Committee: Neither is it by our late Practice lawful for any Member or Members, that are not of that pack'd Club and Society, to make the least Proposal or Motion, either for the repealing of an ill Law, or for the enacting of a good." A. D. 1689. Church Government to be such as best agreed with the Inclinations of the People, and which directs, the rescinding of the Act above specify'd, and all other Acts inconsistent therewith.

His Lordship is, however, in the right, when he says, The Parliament was open'd with much ill Humour: For the Scots did really believe, that they had made the Redress of their Grievances a Matter of Bargain and Contract, as well as of Petition and Desire of Relief; and had set the Articles at the Head of the List, as the greatest of all their Grievances. When therefore they saw how narrow the Commissioners Instructions were on that Head, and how far short of their Expectations and Demands, they look'd upon themselves as dup'd, and thought they had the right of the Injur'd to express themselves with a proper Resentment. 'Tis true, the Author just quoted, takes leave to say, "That the King consented to a proper Regulation, by allowing that the Number of the Lords should be enlarg'd, and chang'd as often as the Parliament should desire it, &c. which answer'd all the just Complaints of that Part of the Constitution." But this also is in part a Misrepresentation. The King's first Instruction ran in these Words, "You are to pass an Act for regulating the Articles, to consist of twenty-four Persons, besides the Officers of State, whereof eight are to be chosen by the Noblemen of their Estate; eight by the Barons, and eight by the Boroughs of their Estate: And in case of the Decease of any of these Persons, that Estate out of which the Person deceas'd, shall supply the same. These are to prepare Matters and Acts for the Parliament, but not to exclude the Parliament to take any Matters into their Consideration, tho' it hath been thrown out, or rejected in the Articles. And all former Acts, especially the first Act, Par. 1st, Cap. 2d, Sess. 3d, inconsistent with this, are to be rescinded." Now all that the Estates gain'd by this Regulation, was the Power to chuse their own Delegates by their own Suffrages; whereas before, eight Bishops chose eight Lords, and those sixteen the rest; and Leave to re-consider any Matter which had been by the said Lords rejected. But they wanted to get rid of the whole Institution, and to have the digesting of their own Business; which the King would not give way to; having been told by his Ministers, That to part with the Lords of Articles, was to part with the brightest Jewel in his Crown. When, however, he was appris'd by his Commissioner of the ill Blood which this Matter had created, and the Resolution which appear'd in the Majority to support their Claim, he sent down an additional Instruction; by which the three Estates were farther indulg'd, with the Choice of eleven Delegates each, to be chosen monthly, or oftener, if they thought fit; and in which after the Words, Not excluding the Parliament, &c. as in the former, are the following dark Expressions, Nor to prevent their moving of any thing, and regulating of it to them. But neither had these Concessions any Effect: The Parliament clearly foresaw, That if the Institution was suffer'd to remain, the Grievance would remain with it; and that, more especially, because the Officers of State were still contended for as before. A. D. 168

"But even the Presbyterians (proceeds the Historian of his own Times) began to carry their Demands high: They propos'd to have the King's Supremacy and the Right of Patronage taken away." This alludes to the second of the Scots Grievances; in which they demanded the Repeal of an Act, concerning which that Author himself, in his first Volumn, writes as follows: "The first (of two Acts pass'd by Lauderdale) explain'd and asserted the King's Supremacy, but carry'd in it such general Words, that it might have been stretch'd to every thing. It was declar'd, that the settling all things relating to the external Government of the Church, was a Right of the Crown; and that all things relating to ecclesiastical Meetings, Matters and Persons, were to be order'd according to such Directions as the King should send to his Privy-Council; and that these should be publish'd by them, and should have the Force of Laws. Lord Lauderdale very probably knew the Secret of the [then] Duke's Religion, and had got into his Favour: So that it was very likely that he intended to establish himself in it, by putting the Church of Scotland wholly in his Power." Now, according to this Account of the Act, there was no great Presumption in stipulating for the Repeal of it: But, whether there was or not, it is plain from the said Stipulation, that they did not now begin to rise so high in their Demands; that, on the contrary, this Repeal was one of their Fundamentals; that the King himself understood it to be so; and that from the Beginning he instructed his Commissioners to comply with it, however he was afterwards influenc'd to dispense with his Obedience. [P. 284]

His Majesty in real Difficulties.

The Truth is, that his Majesty was surrounded with Difficulties almost insuperable. In Scotland the Majority were Presbyterians, in England Episcopalians. He had Points to carry in both Kingdoms, which he was to pay a valuable Consideration for; and it was utterly impossible for him to oblige one Party without disobliging the other. The Abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland was the Price of that Crown, and yet he could not pay it without endangering his Establishment in England. In order, therefore, to steer as safely as possible between the Scilla and Charybdis of the two Parties, he consented to dissolve the Scots Hierarchy, and seem'd in earnest dispos'd to part with his own Supremacy also; but, nevertheless, connive'd at the Breach of his repeated Instructions on that Head, perhaps, that he might have it in his Power, by the Continuance of that Act, to restore it, if ever he should find himself under a Necessity so to do.

Thus, in the Act, which pass'd the first of July, Prelacy, and the Pre-eminence of any Order in the Church above Presbyters, was abolish'd: And it was farther declar'd, "That the King and Queen's Majesties, with the Advice and Consent of the Parliament, then

A.D. 1689. then ſitting, would ſettle by Law that Church Government in the Kingdom which was moſt agreeable to the Inclinations of the People." But, notwithſtanding this ſolemn Engagement, which ſeem'd either to ſecure to the Preſbyterians the uncontrolable Superiority they aſpir'd to, or to render the preſent Parliament immortal, no farther Progreſs was made in the Affair till the Ferment in that Aſſembly grew ſo high, that the Scotiſh Miniſters found they had no other way left to appeaſe it.

It has been already obſerv'd, that the Intermixture of certain epiſcopal Lords and others in the Council, &c. had given Umbrage to the Majority of the Members, and conjur'd up that fierce and intractable Spirit which now reign'd amongſt them: In order, therefore, to lay the Cabinet under a Neceſſity of making more Room in the Government for themſelves, they brought in a A Bill to incapacitate obnoxious Perſons from holding Offices. Bill, providing, "That no Perſon of whatever Rank or Degree, who in the former evil Government had been grievous to the Nation, by acting in the Encroachments, which in the Claim of Rights were declar'd to be contrary to Law, or had ſhew'd Diſaffection to the late happy Change, or had been Retarders and Obſtructers of the good Deſigns of the States, ſhould be allow'd to poſſeſs, or be admitted into any public Truſt, Place, or Employment under their Majeſties." In Recommendation of which they urg'd, That it was neceſſary even for his Majeſty's own Juſtification: For, ſaid they, having charg'd the late King's evil Counſellors, and them only, with the Crimes upon which he grounded both the Righteouſneſs as well as the Neceſſity of his Expedition, ſhould he employ thoſe whom he undertook to remove, it would juſtify the Slanders of his Enemies, who inſiſted, That he quarrell'd with his Father, not to reform his Government, but to deprive him of his Crown. They alſo urg'd, That, if ſuch an Act was not paſs'd, Courtiers would be apt to think, that Integrity was an Ingredient no way neceſſary in a Miniſter of State; and the reſt of the World, That it was held to be a Diſqualification: That it would be impoſſible to inſpire the Vulgar with honourable Thoughts of King William, if he choſe to work with King James's Tools; and that whoever advis'd his Majeſty to do ſo, muſt intend to lay him under a Suſpicion, that he had the like Jobbs to do. And ſuch Weight had theſe and the like plauſible Suggeſtions, that the Bill paſs'd through all the Forms of the Houſe, and became ineffectual only for want of the Royal Aſſent; tho' Lord Belcarres erroneouſly ſays, it was eſpous'd by no Party, and was laid aſide, becauſe it comprehended ſo many of their own.

Another about naming the Lords of Seſſion. Another Point of Oppoſition, was the naming the Lords of Seſſion, or Judges; which the King ventur'd to do by an Act of his own, in virtue of his Prerogative; tho' the appointing Judges in an unuſual manner, and during Pleaſure, had been one of the Articles which he had alledg'd againſt King James in his Declaration for Scotland; tho' in Caſe of a total Vacancy, as at the Reſtoration, the King was to nominate, and the Parliament examine, with Power to confirm or reject, as they found Cauſe; tho' in a partial Vacancy, the Perſon or Perſons, nominated by the King as before, were to undergo the like Trial before the other Lords of Seſſion, who might alſo reject them, and had often done ſo; and tho', in both Caſes, the Lord Preſident was by an expreſs Statute to be choſen by the Suffrages of the Bench. A.D. 1685.

The manner in which his Majeſty was [Burnet.] pleas'd to take this bold Step, was by continuing ſuch a Number of the late King's Judges as were ſufficient to examine thoſe who were now to be promoted: But according to the Voice of Parliament, and indeed the nature of Things, ſuch a Continuance was in effect a new Creation. If the Throne was vacant, all Commiſſions were vacated of courſe, and a new Commiſſion conſtituted a new Judge. As at the Reſtoration, therefore, the Affair came properly before the Parliament, and to convince his Majeſty, it ought ſo to do, the Majority brought in a Bill, in which they aſſerted the total Vacancy of the Bench, as alſo their own Right to examine and approve thoſe who were to fill it; and farther provided, that, agreeable to former Precedents, both now and in all time to come, if any ſuch total Vacancy ſhould occur, the Nomination ſhould be in the King or Queen, or Regent for the time being, and the Approbation in the Parliament; and that all the ſeveral Clauſes in the ſeveral Acts relating to the Admiſſion of the ordinary Lords of Seſſion, and their Qualifications for that Office, ſhould be ratify'd and confirm'd, for perpetual Obſervation.

In treating of this Matter, Biſhop Burnet Miſrepreſented by B. Burnet. uſes theſe Words: "Thoſe who oppos'd every thing, pretended, that the Nomination ought to be made in Parliament; and they had prepar'd Objections againſt every one that was upon the Liſt; intending by this to put a public Affront on one of the firſt and moſt important Actions of the King's Government. Duke Hamilton had a poſitive Inſtruction ſent him not to ſuffer this Matter to be brought into Parliament; yet he ſaw the Party was ſo ſet and ſo ſtrong, that they had a clear Majority: Nor did he himſelf very much approve the Nomination, chiefly, that of old Dalrymple to be Preſident. So he diſcontinued the Parliament."

But this Prelate ſtands ſelf-confuted, as to the Paſſage which indicates, that this Majority oppos'd every thing; for he elſewhere acknowledges, That they granted the Revenue for Life; as alſo, that they paid the Money which was neceſſary for maintaining a ſmall Force: And though his Lordſhip is pleas'd to add, That the greateſt Part of an Army of 6000 Men was paid by England, we ſhall find they themſelves telling the King, "That they had provided a ſufficient and certain Fund to maintain all the Forces, and ſupport all other incidental Charges of the Government, for ſome Months." Then as to the Inſinuation, that the Right they claim'd, to have the Judges nominated in Parliament

A.D. 1689. Parliament was but a Pretence, he might have known, that they made their (u) Appeal to the Public, and manifested beyond Contradiction, that the Claim they made was founded on Law and Reason. Lastly, as to the positive Instruction sent to Duke Hamilton, and his putting an End to the Session upon it, we see the Matter of Fact was otherwise. The Bill, above-mention'd, actually pass'd the House, and nothing was wanting A.D. 1689.

(u) Of which, the most material Part is as follows: "It hath been already prov'd, beyond the Possibility of a Reply, That the first Institution of the College of Justice, and the Nomination as well as Approbation of those that were then advanc'd to be Lords of Session was, by the Estates assembled in Parliament. And I do now further affirm, that in the two total Vacancies, (which are all that have since occurred, besides this that hath now fallen out upon the late happy Revolution) the Estates in Parliament were indispensably allow'd the Right of admitting or rejecting those of whom the College of Justice was to be freshly constituted: For, upon the total Vacancy in the Year 1641, which was the first that had been from the Institution of the Lords of the Session, the Parliament not only challenged the approving, but they took upon them the joint Nomination with the King, of all the Persons that were to be admitted into, and created Members of, the College of Justice. But this Example and Precedent I will not insist upon, seeing there was something unjust and illegal in it, as well as something just and legal. For not being satisfy'd with the Right of admitting, to which Law and Reason gave them an unquestionable Title, they usurp'd upon the Crown, and took upon them the Power of nominating, which had been granted by former Laws unto the King. Let us therefore see what was done upon that other total Vacancy, which occurr'd at the Restoration of King Charles II. when nothing would have been departed from by the King, that he could have withheld without the highest Injustice; nor any thing either claimed or accepted by the Parliament, that they could have sacrificed or surrender'd without becoming obnoxious to imminent Dangers; and yet even then, the King having nominated those whom he design'd for the Lords of Session, the Approbation of them was submitted unto the Parliament; and the Estates having in full Parliament confider'd them, they admitted and receiv'd them. It is true that the Parliament did not bring them single before them, and there try and examine them; not because they might not have done it, but because there was no need of it, being all of them of that Eminency, as to be universally and notoriously known to have all the Qualifications required by the Statutes. Yea, though the Parliament was abundantly officious towards the Crown, and loyal to that Excess to the King, as to be disloyal to their Country, and unfaithful to their Constituents; yet, in the second Act of their first Session, by which they restore to the King what had been wrested from him in the Parliament 1641, they allow him no more, in reference to the Lords of the College of Justice, but the Right of Nomination, as the Crown had enjoy'd it preceding the Year 1637. But I hear there are some, who, finding his Majesty unalterably resolv'd not to depart from the known and just Laws of the Land in the governing of his People, have therefore, to elude the Force of what hath been here represented, and to divert his Majesty from hearkening to the humble Desires of his Parliament in this Matter, been guilty of the Treachery as well as the Impudence to suggest unto his Majesty, That there is not now a total Vacancy, there being, of the fifteen nominated by his Majesty for Lords of the Session, three that were antecedently such; and that it belongeth unto them three to try and approve the others; and that what the Parliament pretends unto, being only in the Case of a total Vacancy, is here wholly superseded; and that for any to insist upon it is an Encroachment upon the Prerogative of the King, and a robbing of the Lords of Session of a Privilege vested in them by Law. Now tho' all that is here insinuated be rather the offering an Affront to our Understandings, than the according us with a reasonable Objection; yet we will so far condescend to the Weakness of those that are ignorant of the Laws and Customs of Scotland, as to return such a Reply unto it, which may not only convince all Mankind of the Impertinency of it, but expose those that are the Authors of it, to be either loathed as ill Men, or ridiculed as silly. For first, supposing that S———, N———, and M———, who are all that can be referred unto in the pretended Objection, did still remain Lords of the College of Justice, by reason of their having formerly been so; yet they are too few to constitute a Session, which they ought to be, before they take upon them to try and approve such as are recommended unto them by the King's Nomination. The Quorum of which a Session ought to consist, before it can exercise any legal Authority, should be nine, which I think no Arithmetic will make three to be. Nor will my Lord Stair, and his Son Sir J. Dalrymple, find that Success in their Attempts against the first and self evident Principles of natural Sciences, and of the Mathematics, that they have had in undermining and subverting the Laws of their Country. Secondly, For any Person named by the King, in order to the being receiv'd as a Lord of the Session, to be examin'd and approv'd by three, tho' granted to be actual and sitting Lords of the College of Justice, is expressly repugnant to an Act of the Session itself, confirm'd by the King's Letter, Anno 1674: it being provided by that Act, That when any new Lords of Session shall be presented by his Majesty for Trial of their Qualifications, that they shall be present one Day in the Outer house, where they are to inspect a Process that shall be carried to Interlocutor, and from thence make report of all the Points therein contained to the whole Lords of Session; and then, for completing their Trial, shall sit another Day in the Inner-house; and after the bringing the Dispute of some Point of Law to a Period, shall give their Opinion about it, in presence of all those Lords of which that House doth then consist. Now as this Order and Rule is appointed to be observ'd constantly in all time coming, about the Trial of Lords nominated by the King, and to be admitted, and hath been accordingly observ'd and practis'd ever since, till the present Vacancy; so it is evident to all who have not renounc'd common Sense, that the Regulation, Order, and Method of Trial, prescrib'd by the foregoing Act, is altogether impracticable, where the Lords that are to be the Triers and Examinants are but three. But then, thirdly, It is the most absurd thing imaginable to fancy, That because three of the Lords, now nominated by the King, were heretofore Lords of Session, that therefore there hath not been a total Vacancy, upon this late and happy Revolution. I am sure that in the parallel Case, Anno 1661, the Parliament, in the Preface unto the Statute by which they admitted those to be Lords of the Session whom the King had then named, call it a new and entire Nomination, which they neither could nor would have done, if they had not judg'd the Vacancy to be total; and yet three of the Lords then nominated by King Charles the Second, viz. M———, C———, and L———, had been Lords of Session, and had Site in the College of Justice before that Nomination. Fourthly, If S———, N———, and M———'s having been once Lords of Session be enough to hinder the late Vacation of the Session from being total; then I challenge all the World to tell me, What can either make a single or a total Vacancy; yea, if those Gentlemens Places were not voided after what had befallen them, and the placing others for several Years in their room, I do much question whether their Death can make their Places vacant; and whether they may not be as well said to remain Lords of Session when they are resting in their Graves, as to have continued so in the Seats they were, before his Majesty's late Nomination of them. For as they all had their Commissions during Pleasure, to S———'s and N———'s were recalled and resum'd by King Charles, of whom they had receiv'd them. And I take it for an undoubted Axiom, that he who hath Power and Authority to give, and giveth not during Life, may, by the same Authority, take away at Pleasure what he hath given. And as for M———, who had his Commission from King James, if his Place be not render'd vacant by his Master's having forfaulted the Crown, nothing will or can render it so. Fifthly, If these Gentlemens having been heretofore Lords of the College of Justice, hindreth the late Vacancy from being accounted total; then his Majesty's nominating them afresh was not only superfluous in itself, but an Injury unto them: For it was the bringing them to hold that by a new Title, which they had a Claim unto, and ought to have been accounted possess'd of, by an ancient Right. Nor are they oblig'd for their Places to his Majesty's Grace and Bounty, but to his Justice. Sixthly, The very Form of the Presentation, by which their Nomination is signify'd, shews, that the Vacancy was taken to be total. For it being the constant Custom, in all single Vacancies, that the Name of the Person succeeded unto, as well as his who is to succeed, be equally express'd in the Presentation; and there being no such Form, but the contrary, observ'd in these Gentlemens Case, it is an Argument that his Majesty took the Vacancy to be total, whatsoever his President, Secretary and Advocate do. Seventhly, In all Cases where the Vacancy is not universal, the Prefectation of those named by the King is directed to the College of Justice, or the ye'rnal Lords of Session; as it is our Laws ordain and provide it should be. But the Presentation of those now nam'd to be receiv'd and advanc'd unto the Administration of Justice, or as Lord of most of them, was directed to the Earl of Crawford, [President of the Parliament, there being no Lord Chancellor] who never was a Lord of the Session, nor yet is. Which is an Evidence, that the nobling of the late Vacancy not to have been total was not an Opinion they were led into by Truth, but by Necessity; and that they have only espous'd it to justify what hath been illegally done." [Present. vind. p. 38, 39, 40, 41, 42.

A. D. 1689. wanting but the Royal Aſſent, to render it a Law. Nay, when it appear'd that the Scots Miniſters were deſperately reſolv'd to maintain the King's Nomination, in Defiance both of the Senſe and the Indignation of Parliament, the Parliament proceeded ſo far, in Vindication of their own Rights, as to forbid the Lords ſo nominated to open their Commiſſions, or hold their Seſſion, till the King's farther Pleaſure was known; which ſo intimidated many of them, that they refus'd to act, till by other Menaces from the Privy Council, they were induc'd to alter their Minds again, and to comply with the ſtrongeſt: And ſo high was the Diſpute carry'd on both Sides, and ſuch a Ferment did it create, that when the Day of ſitting came, it was thought adviſeable to hold all the Forces, which were drawn in unuſual Numbers about Edinburgh, in Readineſs, to maintain with the Sword, what could be maintain'd no other way.

Parliament adjourn'd.

It was indeed in the midſt of this Confuſion, that his Grace the Commiſſioner adjourn'd the Houſe to the eighth of October following; and ſuch a Flame of Reſentment did that Adjournment, and the ſeveral other Matters before-mention'd, produce, that the Majority drew up the following Remonſtrance, which was preſented to his Majeſty at Hampton-Court.

Scotiſh Remonſtrance to the King.

"Nothing ſave the great and general Surpriſe of this long diſtreſs'd, and at preſent unſettled, Kingdom, upon the late Adjournment of your moſt loyal Parliament for ſo long a time, and in ſo critical a Seaſon, with the deep Concern of your Royal Intereſt therein, could poſſibly have induc'd us to this ſo neceſſary a Petition. But the viſible Conſternation and Diſcouragement of thouſands of your good Subjects, delay'd in the Relief and Comfort which at this time they aſſuredly expected, with the Advantages that we apprehend your Majeſty's Enemies, both within and without the Kingdom, may think to reap by ſuch an Interruption, being our only Motives, we cannot, we dare not, be ſilent: And therefore to prevent theſe evil Conſequences, we in the A. D. 1689. firſt Place moſt ſolemnly proteſt and declare, in the Preſence of God and Men, our conſtant and inviolable Fidelity and Adherence to your Majeſty's Royal Title, Right and Intereſt, ſo frankly and chearfully recogniz'd by us in this current Parliament, wiſhing and praying for nothing more under the Sun than your long and proſperous Reign, as that wherein the Security of all our Lives and Liberties, as alſo of our Holy Religion, more dear to us than both, is infallibly included. It was the Perſuaſion we had of the Juſtice, as well as the Neceſſity of your Majeſty's heroic Undertaking for the Delivery of theſe Kingdoms, with the Conviction of the divine Confirmation that appear'd in its glorious Succeſs, that mov'd moſt, if not all of us, to endeavour and concur moſt heartily in the late Meeting of Eſtates, for the Advancement and Eſtabliſhment of your Majeſty upon the Throne, when ſome diſcover'd their Diſaffection, and were too open Retarders and Obſtructors of that good Deſign. And it is from the ſame true Affection and Zeal, that we do now moſt heartily make the above-mention'd Proteſtation, to obviate all the Miſconſtructions your Enemies may make in this Juncture.

Nor are we leſs aſſur'd of your Majeſty's moſt ſincere and gracious Intentions, to perform for us to the utmoſt, all that the Eſtates of the Kingdom have either demanded or repreſented as neceſſary and expedient for ſecuring the Proteſtant Religion, reſtoring their Laws and Liberties, and redreſſing of their Grievances, according to your Majeſty's Declaration for this Kingdom. Neither can it be imagin'd, that ſo wiſe and juſt a King as your Majeſty will ever be perſuaded, that ſo loyal a Parliament as this, can be induc'd either to wiſh or deſign any Prejudice to, or Diminution of, your true Intereſt and Prerogative; but ſuch as have ſlaviſhly ſerv'd and flatter'd Arbitrary Power and Tyranny will be always ſtudying, for their own ſiniſter Ends, to ſtate a (w) SEPARATE INTEREST betwixt

(w) To underſtand the full Force of this Expreſſion, 'tis neceſſary to inſert the following Paſſage:

"But foraſmuch as the preſent Embarraſs of his Majeſty with his Parliament of Scotland is wholly caus'd by the Advocate's [Dalrymple] abuſing his Majeſty in the Account he hath given him, both of the Rights and Juriſdictions of the Eſtates in Parliament aſſembled, and of the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kingdom; I ſhall therefore, in order to the diſparaging of him with all the wiſe and loyal Part of Mankind, and the debarring him the King's Ear, and attracting upon him the Royal Indignation, publiſh the Principle upon which he builds all the Advices he communicateth to his Maſter, and with which he ſeeks to poiſon and corrupt his Royal Mind. And this is, "That the King hath a ſeparate Intereſt from his People, which he ought to purſue in diſtinction from theirs:" And this we may be ſure he doth not fail of inſinuating, either immediately unto his Majeſty, or at leaſt to thoſe about him; ſeeing he had the Folly, as well as the Impudence, both to aſſert and to ſeek to juſtify it in open and full Parliament. Now whoſoever gives himſelf the Trouble of examining the Tendency of this Principle will find the natural Conſequences of it to be, That the Prince and People muſt not only live in a conſtant Jealouſy and Dread of one another; but muſt always be embark'd in an inteſtine War. Nor is it to be avoided, unleſs either by the King's arriving at the Height of Tyranny, and the People's ſinking into the Abyſs of Slavery; or by the Subjects graſping the whole Power and Authority, and leaving unto the King an empty Name. Yea, it is a deſtroying of the very End for which Government was ordain'd of God, and ſubmitted unto by Men; ſeeing that was nothing elſe, but that the whole Society, comprehending Ruler and Ruled, might have but one common political Intereſt; for the Defence and Security whereof each of them were to have their reſpective Duties allotted unto them: "Nay, the very Prerogative, acknowledg'd to belong unto "the King, is nothing ſave a Power truſted with him, in re- "lation to ſome Caſes that may emerge, by which he may "be the better enabled to preſerve the Safety of the Com- "munity, and to provide for the Benefit of the Public." Nor could Sir J. Dalrymple take a more effectual Courſe to ſupplant the King in the Hearts of his People, and to poſſeſs them with a Horror of, and an Alienation from, his Government, than by his proclaiming within the Parliament-Walls, That the King hath a ſeparate Intereſt from that of his People, and, by conſequence, that he is to promote and maintain it, with the Neglect if not the Ruin of theirs: Neither is there any thing more probable, than that the Advocate vented it in Treachery to his Majeſty; whom, out of a Love to the late King, and a Deſire to have him reſtor'd, he ſeeks to undermine and betray. For he hath hereby ſo alarm'd the People in reference to his Majeſty's Government, and fill'd them with thoſe diſmal Apprehenſions of what they are to expect, in caſe the King have a ſeparate Intereſt from theirs, that it will be difficult either to allay their Fears, or to recover them to an entire Truſt in his Majeſty's Juſtice and Goodneſs, without removing that Man both from about his Majeſty's Perſon, and out of his Councils, who hath given them that frightful Idea of his enſuing Reign." [Preſent. and. p. 12, 13, 14.

A. D. 1689. betwixt King and People; a Practice which we are confident your Majesty abhors.

But that we may clear ourselves upon this present Occasion to your Majesty's full Satisfaction, and the refuting of all Misrepresentations we can incur on any hand, we shall briefly rehearse to your Majesty the Votes pass'd in this present Parliament, to which the Royal Assent is not given, with such short Reflections, as we hope may tend to the better Vindication of all concern'd.

The first Act upon which the Vote of Parliament has pass'd, is that, declaring the Privileges of the Estates of Parliament to nominate and appoint Committees, as they shall think fit; and excluding therefrom the Officers of State, unless they be chosen: And, omitting what the Parliament hath already represented to your Majesty as Reasons of their Vote, it is humbly conceiv'd, that this Act is exactly fram'd to the Extent of that Grievance, which, together with the rest, is desir'd, in the Instrument of Government, to be redress'd unto us in Parliament.

The second was an Act abrogating the Act of Parliament 1669, asserting the King's Supremacy over all Persons, and in all Causes ecclesiastical; and this Act is so exactly conform to the second Article of the abovemention'd Grievances; and the foresaid Act of Supremacy in itself is so dangerous to the Protestant Religion, as well as inconsistent with the Establishment of any Church-Government, that we doubt not your Majesty will ever approve all that voted to it.

The third is an Act anent Persons not to be employ'd in public Trusts: And all the Ruins and Distresses of this Kingdom, have so certainly flow'd from the Persons therein noted, especially such as, by their contriving of, and concurring in, the dispensing Power, have thereby imminently endanger'd our Religion, and overturn'd all the Fences of our Liberties and Properties; which we have good Ground to believe the Parliament would have extended but to few Persons: And your Majesty in your Declaration hath so justly charg'd the same upon evil and wicked Counsellors (the only Persons pointed at in this Act) that we are persuaded that you will find it absolutely necessary for attaining all the Ends of your Majesty's glorious Undertaking for our Relief.

The fourth is an Act concerning the Nomination of the ordinary Lords of Session, and the Election of the President, to wit, that in a total Vacation they be try'd, and admitted or rejected by Parliament, and in a particular Vacation they be try'd and admitted, or rejected, by the other Lords; and that the President be chosen by the Lords themselves, conform to our old practice and express Statute: And this Act is so agreeable to practic Laws and Acts of Parliament, and so necessary for the true and equal Administration of Justice (the great Security of all Kingdoms) that your Majesty will unquestionably approve it.

The fifth and last is, an Act ordaining the Presbyterian Ministers yet alive, who were thrust out since the first of January, 1661, for not conforming to Prelacy, and not complying with the Courses of the Time, to be restor'd. And this Act is in itself so just and so consequential from the Claim of Right, and agreeable to your Majesty's Declaration, that less in common Equity could not be done. And here your Majesty may be pleas'd to consider, That though Prelacy be now by Law abolish'd, yet these few Ministers, not exceeding Sixty (tho' restor'd, as they are not, for want of the Royal Assent to the foresaid Act) would be all the Presbyterian Ministers, legally establish'd and provided for in Scotland. A. D. 1689.

It is not unknown to your Majesty what have been the sad Confusions and Disorders of this distress'd Country under Prelacy, and for want of its ancient Presbyterian Government; and now the whole West, and many other Parts of Scotland, are at present desolate and destitute, having only Ministers called by the People upon the late Liberty, without any Benefice or Living, or convenient Place to preach in. It is also certain, that there are many hundreds of forefaulted or fined Persons who are yet waiting to be restor'd and refounded, according to the Claim of Right, and your Majesty's gracious Instructions thereanent.

It is true, the last thing propos'd by your Majesty's Commissioner in Parliament was, a Supply of Money for Maintenance of the Forces so necessary for our present Defence; and we should have proven ourselves ungrateful to your Majesty, and false to our own Interest and Security, if we had absolutely refus'd it: But there being a sufficient and certain Fund to maintain all the Forces, and support all other incident Charges of the Government for some Months; all that we demanded was, that some things visibly necessary for the Satisfaction of the Country, and the better enabling and disposing them to pay the said Supply, might be first expeded. We are confident that the Vote of Parliament, which was only for a short Delay, will not give your Majesty the least Ground of Offence.

And now having presum'd to lay these things before your Majesty with all humble Submission, purely out of Duty, for preventing the evil Constructions of your Majesty's Enemies, and for our own just Vindication, we most humbly beseech your sacred Majesty graciously to consider what is here represented; and in Prosecution of your Majesty's Acceptance of the Claim of Right, and your Declaration emitted for this Kingdom, to take such Courses as you in your Royal Wisdom shall think it, for passing the foresaid Acts of Parliament, and redressing all our other Grievances: And we, your Majesty's most humble Petitioners and faithful Subjects, shall, as in Duty bound, ever pray for your long and prosperous Reign over us."

Thus even the Presbyterians, who had unquestionably set the Crown on the King's Head, could not help upbraiding him in effect, with Breach of Faith, in not fulfilling the Conditions on which it was bestow'd: And so touch'd was his Majesty with their Reproaches,

A. D. 1689. Reproaches, however artfully couch'd under Expreſſions of Zeal, Affection, and Veneration, that he caus'd his Inſtructions to his Commiſſioner to be publiſh'd, by which it appear'd, that his Grace might have gone farther in obliging them than he did, tho' not ſo far as they demanded.

Scotiſh Church left without Government.

To cloſe on this Topic, tho' Epiſcopacy was aboliſh'd, Preſbytery was not eſtabliſh'd in form; and the Church of Scotland was in this Interval left without any Government at all, or at leaſt no other than was dictated occaſionally by the Privy-Council, in virtue of that very Act of Supremacy, which, in Conformity to the Claim of Rights, ought to have been repeal'd: And of what kind that occaſional Government was, may be gather'd from a Proclamation, bearing Date Auguſt the ſixth, by which the Lieges are ſtrictly charg'd and commanded not to offer any Violence or Injury to any of the Miniſters of the Goſpel, preaching in Churches or Meeting-Houſes, or preſume, without legal Sentence, to meddle in that Matter; all ſuch Miniſters as were in Poſſeſſion of the Miniſtry upon the 13th Day of April, are allow'd to continue there undiſturb'd; and all ſuch as had been remov'd, diſpoſſeſs'd, or reſtrain'd without legal Sentence, ſince the 30th of the ſaid Month, are alſo allow'd to return and reſume the Exerciſe of their Function: Only ſuch Miniſters who had not read the (x) Proclamation in relation to the new Government, or pray'd for King William and Queen Mary, according to the Tenour thereof, might be cited before the Privy Council, in order to their being depriv'd of their Benefices according to Law.

The Caſtle of Edinburgh ſurrender'd by the Duke of Gordon.

During this Interval, the Blockade of Edinburgh Caſtle was converted into a regular Siege, under the Command of Sir John Lanier, who having advanc'd his Works cloſe to the Ditch, and beginning to make his Diſpoſitions for a Storm, the Duke of Gordon beat a Parley; and ſeeing no Probability of being deliver'd either by King James, or his Champion, Dundee, finally ſurrender'd the Place on the 13th of June, on very favourable Conditions for the Garriſon, and thoſe who had correſponded with them, (ſuch as providing for the Security of their Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes) but without making any for himſelf, as appears by the Preamble to the ſaid Conditions, which runs in theſe Terms: "The Duke of Gordon hath A. D. 1689. ſo much Reſpect for all the Princes of King James the Sixth's Line, as not to make Conditions with any of them for his own particular Intereſt, ſo he renders himſelf entirely to King William's Diſcretion." And which has led Biſhop Kennet, Mr. Tindal, and others into a ſtrange Miſtake; for they are pleas'd to ſay, "That the Duke ſurrender'd himſelf and his whole Garriſon to King William's DISCRETION, upon CONDITION that their Lives ſhould be ſecur'd;" whereas, the Surrender at Diſcretion, as we have ſeen, was of his own Perſon (y), and the Conditions of Capitulation regarded his Garriſon.

This was a ſtunning Blow to King James's Friends, and reduc'd them to a Neceſſity of placing all their Hopes on Dundee; who, under pretence of defending himſelf, had retir'd to the Highlands, and ſummon'd the Clans to join him; which they ſent him Aſſurances of doing: Finding, however, by two Expreſſes which fell into his Hands, that Mackay had ſent Orders to Colonel Ramſay to way-lay him behind, while he attack'd him in front, he made a forc'd March, with about two thouſand Highlanders and a few Horſe, to ſurprize the Colonel firſt, who made a ſhift to get out of his way, and then went in ſearch of Mackay; to which he was not a little encourag'd, by a Meſſage which he had receiv'd from the Regiment of Scots Dragoons under that General's Command, ſignifying their Readineſs to revolt, and declare for King James. Mackay, in the mean time having receiv'd Intelligence of their Treachery, decamp'd immediately, to prevent the Effects of it, and by long and ſwift Marches avoided any Rencounter, till he was reinforc'd by Ramſay's Dragoons, and another Regiment of Engliſh Foot: He then fac'd about once more, and Dundee retiring into Lochabar, where it was then impoſſible to force him to an Engagement, he found it expedient for the preſent to give over the Purſuit, and to refreſh his Men, who were almoſt ſpent with the Fatigues they had undergone, without the leaſt Interval of Repoſe.

Dundee's Exploits.

[Belcarres.]

Lord Murray, Son of the Marquis of Athole, about this time repair'd to the Highlands, with a Commiſſion from the Regency, to raiſe his Vaſſals in the Defence of the Government; and, without communicating either (x) Concerning which, Biſhop Burnet writes as follows: "The Convention, when they paſs'd the Vote, declaring the King and Queen, order'd a Proclamation to be read the next Sunday, in all the Churches of Edinburgh; and in all the other Churches of the Kingdom, by a certain preſix'd Day; but which was ſo near at hand, that it was leaſt poſſible to lay Proclamations, all round the Nation, within the time; and it was abſolutely impoſſible for the Clergy to meet together, and come to any Reſolution among themſelves: For the moſt part, the Proclamations were not brought to the Miniſters till the Morning of the Sunday in which they were order'd to be read; ſo, this having the Face of a great Change of Principles, many could not on the ſudden reſolve to ſubmit to it: Some had not the Proclamations brought to them till the Day was paſt: Many of thoſe read it the Sunday following. Some of thoſe, who did not think fit to read the Proclamation, yet obey'd it; and continued, after that, to pray for the King and Queen. Complaints were brought to the Council of all thoſe who had not read nor obey'd the Proclamation; and they were, in a ſummary Way, depriv'd of their Benefices. In the executing this, Lord Crawford [who preſided at the Council-board, as well as in the Parliament] ſhew'd much Eagerneſs and Violence. Thoſe who did not read the Proclamation, on the Day appointed, had no Favour, tho' they did it afterwards: And upon any Word that fell from them, either in their extemporary Prayers or Sermons, that ſhew'd Diſaffection to the Government, they were alſo depriv'd. All theſe things were publiſh'd up and down England, and much aggravated; and rais'd the Averſion that the Friends of the Church had to the Preſbyterians, ſo high, that they began to repent their having granted a Toleration to a Party, that, where They prevail'd, ſhew'd ſo much Fury againſt thoſe of the Epiſcopal Perſuaſion. So that ſuch of us as had labour'd to excuſe the Change that the King was forc'd to conſent to, and had promis'd in his Name great Moderation towards our Friends in that Kingdom, were much out of Countenance, when we ſaw the Violence with which Matters were carry'd there." [Fol. ii. p. 29, 30.

(y) His Grace was actually put under Confinement, for Form's ſake; but ſoon obtain'd his Liberty.

A. D. 1689. ther his Authority or his Purpoſe, did accordingly raiſe about twelve hundred Men: But, before he could make any uſe of them, a Gentleman, who had always been a Dependant on his Family, and who was deep in his Confidence, betray'd his Intentions to Dundee, ſeiz'd the Caſtle of Blair, which belong'd to the Athole Family, and, when requir'd by his Patron to deliver it up, reply'd, That he kept it, by the General's Orders, for the King's Service. Upon this, Murray, who was not ſtrong enough to reduce it, ſent to Mackay for Aſſiſtance; and, while that General was collecting his Forces to join him, Dundee not only did the ſame by his Clans, but invited Murray himſelf to aſſociate with him in the ſame Cauſe, and ſhare with him in the Glory; repreſenting how eaſy it would be for them, in conjunction, to reduce all King James's Enemies in Scotland, and what Ignominy he would be liable to, in caſe he let ſlip ſo tempting an Opportunity. But, tho' Murray was not to be mov'd, his Men were: They ſaid, if he would join Dundee, they would follow him; if not, they would leave him: And when the Laſt appear'd to be his Reſolution, they fill'd their Bonnets with Water, drank King James's Health, and ſeparated immediately.

About this time arriv'd the long-expected Supply from Ireland: But, inſtead of five hundred Foot and three hundred Horſe, with Ammunition and Proviſion of all Sorts, as had been promis'd by King James and his Secretary Melfort, they prov'd to be but three hundred new-rais'd Foot, in want of all things; which mortify'd Dundee as much as it diſmay'd his Friends, who had not taſted Bread, Salt, or any Drink but Water, for ſeveral Weeks: And, what almoſt broke their Hearts, the Tranſports, which had a Quantity of Proviſions on board for their Relief, fell into the Hands of the Engliſh. But, notwithſtanding all theſe Diſcouragements, Dundee reſolv'd to proceed with his Undertaking; and, for his firſt Exploit, to ſuccour the Caſtle of Blair, which was a Matter of the firſt Importance; for if that was once reduc'd, all Communication with any Part of the Highlands would be cut off, and it would be utterly impoſſible to derive any farther Advantage from the Athole Men, in whom he had plac'd his chief Dependence. Accordingly, he march'd with his little Army towards Athole; and when he came to the Caſtle, held a Council of War on the Intelligence which he had receiv'd, that Mackay was entering by a narrow Paſs into the County of Killikrankie. Many of the Clans were of Opinion that they ought to diſpute that Paſs, which would afford time for the reſt of their Friends to come up: But Dundee was for giving him Admittance, that they might have an Opportunity of coming to a deciſive Action before the Engliſh Dragoons were come up (which Lord Belcarres obſerves is the only Enemy that the Highlanders are afraid of) Mackay having at that time, as he thought, but two Troops with him: His Opinion prevail'd; an Engagement follow'd; and the Account given of it in the London Gazette is to this Effect: That Mackay coming to St. Johnſtown, and underſtanding that a Party of the Enemy had juſt carry'd off certain Stores of Meal, which had been depoſited there for the Uſe of his Majeſty's Forces, and were conveying it to their main Body, which lay about ſeven Miles from thence, went in Purſuit of them, overtook them in a Plain, not far from St. Johnſtown, and having routed the Horſe which cover'd their Rear, fell upon their Foot, which were all kill'd or taken Priſoners; and among the Former Dundee himſelf. Thus the Tale was told in England; but nothing is more unlike the Truth, if any Credit is due to the Account given by Lord Belcarres; for, according to that, it was not a meer Skirmiſh between two Parties, but a regular Engagement with the whole Force of each, and under the beſt Diſpoſition that their reſpective Generals had Skill to make. The Highlanders receiv'd the Fire of the Engliſh, and having given one Diſcharge, fell in with their Swords and Targets, which threw the Latter into ſuch a Conſternation, that they ſcarce made any Reſiſtance. The Engliſh Horſe ran without firing a Shot: The Earl of Dumbarton, with about ſixteen other Gentlemen-Volunteers, ſeiz'd their Cannon: The Scots Horſe, in all about one Hundred, broke through Mackay's own Regiment. Two thouſand were kill'd on the Spot: Five hundred were taken Priſoners. Never was a more entire Victory gain'd: And if the Highlanders had not been ſo greedy of the Spoil, that they neglected the Purſuit, Mackay himſelf, with the few that accompany'd him in his Flight, had not been able to make their Eſcape.---- Poſſibly, all theſe Circumſtances are exaggerated; but all Authors agree, that Dundee had the Advantage, and that if he had ſurviv'd the Day, far greater things might have been expected from him; for, according to the Character given of him, by his Friend, he was the only Man in Scotland who was equal to ſuch an Undertaking, being perfectly well acquainted with the Tempers of thoſe he was to manage, and Maſter of his own, provident by Nature, liberal thro' Policy, obliging in his Manner to thoſe whom it was his Intereſt to oblige; with ſuch a happy Mixture of occaſional Rigour, as ſerv'd to give Authority to his Commands: He was, indeed, ſo entirely the Life and Soul of his Party, that their very Hopes dy'd with him, and his Death was never ſpoke of, but as the Death of the Cauſe. One Colonel Cannon, who came over with King James's Iriſh Troops, ſucceeded to the chief Command, but was either ſo unequal to it, or ſo unfortunate in it, that all his Deſigns miſcarry'd; and in Deſpair of better Fortune, or farther Help, the Clans, by Degrees, took hold of King William's Proclamation of Pardon, and laid down their Arms.

The Action at Killikrankie.

And now there remains no more to be ſaid of the Affairs of Scotland for the preſent, than is to be taken from one remarkable Paſſage to the following Effect, namely, That the next Day after the Action of Killikrankie,

A. D. 1689. likrankie, an Officer of King James's, riding by the Place where Lord Dundee fell, saw lying there a Bundle of Papers and Commissions, which those who stript his Body had left unregarded, as things of no Value: These he took up, and finding them all to be of Moment, communicated them to several of his Friends. Among them was a Letter from Lord Melfort to Lord Dundee, which accompany'd a Declaration of King James's, containing not only an Offer of Indemnity to all such as return'd to their Duty, but of Toleration to all Persuasions. Now this Declaration, the first of these Lords had advis'd and prepar'd, purposely to bridle the Rage of the Last against the Fanatics: And the Letter, we are told, was calculated to sweeten that bitter Pill to him, for it imported, "That notwithstanding the seeming Promises of Indulgence and Indemnity in the Declaration, he had so worded them, that King James might break thro' them when he pleas'd: And that his Majesty did not think himself oblig'd to stand to them." It is fit to point out to Posterity, that this Passage is taken from the Account of Scotish Affairs which Ld. Belcarres himself thought fit to lay before that unfortunate Prince; and that his Lordship observes upon it, That it not only dissatisfy'd Dundee, but many of his Majesty's Friends, who thought a more ingenuous way of Dealing would have been more agreeable to his Honour and his Interest: That it did no small Prejudice to his Affairs: And that it would have done more, if it had not been carefully suppress'd.

Affairs of Ireland.

From the Divisions and Troubles of Scotland, we must now return to those of Ireland. We left the Irish Army under the Walls of Derry, and King James on his Return to Dublin, to meet the Parliament, which was to be held there, according to his Proclamation, of May the seventh, and which had been return'd in a manner agreeable to the Turbulence of the Times: For, together with the Writs, we are told, either Lord Tyrconnel, or the titular Bishop of Clogher, his Secretary, issu'd circular Letters, not only nominating the Person or Persons to be chosen, but willing and commanding, that they should be chosen: The Sheriffs, Mayors, and other returning Officers, who were all his Creatures, on the Receipt of these Mandates, assembled such of the Freeholders of a County, or Citizens, or Burgesses of a Corporation, as they knew were of the same Stamp, open'd their Instructions, and requir'd Obedience, which was given without the least Opposition or Demur; for either the Protestants durst not appear, or the Affair was over before they had any Notice of its being begun. And thus it may be said, That never any national Election was carry'd with such Unanimity as this. We are farther told, that by these Means almost the whole House of Commons consisted of the most bigotted Papists, and such as were most deeply interested to destroy the Protestant Religion and extirpate its Professors: That many of them were the Sons and Descendants of the forfeiting Persons in 1641, who had no Freeholds or Estates in the Kingdom: That no less than twenty-nine Boroughs and Counties had no Representatives at all; either because they were in the Enemies Hands, or because the Protestants refused to stand, and the Papists were too few or too remote, to make sure of the Election: That there were but six Protestants among them all, of whom two were for the University of Dublin: And that even the House of Lords was under such Disabilities as render'd it wholly uncapable to hold the Balance of the Constitution; for of sixty-nine temporal Protestant Peers, not above four or five gave their Attendance; and of twenty two spiritual, only four: While, on the other hand, King James, by removing Outlawries, reversing Attainders, and creating five new Peers, had upwards of forty Papists at his Devotion. And to this Parliament, thus constituted, did his Majesty, on the first Day of the Session, make the following plausible Speech:

Management of the general Election there.

[King's State, p. 151.]

A. D. 1689.

State of the House of Lords.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

The exemplary Loyalty which this Nation expressed to me at a time, when others of my Subjects so undutifully misbehav'd themselves to me, or so basely betrayed me; and your seconding my Deputy, as you did, in his bold and resolute asserting my Right, in preserving this Kingdom for me, and putting it in a Posture of Defence, made me resolute to come to you, and to venture my Life with you in Defence of your Liberties, and my own Right; and to my great Satisfaction I have not only found you ready to serve me, but that your Courage hath equalled your Zeal.

King James's Speech.

I have always been for Liberty of Conscience, and against invading any Man's Right or Liberty; having still in Mind that Saying of Holy Writ, Do as you would be done to, for this is the Law and the Prophets.

It was this Liberty of Conscience I gave, which my Enemies both at home and abroad dreaded to have establish'd by Law in all my Dominions, and made them set themselves up against me, tho' for different Reasons; seeing, that if I had once settled it, my People, in the Opinion of the one, would have been too happy, and in the Opinion of the other, too great.

This Argument was made use of to persuade their own People to join with them, and so many of my Subjects to use me as they have done: But nothing shall ever persuade me to change my Mind as to that; and wheresoever I am the Master, I design, God willing, to establish it by Law, and have no other Test or Distinction but that of Loyalty. I expect your Concurrence in so Christian a Work, and in making Laws against Prophaneness, and against all sorts of Debauchery.

I shall most readily consent to the making such good wholesome Laws, as may be for the Good of the Nation, the Improvement of Trade, and relieving such as have been injur'd by the late Acts of Settlement, as far forth as may be consistent with Reason, Justice, and the public good of my People.

A. D. 1689. And as I shall do my Part to make you happy and rich, I make no doubt of your Assistance, by enabling me to oppose the unjust Designs of my Enemies, and to make this Nation flourish.

And to encourage you the more to it, you know with how great Generosity and Kindness the most Christian King gave sure Retreat to the Queen, my Son, and myself, when we were forc'd out of England, and came to seek for Protection and Safety in his Kingdoms; how he embrac'd my Interest, and gave me such Supplies of all sorts, as enabled me to come to you, which without his obliging Assistance, I could not have done. This he did at a time when he had so many and considerable Enemies to deal with, and you see still continues so to do.

I shall conclude as I have begun, and assure you, I am as sensible as you can desire of the signal Loyalty you have express'd to me, and shall make it my chief Study, as it has always been, to make you and all my Subjects happy."

The [illegible] Sir Richard Neagle, the King's Attorney, had been chosen Speaker of the House of Commons; and no sooner was the King withdrawn, than he prompted, or rather enjoin'd them to prepare two Addresses; namely, one to his Majesty, signifying how highly they were oblig'd both to him and his Substitute Tyrconnel, for that glorious Meeting; and one of Acknowledgments to the most Christian King, for his Generosity in receiving and succouring their Sovereign. Both were prepar'd and approv'd accordingly: And to shew the Excess of their Loyalty, the first Business they proceeded upon, was a Bill which contain'd a Recognition of his Majesty's Title, and an Abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's Usurpations, and the Defection of the English; to keep Pace with which, King James, the next Day, set forth the ensuing Declaration:

"JAMES R.

King James's Declaration. Although the many Calumnies and dismal Stories, by which our Enemies have endeavour'd to render us and our Government odious to the World, do now appear to have been advanced by them, not only without any Ground, but against their own certain Knowledge; as is evident by their not daring to attempt the proving these Charges to the World, which we cannot but hope hath open'd the Eyes of our good Subjects, to see how they have been impos'd upon by designing Men; who, to promote their own ambitious Ends, care not what Slavery they reduce our Kingdoms to: Yet we cannot but rejoice that we have had an Opportunity to demonstrate the Falseness and Malice of their Pretences, since our Arrival in this Kingdom of Ireland, by making it our chief Concern to satisfy the Minds of our Protestant Subjects, the Defence of their Religion, Privileges and Properties, is equally our Care, with the Recovery of our Rights. To this End, we have preferr'd such of them, of whose Loyalty and Affection we are satisfy'd, to Places both of the highest Honour and Trust about our Person, as well as in our Army. We have, by granting our Royal Protection to such whose Minds are shaken by the Arts of our Rebellious Subjects, dispell'd their Apprehensions, and effectually secur'd them against the Attempts of their private Enemies. Our Ear hath been always open to their just Complaints; and so far hath our Royal Mercy been extended to those who were in Arms against us, that we have actually pardon'd several hundreds of them; and most notorious Criminals are kept in an easy Confinement, as they themselves acknowledge. A. D. 1689.

We have taken care that our Subjects of the Church of England be not disturb'd in the Exercise of their Religion, the Possession of their Benefices and other Properties; and all Protestant Dissenters enjoy the Liberty of their Consciences, without any Molestation: And out of our Royal Care for the Prosperity of our People, we have recommended to our Parliament, as the first thing necessary to be dispatch'd, to settle such a Security and Liberty, both in spiritual and temporal Matters, as may put an End to these Divisions, which have been the Source of all our Miseries; being resolv'd, as much as in us lies, to entail Liberty and Happiness upon our People, so far as to put it out of the Power of our Successors to invade the one, or infringe the other. And this, we take God to witness, was always our Design; of which we see our good Subjects here are more and more convinc'd, by the great Numbers of those who, having been seduc'd or frighten'd by the restless Importunities of our Enemies, are return'd to their Country and Habitations, and who assure us daily, more would follow, if the Ports were open: But the Usurpers know too well the Sincerity of our Intentions, to permit a free Passage of our said Subjects, fearing nothing more than that their Experience should undeceive the rest, who are restrained more through Ignorance than any ill Intention; and therefore deny them that Liberty which we afford to all, whose Designs, we are satisfy'd, tend not to the Disturbance of the Peace.

By this our Gracious and Royal Care of our Protestant Subjects here (where the greatest Part of our Nation is Catholic) and have, as well as we, receiv'd the highest Provocation from their Fellow-Subjects of contrary Persuasions; so that nothing but our own Inclination to Justice, and Desire to see our People flourish, could move us to such a Proceeding; we hope our Subjects in England will make a Judgment of what they expected from us: And we do hereby promise and declare, That nothing shall ever alter our Resolutions, to pursue such and no other Methods, as by our said Subjects in Parliament should be found proper for our common Security, Peace and Happiness. And that none may be debarr'd of assisting us in recovering our Rights, and redeeming our People from their present Slavery, out of any Apprehension from past Miscarriages, we do hereby assure all our Subjects, of what Quality soever, let their Crimes

A. D. 1689. againſt us be never ſo great, that, if, in twenty Days after our appearing in Perſon in our Kingdom of England, they return to their Obedience, by deſerting our Enemies, and joyning with us, we will grant them our full Pardon, and all paſt Miſcarriages ſhall be forgot; ſo little do we delight in the Blood or Ruin of our People. But if after this our gracious Condeſcention, they ſhall ſtill continue to aſſiſt our Enemies and Rebels, we do, before God, charge all the Blood which ſhall be afterwards ſhed, upon them and their Adherents. And, we doubt not, by the Bleſſing of God upon our Arms, to force the moſt obſtinate to their Duty; tho, as we have made appear in reducing our rebellious Subjects in this Kingdom, we deſire to uſe no other Methods than Lenity and Mercy.

Given at our Court in Dublin Caſtle, the 18*th of* May, 1689, in the fifth Year of our Reign.

God ſave the King."

What Degree of Sincerity there was in theſe Profeſſions, or at leaſt how little it was in his Power to make them good, will preſently be made appear: The Aſcendancy of Mr. d'Avaux in his Councils has been already mention'd; and, next to the Attention which he was forc'd to pay to his Maſter's immediate Intereſt, his chief Concern was to ruin that of the Proteſtants. By the Act of Settlement, which the King had repreſented as injurious to his Subjects, all the Lands forfeited in the Rebellion, after a five Years Examination of the Claims of all Sides, were ſolemnly veſted in ſuch of the then Poſſeſſors, whoſe Titles were allow'd; and even King James himſelf had, over and over again, promis'd to maintain it: But thoſe who had the Poſſeſſion were Proteſtants, and thoſe who were outed were Papiſts: Theſe were to a Man zealous Loyaliſts, as having no other Hope but in the King; and if Thoſe were the ſame, they lay under a Suſpicion of being otherwiſe: What was juſt, therefore, was to give way to what was expedient; and, by one great and ſudden Transfer of Property, the Lords were to be made Beggars, and the Beggars Lords. Of this Advice, Mr. d'Avaux was ſaid to be the Author; and poſſibly it was not more owing to his Animoſity to the Proteſtant-Cauſe, than a political View of cultivating the Affections of the Iriſh, and of inducing them to place their chief Dependance on France. On the third Day of the Seſſion, a Bill to repeal this momentous Act, and the Act explanatory thereof, was brought in by Lord Chief-Juſtice Nugent, ſay ſome; by Sir Ulrick Bourke, ſay (x) others; and was receiv'd, according to the Latter, with a Huzza; which, if true, more reſembled the Behaviour of a Crew of Rapparees over a rich Booty, than that of a Senate aſſembled to rectify Abuſes, and reſtore the Rights of their Fellow-ſubjects: It is added,

Bill to repeal the Act of Settlement.

A. D. 1689. That, in order to prevent all Oppoſition to the Repeal, a Motion was made, that whoever ſhould take any Step of that Kind ſhould be voted an Enemy to his King and Country; and that, when this Motion miſcarry'd, as being abhorrent to the very Nature of Parliaments, it was alſo mov'd by another zealous Member, That the Act of Settlement might be burnt by the common Hangman. All, however, were, in the main, of one Mind: The Bill was hurry'd through all the Forms of the Houſe, with all the Expedition imaginable, and ſent up to the Lords: But with them it ſtuck for ſome time; for even the few Proteſtants among them ſaw, it was of the higheſt Importance to withſtand it to the utmoſt of their Power, and to expoſe it to the utmoſt of their Abilities. At the Head of theſe few ſtood forth Dr. Dopping, Biſhop of Meath, who in an excellent Speech, ſtill extant in the Appendix to Dr. King's State, undertook to ſhew, That the Bill was unjuſt in its very Nature; that it was neither for the Honour of the King, nor his Intereſt; that it was injurious to the public Good, and deſtructive of the public Faith; and that even in point of Time it was improper; ſince it was fit to get an entire Poſſeſſion of the promis'd Land, before they proceeded to divide it. In the Courſe of this Speech, he alſo took into Conſideration the Clauſe which was to enable the King, to gratify meriting Perſons, and to order the Commiſſioners to ſet forth Repriſals, and likewiſe to appoint and aſcertain where and what Lands ſhould be ſet out to them; and demonſtrated, that tho' ſuch a thing as a Repriſal or Equivalent was mention'd in the Bill, the Reality was wanting; and that, in particular, no Penalty was inflicted on ſuch as ſhould enter on the Lands they claim'd without an Injunction; that no Conſideration was allow'd for Improvements; that no Saving was made for Remainders; that no Time was given to Tenants or Poſſeſſors to remove their Stock; that no Proviſion was made for Proteſtant-Widows; and that the only Equivalent allow'd was for original Purchaſe-Money, which it was hard to make out, and which it might be preſum'd would not reimburſe the ſecond or third Purchaſers. But however convincing theſe Arguments were, they converted no body; the Fate of the Bill was predetermin'd, and had its Courſe accordingly; nor could thoſe concern'd obtain Leave to be heard at the Lords Bar, in conformity to their humble Prayer, or any other Conſideration of any kind, tho' ever ſo conſonant to Reaſon and Equity. There remain'd, therefore, no more to be done, than for the Perſons concern'd to ſtate their Caſe, and to ſollicit that Juſtice and Mercy from King James's Perſon, which his two Houſes, ſuch as they were, had deny'd. They did ſo: Judge Keating drew up their (†) Remonſtrance; in which he gave a ſhort dutiful and obedient Subjects of all Degrees, Sexes, and Ages. The Deſign and Intention of it, is to prevent the Ruin and Deſolation, which a Bill now under Conſideration, in order to be made a Law, will bring upon them and their Families, in caſe your Majeſty doth not interpoſe; and by your Moderation and Juſtice protect them ſo far as the known Laws of the Kingdom, and Equity and good Conſcience will warrant and require.

It is in the Behalf of Purchaſers, who for great and valuable Conſiderations, have acquir'd Lands and Tenements in this Kingdom, by laying out not only their Fortunes and Proviſions made for them by their Parents, but alſo the whole Product of all their own Induſtry, and the Labour of their Youth; together with what could be ſaved by a frugal Management, in order to make ſome certain Proviſion for old Age and their Families, in purchaſing Lands and Tenements under the Security of divers Acts of Parliament, and public Declarations from the late King: And all theſe accompanied with a Poſſeſſion of twenty-five Years.

Divine Providence hath appointed us our Dwelling in an Iſland; and conſequently, we muſt trade or live in Penury, and at the Mercy of our Neighbours. This neceſſitates a Tranſmutation of Poſſeſſions, by Purchaſe from one hand to another, of mortgaging and pledging Lands for great and conſiderable Sums of Money, by charging them with Judgments; and indeed, gives Name to one of the greateſt Securities made uſe of in this Kingdom, Statutes Merchant, and of the Staple; and very many, eſpecially Widows and Orphans, have their whole Eſtates and Portions ſecured by Mortgages, Bonds of the Staple, and Judgments.

Where or when ſhall a Man purchaſe in this Kingdom; and what Title, or on what Security ſhall he lay out his Money, or ſecure the Portions he deſigns for his Children, if he may not do it under divers Acts of Parliament, the ſolemn and reiterated Declarations of his Prince, and a quiet and uncontroverted Poſſeſſion of twenty Years together? And this is the Caſe of thouſands of Families who are Purchaſers under the Acts of Settlement and Explanation.

It were a hard Taſk to juſtify thoſe Acts in every Particular contain'd in them; I will not undertake it; but if it be conſider'd, that from October 23, 1641, until May 29, 1660, the time of his Majeſty's Reſtoration, the Kingdom was upon the Matter in one continued Storm: That the Alterations of Poſſeſſions were ſo univerſal, and Properties ſo blended and mix'd by Allotments and Diſpoſitions made by the then uſurping Powers, it may be well concluded, that they muſt be ſomewhat more than Men, that could, or can, frame a Law to take in every particular Caſe, tho' it ſhould have ſwoln to many Volumes; and Laws, which are to be of ſuch univerſal Conſequence as this was, are to have a regard to the Generality of a Kingdom or People, tho', poſſibly, ſome particular Perſon may have ſome Hardſhip in his private Concern.

But if we may judge by general Laws, by the Produce and Effect of them, and at the ſame time have a Proſpect to the Eſtate and Condition of this Kingdom from 1640, and as far backwards as you pleaſe, until the time of his late Majeſty's happy Reſtoration; and at the ſame time take into Conſideration what the Kingdom became in a few Years after the Commiſſion for the Execution of thoſe Acts were at an end; the Buildings and other Improvements; the Trade and Commerce; the vaſt Heads of Cattle and Flocks of Sheep, equal to thoſe of England; together with great Sums of Money brought over by our Fellow-Subjects of England, who came to purchaſe and plant in this Kingdom, the Manufactures ſet on foot in divers Parts, whereby the meaneſt Inhabitants were at once inrich'd and civiliz'd, it would hardly be believ'd it were the ſame Spot of Earth: Nay, overflown and mooriſh Grounds were reduc'd, to the bettering of the Soil and Air. The Purchaſers who brought the Kingdom to this flouriſhing Condition, fly to your Majeſty for Succour, offering not only their Eſtates and Fortunes, but even their Lives to any legal Trial within this your Majeſty's Kingdom, being ready to ſubmit their Perſons and Eſtates to any eſtabliſhed Judicature; where, if it ſhall be found, that they enjoy any thing without legal Title, or have done any thing that may forfeit what they have purchaſed, they will ſit down, and moſt willingly acquieſce in the Judgments: But to have their Purchaſes made void, their Lands and Improvements taken from them; their Securities and Aſſurances for Money Lent, declar'd null and void by a Law made ex poſt facto, is what was never practis'd in any Kingdom or Country.

If the Bill now deſign'd to be made a Law, had been attempted within two, three, four, or five Years after the Court for the Execution of theſe Acts was ended, the Purchaſers would not have laid out their Eſtates in acquiring of Lands, or in building or improving on them: Thouſands who had ſold ſmall Eſtates and Free-holds in England, and brought the Price of them to purchaſe or plant here, would have ſtay'd at home; and your Majeſty's Revenue, with that of the Nobility and Gentry, had never come to the height it did. If your Majeſty pleaſe to conſider upon what Grounds and Aſſurances the Purchaſers of Lands and Tenements in this Kingdom proceed, you will ſoon conclude, that never any proceeded upon ſecurer Grounds. The Acts of 17, and 18 of King Charles your Father of bleſſed Memory, the firſt, takes notice, that there was a Rebellion begun in this Kingdom on the 23d of October, 1641: And ſo doth a Bill once read in the Houſe of Lords. Whoever looks into the Royal Martyr's Diſcourſe upon that Occaſion, will ſee with what an Abhorrence he laments it; and that he had once Thoughts of coming over in Perſon to ſuppreſs it.

Thoſe Acts promiſe Satisfaction out of forfeited Lands to ſuch as would advance Money for reducing theſe Diſturbers of the public Peace unto their Duty. The Invitation was his late Majeſty's, your Royal Brother's Letters from Breda, ſome few Weeks before his Reſtoration, which happen'd the 29th of May, 1660: And within ſix Months after, came forth his Majeſty's moſt gracious Declaration for the Settlement of this Kingdom. This, may it pleaſe your Majeſty, is the Baſis and Foundation of the Settlement, and was ſome Years after enacted and made a Law by two ſeveral Acts of Parliament.

It is true, that the uſurping Powers in the Year 1653 (having, by the Permiſſion of the Almighty, as a juſt Judgment on us for our Sins, prevailed here) did diſpoſe and ſet out the Eſtates of Catholics unto Adventurers and Soldiers; and in a Year or two afterwards, tranſplanted our Catholic Free-holders for no other Reaſon, but their being ſo, in Connaught, where Lands were ſet out unto them under divers Qualifications, which they and their Heirs, or thoſe deriving under them as Purchaſers, enjoy'd, and ſtill do enjoy, under the Security of the before-mention'd Acts of Parliament and Declaration.

His Majeſty's gracious Declaration of the 30th of November, 1660, which I call the Foundation of the Settlement, was, before it was concluded on, under the Conſideration of that great Prince, and the Lords of his Council of England, where all Perſons concern'd for the Proprietors, as well old as new, were heard. Whoever reads, will find the many Difficulties which he and his Council met with from the different and ſeveral Pretenders; what Conſideration was had, and Care taken to reconcile the jarring Intereſts, and to accommodate and ſettle, as well as was poſſible, the Maſs and Body of Subjects here.

It was ſome Years after, before the Act for the Execution of his Majeſty's moſt gracious Declaration became a Law: It was near two Years upon the Anvil. It was not a Law that paſs'd in few Days, or ſub ſilentio: It was firſt, according to the then Courſe of paſſing Laws, here framed by the chief Governor and Council of this Kingdom, by the Advice, and with the Aſſiſtance of all the Judges, and of his Majeſty's Council learn'd in the Law, and then tranſmitted into England to be further conſider'd of by his Majeſty and Lords of his Council there, where the Council at Law and Agents of all Pretenders to the Propriety of Lands in this Kingdom were heard, and that Act, commonly call'd the Act of Settlement, approv'd of and retranſmitted under the Seal of England to receive the Royal Aſſent, which it did, after having paſs'd both Houſes of Parliament.

The innocent Proprietors being reſtor'd purſuant to this Act, and ſome Difficulties appearing as to the further Execution of it, another Act paſſed, commonly called the Act of Explanation; which went the ſame Courſe, and under the ſame Scrutiny.

It is confeſs'd, that tho' they are two Acts, it was by the ſame Parliament, who were choſen according to the ancient Courſe of chuſing Parliaments.

But if any Miſcarriage were in bringing that Parliament together, or the procuring the aforeſaid Acts of Parliament to paſs, which we can in no wiſe admit; and the leſs, for that your Majeſty's Revenue was granted and ſettled by the ſame Parliament, and many good and wholſome Laws there-in enacted; yet it is manifeſt, that nothing of that kind ought to affect the plain and honeſt Purchaſer, who for great and valuable Conſiderations acquired Lands under the Security aforeſaid, and expended the Remainder of his Means in building, improving, and planting on them; and that for the following Reaſons.

1. The Purchaſer adviſing with his Council, how to lay out or ſecure his Money that it may not be loſt, not only to his but the public Detriment, tells him, that he is offer'd a Purchaſe of Lands in Fee, or deſired by his Neighbours to accommodate him with Money, upon the Security of Judgment or Statute Staple: and, upon the Enquiry into the Title, he finds a good and ſecure Eſtate, as firm in Law as two Acts of Parliament in force in this Kingdom can make it; and, in many Caſes, Letters Patents upon a Commiſſion of Grace for remedying of defective Titles: he finds Poſſeſſion both of many

A. D. 1689. Council before him. This was presented by the Earl of Granard; and, it may be presum'd, had some Effect upon his Compassion, at least: For, in a Tract, called, An Account A. D. 1689.

many Years gone along with his Title several Descents past, and possibly that the Lands have been purchas'd, and pass'd thro' the Hands of divers Purchasers: He resorts to the Records, where he meets with Fines and common Recoveries, the great Assurance known to the Laws of England; under which (by the Blessing of God) we live; and tells him there is no Scruple, nor Difficulty of purchasing under this Title; since he hath Security under two Acts of Parliament, Certificates and Letters Patent, Fines and Recoveries; and that no Law of force in this Kingdom can stir, much less shake, this Title.

How is it possible to imagine, that the legislative Power should be made use of to void this Man's Estate, who perhaps was never in this Kingdom, until after these Acts were enacted and become Laws; it will be the like Case with all Persons, who, upon the Marriage of their Children, and considerable Marriage-Portions paid and receiv'd, have procur'd Settlements for jointur'd Portions, and Remainders for their Children and Grand-children: And all these are to be laid aside, without any Consideration of Law or Equity in the Case of the Purchasers, or any Misdemeanor or Offence committed by them: Whereby vast Numbers of your Majesty's dutiful Subjects, the present Proprietors and their Lessees, and, in very many Cases, Widows, Orphans, Merchants and Traders, will be at one Stroke outed and remov'd from the Possessions of their Lands and Improvements, which in many Places are more in value than the Township whereon they are made: This, with Submission, without some Fraud, Deceit, or Default of the Purchaser, never was, and it is hop'd never will be, done by a People or Nation professing Christianity: Nor is it for the Honour, Welfare, or Advantage of the King or Kingdom to have it to done: What will Strangers and our Fellow-subjects of England and Scotland say?——— We sold our Estates in England, transported us and our Families into Ireland, to purchase, improve and plant there: We acquir'd Lands under as secure Titles as Acts of Parliament (the greatest known Security) could make them. Our Conveyances, both by Deeds and Matters of Record, are allow'd good, firm, and unquestionable by any Law in force at the Time of Purchase. We have had the Possession ten, twelve, or fifteen Years, and are grown old upon them. We have clearly drawn our Effects from England, and settled here, not doubting but our Posterity may be so likewise. We have purchas'd Annuities and Rent-charges out of Lands under the same Securities: And now the Old Proprietors (tho' many of them had Satisfaction in Connaught) would fain have a new Law to dispossess us of our Estates, and Improvements made as aforesaid. It will not be believ'd, that the chief of those who drew on this Design should in Parliament and elsewhere, which ought to consist of the gravest, wisest, and wealthiest Freeholders of the Kingdom, (for such the Law presumes them) make a noise with that good and wholsome Advice, Caveat emptor, in this Case; or can think that Caveat is proper here.

The Purchaser ought to be wary of any Flaw in the Title at the Time of the Purchase made, and purchases at his Peril, if any such there be: But who is that Purchaser that shall beware of a Law to be made twenty, thirty, or forty Years after his Purchase, or to destroy his Security for Money lent, or Settlement upon Marriage? This is not a Defect in Title, but (under Favour) is a Precedent which no human Foresight can prevent: and, if once introduc'd, no Purchaser could ever be safe; the worst of Lotteries affording a securer Way of dealing than Ireland would.

Can it be your Majesty's Honour or Advantage to have thousands of Families ruin'd by such a Proceeding as this is? What will become of our Credit, and consequently of our Trade abroad? Where will be the Reputation, and public Faith, and Security of the Kingdom, when foreign Merchants shall know from their Correspondents here, that they cannot comply with their Engagements to them, their Estates, Houses, and Improvements, both in Country and City, which they had acquir'd for great and valuable Considerations, and within the Securities of the Laws, are taken from them by a Law made Yesterday, in case this Bill should pass: So that, in effect, we are not only contriving to break and ruin our own Trades and Merchants at home, but even those in foreign Parts; which will infallibly destroy your Majesty's Revenue, and sink that of every Subject.

Surely these Particulars, and the Consequences of them, are worth more than two or three Days Consideration: Which is as much as this Bill could have, since the Parliament was not open'd till the Seventh of this Month.

The very Report of what is design'd by this Bill hath already reduc'd the most improved and improving Spot of Earth in Europe (from stately Herds and Flocks; from Plenty of Money at seven or eight per Cent. whereby Trade and Industry were encourag'd; and all upon the Security of those Acts of Parliament; from great and convenient Buildings newly erected in Cities and other Corporations;) to that degree, that even the City of Dublin is ruin'd. The passing of these Acts, and the Securities and Quiet promis'd from them, enlarg'd double what it was; that the Shipping in divers Ports were five or six times more than ever was known before, to the vast Increase of your Majesty's Revenue; reduced to the saddest and most disconsolate Condition of any Kingdom or Country in Europe; infinite Numbers of the Inhabitants having transported themselves and Families, with what remain'd unsix'd in Purchases and Improvements, and was portable, of their Estates, into other Kingdoms, that very many of the Buildings both new and old, in this City, and in the very Heart and finding Part of it, are uninhabited and waste.

It is grievous to see, as you pass through the City, the Houses and Shops shut up; the Herds and Flocks in the Country are utterly destroy'd; in that of necessity the Tenant must break, throw up his Lease, leave the Key under the Door, and the Lands become waste; and from hence will necessarily follow, that the Farm-houses and Improvements must go to Decay, and Beef, Tallow, Hides, Wooll, and Butter, (from whence arise the Wealth of the Country) will fail us.

What is become of the frequent Declarations made by the Earl of Clarendon, and the Earl (now Duke) of Tyrconnel, of your Majesty's fix'd Resolutions never to by aside the Acts of Settlement and Explanation? Why did the Judges, in their several Circuits, declare in all Places where they sat, unto the Countries there assembled, that your Majesty was resolv'd to preserve the Acts of Settlement and Explanation; and that they were appointed by the then chief Governor here, to declare the same unto them; from whence they took confidence to proceed in their Purchases and Improvements; and (with Submission be it spoken) if this Bill pass, are deluded. Shall Patents on the Commission of Grace signify nothing? The Great Seal of England tells them they may proceed upon the public Faith; and here again they become Purchasers, paying considerable Fines to the King, to whom Rents were reserved where none were due before, and many Places the Rent increas'd; as in case of Fairs and Markets granted, together with the Lands on them, Patents of Liberties of free Warren, and to enclose and empale for Park; surely some Consideration ought to be had of those whose Money was paid on this account.

It would be farther considered, That your Majesty before your Access to the Crown, had passed several Lands and Tenements in this Kingdom in Certificate and Patent, pursuant to these Acts of Settlement; and that you made Leases of them, on which many and great Improvements have been made. It is likewise true, that your Majesty sold and exchanged some small Proportions of the same Lands, and received in Money twelve Years Purchase; some of which your Majesty conveyed by Fines and other Assurances in Law; and tho' your Majesty may, if it seem meet unto you, part with all that Estate, yet it is humbly conceiv'd, it ought to be with Reservation to the Lessees and those few Purchasers, as it was done by Mary Queen of England, who tho' zealous in the highest Degree to the Religion she profess'd, and that the restored such Parts of Lands belonging unto Monasteries as remained in her Hands undispos'd, did, nevertheless, permit the Grantees and Purchasers quietly and peaceably to retain such Part of them as they were possessed of by Grant or Purchase, and which, for aught appearing, is enjoyed by them, and those deriving under them to this Day, tho' the came to the Crown within few Years after passing the Act for dissolving Monasteries; for if no Consideration be had of them, your Majesty gives away the Terms of Years and Improvements from your Lessees, and the Land from him to whom your Majesty sold it, without restoring the Purchase-Money, than which, no Case can be harder; and without your Royal Assent neither of these can be done.

For the Objections commonly made against the Acts of Settlement and Explanation, which are usually, that many Innocents were never heard, and that there was not time sufficient for hearing of them: but how this should affect those who purchased after the Acts pass'd, and Certificates and Letters Patent passed on them, is not demonstrable from any Rule of Law or Equity.

The Person designing to purchase, enquires whether the Title of the Land or Tenement to be sold be good in Law and Equity; and being assur'd in that he forbears further Inquiry, being assur'd that never any Purchaser in Possession having Law and Equity on his Side, was dispossessed by any Person whatsoever upon Ground of Equity; and the Purchaser here hath the Law with him by the Acts of Settlement, and the Equity by the Payment of his Money.

It is to be wish'd, that if Widows, Orphans, or any other Persons have fallen under Hardship by the general Settlement of the Kingdom, that some way may be devised to make them Reparation; but the way prescrib'd by this Bill, is to rob the Innocent Purchasers, Creditors and Orphans of their

A. D. 1689. Account of the present State of Ireland, by a Person who, with great Difficulty, left Dublin June the 8th, 1689, as it was presented to Lord Shrewsbury, we find the following Passage: "He (Mr. d' Avaux) has influenc'd the passing the Bill for destroying the Act of Settlement; insomuch that he has said, That he would go again to France, if it were not done."— Which seems to argue, that the King's Heart was not set on the Jobb, and that some Violence was necessary to get the better of his Scruples: And it is besides acknowledg'd, that he gave up ten thousand Pounds a Year of his own, to be employ'd in making the Reprisals appointed by the Act as beneficial as possible. But whatever his Inclinations were, they were over-rul'd, the Repeal took (a) place, and was put in execution, Pass'd, and put in force A. D. 1689.

their Estates, to do it contrary to the public Faith, Laws of the Land, and Precept of Holy Writ, which forbids doing of Evil, that Good may come thereof.

'Tis manifeſt by what has been ſaid, that if this Bill proceed, as is now contrived, that all the Proteſtants in the Kingdom are undoubtedly and without Reſerve ruined, ſince the Rapparees, that is, the armed Multitude, have taken away all their moveable Eſtates: And this Deſign is to take away all the Lands and Tenements purchaſed by them.

The thriving Catholics who were Purchaſers (as moſt of the Province of Connaught are) are likewiſe to be turn'd out of their Eſtates and Poſſeſſions, and their own and the Improvements of thoſe who hold under them utterly loſt.

As to the politic Part which theſe great Statesmen who drive on this Bill make mention of, that will be worthy of Conſideration. It is ſaid, that this will unite your Majeſty's Subjects in this Kingdom, that is too groſs to paſs: Since the firſt mentioning thereof, hath it not made a Diviſion and a Breach betwixt them? nay, where there was none before? and doth it not grow daily wider? It was never heard that Accommodation between Parties that were all in Conteſt could ſtand, unleſs the Terms were continued; for if what was given to one of the Parties be taken away, it makes the whole Award void and of none Effect; and admitting the old Proprietor had Right, it is not enough except he have it againſt the Purchaſer: And if the Deſign be what is pretended, to reſtore this Kingdom to the Peace and Plenty which it flouriſh'd in ſome Years ſince, to unite your Majeſty's Subjects, whereby they may be enabled according to their Duty and Allegiance, to reſtore your Majeſty to the Exerciſe of your Royal Dignity in all your Kingdoms; this can never be effected, except all Pretenders recede in ſome Degree from the full of their Pretenſions for the Accommodation of the whole, and the public Quiet and Safety.

Would it not be an unreaſonable thing in a Cargo where divers Merchants are concern'd, and have Goods and Merchandizes in a Storm, to throw out by Conſent the Goods of any one Merchant, tho' in the Bottom of the Hold and hardeſt to come by, for the Safety of all concern'd, without Satisfaction given him, by a Contribution from thoſe who had the Advantage of it; or if it could be done, or had time for it, were it not much more juſt that the Loſs ſhould be equally divided among them, by throwing out a juſt Proportion from all concern'd, than to ſingle out one Part of the People, and by their Ruin to advance the other. This is not, in my Judgment, the readieſt way of uniting them.

Suffer us to make one Step more, and Query, whether the Catholic Purchaſers now to be turn'd out of Poſſeſſion, will join heartily with thoſe that enter upon them? Farewell Trade and Commerce where Acts of Parliament ſhall be made to deſtroy Securities that were good when made; farewell all Improvements in Ireland, where no Man ſhall ever know what Eſtate he hath, if the Foundation of the general Settlement ſhould now be overturn'd.

I cannot foreſee what the Conſequences may be of having it publiſh'd, and made known in your Majeſty's other Kingdoms and Dominions, and elſewhere where the Proteſtant Religion is profeſs'd, that ſuch a Propoſal as this (in relation to ſuch of your Proteſtant Subjects as have made no Defection) hath been prepar'd for your Majeſty's Conſideration in order to be paſs'd into a Law, and this, when they were ſecure of the Laws of the Land; and not ſo much as common Equity to queſtion the Title by which they held: That nevertheleſs uſe ſhould be made of the Legiſlative Power to enact a new Law, after ſo many Aſſurances given them to the country, and after ſo many Years quiet Poſſeſſion to turn them out of their Eſtates altogether.

'Tis much to be fear'd that thoſe who firſt adviſ'd this Method of Proceedings, have conſider'd their own particular Advantage, and that of their Friends and Relations, without the leaſt Thoughts of your Majeſty's Service; for ſurely this can never be thought ſo, nor the way to ſettle this Kingdom whereby it may be ſerviceable to your Majeſty: Nor can it be imagin'd, but that Men thus deſpoil'd, will as often as Parliaments ſhall be call'd, make Application for Redreſs and Repeal, as in the Caſe of the Spencers to repeal a Repeal, and they and their Poſterity will be always ſoliciting your Majeſty and your Succeſſors to give them Relief in a Caſe of ſo great Moment and general Concern as this is.

As for the general Reprizal mention'd to be made them out of the Rebels Eſtate (which muſt not be conceiv'd to give any Colour to this manner of Proceeding, and ought to be equal to the Eſtate which the Proprietors ſhall be outed of) that will be very uncertain, for it muſt be known who the Rebels are, and what their Lands amount to, ſince it may be probably concluded, that there are many of your Subjects now in England no way concern'd in the Rebellion, and would have, e're this, attended your Majeſty here, if they had not been hinder'd from coming by Dureſs and Embargo, and many other legal and juſtifiable Excuſes, too long for this preſent Paper; and withal, that where any of them are ſeiz'd of any new Eſtates, ſo much muſt be reſtored to the old Proprietors, and what is alſo ſubject to their Settlements and other Incumbrances.

After all this, it is in the Power of your Majeſty to prevent the total Ruin of ſo many of your Subjects as have been Purchaſers and Improvers in this Kingdom, by preſcribing more moderate ways than depriving them of the whole of what they have legally and induſtriouſly acquir'd; and that Committees of both Houſes may hear and enquire whether any Medium may be found out betwixt the Extremes for the accommodating as near as may be the Purchaſer and the old Proprietor, ſo that if there be cauſe of Complaint, it may not ariſe from a total Diſappointment of either Party. This is a little of what may be ſaid on this Occaſion, but the Haſte of thoſe who drew on this Bill will allow no further time at preſent.

It is propos'd that his Majeſty will hear Council on this Occaſion."

(a) Under the following Pretences, which ſerve as a Preamble to it:

" Whereas the Ambition and Avarice of the Lords Juſtices, ruling over this your Kingdom in 1641, did engage them to gather a malignant Party and Cabal of the then Privy-Council, contrary to their ſworn Faith and natural Allegiance, in a ſecret Intelligence and traiterous Combination with the Puritan Sectaries in the Realm of Great Britain, againſt their lawful and undoubted Sovereign, his Peace, Crown and Dignity; the Malice of which made it ſoon manifeſt in the Nature and Tendency of their Proceedings, their untimely Prorogations of a loyal, unanimous Parliament, and thereby making void and diſappointing the Effects of many reaſonable Votes, Bills and Addreſſes, which paſs'd into Laws, had certainly ſecur'd the Peace and Tranquility of this Kingdom; by binding to his Majeſty the Hearts of his Iriſh Subjects, as well by the Ties of Affection and Gratitude, as Duty and Allegiance there. The ſaid Lords Juſtices traiterouſly diſbanding his Majeſty's well-affected Catholic Forces, when his Perſon and Monarchy were expos'd to the ſaid Rebel Sectaries, then marching in hoſtile Arms to deſpoil him of his Power, Dominions, and Life; their immediate calling into the Place and Stead of thoſe his Majeſty's faithful diſbanded Forces, a formidable Body of diſciplin'd Troops, aly'd and confederated in Cauſe, Nation, and Principles, with thoſe Rebel-Sectaries: Their unwarrantable Entertainment of thoſe Troops in this Kingdom, to the draining of his Majeſty's Treaſury, and Terror of his Catholic Subjects, then openly menac'd by them the aforeſaid Lords Juſtices with a Maſſacre and total Extirpation; their bloody Proſecution of that Menace, in the Slaughter of many innocent Perſons; thereby affrighting and compelling others (in deſpair of Protection from their Government) to unite, and take Arms for their neceſſary Defence, and Preſervation of their Lives; their unpardonable Prevarication from his Majeſty's Orders to them, in retrenching the Time by him graciouſly given to his Subjects, ſo compell'd into Arms, of returning to their Duty; confining the general Pardon to ſuch only as had no Freehold Eſtates to make Forfeitures of; their pernicious Arts in way-laying, exchanging, and wickedly depriving all Intercourſe by Letters, Expreſſes, and other Communication and Privity, betwixt your ſaid Royal Father and his much abuſed People," &c.

Then the Act ſets forth, how they torture'd Sir John Read; and how the Duke of Ormond follow'd the Steps of thoſe Lords Juſtices, in procuring the Acts of Settlement and Explanation.

After which it proceeds:

" Which laſt Act was paſs'd in a Seſſion of the ſaid Parliament held in this Kingdom, in the ſeventeenth and eighteenth Years of his Reign; moſt of the Members thereof being ſuch as forcibly poſſeſs'd themſelves of the Eſtates of your Catholic Subjects in this Kingdom, and were convey'd toge-

Thoſe ejected to be puniſh'd for Waſte.

As a farther Aggravation of the Calamities, which the Act was calculated to bring on thoſe who were to be ejected in this Summary way, an additional Bill was brought in and paſs'd, under the Title of An Act for Puniſhment of Waſte committed on Lands reſtorable to the Proprietors; by which it was provided, That thoſe who had pull'd down old Houſes, or who had fell'd Trees, tho' for maintaining or improving the Premiſſes, ſhould be accountable for it: And many of them were actually ſued for pretended Treſpaſſes of that kind, and compell'd by all the Severities of the Law to ſatisfy the Demands ſo injuriouſly made upon them. There was alſo a Clauſe in the firſt of theſe two Acts, by which it was enacted, That all Mannors, Lands, &c. and all Eſtates and Intereſts whatſoever, in Law or Equity, which on the firſt of Auguſt 1688, or at any time after, belong'd to any in Rebellion in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or who correſponded or kept Intelligence, or went contrary to their Allegiance to dwell or ſtay among the ſaid Rebels, or was any way aiding or abetting them, were forfeited from the ſaid firſt of Auguſt, and freed from all Eſtates, Tails, Remainders, and Reverſions.

The Lands and Goods of Abſentees, &c. forfeited.

There was, moreover, an expreſs Act for veſting in his Majeſty the Goods of Abſentees, and to impower his Commiſſioners of the Revenue to ſeize the ſame. According to Dr. King, this Bill extended only to ſuch Abſentees as were declar'd forfeiting Perſons by the Bill of Attainder, of which we are preſently to ſpeak, or who abetted or aſſiſted the Prince of Orange: But the Author of the Memoirs of Ireland makes mention of no ſuch Limitation; and adds, That by this Bill it was penal for any to have the Goods of Abſentees in their Hands without making Diſcovery thereof.

But all theſe, and all the other Severities that were never yet put in Practice, under the Form of Laws, or even Proſcriptions, fell far ſhort of the Act of Attainder, juſt mention'd, which was deſign'd to complete what the Repeal had ſo notably begun. It was indeed notorious, that many of the Iriſh Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy, and many of the Engliſh holding large Eſtates and Poſſeſſions in Ireland, had join'd with the Prince of Orange againſt King James, and had been inſtrumental in accompliſhing the Revolution, and in forming the new Government. But, if we are rightly inform'd, theſe mercileſs Avengers did not ſo much conſider the Crime, as the Perſon, nor the Weight of the Evidence as the Value of the Forfeiture. It is even aſſerted, that the Method they took to make the Act as extenſive as poſſible, was as inexcuſable as the Act itſelf; for every Member return'd the Names of ſuch Proteſtant Gentlemen as liv'd near him, or in the County or Borough for which he ſerv'd: And in Caſe any Member was a Stranger to the Place he repreſented, he ſent thither for Information. And on the Reports that were thus collected and thus deliver'd by themſelves, they proceeded to attaint of Rebellion, 1. All Perſons who did not ſurrender themſelves in order to take their Trials, by the 10th of Auguſt, and who were in the Kingdom and amenable to the Law, at the time of paſſing the Act (for in caſe any of thoſe rang'd under this Head were not ſo, they were attainted abſolutely.) The Numbers comprehended under this Head, were one Archbiſhop, one Duke, fourteen Earls, ſeventeen Viſcounts, and one Viſcounteſs, two Biſhops, twelve Barons, twenty-ſix Baronets, twenty-two Knights, fifty-ſix Clergymen, and eleven hundred and fifty three Eſquires, Gentlemen, &c. 2. All Perſons who were Abſentees before the fifth of November, and who ſhould not return, according to the Proclamation of November 25, by the firſt of September. One Lord, ſeven Knights, eight Clergymen, ſixty-five Eſquires and Gentlemen

[Note, The Copy of the firſt Order for garriſoning the Houſe of Ballyſannan could not be gotten.]

Whereas I have been inform'd, that Ballyſannan, now belonging to Mr. Annesley, was a Houſe of Strength, and therefore fit to have a Garriſon; and now being convinc'd of the contrary; theſe are therefore, in his Majeſty's Name, to require you forthwith to remove your Men to their former Garriſon, out of the ſaid Houſe. For Captain Patrick Nugent, or the Officer in Chief, commanding the Troop at Kildare.

SIR,

This is to let you underſtand, that I am authoris'd to give the Proprietor poſſeſſion of the Lands of Ballyſannan, &c. according to the Act of Parliament; and that you may not be ſurpriz'd therein, I give you this Notice, from, Sir,

Your loving Friend and Servant,

Nass, the 8th of April, 1690. CHARLES WHITE.

For John Anneſley, Eſq; or, in his Abſence, to Francis Anneſley, Eſq; Theſe.

Second Order for Ballyſannan.

Whereas Luke Fitzgerald, Eſq; has prov'd himſelf before me to be the ancient Proprietor of the Town and Lands of Ballyſannan, and that his Anceſtors were poſſeſs'd of their Manſion-houſe there, in the Year 1641; I do therefore, in purſuance of his Majeſty's Orders unto me, appoint the under-nam'd Perſons to give poſſeſſion of the Manſion-houſe there to Luke Fitzgerald, Eſq; And for ſo doing this ſhall be your Warrant. Given under my Hand and Seal this 6th Day of May, 1690.

CHARLES WHITE.

I do hereby appoint Captain Walter Archbold, or Captain John Dillon, of Athy, to give poſſeſſion of the Manſion-houſe of Ballyſannan to Luke Fitzgerald, Eſq;".

A.D. 1689. men were nominated under this Clause. 3. All Persons, who were Absentees before the fifth of November, 1688, not returning according to the said Proclamation, if they did not appear by the first of October, 1689. In which Predicament were involv'd one Archbishop, one Earl, one Viscount, five Bishops, seven Baronets, eight Knights, nineteen Clergymen, four hundred and thirteen Esquires, Gentlemen, &c. And, 4. All Persons, usually resident in England, who did not manifest their Loyalty by the first of October, in case the King went thither by that time: By which one Earl, fifteen Viscounts and Lords, fourteen Knights, five hundred and ninety-two Esquires, &c. were proscrib'd.

What is still more cruel than all the rest, the Estates real and personal of such as were absent thro' Sickness or Nonage, were vested in the King, till they should give sufficient Proof of their Loyalty: And, in case they did so before the last Day of the first Term after their Return, they were allow'd to sue for their Estates, before the Commissioners for executing the Acts of Repeal or Attainder, if sitting, or the Courts of Chancery or Exchequer. One Earl, seven Countesses, one Viscountess, thirteen Ladies, one Baronet, and fifty-nine Gentlemen, &c. were stript of their Property by this Clause. And by the whole Act above two thousand four hundred Persons were pointed out by Name, to suffer all the Mischiefs that the Avarice or Malignity of an enrag'd and all-powerful Enemy could inflict upon them. Care was moreover taken to lay a Restraint on the very Prerogative, which these Men affected to be so zealous for, in the Apprehension that some use might be made of it on the merciful Side. Thus it was provided, that, in case a Pardon was issu'd to any of the Persons specify'd in that Act, if it was not enroll'd before the last Day of November, 1689, it should be absolutely null and void: And as to the seeming Indulgence of allowing the said Persons a certain time to come in, before the Penalties took place, Bishop King affirms, it was a mere Nothing; the Embargo in both Kingdoms being so strict that neither could those in Ireland correspond with their Friends abroad, nor those abroad return home, on any Consideration whatsoever; nor indeed durst any body in Ireland have sent any such Advices, had the Ports been open; for by the Clause in the Act of Repeal, which made it Treason to correspond with any Rebel, they would have been liable to such Prosecutions as might have ruin'd them, only for endeavouring to prevent the Ruin of others. Nay, the very Act itself was so carefully (d) conceal'd, that no Protestant was permitted to see it, much less to take a Copy of it, till the time limited for Pardons had been elaps'd, at least four Months. And, to crown all, that it might be out of the Power of any English Parliament, as well as the King himself, to interpose in Behalf of the Sufferers, they pass'd another Act, by which it was declar'd, That the Parliament of England had no Power or Authority over Ireland; and a Provision was made against all Writs of Error and Appeal from Ireland to England.

against upwards of 2400 Persons.

To draw towards a Conclusion on this Head: When Sir Richard Neagle presented this terrible Act to King James for his Royal Assent,

(d) We had from the beginning, says Dr. King, labour'd to get it, and offer'd largely for a Copy, but could not by any Means prevail, Chancellor Fitton keeping the Rolls lock'd up in his Closet, till at last a Gentleman procur'd it by a Stratagem, which was thus: Sir Thomas Southwell had been condemn'd for High Treason against King James, among other Gentlemen at Galloway, in March 1688, and attainted in the Act of Attainder also; he continued a Prisoner till my Lord Seaforth became acquainted with him; my Lord undertook to reconcile him to the King, and to get his Pardon. King James promis'd it on the Earl's Application, and order was given to draw up a Warrant for it. The Gentleman I mention'd being a Lawyer and an Acquaintance of Sir Thomas's, was employ'd to draw it up; he immediately apprehended this to be a good Opportunity to get a Copy of the Act of Attainder, which he had labour'd for in vain before, and which was kept from us by so much Injustice. He told the Earl therefore, and Sir Thomas (what was the real Truth) that he could not draw up an effectual Pardon, except he saw the Act that attainted him. Hereupon the Earl obtain'd an express Order from the King, to have a Copy deliver'd to him. This I believe was the only Copy taken of it after it was inroll'd. It was taken for the use of a Papist, and was lent to the Earl, who was permitted to shew it to his Lawyer; and accordingly left it with him only for one Day, who immediately imploy'd several Persons to copy it, and the Copy was sent by the first Opportunity into England. The List of the Names of those that were attainted, had been obtain'd the January before with Difficulty; the Commissioners in the Custom-house, who seiz'd Absentees Goods, and set their Estates, could not do their Work without such a List: And that which was printed in England, with some of the Acts of our Irish Parliament, was copy'd from thence; but the Act itself could not then be procur'd, and therefore was not printed with them. When the Lawyer had drawn up the Warrant for Sir Thomas's Pardon, with a full Non obstante to the Act of Attainder, the Earl brought it to the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Neagle, to have a Fiat Drawn; the Attorney read it, and with Indignation threw it aside: The Earl began to expostulate with him for using the King's Warrant at that rate: The Attorney told him, That the King did not know what he had done; that he had attempted to do a thing that was not in his Power to do, that if the Earl understood our Laws, or had seen the Act of Attainder, he would be satisfy'd that the King could not dispense with it: My Lord answer'd, That he understood Sense and Reason, and that he was not a Stranger to the Act of Attainder. Sir Richard would not believe him till he shew'd the Copy, which much surpriz'd Sir Richard: He began to enquire how his Lordship came by it, and intimated that the Keepers of the Rolls were treacherous, in letting any one see it, much more in letting a Copy of it go abroad. His Lordship, with good Reason, express'd his Admiration, that an Act of Parliament should be made a Secret; and the Laws, upon the Observation of which the Lives and Fortunes of so many Men depended, should be conceal'd with so much Care from them. At last the Attorney told him, That he himself would draw up a Warrant for Sir Thomas Southwell's Pardon, that should do his Business, and get the King to sign it; but the Earl refus'd to accept his Offer, unless his Lawyer might first peruse it; which being granted, the Lawyer, upon Perusal, found it to be such as would not hold in Law, and intended only to delude him. The Earl made new Application to King James, and Sir Richard being sent for, the King ask'd him why he did not prepare a Fiat for Sir Thomas Southwell's Pardon, according to the Warrant sent to him? he answer'd, That his Majesty could not grant such a Pardon; that his Majesty was only a Trustee for forfeited Estates, and could not dispense with the Act: That by an express Clause in it, all Pardons that should be granted were declar'd void: The King in some Passion told him, That he hop'd they did not intend to retrench his Prerogative: Sir Richard reply'd, That his Majesty had read the Act before he pass'd it: The King answer'd, He had betray'd him; that he depended on him for drawing the Act; and if he had drawn it so that there was no Room for dispensing and pardoning, he had been false to him, or Words to that Effect. Thus the Matter ended, and Sir Thomas went into Scotland with my Lord Seaforth, without being able to obtain his Pardon for Estate or Life."

A. D. 1689. Assent, we are told, he made no Difficulty to acknowledge, that many of the Persons attainted by it, were attainted on such Evidence as was satisfactory to the House of Commons, and the rest, upon Common Fame. Even in the Preamble to the Act itself, it is only said, in general, that the Persons therein after nam'd had notoriously join'd in the Rebellion of his Majesty's Subjects, and the Invasion of the Prince of Orange; and, more particularly, that some of them had been condemn'd on Indictments, some executed for High Treason, some kill'd in open Rebellion (with King James's (e) Protections in their Pockets) some were actually in the Service of the Prince of Orange, and that the rest either ran away or absconded. In the Course of both these Acts, namely, of Attainder, and Repeal, the few sitting Lords that were Protestants desir'd leave to enter their Dissents, agreeable to the Privilege of the Peerage; but were told by the King himself, That Protestations were only us'd in rebellious Times. Persisting, however, in their Demand, it was at last agreed to by the House, but as far as appears, without any Effect; for the Clerk of the House, who was a Nephew of Chancellor Fitton's, found such a Variety of Pretences to elude their Importunities, that they were forc'd in the End to give them over. It is farther observable, according to Dr. King, that all the Acts of this pretended Parliament are said to be, by the Advice, and with the Consent, of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal; whereas, to many of them not one Spiritual Lord gave his Consent; on the contrary, those that attended, unanimously protested against them; and, in particular, at the final passing the Bill of Attainder, they were not so much as present: It was in vain, however, that they made their Complaint of this Trespass; Redress was refus'd: Possibly the Example of the English Convention was quoted against them, which had even dispos'd of the Crown, in the Name of the Lords Spiritual, tho' but one or two of them had join'd in the Vote; and it was thought advisable to adhere, as they had done, to the usual Forms. A. D. 1689.

Having made these mighty Strides towards the Establishment they had so long desir'd, these Catholic Patriots, in the next place, took it into their Consideration, to bestow a suitable Reward on Lord Tyrconnel, who, for upwards of twenty Years together, had labour'd to procure them the Opportunity then before them: And this Reward was no less than Twenty thousand Pounds per Ann. out of the forfeited Estates; which was bestow'd on him by an express Act, and in express Acknowledgment of his signal Services. They, moreover, complimented King James with a Tax of twenty thousand Pounds per Month, for thirteen Months: And that their Mother-Church might also have Reason to pour out her Benedictions upon them, they proceeded first, to pass an Act for Liberty of Conscience, and for repealing all such Acts, or Clauses of Acts, as were inconsistent with the same: And, having thus put all the several Sects of Religion on a seeming Level, their next Effort was, to make a proper Provision for their own; which they did, by enacting, That all Tythes which were payable by Papists should be paid to their own Priests; with an additional Clause, which allow'd the said Priests to bring their Actions at common Law, to make the Recovery of them so much the more

A Tax of twenty thousand Pounds a Month given to the King for thirteen Months.

Tythes of the Papists given to the popish Priests.

(e) Which is thus accounted for by Dr. King: "The Protestants had reason to fear their Lives, when they saw that they were in the Hands of such, as not only broke all Articles and Conditions with them, but likewise violated the King's Protections granted to poor innocent People that had no ways offended him. This was the Case of many in the County of Down, tho' they had Protections granted them, and lived quietly; yet not only their Goods were taken from them, but likewise their Wives and Daughters were ravish'd by the Soldiers. They were most sensible and impatient of this Injury, and yet proceeded no farther than to complain of it to the chief Officers, and to demand Redress from them. The Answer they had was, That these Robbers and Ravishers had no Authority from the King for what they did; and therefore they advis'd the Complainants to fall on them and oppose them if they made any further Attempts on the Country. The poor People were satisfy'd with the Answer, and resolv'd to do as they were directed; and accordingly fell upon the next Party of Soldiers they found plundering and committing Outrages on the Country People, and they kill'd some of them. This instead of being approved, as they were made to believe it would be, was counted a Rebellion; and immediately Major General Boham was sent among them with a Party, who massacred about five or six hundred of them in cold Blood for several Days together. Many of those who were killed were poor, old, impotent People; many were kill'd at their Work, and while they were busy about their own Affairs and suspected no such Matter. King James was so far from resenting the barbarous Usage of these poor People, that he rail'd on this Occasion against Protestants in general, representing them as false and perfidious; for, said he, Many were kill'd with my Protections in their Pockets; not considering the Reflection was on his own Party, against whom his Protection, as appear'd by his own Confession, was no Security. And when Men were thus slaughter'd with his Approbation, notwithstanding his Protections in their Pockets, it was but reasonable for such as survive'd to think of some other way of protecting their Lives. If he had design'd in earnest to have secur'd his Subjects Lives, or to prevent their Destruction, he would have made Examples of those who robb'd or kill'd such as had been at the Charges of taking out four or five Protections, and yet were never the safer or securer of their Fortunes or Lives."

Again, in another Place:

"His Protections were in every Place alike insignificant: many Protestants lost the Value of three, many of four, and some of ten thousand Pounds Sterling, notwithstanding their repeated Protections, and their approv'd and peaceable demeaning themselves; of which Captain Barton, in the County of Monaghan, was a signal Example: He had a Protection for his House, at Carrick Mac Rory, and Arms, and had left his Servants in his House, to preserve it and his Goods, he himself staying in Dublin, as a Hostage to the Government, that they might not suspect him to have any Design to withdraw to the North, or join with such Protestants as were in Arms there; yet, in his Absence, a Party of Colonel Mac Mahon's Regiment, about February 1688, came and demanded the House; the Servants shew'd their Protection, and told him who commanded the Soldiers, that they had Orders from the Government to keep the House: The Commander assur'd them, that he would not disturb them, and that he only design'd to lodge some of his Men in it, to secure it more effectually for the King and the Owner; upon which Promise the Servants let him and his Soldiers into the House: They no sooner had obtain'd Entrance, but they fell a plundering, destroying and defacing; and in a few Hours, by ruining his Improvements, and robbing his Goods, Stock and Furniture, they damnify'd him to near the Value of ten thousand Pounds: He complain'd of this false and injurious Dealing to the Government, but could never obtain any Redress, or procure the Ashes of it to be brought to any Account or Punishment; instead of obtaining any thing of that Nature, they added new Injuries to their former, and at last burnt his House to the Ground."

A.D. 1689. more eaſy; a Favour which they, at the ſame time, deny'd to the Proteſtant Clergy; alledging, That they left them in poſſeſſion of their old Claims, and therefore did them no Injury. "But this, ſays our Author, was as good as nothing, for they had ſo weaken'd the eccleſiaſtic Power and Juriſdiction, that it was incapable of compelling the People to Obedience; and it being neceſſary to ſue out a Writ de excommunicato capiendo, in order to force ſuch as were refractory, the popiſh Chancellor either directly refus'd to grant it, or elſe laid ſo many Impediments and Delays in the Way, that it coſt double the Value of the Tythes ſued for, to take it out."

We learn alſo from the ſame Authority, That, in the Corporate Towns and Cities of Ireland, there was a peculiar Proviſion made for Miniſters by Act of Parliament, in King Charles the Second's Time; by which Act, the Houſes in thoſe Places were to be valued by Commiſſioners at a moderate Value; and then the Lord Lieutenant, or chief Governor for the Time being, was to aſſign a certain Proportion for the Miniſters Maintenance, not greater than the twentieth Part of the yearly Value return'd by the Commiſſioners. That therefore the City-Proteſtant Clergy might not be in a better Condition than thoſe in the Country, a Bill was brought in, to take away this altogether; and the Clergy of Dublin deſiring to be heard againſt it at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, before it paſs'd, their Council were admitted to ſpeak to it, who ſhew'd the Unreaſonableneſs and Injuſtice of it ſo evidently, and inſiſted ſo boldly on King James's Promiſe to the Proteſtant Clergy, at his firſt Arrival in this Kingdom, when he gave them Aſſurances of maintaining them in their Rights and Privileges; and further, bid them, if aggriev'd in any thing, to make their Complaints immediately to him, and engag'd to ſee them redreſs'd; that both the King ſeem'd to be ſatisfy'd, and the Houſe of Lords with him: And yet the Deſign to ruin them was ſo fix'd, that, without offering any thing by way of Anſwer to the Reaſons urg'd againſt it, the Act paſs'd; and thereby left the Clergy of the Cities and Corporate Towns without any Pretence to a Maintenance, except they could get it from the voluntary Contributions of their People; nay, ſo malicious were they againſt the Proteſtant Clergy, that they cut off the Arrears due to them, as well as the growing Rent; having left no Means to recover them, as appear'd upon Trial at the Council-Board afterward, when ſome of the Clergy petition'd for Relief therein. Nor was this all: For, upon the Plantation of Ulſter, in 1625, there being a Table of Tythes agreed on by the King and Council, by which the Planters, to whom the Grants were made by the King, were oblig'd to pay Tythes according to that Table; this pretended Parliament took away this Table alſo; for no other Reaſon that appear'd, but becauſe moſt of the Inhabitants of Ulſter were Proteſtants, and conſequently the Proteſtant Clergy would pretend to them.

The Clergy reſident in Towns deprived of their Support.

A.D. 1689.

Another of the Sins imputed to this Parliament has been already touch'd upon, namely, their weakening the eccleſiaſtic Power and Juriſdiction. This was done by their exempting all Diſſenters from that Juriſdiction; and that in ſuch general Terms, that, we are told, a Man needed no more to free him from all Puniſhment for his Miſdemeanors, tho' cognizable only in the eccleſiaſtic Courts, than to profeſs himſelf a Diſſenter, or that it was againſt his Conſcience to ſubmit to the Juriſdiction of the Church: It is added, That as the Act was at firſt drawn, and paſs'd the Houſe of Commons, no Proteſtant Biſhop could pretend to any Juriſdiction even over his own Clergy: That thoſe about King James, who beſt underſtood his Intereſt, and who, from their Knowledge of the Clergy, knew alſo how much more odious it would render him to them, made ſuch earneſt Remonſtrances on that Occaſion, that he was prevail'd upon to employ Sir Edward Herbert to amend the Act while it lay before the Lords; which he did ſo effectually, that nothing of the original Draught remain'd, but the Word Whereas; and that, after all, the Act was fatal to the Juriſdiction of the Church.

And the ſtabliſh'd Church of its Juriſdiction.

That ſuch Acts as theſe were paſs'd in this Aſſembly, is too notorious to admit of Contradiction; but whether they had their Origin from the Violence of the Members who compos'd it, or that of the King, under whoſe Authority they ſat, is Matter of ſome Doubt. Dr. King himſelf is not over conſiſtent on this Head; for he affirms, That this Parliament openly profeſs'd itſelf a Slave to the King's Will, and he was look'd on as factiouſly and rebelliouſly inclin'd, that would dare to inſiſt on any thing after any Favourite in the Houſe had affirm'd, that it was contrary to the King's Pleaſure. Several Bills were begun in the Houſe of Commons, one for erecting an Inn of Court, another for repealing an Act commonly call'd Poinings Act; which requires that all Acts ſhould be peruſed by the King and Council of England, before they be offer'd to be paſs'd by the Parliament in Ireland; but King James ſignify'd his Diſſatisfaction to theſe Bills, and for that Reaſon, both they and ſeveral others were let fall; tho' the Iriſh had talk'd much, and earneſtly deſir'd the Repeal of Poinings Act, it being the greateſt Sign and Means of their Subjection to England. There was a Doubt made in the Houſe concerning the Earl of Strafford, whether he ſhould be attainted for Eſtate and Life; ſeveral mov'd in his Behalf, but it was carry'd againſt him upon this Evidence: Colonel Simon Lutterell affirm'd in the Houſe, That he had heard the King ſay ſome hard things of him. The King's Pleaſure therefore was the LAW on which the Lives and Fortunes of his People depended; for, having entirely engroſs'd the Power of making and repealing Laws, he was Maſter of all Things. And yet we afterwards find him acknowledging, That they croſs'd

The Parliament ſaid to be at the King's Devotion.

Inſtances to the contrary.

A. D. 1689. croſs'd one of the King's Propoſals, which put him into ſo violent a Paſſion, that he cry'd out, I find all Commons are the ſame. That, at another time, they preferr'd a Remonſtrance to him againſt the Earl of Melfort, one of his Secretaries; which gave him occaſion to complain, that they us'd him unkindly and baſely; and to declare, that if he had thought they would not have let him chuſe his own Servants, he would not have come among them. That, when the Act of Attainder was under Conſideration, they would not hear of a Clauſe to enable the King to diſpenſe with it, in any Inſtance whatever: And that he was ſometimes forc'd to make uſe of the Biſhops, and other Proteſtant Lords, by way of Counterpoiſe, to moderate the Madneſs of his own Party, when their Votes diſpleas'd him. All which ſeveral Particulars ſerve to ſhew, That the King's Pleaſure was not always a Law; and that, on the contrary, their Pleaſure was ſometimes a Law to him.

Upon the Whole, the ſame Author pronounces, That they ſat from the 7th of May, till the 20th of July following; and that, in ſo ſhort a time, they entirely deſtroy'd the Settlement of Ireland, and outed both the Proteſtant Clergy and Laity of their Freeholds and Inheritances.

Abuſes of the executive Power.

What we are next to treat of, is the uſe which King James made of his executive Power in Ireland; and if it is truly repreſented by Dr. King and his Followers, we ſhall be forc'd to conclude, that though no Prince had ever leſs perſonal Authority, no Government was ever more tyrannical or oppreſſive, and conſequently, that none can deſire to reſtore it, but ſuch who are either ſo infatuated as to ſeek their own Ruin, or who are ſo profligate as to rejoice in the Ruin of others.

The general diſarming of all Proteſtants through the Kingdom, except thoſe of the North, who had declar'd for the new Government, was follow'd by the authoris'd Robberies in the Country, touch'd on before (for, at the Aſſizes held at Cork, Chief Juſtice Nugent publicly call'd the Robbers Neceſſary Evils) and thoſe by free Quarterings, which was only another Name for the ſame thing. Even before the Act, which empower'd the Commiſſioners of the Revenue to ſeize the Goods and Chattels of Abſentees, had taken place, the very Soldiers had poſitive Orders not only to ſeize the Goods and Chattels, but the Lands and Houſes, of ſuch Perſons, not excepting even thoſe who had taken out Licences of Abſence, and whoſe Licences were not expir'd: We are not to wonder therefore that after the Act took place, the ſaid Commiſſioners continu'd to do by Law, what the Soldiers had preſum'd to do without; nor that, in Conſequence of theſe Severities, all the abſent Proteſtants, to the Number of many thouſands were, as Rebels, indiſcriminately diveſted of their perſonal Eſtates, without Mercy. With regard to the Licences, juſt mention'd, it is moreover aſſerted, That when an expreſs Bargain has been driven, and a Sum paid to clear a particular Ship, that Ship has been ſtopt by a Counter Order, the Cargo unloaded, and what Plate or Money has been found among it, ſeiz'd and confiſcated, tho' not forfeited by any Law. And again: That when general Notice had been given, that Licences to ſail for England would be granted to any who would pay the Price of them, and when they had gotten vaſt Sums from the Multitude who preſs'd to get away, they ſuffer'd no Ship to ſet ſail; and thereby manifeſted, that the ſaid Notice was no better than a Snare, to drain ſo much Money out of the Pockets of the People. It is added, That another of their Arts, was to take off the general Embargo, and pretend that they would ſuffer the Merchants to trade as uſual; but that, no ſooner were the Cuſtom-houſes fill'd with Goods, and large Sums were paid for Duty, beſides ſuch Bribes as were exacted by the Officers, than they impos'd the Embargo again, and ſtopp'd the Goods without refunding one Farthing. On the Head of Protections, it is alſo farther alledg'd, That all Proteſtants reſiding in the Country, were oblig'd to take them out; that they were ſold at great Rates; that it was not ſufficient to buy them once; that they were often voided by change of Orders, or change of Governors; that in ſuch Caſes they were under a Neceſſity to renew them; and that thoſe who had paid for them five or ſix times over, and had their Horſes and Arms included, were depriv'd of thoſe Horſes and Arms notwithſtanding.

Abuſe of Licences and Protections.

A. D. 1689.

But theſe and the like Shifts (of which a great Variety were put in Practice) not anſwering the great End, of ſupplying the Wants of the Government, or rather of exempting the Court of France from making any farther Remittances, a more comprehenſive Project was ſet on foot, which was, to fill the Exchequer with baſe Money, and to make it current by the King's Proclamation. The ſole Right of coining Copper Money in Ireland for a certain Term of Years, was, by an excluſive Patent of the late King Charles's, which had been confirm'd by King James, lodg'd in one Moor, for a valuable Conſideration: This was now ſuperſeded, and, inſtead of making him any Amends, all his Tools and Engines were preſs'd into the King's Service. Nor was that the only private Injury on which this public Fraud was grafted; for when the King's own Stores of old Guns, and old Braſs of all Sorts were exhauſted, the Braziers Shops and Citizens Kitchens were pillag'd to ſupply the Mint: And when a ſufficient Stock of adulterate Traſh was provided, a Proclamation was ſet forth (June 18) requiring and commanding all manner of Perſons to take it in Payment, under the ſevereſt Penalties, tho' the intrinſic Value of what was to paſs for five Pounds, was not worth above a Groat. In about a Year's time, no leſs than 965,375*l.* was iſſu'd of this counterfeit Coin: And though the Parliament was ſitting when the Abuſe was firſt committed, they ſuffer'd the Prerogative to be thus infamouſly proſtituted, without once interfering in Behalf of the Subject, or endeavouring Baſe Money coin'd.

A. D. 1689. deavouring to remedy the Grievances and Oppreſſions it gave riſe to, of which many ſhocking (f) Inſtances are recited by Dr. King.

Nor was this the ſole Violation of national Property which King James or his Miniſters had to anſwer for: The Tax of 20000*l.* a Month given him by his Parliament, was laid upon Lands only; but towards the Cloſe of this Year, he caus'd the like Tax to be levied on Chattels alſo; and that without any other Authority than what he deriv'd from his Prerogative, or aſſigning any other Reaſon than his Royal Will and Pleaſure.

20,000 l. per Month levy'd on Chattels by Prerogative.

But this way of levying Money, we are told, ſtartled every body: The pretended Parliament was then in being, and was adjourn'd till January 12, 1689, which happen'd to be about the very time when the King and his Council were upon this Project. Some of the Latter had the Honeſty and good Senſe to oppoſe it, and ſhew'd there was no Neceſſity of uſing extraordinary ways of levying Money, when the King might have it in the ordinary way; as alſo, that it would give Advantage to his Enemies, and be an Argument of his affecting an Arbitrary Power: But with theſe Free-Speakers he was very angry, and told them, That they had made him believe it was a Branch of his Prerogative to levy Money, and that if he could not do it, he could do nothing. Chancellor Fitton particularly appear'd zealous for it, and it was carry'd, that the Money ſhould be rais'd; but it being a new thing, they were at a loſs for a Method; at laſt however a Proclamation was agreed upon, and a Proclamation, dated February 4, 1689, was iſſu'd accordingly, wherein it is order'd and declar'd, That a Contribution of 20,000 l. per Month, for the Space of three Months, ending the laſt Day of January laſt paſt, ſhall be forthwith applotted, laid in, and levy'd upon perſonal Eſtates of all ſorts: Now this Applotment is order'd to be made by Commiſſioners to be nam'd by the King, who were to proceed according to Inſtructions forthwith to be publiſh'd by him: But Albaville, the Secretary of State, thought it ſufficient, to ſend Letters ſign'd only by himſelf; in which he nam'd and inſtructed the Commiſſioners; and the Perſons ſo nam'd for Dublin judging this Authority inſufficient, and demurring to the Execution, till they had their Nomination and Inſtructions according to the Proclamation, from the King himſelf, under the Great Seal, his Majeſty appear'd not only highly incens'd at the difficulty they made, but was hardly prevail'd on to iſſue a Commiſſion under the Seals in the uſual Forms; as judging his Secretary's Letter a ſufficient Warrant. At laſt, however, a Commiſſion was iſſu'd, in which the Commiſſioners were named, and empowered to name Sub-Commiſſioners for every Barony in their reſpective Counties,

A. D. 1689.

(f) "In this Coin King James paid all his Appointments; and all that receiv'd the King's Pay being generally Papiſts, they forc'd the Proteſtants to part with their Goods out of their Shops for this Money, and to receive their Debts in it; but the Proteſtants having only good Silver or Gold, and Goods bought with theſe, when they wanted any thing from Papiſts, they were forc'd to part with their Gold and Silver, having no Means of coming by the Braſs Money out of the King's Hands; ſo that the Loſs by the Braſs Money did in a manner entirely fall on the Proteſtants, being defrauded (for I can call it no better) of about 60,000 l. per Month by this Stratagem, which muſt in a few Months utterly exhauſt them. When the Papiſts had gotten moſt of their ſalenable Goods from their Proteſtant Neighbours, and yet great Quantities of Braſs Money remain'd in their Hands, they began to conſider, how many of them who had Eſtates had engag'd them to Proteſtants by Judgments, Statute-Staples, and Mortgages; this was all the Reſerve of their Fortunes left the Proteſtants: And, to take this likewiſe from them, they procur'd a Proclamation, dated February 4, 1689, to make the Braſs Money current in all Payments whatſoever, whereas at firſt Judgments, &c. were excepted: Thus they rid themſelves of their Braſs Money, and put it on Proteſtants. The Chancellor Fitton compelling the Truſtees for Orphans and Widows, to receive their Mortgages, &c. in this Coin, as well as others, tho' they pleaded that they knew not how to diſpoſe of it, nor, if they did know, could they legally receive it, or make uſe of it, being only Truſtees. Sometimes it was pleaded, that by the original Covenants they were to have a certain Time of Warning, before they ſhould be oblig'd to receive their Money, tho' offer'd them in Silver: but all ſignify'd nothing, the Chancellor over-rul'd all their Pleas, and puſh'd the Braſs Money on them, not ſo much as allowing it to remain in the Court.

The Governor of Dublin, the Provoſt-Marſhal, and their Deputies, aſſum'd the ſame Power, and threaten'd to hang all that refus'd the Braſs Money; of which we had many Inſtances. One Mr. Bennet a Tanner owing Money to one Alderman Smith, and to Mr. Hugh Leſſon a Clergyman; Bennet having ſome Goods taken from him, for which he was paid in Braſs Money, tender'd it to them; but upon a civil Refuſal he complain'd to Governor Luttrell, who gave him two Warrants to the Provoſt-Marſhal to take them; he ſhew'd them to Alderman Smith, who immediately comply'd, and receiv'd his Money; but Luttrell, being inform'd of it, was angry that Bennet had compounded the Buſineſs, and therefore directed the Provoſt to take him; by whom he was kept a Fortnight, and not releas'd till he paid 20*l.* Fees. Leſſon was likewiſe taken, and committed with him.

One Chapman, a Widow, was us'd yet worſe by the Provoſt-Marſhal's Deputy, one Kerney: a Petition was preferr'd againſt her by the Sollicitor of one who ow'd her 150 l. by Bond, alledging, falſly, that ſhe had refus'd to receive it in Braſs: Kerney ſent his Troopers for her at ten o' Clock at Night; he told her, with many Oaths and Execrations, that he would have her burnt next Morning; that he had Power to put to what Death he pleas'd any that ſhould refuſe or undervalue the Braſs Money, and would exerciſe it on her. Her Debtor was preſent, and acknowledg'd, that the Allegation in the Petition was falſe, that ſhe had never tender'd the Money, only ſent to her Houſe, and receiv'd Anſwer that ſhe was not at home, and that his Sollicitor had wrong'd her in the Petition; yet the Deputy-Provoſt abated nothing of his Rigour, but made her be thruſt into a dark Cloſet for that Night, without Bed or Candle: Her Sollicitor offer'd any Security for her till next Morning; but he threaten'd to tie him Neck and Heels, ſend him to Newgate, and hang him next Day at his own Door, for interceding for her. At Nine next Morning he ſent a Meſſenger to her to prepare for Death, for he would have her burnt immediately. She had often, while in Cuſtody, preſſer'd to receive her Money, and never before refus'd it; which ſome repreſented to him ſo effectually, that he at laſt conſented to releaſe her, ſhe paying 4*l.* Fees, and 10*s.* to her Adverſary's Sollicitor that preſſer'd the falſe Petition againſt her, and ſigning an Acknowledgment to be enter'd on Record, and a General Releaſe: She demurr'd a little at the General Releaſe; but the Provoſt, renewing his Threats of burning her and hanging her Sollicitor, oblig'd her to perfect it.

But where Papiſts were Creditors, and Proteſtants Debtors, the Caſe was otherwiſe; of which Mr. Rice, a Merchant, is an Inſtance: He had receiv'd 500 l. from ſome Roman-Catholics, for which he drew a Bill of Exchange into England on his Correſpondent: the Seas being then ſhut up, they ſued for the Money, tho' it was ſuppoſ'd on all hands to be paid in England: While they went on with the Suit, the Braſs Money came into Play, and then they would have withdrawn it; but Mr. Rice, having great Quantities of Braſs Money put on him for Goods taken away from him, proſſited in it, the Declaration againſt him being filed; however, the Judge kept him three Terms, taking occaſion from the Sickneſs of the Attorney, or any other little Matter, to adjourn the Cauſe. At laſt Mr. Rice brought the Money, and depoſited it in Court; which the Judge call'd an Affront, and the receiving it was demurr'd to; and there the Cauſe remain'd till the Change of the Government, without any Determination." King's State, p. 134, 135, 136.

A. D. 1689. Counties, to make the Applotment; of which Sub-Commiſſioners the High-Conſtable was to be one. The Commiſſioners of Dublin, and other Cities, were not yet ſatisfy'd; for their Counties had neither Baronies nor High-Conſtables; and therefore the Commiſſion could not be duly executed in them: They therefore apply'd a-new to the Lords of the Treaſury for a more ample Commiſſion, which put the ſaid Lords and the Attorney-General in as great a Paſſion as the King had been in before; and all the Anſwer return'd to the Commiſſioners was, That they ſhould go about their Buſineſs without ſuch frivolous Scruples, or they ſhould take a Courſe with them. The Commiſſioners being thus appointed, were moſt of them Papiſts; and the few Proteſtants that were nam'd, declin'd acting as much as they durſt; by which Means the Papiſts had the applotting entirely in their own Hands, and never fail'd to lay the greateſt Burden on their Proteſtant Neighbours, who, in effect, paid all the Taxes that King James ever receiv'd in Ireland."

Goods rated by Proclamation:

Cloſe on the Heels of this arbitrary Edict came forth another, in which the King took upon him, by virtue of the Prerogative, as before, to fix the Prices of Hides, Tallow, Wool, Corn, &c. which the Proteſtants had bought up in great Quantities, and at any Rate, in order to get rid of their Braſs Money. It was then declar'd, that the King wanted certain Quantities of theſe Goods; as alſo, that he would have them at the Proclamation-Rates: And when it appear'd, that no body was over-forward to ſupply him on thoſe Terms, Searchers were firſt appointed to take an Inventory of all ſuch Goods; and then the Quantities wanted for the King's Service were ſeiz'd by his Warrant, as far as appears, without (g) allowing the Owners any Conſideration at all.

And ſeiz'd for the King's Uſe.

Methods taken to ruin the Proteſtant Religion.

It is farther alledg'd, That, during this melancholy Interval, the Proteſtants of this unhappy Kingdom did not ſuffer more in their Property than their Religion: That King James laid the Ax to the Root of the Tree; and that his Emiſſaries of all ſorts made it their joint Endeavour to accompliſh its Downfal: In order to which, they, in the A. D. 1689. firſt place, either left the ſeveral public Schools unſupply'd, or ſupply'd them with Papiſts; and where no Vacancy occurr'd, they drove away the Teacher, or ſet up poſ- Given to Papiſts. piſh Schools in oppoſition: At Kilkenny they did both: And they not only cut off the yearly Penſion of three hundred and eighty-eight Pounds allow'd to the Univerſity of Dublin, out of the Exchequer, but turn'd out the Vice-Provoſt, Fellows and Scholars, ſeiz'd upon their Furniture and Books, the Communion Plate, the public Library, and, in general, whatever they found upon the Premiſes; which was ſo much the more inexcuſable, becauſe there was not the leaſt Colour or Pretence of Law for this Violence; and King James had in Perſon aſſur'd the Univerſity, when they came to compliment him on his Arrival in Dublin, That he would preſerve them in their Liberties and Properties, and rather augment than diminiſh the Privileges and Immunities granted to them by his Predeceſſors. Nor did the Violence offer'd to this national Seminary end here: A Party of Soldiers had Orders to apprehend the Perſons of thoſe obnoxious Collegians: "And, ſays our Author, it coſt the Biſhop of Meath, their Vice-Chancellor, all his Cunning and Intereſt with Lutterel, the Governor of Dublin, to prevent their Impriſonment; which he could no otherwiſe do, than on condition, That no Three of them ſhould meet together on pain of Death." In the mean while, the College was turn'd into a Garriſon, the Chapel into a Magazine, and many of the Chambers into Priſons for Proteſtants; under which Proſtitution, the Damage done to the Building, Lodgings, &c. amounted to two thouſand Pounds: And, finally, one Dr. Moore, a popiſh Prieſt, was nominated Pro- And alſo the Univerſity of Dublin. voſt, and one Macarty Library-Keeper; and the whole Foundation was allotted to others of the ſame Fraternity.

All this, we are told, was done to prevent the Succeſſion of Proteſtants, and more eſpecially of Proteſtant Clergymen: And, that the Latter might fail ſo much the ſooner, we are farther told, that as faſt as Biſhoprics, or

The Schools

(g) "When the Sufferers preſs'd the Commiſſioners of the Revenue to know the Reaſon why they were thus us'd, it was anſwer'd them by Sir Patrick Trant, that he would not give any Reaſon to ſuch Rogues; but at laſt, when urg'd, he told them, It was becauſe they were Proteſtants. Some, particularly Mr. Piercy the Merchant, being aſk'd by Sir Thomas Hacket, whether he was willing to part with his Goods, anſwer'd very calmly, That he was not willing if he could help it. His ſaying ſo was reckon'd a high Crime, and he was brought before Colonel Lutterel Governor of Dublin, who put the ſame Queſtion to him, and upon his making the ſame Anſwer, condemn'd him, in his Paſſion, to be hang'd, for oppoſing the King's Will: He ſent up and down for the Provoſt to execute the Sentence, and ſwore many Oaths that he would have it done immediately. Mr. Piercy continu'd under this Sentence for two Hours, during which time the Provoſt could not be found, though diligent Search was made for him. At laſt the Governor, weary'd with waiting, and not able to find any to execute his Sentence, was, by ſome Intercеſſion made to him, content to diſmiſs Mr. Piercy for that time." [King's State, p. 138.

Again, "It was criminal to have barrell'd Beef or Biſket in a Houſe, and Alderman Giles Meigh was clapp'd up in Priſon for the Treaſon of having ſome hundred of Biſket. The like happen'd to ſeveral others, they alledging, that ſuch as had them deſign'd them for Schomberg's Army. We were at a loſs what the meaning of taking away Corn from Proteſtant Farmers, Houſe-keepers and Bakers ſhould be, when there was no Scarcity in the Kingdom, and the Markets, if left open, were ſufficient to furniſh all; but Sir Robert Parker, and ſome others, blabb'd it out in the Coffee-houſe, That they deſign'd to ſtarve one half of the Proteſtants and hang the other, and that it would never be well till this were done. We were very ſenſible that they were in earneſt by the Event; for no Proteſtant could get a Bit of Bread, and hardly a Drop of Drink in the whole City: twenty or thirty Soldiers ſtood conſtantly about every Bake-houſe, and would not ſuffer a Proteſtant to come nigh them: If they ſent into the Country, and by Intereſt and a great Price, got a Barrel of Wheat from a Popiſh Farmer, it was ſeiz'd as it came to Town: And tho' there was Plenty of all things, yet ſeveral Proteſtant Families could not get one Loaf of Bread, ſometimes in a Week, ſometimes in a Fortnight: There was a general Cry for Bread, and the Proteſtants could find no way to come by it, but by buying it from the Soldiers, who ſold their Two-penny Loaves for a Shilling or eighteen Pence. It was confidently reported, that the Popiſh Store-keepers deſign'd to get all the Corn in the Kingdom into the King's Stores, and then to let the Proteſtants have none out but for Silver and Gold; which they did in a good meaſure effect; and it is certain before Harveſt they would have ſtarv'd many and drain'd all." [Ibid 139, 140.

A. D. 1689. or any other Benefices in the Gift of the Crown, became vacant, King James seiz'd them to his own Hand, caus'd the Profits of them to be lodg'd in the Exchequer, and suffer'd the Cures to lie totally neglected. It was thus with the Archbishopric of Cashel, the Bishoprics of Clogher, Elphin, and Clonfert, and many inferior Livings; the Revenues of which were diverted to maintain Popish Bishops and Priests, directly against the Laws and Constitution of the Kingdom. This was an effectual, tho' a slow, Way of putting an end to the Ministry: And of this Usage the Protestant Clergy had so much the more Reason to complain of King James, because there was as much Ingratitude in it as Injustice: "They, says Dr. King, had disoblig'd many of their People to set him on the Throne; and he, in requital, depriv'd them of all other worldly Support or Power, besides what must depend on the free Choice of those very People, whom, for his Sake, they had not only disoblig'd, but likewise help'd to bring under many Inconveniencies."

The Profits of vacant Bishopricks bestow'd on Popish Priests.

But we are farther told, that this slow Method of Proceeding, however effectual, did not answer the Impatience of the Popish Priests: In the Months of October and November, therefore, they seiz'd on most of the Churches in the Kingdom, after the manner following: The Mayor or Governor in the Towns, with the Priests, went to the Churches, sent for the Keys to the Sextons, and if they were found, forc'd them from them; if not, they broke open the Doors, pull'd up the Seats and Reading-Desk; and having said Mass in them, look'd upon them as their own; and said, The King himself had then nothing to do with them, being consecrated Places, and that to alienate them, or give them back to Heretics, was Sacrilege. In the Country the Militia-Captains, or Officers of the Army that chanced to be quarter'd in the several Places, perform'd the same Part that the Mayors or Governors did in Corporations. Thus Christ-Church in Dublin was seiz'd by Lutterel the Governor, and about twenty-six Churches and Chapels in the Diocese of Dublin.

They seize the Protestant Churches.

Of this the Protestants complain'd to King James, as a great Violation of his own Act for Liberty of Conscience; in which it is expressly provided, that they should have Liberty to meet in such Churches, Chapels, and other Places as they should have for that Purpose. They further represented to him, That all the Churches of Ireland were in a manner ruin'd in the late War in 1641: That it was with great Difficulty and Cost that the Protestants had new built or repair'd them: That many were built by private Persons at their own Costs; and that the Roman Catholicks had no Pretence or Title to them: But his Majesty answer'd, "That they were seiz'd in his Absence at the Camp, without his Knowledge or Consent: That nevertheless he was so much oblig'd to his Roman Catholic Clergy, that he must not dispossess them: That they alledg'd a Title to the Churches that they had seiz'd; and if they, the Protestants, thought their Title was better, they must bring their Action and endeavour to recover their Possessions by Law.

A. D. 1689.

Only to colour the Matter a little, and lest it should make too great a Noise in England and Scotland, where at this time he had very encouraging Hopes, he issu'd out a Proclamation, December 13, 1689, in which he acknowledges, that the seizing of Churches was a Violation of the Act for Liberty of Conscience, yet doth not order any Restitution; only forbids them to seize any more. The Papists had, in many Places, Notice of this Proclamation before it came out, and therefore were the more diligent to get into the remaining Churches; for they look'd on the Proclamation as a Confirmation of such Possessions as they had before the publishing of it; and in some Places the Popish Officers kept it from being publish'd, till they had done their Work: And thus, like other Proclamations of his Majesty in favour of his Protestant Subjects, it was not publish'd till the Inconveniency it pretended to prevent was brought upon them, and the Mischief actually executed; and when publish'd, it only serv'd to make their Enemies more hasty to do it than otherwise they would have been, lest they should slip the time, and lose the Opportunity.

But after all, some were too late, and the Protestants got sight of the Proclamation before their Churches were seiz'd: But here the Priests put off their Vizors, and acted bare-faced; telling the People, as above, That the King had nothing to do with them or their Churches; that they were immediately under the Pope, and that they would neither regard him nor his Proclamations or Laws made to the Damage of Holy Church.

The Protestants upon this had a mind to make an Experiment, whether the Priests or King would get the better; in order to which, they chose out some Instances, in which the Violence and Injustice of turning them out of their Churches, were most undeniable, and laid their Case before his Majesty and his Council by their Petitions: And that those Petitions might not be laid aside or lost, as was the common Custom to deal with such Petitions and Affidavits as they were asham'd to return a flat Denial to, they engag'd some of the Privy Council to espouse their Cause; and had the Luck to gain several of the Popish Nobility to recommend their Suits, especially of such as had Estates in England, and knew King James's true Interest and their own.

The Petitions of Waterford and Wexford were the most favourably receiv'd, and in spite of all the Opposition that the Attorney General Nevgle, or the Solicitor General, one Butler, who concern'd himself with singular Impudence against the Petitions, could make, they obtain'd an Order for Restitution of these two Churches: The Wexford Petition sets forth the Loyalty of the Minister, the Peaceableness of the People, their having contributed to the building of several Popish Chapels within and without the Walls of that Town, and that the Roman Catholics had

The King ordered to give Redress.

A. D. 1689. had no Occasion for the Church; the Reasonableness of it was so manifest, that King James and his Council made an Order for the Restitution of the Church: But he now found how precariously he reign'd in Ireland (notwithstanding their mighty Professions of Loyalty and absolute Subjection upon all Occasions, and more particularly in their Act of Recognition) for the Mayors and Officers refus'd to obey his Order.

Upon which he was importun'd by the Protestants with new Complaints; but being asham'd to own his want of Power to make good his former Order, he referr'd the Waterford Petition to the then Governor of that Place, the Earl of Tyrone, who reported that the Church of Waterford was a Place of Strength, and consequently not fit to be trusted into the Hands of Protestants; and so all they obtain'd by their Petition, Attendance, and Charges, was to have their Church turn'd into a Garrison instead of a Mass-house. This Pretence could not be made for the Church of Wexford, it having no Appearance of Strength, and therefore the Order for restoring it was renew'd, and the disobedient Mayor sent for and turn'd out; for which the Popish Clergy made him ample Satisfaction. But notwithstanding that King James appear'd most zealous to have the Church restor'd, and express'd himself with more Passion than was usual, that he would be obey'd, and tho' the Protestants concern'd solliciated it with the utmost Eagerness and Diligence, even to the Hazard of their Lives, yet they could never procure the King and Council's Order for the Restitution of their Church, to be executed or obey'd.

"Thus, says our Author, it was found upon Trial, that when King James would have kept his Word with us, it was not in his Power to do it; and that his frequently-repeated Promises, and his Act of Parliament for Liberty of Conscience, could not prevent the demolishing, defacing, or seizing nine Churches in ten through the Kingdom; and discover'd to us, That the Act for Liberty of Conscience was only design'd to destroy the Establish'd Church, and not that Protestants should have the Benefit of it."

By the Act of the Dublin Parliament for Liberty of Conscience, it was provided, "That all who profess'd Christianity within the Kingdom of Ireland, should have the full and free Exercise of their respective Religions, without any Molestation, Loss, or Penalty whatsoever." But no Provision being made for the Punishment of such as should disturb any Congregation in their Religious Exercises, Advantage was taken by the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, to commit a thousand Rudenesses in the Protestant Churches: And when this did not deter the People from assisting at Divine Service, all Protestants were prohibited by Proclamation, bearing Date July 13, from going out of their own Parishes: Now one Church generally serv'd two or three Parishes, and by Consequence, full one Half of them were compell'd to stay at Home. In the September following, under Pretence, that some Ships were seen in the Bay of Dublin, they were expresly forbid assembling in any Place of Worship: And in the Close of all, the Protestant Churches throughout the Kingdom were not only shut up, but they were yet again forbid to hold Assemblies either there or elsewhere, on pain of Death. A. D. 1689. Protestants forbid to assemble on pain of Death.

These dreadful Words have once before occur'd in the Case of the Dublin Collegians; and there is Reason to think that they occur'd often under the Administration before us, which seems to have been one continu'd Series of Illegality and Violence, and which consequently could no otherwise subsist than by Terrors and the Sword. The Proclamation which was first set forth to oblige all Protestants to bring in their Arms, was on the Penalty of their being left to the Discretion of the Soldiers: That of June 20, 1689, to the like Effect, was on Penalty of being dealt with as Rebels and Traitors; in vindication of which, Chief-Justice Nugent was pleas'd to declare, That Disobedience to the King's Command, in that Case, was Treason; as also, that all such disobedient Persons ought to be proceeded against accordingly. And we are moreover assur'd, that it was for this kind of Treason, which was construed a levying of War against the King, That many Persons were inserted in the Bill of Attainder. By an Ordinance, which requir'd all Ministers to number the Protestants in their several Parishes, it was declar'd to be his Majesty's Resolution, that all Persons who did not give in their Names by a certain Day, should be treated as Spies, or Enemies. This Ordinance was penn'd and set forth by Lutterel. The same Person, in a Speech at the Quarter Sessions held for the County of Dublin, was pleas'd to declare, That King James wanted Wheat and other Grain for his Horses; that he had given the Country Farmers three Weeks to bring in their Corn; that he had waited for their Compliance during that time; that he resolv'd to wait further until the Saturday after; that if they did not bring it in by that time, he would compel them; that it was the King's Will they should do it, and that he the King's Servant would see his Master's Commands executed; adding with a great Oath, That he would hang that Man before his own Door that did not obey and bring in his Corn according to Order. The same Person also gave out the same Menace, by beat of Drum, against all who should presume to disobey the Proclamation for ascertaining the Rates of Goods. Brigadier Sarsfield, in virtue of the like military Authority, requir'd all Protestants to leave their Houses, and retire ten Miles from the Borders on Pain of Death: And lastly, to keep up the Credit of their Brass Money (which in nominal Value was at last rais'd 100 per Cent. but in truth was sunk so low, that five Pound of it was given for a Guinea) a Proclamation was issu'd, which made it Death for any one to give above 1*l.* 18*s.* for a Guinea, or 1*l.* 10*s.* for a Louis d'Or. Other Proclamations &c. under the same Penalty.

To sum up all that need be said on these several despotic Acts, as fairly and concisely General Reflections on as poſſible; ſuppoſing them all to be as unjuſt and ſavage as we find them repreſented, ſome Allowance ought to be made on King James's Side, for the Neceſſity of his Affairs, the alternate Predominancy of the French and Iriſh Factions; with either of which he was too weak to ſtruggle; the Suſpicions he could ſcarce help entertaining of his Proteſtant Subjects, and the Licentiouſneſs inſeparable from a State of a War and a military Government. Inſtances of his endeavouring to prevent ſome of thoſe Miſchiefs, and of his Inability to do ſo, have ariſen even from the Teſtimony of his Enemies: And by the ſame Teſtimony we farther learn, that, when certain Forgeries were contriv'd among the Popiſh Prieſts and others, to ſcandalize the Proteſtants, the King, on their being detected, in great Paſſion declar'd, "That for aught he ſaw, the Latter were wrong'd and miſrepreſented to him, and that there were ſome as great Rogues amongſt the Roman Catholics, as amongſt them." But then whether theſe Miſchiefs were the Reſult of his Weakneſs or Wickedneſs, they were equally grievous to the Sufferers, and reproachful to his Government: Nor could a worſe thing have happen'd to his Cauſe, than the Opportunity which fell into his Hands of reſuming the King once more; for the Uſe he made of his Power in Ireland was ſuch as could not fail to convince the Inhabitants of England and Scotland, that wherever he held the Reins, the Emiſſaries of France and Rome would drive.

It is however undeniable, that the greater the Preſſures of the Iriſh Proteſtants were, the more incumbent it was on the new Government here to interpoſe for their Deliverance. Theſe Proteſtants, we may perceive, were of two ſorts; thoſe who for various Reaſons continu'd under the Government of King James, and thoſe who in the North declar'd for King William and Queen Mary, and who had recourſe to Arms to vindicate that Declaration: The Former made a merit of their Obedience, and the Latter pleaded by way of Excuſe for their Defection, That Ireland being a Kingdom dependent on the Crown of England, and Part of the Inheritance thereof, was under a Neceſſity to follow its Example, and ſhare its Fate: But as Loyalty and Submiſſion in the one, produc'd nothing but Tyranny and Oppreſſion, ſo the Spirit of Liberty and Independency, which animated the other, only expos'd them to Difficulties and Dangers beyond Example, without procuring them the Protection they ſought, or the Succours they deſerv'd.

Sequel of the Siege of Londonderry.

Tho' the Colonels Richards and Cunningham return'd with ſo much Speed and Terror to England, and gave out ſuch a Report of the deſperate State of Londonderry, by way of juſtifying themſelves, it was not till the Middle of May that a ſecond Embarkation was made at Liverpool for the Relief of thoſe who had undertaken its Defence. Kirk, ſo infamous for his Cruelties in the Weſt, after the Duke of Monmouth's Defeat at Sedgmoor, and who had ſince made his Peace with the Party he was once ſo eager to deſtroy, by abandoning the Maſter he was then ſo zealous to ſerve, had the Command, and ſet Sail the twenty-ſecond; but meeting with contrary Winds, could not proſecute his Voyage till June the firſt. He had afterwards ſo tedious a Paſſage, that he did not arrive in the Lough of Derry till the Middle of the Month; and even then, inſtead of making any Attempt to execute his Orders, came quietly to anchor, and diſpatch'd an Expreſs to England, ſignifying, That the Enemy was ſo well entrench'd on both Sides of the River, and had taken ſuch Precautions, (having planted Batteries of 24 Pounders in the narroweſt Part of it, which was not Piſtol Shot over, having ſecur'd that Paſſage by a Boom, and having elſewhere encumber'd the Channel by ſunk Boats) that it was thought adviſeable to reſt on their Arms, till they were enabled by a Reinforcement to force their way through the Enemy's Camp. To keep up the Spirits of the Beſieged in the mean while, however, he contriv'd to ſend ſeveral Letters to their Governor, Walker, containing Aſſurances, "That he would endeavour, by all Means, to relieve the Place: That finding it impoſſible to be accompliſh'd by the River, he had ſent a Party to Inch, in hope to make ſuch a Diverſion on that Side, as ſhould prevent the Enemy from preſſing the Town: That he had ſent Officers, Ammunition, &c. to Iniſkillin, where there was a Force of 3000 Foot, 1500 Horſe, and a Regiment of Dragoons, which had promis'd to come to their Relief: That when theſe came up, he would make his Attack at Inch: That he expected ſix thouſand Men from England every Minute, they having been ſhipp'd eight Days before: That he had Stores of all ſorts for their Relief: That he, nevertheleſs, adviſ'd them to huſband the Remainder of their own, till an Opportunity ſhou'd offer to ſend them a Supply; and that he hop'd their Deliverance was at hand; for that ſeveral of the Enemy had deſerted to him, who all aſſur'd him, they could not ſtay long."

Inch is an Iſland within ſeven Miles of Derry; the Detachment landed there, under the Protection of a Man of War, conſiſted of 500 Men, and the Orders they receiv'd were, to throw up ſuch Works as ſhould be neceſſary for ſecuring that Poſt, which was of great Importance to facilitate the Junction of the Engliſh Forces with thoſe of Iniſkillin: But for five or ſix Weeks together this was the only Step that was taken to ſuccour the Town. The Iniſkillin Forces, which were not above 2000, could not come up: The ſix thouſand Men which were every Minute expected from England, never arriv'd; and Hopes and Promiſes were all the Beſieg'd had to ſubſiſt upon: Their Proviſions were exhauſted; Famine diſtreſs'd them more grievouſly within than the Enemy without. Such things as reſembled Poiſon more than Food Hunger made palatable: Horſe-Fleſh, Tallow, dry'd and ſalted Hides, and Vermin of all ſorts were Dainties: Even theſe Deteſtables were on the Point of failing; and yet, ſurrounded as they were with all this

A. D. 1689. Variety of Horrors, inſtead of liſtening to the Offers of General Hamilton (the Perſon recommended by the Temples to bring over Tyrconnel) who endeavour'd to negotiate them into a Surrender, they upbraided him with his Infidelity to King William. They made an Order that no Mention ſhould be made for the future of a Capitulation on pain of Death; and they unanimouſly reſolv'd firſt to eat the Iriſh, and then one another, rather than ſubmit on any Terms whatſoever.

Marſhal Roſen takes the Command of King James's Army.

On the Arrival of Kirk and the Forces from England, it was thought adviſable to give the Direction of the Siege to Mr. de Roſen, a Frenchman, with the Title of Marſhal-General of all his Majeſty's Forces, who, on his Arrival in the Iriſh Camp, to ſtrike a Terror into the Beſieged, took occaſion to ſay, That he would level the Place to the Ground, and bury the Inhabitants, without any Diſtinction of Age or Sex, in the Ruins, in Caſe they held out any longer. But he had Men to deal with who ſeem'd to have no Mixture of Fear in their Compoſitions, and who made no Difficulty to treat his Menaces with as much Diſdain and Contempt as they had ſhewn to the Offers and Promiſes of his Predeceſſor Hamilton.

In hope, however, that thoſe who had loſt all Concern for themſelves, might, nevertheleſs, have ſome feeling for the Miſeries of others, Mr. de Roſen had recourſe to one Device more, which for every kind of Barbarity is not to be paralell'd in Hiſtory: He firſt ſent the following Notice to Derry, viz.

His cruel Order.

"Comrade de Roſen, Marſhal-General of all his Majeſty's Forces, declares by theſe Preſents, to the Commanders, Officers, Soldiers and Inhabitants of the City of Londonderry, That, in Caſe they do not, betwixt this and Monday next, at ſix o'Clock in the Afternoon, being the firſt of July, 1689, agree to ſurrender the ſaid Place of Londonderry unto the King, upon ſuch Conditions as may be granted them, according to the Inſtructions and Power Lieutenant-General Hamilton formerly receiv'd from the King, he will forthwith iſſue out his Orders from the Barony of Iniſhone, and the Sea-coaſts round about, as far as Charlemont, for the gathering together of thoſe of their Faction, whether protected or not, and cauſe them immediately to be brought to the Walls of Londonderry, where it ſhall be lawful for thoſe that are in the Town (in caſe they have any Pity for them) to open the Gates, and receive them into the Town; otherwiſe they will be forc'd to ſee their Friends and neareſt Relations all ſtarv'd for want of Food; he having reſolv'd not to leave one of them at home, nor any thing to maintain them. And that all hope of Succour may be taken away, by the landing of any Troops in theſe Parts from England, he further declares, That in caſe they refuſe to ſubmit, he will forthwith cauſe all the ſaid Country to be immediately deſtroy'd; that if any Succour ſhould be hereafter ſent from England, they may periſh with them for want of Food: Beſides which, he has a very conſiderable Army, as well for the oppoſing of them in all Places that ſhall be judg'd neceſſary, as for the protecting all the reſt of his Majeſty's dutiful Subjects, whoſe Goods and Chattels he promiſes to ſecure, deſtroying all the reſt that cannot be brought conveniently into ſuch Places as he ſhall judge neceſſary to be preſerv'd, and burning the Houſes and Mills, not only of thoſe that are in actual Rebellion, but alſo of their Friends and Adherents, that no Hopes of eſcaping may be left for any Man; beginning this very Day to ſend his neceſſary Orders to all Governors, and other Commanders of his Majeſty's Forces of Colerain, Antrim, Carricfergus, Belfaſt, Dungannon, Charlemont, Belturbet, Sligo; and to Colonel Sarſfield, commanding a flying Army beyond Ballyſhany, Colonel Sutherland commanding another towards Iniſkillin, and the Duke of Berwick another, on the Fin Water, to cauſe, all the Men, Women, and Children, who are any ways related to thoſe in Londonderry, or any where elſe in open Rebellion, to be forthwith brought to this Place, without Hopes of withdrawing further into the Kingdom; that, in caſe before this ſaid Monday the firſt of July, in the Year of our Lord, 1689, be expir'd, they do not ſend us Hoſtages and other Deputies, with a full ſufficient Power to treat with us for the Surrender of the ſaid City of Londonderry on reaſonable Conditions, that they ſhall not, after this time, be admitted to any Treaty whatſoever; and the Army which ſhall continue the Siege, and which, with the Aſſiſtance of God, will ſoon reduce them, ſhall have Orders to give no Quarter, or ſpare either Age or Sex, in caſe they are taken by Force; but if they return to the Obedience due to their natural Prince, he promiſes them, that the Conditions granted them in his Majeſty's Name, ſhall be inviolably obſerv'd by all his Majeſty's Subjects; and that he himſelf will have a care to protect them on all Occaſions, even to take their Parts, if any Injury, contrary to the Agreement, ſhould be done to them; making himſelf reſponſible for the Performance of the Conditions on which they agree to ſurrender the ſaid Place of Londonderry to the King. Given under my Hand this 30th Day of June, in the Year of our Lord, 1689.

Le Mareſchal ROSEN."

A. D. 1689.

And, without waiting for any Reply, the Marſhal cauſ'd it to be put into immediate Execution, by ſufficient Parties of Foot and Dragoons, who did not fail to enforce it with the utmoſt Rigour: They firſt ſtript, and [King's State] then drove, the Inhabitants of the whole Country for thirty Miles about before them, not ſparing Nurſes with their ſucking Children, Women big with Child, nor old, decrepid Creatures; ſome Women in Labour, ſome that were juſt brought to bed, were driven amongſt the reſt; the very Papiſt Officers that executed the thing afterwards, confeſs'd, that it was the moſt diſmal Sight they had ever ſeen, and that the Cries of the poor People ſeem'd to be for ever in their Ears. They own'd that they gather'd above 4000, others ſay 7000, and that they kept many of them

A.D. 1689. them without Meat or Drink for a whole Week: That several hundreds dy'd in the Place before they were dismiss'd, and many more on the way as they went home again to their Houses: And these were the happiest; for the Survivors, who made a shift to wander back to their Homes, found nothing there but Hunger and Desolation: the straggling Soldiers, Rapparees and Pilferers that follow'd the Army, had left them neither Meat, Drink, Houshold-Stuff nor Cattle, but had taken away all in their Absence; so that Numbers of them perish'd there for want, and many more were knock'd on the Head by the Soldiers. As to the Effect of this cruel and foolish Stratagem, it was the same which any thinking Man would have expected, it not only confirm'd the besieg'd in their Resolutions never to yield to such barbarous People, but prompted them to set up Gallows, and threaten to hang all the (b) Prisoners they had in their Hands, if their Friends were not immediately dismiss'd: With which the Besiegers being startled, and finding that it did not answer their Design, to keep them still under the Walls, did at last comply, after they had kept them there three Days without Food. "And this, says Dr. King, was the Security Men had of their Lives by King James's Protections:" Adding, "The News of this Order came to Dublin before it was executed, and the Bishop of Meath went immediately to King James to see if he could prevail with him to prevent such a barbarous proceeding: His Majesty very calmly told the Bishop, That he had heard of it before, and that he had sent Orders to stop it; that General Rosen was a Foreigner, and us'd to such Proceedings as were strange to us, tho' common in other Places; and that if he had been his own Subject, he would have call'd him to account for it. Yet he continu'd him still in his Employment."

During this whole horrid Interval, Kirk made no one Effort to fulfil his Orders; or, for aught appears, to interpose any way for the Deliverance of the Wretches thus inhumanly expos'd, or to prevent the carrying on the War by such terrible Methods for the future. Possibly he was glad of an Instance of Cruelty which surpass'd his own: Possibly he had some Thoughts of playing the Renegade a second time: 'Tis certain he fell under the Suspicion, and that he did not take any Measure for entering into Action, A.D. 1689. till the 20th of July, when he landed the rest of his Men in the Inch; and that it was not till the 28th, according to the Gazette, or the 30th, according to Dr. Walker and others, that he actually caus'd the Attack to be made on the Boom. Now this Boom, it must be observ'd, was in the very same Condition now as at first, and was cover'd with the same Fort, Batteries, &c. And yet, by the Help of one small Man of War, the Dartmouth, to entertain those Batteries and that Fort, a single Victualler, the Mountjoy, at one single Shock, (i) broke the Boom; with no other Inconvenience than arose from her being forc'd on shore by her own Rebound, and without any Damage at all; for, by the first Broadside that she bestow'd on the Enemy, she floated again, and sail'd thro' the Breach she had made, being follow'd by two Victuallers more; the whole Loss sustain'd on the Occasion being one Soldier, who was kill'd on board the Dartmouth.

The Result was, that the Remains of those brave Men, who had for so long together defended themselves against so numerous an Army, were rescu'd from the Extremity of Misery and Despair; having nothing left, but nine lean Horses, and as much Meal as would have serv'd them for two Days, at a Pint each; and being reduc'd from seven thousand five hundred Men, to four thousand three hundred Shadows. What is yet farther remarkable, the Enemy was no sooner convinc'd, that the Besieged were able to live, than they acknowledg'd their own (k) Despair of conquering them, by raising the Siege in the Night-time, and retiring in the utmost Confusion; as also the Rage arising from their Disappointment, by laying waste the whole Country round about, and leaving nothing but Ruin and Desolation behind them. The Siege rais'd.

Kirk now repair'd to Derry in Person, and was receiv'd with the highest Respect and Acknowledgments; for, in the first Transports of their Deliverance, they forgot the Agonies they had suffer'd in waiting for it: And as to the gallant Dr. Walker, who had so gloriously deviated from the Duties of his own immediate Function, he was dispatch'd forthwith to England, with an Address of Thanks to their Majesties, from the Garrison and Inhabitants of the Place, and met with such a Reception as his extraordinary Merits and Services deserv'd: For he had the Honour

(b) They themselves declar'd, they could not blame the Garrison for putting them to death, seeing their own People exercis'd such Cruelty on wretched, innocent Persons, that were under their Protection. They desir'd Leave from the Governor to write to Lieutenant-General Hamilton; which being allow'd, they sent him a Letter sign'd by Netterail, Butler, Aylmer, Macdonel, and Darcy, acquainting him, 'That the Lives of twenty Prisoners lay at stake, and therefore they made it their Request that he would represent their Condition to the Mareschal-General: That they were 'all willing to die, with their Swords in their Hands, for 'his Majesty; but 'twas hard to suffer like Malefactors; nor 'could they lay their Blood to the Charge of the Garrison, 'the Governor and the rest having treated them with all Civility imaginable.' To this Letter the Lieutenant-General answer'd, 'That what those poor People were like to 'suffer, they might thank themselves for, being their own 'Faults; which they might prevent, by accepting the Conditions that had been offer'd them; and that if they suffer'd, it could not be help'd, but should be reveng'd on 'many Thousands of the People (as well innocent as others) 'within or without that City.' [Life of King William, vol. II. p. 66.

(i) To prevent, as far as possible, the Reflections which necessarily arose on this Occasion, the Expression was thus express'd in the Gazette: "Whether she (the Mountjoy) cut the Boom, or broke it; or whether it was broke before, as he (Kirk) was told, from the Town, he had not yet learn'd, but up she went."

(k) It was said, That such was the Bravery of the Besieged, and such the Cowardice of the Besiegers, that if the Walls of Derry had been made of Canvas, they could not have taken it.

A. D. 1689. [Gazette, Num. 2484.]

Honour to be introduc'd by the Lord Preſident (Danby,) was welcom'd with many obliging Expreſſions of Grace and Favour, was rewarded on the Spot with five thouſand Pounds; and was farther given to underſtand, "That that was but an Earneſt of the Kindneſs which his Majeſty intended to ſhew to him and his Family."

Valour and Succeſs of the Inniſkillin-Men.

About the ſame time that the Siege of Derry was thus fortunately rais'd, the Iniſkillin-Men having been ſupply'd with Arms, Ammunition, and Officers by Kirk, took the Field, to the Number of fifteen hundred Foot and twelve hundred Horſe, under the Command of Colonel Wolſley; and having obtain'd the Advantage in a Skirmiſh, with a ſmall Party of the Enemy, had the Courage to advance againſt the main Body to which that Party belong'd; who were ſix thouſand ſtrong, advantageouſly poſted on the Side of a ſteep Hill, near a Place call'd Newton-Butler, ſkirted with Bogs, and cover'd with ſeven Pieces of Cannon. A ſharp Engagement enſued, in which the Iriſh were ſo totally worſted, that they loſt all their Cannon, Drums, and Colours; two thouſand of them were kill'd, five hundred were drown'd in the Lough or Lake, and above three hundred were taken Priſoners, among whom was their General Macarty; who, ſeeing all was loſt, with about five or ſix Officers, fell in deſperately among the Iniſkilliners, in hope ſome kind Bullet would put him out of his Pain; for ſo he expreſs'd himſelf to thoſe that redeem'd him out of the Hands of the Soldiers, who having kill'd his Horſe under him, after giving him ſeveral Wounds, were on the point of knocking out his Brains; and ſeem'd inconſolable, that, in ſpite of himſelf, he had ſurviv'd his Defeat.

Proceedings of the Engliſh Houſe of Commons on the Affairs of Ireland.

We left the Commons of England ſitting; and, during this whole Interval, the Iriſh Affairs made a very conſiderable Article in their Proceedings: Not perhaps ſo much for the ſake of the Engliſh Intereſt in Ireland, or the Proteſtant Cauſe, tho' theſe were the Pretences they made uſe of, as in hope of making ſome ſuch Diſcoveries, as might ſerve them to addreſs the Lords Halifax and Danby out of their Places.

A Committee of Inquiry appointed.

Thus we find, that, on the firſt of June, the Houſe appointed a Committee to enquire what had been the Occaſion of the Delays in ſending Relief over into Ireland, and particularly to Londonderry: With an Inſtruction, That they make enquiry what Default was in relation to the Proviſions ſent over with the Soldiers to Ireland; as alſo very particularly into the Carriage of the Colonels Lunde, Richards, and Cunningham; the Reaſons why the Relief ſent to Londonderry was brought back again; and into all other Miſcarriages relating to Ireland.

On this Baſis, Sir Thomas Lyttleton, the next Day but one, mov'd the Houſe, from the Committee appointed to make the ſaid Enquiry, that his Majeſty might be humbly deſir'd to give Directions, that Copies of the Commiſſions and Inſtructions, given in relation to Londonderry, and the Kingdom of Ireland, might be tranſmitted to the ſaid Committee; and alſo that Colonel Lundee, (then a Priſoner in the Tower) might be brought to the ſaid Committee; and a Reſolution was made accordingly. A. D. 1689.

The ſame Day, Mr. How, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, mov'd for an Addreſs, to deſire his Majeſty to remove from his Preſence and Councils ſuch as had been impeach'd by Parliament, and had betray'd the Liberties of the Subject: Tho' no body was nam'd, yet it was eaſy to gueſs that the Perſons, at which the Addreſs was to be level'd, were the Lords above-mention'd, the Preſident of the Council, and the Speaker of the Houſe of Lords; and that not ſo much on account of their Miſmanagements in former Reigns, as their Aſcendancy under the preſent. This Queſtion was debated with great Warmth; and, we are told, was ſo little expected by the Courtiers, that, if the contrary Party had not unexpectedly cool'd, it would have been carry'd in the Affirmative. But this is not over-likely; becauſe, on the Morrow, Mr. How (l) renew'd the Attack, and was ſupported by a great many; but the oppoſite Side requiring them to name the Perſons, and no body offering to do it, the Motion fell; and all that Mr. How and his Party were able to do, after the reading the Exceptions to the Bill of Indemnity, was to carry this Reſolution, That the King's Pardon was not pleadable in bar to an Impeachment.

Two or three Days before this, the Houſe had taken the Diſtreſſes of the Iriſh Proteſtants, who were depriv'd of their Eſtates, and had ſought Refuge in England, into Conſideration, and had order'd an Addreſs to be preſented in their Favour; with a View perhaps to facilitate the Enquiry. But, whether this was the Motive or not, while the Committee was in full Queſt, the ſaid Addreſs was perfected, in Manner and Subſtance as follows:

Addreſs in favour of the Iriſh Proteſtants in England.

"That having taken into their ſerious Conſideration the many great Sufferings of the Proteſtant Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, which their Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion, his Majeſty's Service, the Intereſt of England in that Kingdom, and Love to this Nation had expos'd them to, &c. being the only Body of Proteſtants ruin'd by the late happy Revolution, which had wrought ſo great a Deliverance, &c. they moſt heartily crav'd Leave, in their behalf, to offer their deplorable Condition to his Majeſty's moſt princely Conſideration.

That whereas, by reaſon of their Numbers, they were very apprehenſive of being and continuing a Burthen to this Kingdom, while (l) Myn Heer Dyckvelt diſcours'd Mr. How about the Motion he had made in the Houſe; to which he anſwer'd, 'He did not think it to be of any ill Conſequence to his 'Majeſty: and beſides, that a Place at Court ſhould never 'ſilence him, when the Good of his Country requir'd him 'to ſpeak.' [Life of K. Will. v. ii. p. 119.

A. D. 1689. while they remain'd in such Condition unemploy'd, and that many of them, for their Interest in, and Knowledge of, that Kingdom, as well as their Experience, &c. in military Affairs, being well-qualify'd to serve under his Majesty for the reducing thereof, and all of them pressing and forward for that Service, &c. They, 1. humbly recommended such of the said Nobility and Gentry as were fit for military Employments, as very proper Persons for reducing that Kingdom to its due Obedience to the Crown.

2. That such as were not fit for the Field might be put into such civil Employments as they were most capable of.

3. That, for their present Subsistence, they humbly pray'd, that the Sum of fifteen thousand Pounds might be forthwith distributed among them: And that, for a further and standing Fund for their Subsistence, until Ireland should be reduc'd, his Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to issue forth his Royal Proclamation, requiring all Papists beyond Seas, who had Estates in England, and all Protestants who were in Arms, or otherwise engag'd against his Majesty, if any such there were, to return within a certain Time; and that the Estates of such as should not give Obedience thereunto might be seiz'd into his Majesty's Hands, for the Relief of the said Nobility and Gentry, who were, or should be, depriv'd of their Estates there.

And, said they, we the rather make this our humble Supplication to your Majesties, because we esteem ourselves oblig'd to afford them present Relief, and to represent the speedy Recovery of that Kingdom, as of great Importance to this, in all respects, and your Majesties and the Nation's true Interest.

And we do humbly beseech your Majesties to take the Duke of Ormond, and his great Merits and Sufferings into your particular and Royal Consideration; and that your Majesties would be pleas'd also to consider of the rest of the Nobility and Gentry, already fled, and daily coming up, from Ireland, that remain unprovided for.

And that your Majesties Favour and Bounty to the said Nobility and Gentry may be distributed with the greater Ease and Advantage; we do humbly recommend to your Majesties, that what you shall be graciously pleas'd to advance for their present Supply, you will be pleas'd to order the same to be paid into the Chamber of London, or such other Place as your Majesties shall think convenient, with as much Expedition as the Urgency of your Affairs will admit; to be thence paid out for them respectively, with as little Charge and Trouble of Attendance as may be." A. D. 1689.

In his Answer to this Address, the King was pleas'd to promise all that was requir'd of him; and at the same time, by way of Barrel to the Whale, the House of Lords, by his Majesty's Directions, communicated to the Commons certain treasonable Papers; of which Mr. Hampden gave the following Account: "That they were found upon two Persons who were going to Ireland on board a Ship which had stolen out of Liverpool, but which was stopp'd two Miles out at Sea: That they were dispatch'd up to Town by the Mayor of that Place; and that among them were three Letters writ by King James, tho' he had in one of them somewhat disguis'd his Hand." But then we are farther told, that, because, among other ambiguous Expressions, mention was made in them of certain contraband Goods ready to be shipp'd off, in order to be run into such Places, as were least expos'd to the Visitation of Customhouse-Officers, which seem'd to indicate, that a Design was in Agitation to invade the Kingdom, the same Gentleman took upon him, to enlarge on the Difficulties and Dangers his Majesty was surrounded with, and to shew the Necessity of a farther Supply, to enable him to provide for the Safety of the Public. Now, over and above the several Applications which had been made of the late King's Revenue, they had granted a present Aid of 420,000 l. a Poll-Tax for the Reduction of Ireland; a Land-Tax of 12 d. in the Pound for the necessary Defence of these Realms; an additional Duty of Excise upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors; they had appropriated certain Duties for the Payment of the 600,000 l. demanded by or for the States-General; and they had prepar'd an additional Poll-Bill, which was (m) lost

Treasonable Papers communicated to the Commons.

[Life of King William, p. 121.]

A Motion for a farther Supply not so much as seconded.

(m) After what Manner, may be gather'd from the following Abstract of the Conferences which pass'd between the two Houses thereon:

"The Lords insert a Clause for the Lords appointing Commissioners to rate themselves in respect of their Offices and personal Estates, and freeing their Persons from Imprisonments, and for appointing a Collector to receive their Assessments.

"To which Clause the Commons disagree;

1. Because the Bill now in question taxes Commoners only.

2. Because the Poll-Bill already pass'd, hath sufficiently provided for taxing all the Nobility; to which the Lords have consented.

These Reasons being approv'd, a Conference was desir'd with the Lords thereon: Who adher'd to their Amendment, for the following Reasons:

1. That it is the common Course of Parliament to pass explanatory Acts of any thing that has been omitted or ill express'd in any other Act pass'd in the same Session, and one of that sort has pass'd this present Session.

2. That the House of Commons have, in this Bill, taken care of Serjeant's-Inn, and the Inns of Court and Chancery, that they should be rated by their own Members; and that, since there is no Comparison to be made between them and the Peers of England, therefore the Peers ought to be rated by none but those which are of their own House.

3. That the House of Peers, out of their extraordinary Zeal for the reducing Ireland, and the Poll-Bill coming up so late to them from the House of Commons, that they had not so much Time to deliberate upon every Part of it, as had been necessary, if to pressing an Occasion would have allow'd it, did make this Omission: Which, for that Reason, ought not to turn to their Prejudice; it being their undoubted Right, which had been preserv'd to them in all former Poll-Bills; and particularly in the last, which pass'd in the 29th of Charles II. the Proviso being conceiv'd in the same Terms with the Proviso now offer'd.

Upon the Report of these Reasons, the Question being put to agree with the Lords, it pass'd in the Negative, nem. con. and a free Conference was desir'd with the Lords thereon; the Substance of which was thus reported by Sir Thomas Lyttleton: "That the Commons urg'd, That as, in this additional Poll-Bill, none but Commoners were tax'd, they infer'd their Lordships had no Colour of Reason to meddle with it; or to name Commissioners to tax the Peers, in a Bill that did not tax the Peers.

That

A.D. 1689. loſt in the Houſe of Lords: And as Miniſters had hitherto been modeſt in their Demands on the People, and the People were, in a manner, Strangers to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of Taxes, theſe ſeveral Grants were held a very ſufficient Proviſion for the Wants of one Year. Mr. Hampden had, beſides, neglected the uſual Arts of Miniſters, to beſpeak the Favour of the Majority: So that, inſtead of carrying his Point, he was not ſo much as ſeconded; no, not even by his own Son. On the contrary, having, in the Courſe of his Speech, inſiſted on the Neceſſity of a farther Aid, to ſave the Nation from falling into the Hands of the Iriſh and French, another Member ſaid, Add the DUTCH. Mr. Garraway, though a known Williamite, gave it as his Opinion, That they had granted Money enough for one Year; that if they had thought there had been occaſion for more, they would have prevented the King's Demands: That it was not the want of Money, but the ill Conduct of thoſe who had the Management of Affairs, which caus'd the Difficulties of the Government: That the Miſcarriages in not aſſiſting the Proteſtants of Ireland, were both ſo manifeſt and ſo pernicious in their Conſequences, that if they were not ſpeedily remedy'd, the Houſe would be oblig'd to take notice of them. Mr. Howe had the Boldneſs to aſſert, That their preſent Dangers proceeded from their not addreſſing the King to remove his evil Counſellors, in Conformity to his late Motion: And upon the whole, the Reſolutions of the Houſe were, That all conſiderable Papiſts ſhould be taken into Cuſtody: That their Horſes and Arms ſhould be ſeiz'd: That ſuch Proteſtants as ſhould harbour or conceal any ſuch Arms and Horſes, ſhould be reputed Enemies to their Majeſties, and ſhould be proceeded againſt accordingly: And that an Addreſs of Thanks ſhould be preſented to the King for having communicated thoſe Papers.

Votes againſt the Papiſts, &c.

They had, not long before, paſs'd a Bill for committing (n) ſuſpected Perſons without Bail: They had alſo order'd Sir Adam Blair, Captain Vaughan, Captain Moyle, Dr. Elliot, and Dr. Gray, to be impeach'd for compoſing and publiſhing (the Proclamation ſays diſperſing) a Declaration (formerly inſerted) in the Name of the late King; and the Declaration itſelf to be burnt by the common Hangman. They had, moreover, a Bill before them, for attainting certain Perſons then in Rebellion againſt their Majeſties: And by way of Retaliation of the Iriſh Act of Attainder, they order'd a Clauſe to be inſerted in it, which provided, that the Eſtates of ſuch as were in Arms againſt their Majeſties in Ireland, ſhould be apply'd to the Relief of the Iriſh Proteſtants; and declar'd, That the Proceedings of the pretended Parliament and Courts of Juſtice there, were null and void. A.D. 1689.

But however grateful theſe Proceedings were at Court, as they ſerv'd to manifeſt the Zeal of the Houſe againſt King James and his Adherents, they did not atone for the Intractability which they continu'd to manifeſt in moſt other Court Points, and from which they did not ſeem diſpos'd to depart. On one Side, the Common-Council of London were ſpirited up to make their Application to the Houſe of Commons, by way of Petition, "That their moſt gracious King might be ſet free from all Reſtraints of uſing his Proteſtant Subjects indifferently in his military or civil Services, according to their ſeveral Qualities and Abilities," &c. And, on the other, the King himſelf was induc'd to go to the Houſe of Peers, and to make the following Speech from the Throne:

London Common-council ſollicit the taking off the Teſts.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

The time of the Year being ſo far advanc'd, and there being ſeveral Acts yet to be paſs'd for the Safety and Settlement of the Nation, I deſir'd you would expedite them as ſoon as you can, it being neceſſary there ſhould ſhortly be a Receſs, both that I may be at liberty to

A quickening Speech of the King's to both Houſes

That there was no Omiſſion in the former Poll-Bill, which was paſs'd and agreed to by the Lords; but by the Conſent of both Houſes; the Nomination of Commiſſioners was left to the King (indeed, to reſtrain'd, that the King was to name them out of the Commiſſioners in the ſaid Act,) who were to tax all the King's Subjects, both Lords and Commons: As therefore the Lords had included themſelves in that Bill, the Commons think it hard their Lordſhips ſhould urge any ſubſequent Bill, to ſupply a Defect of the former.

That the Lords pleaded to this, Inadvertency, and their own Zeal to give the former Bill a quick Diſpatch; and farther, that they had ſeveral Precedents of their naming Commiſſioners: And that they likewiſe thought it hard, that their Overſight ſhould turn to their Prejudice.

To which the Commons reply'd, That if the Commiſſion had been ſuch that no Commiſſioners had been nam'd at all, the Commons would have agreed to their Lordſhips preſent Demand, rather than their Lordſhips ſhould not be tax'd: But, Commiſſioners being already nam'd, the Commons thought any Alteration went a great way to repeal the Act. That the Commiſſioners ſo nam'd might, probably, be enter'd upon their Office, and were already taxing their Lordſhips; at leaſt, they would ſoon do it, if this Clauſe be not admitted: Therefore, if the preſent Commiſſioners, as the Law ſtands, and the Lords have conſented, be no Authority to tax them, the Commons thought it would be a Repeal of that Law, at leaſt pro tunto; for their Authority muſt ceaſe, who have it by the former Law.

That then the Lords inſiſted much, that tho' the Lords are not expreſly tax'd, in this additional Poll-Bill, they have a ſufficient Handle for their Demand furniſh'd by it, by the Indulgence it accords to the Inns of Court and Chancery."

To this the Commons rejoin'd, (among other things,

(n) The Author of a Pamphlet, call'd, The Engliſhman's Complaint, once before quoted, ſpeaking of the Sins of Commiſſion, as he calls them, of this Parliament, ſays, "Of this ſort, the Suſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus well challenges the Preference. It is what can never be anſwer'd by us Whigs to faſh ſuch a Law, nay our own Law, three times ſucceſſively: In this the Tories outwitted us; for they have humour'd us into a Contradiction of our own Principles." And, in another Pamphlet, call'd A Defence of the Proceedings of the late Parliament, attributed to Mr. Hampden and Major Wildman, this Paſſage is thus anſwer'd: "The ſuſpending of that Act, at that time, was the only Way to ſecure our Properties and Liberties, by preventing a civil and domeſtic War, which, in all likelihood, had enſued, had it not been prevented in time, by empowering the King to ſecure ſuch as, becauſe of their Quality, or their former Engagements with the Papiſts, and with the then Malcontents, were likely to prove Ringleaders to new Diſturbances, in a time when things were not as yet ſettled upon ſo faſt a Foundation as they now are." [State Tracts, temp. W. III. v. i. p. 215.

which are ſo obſcurely expreſs'd as to be hardly intelligible) that the Reaſon of this Indulgence to the Inns of Court and Chancery was owing to a pretended Privilege of theirs, of hindering all other Commoners from coming into their Juriſdiction: And ſo that this Part of the Tax might not be loſt, the Bill provided, that the King might name Commiſſioners of themſelves; but they did not name new Commiſſioners: And that, upon the whole Matter, the Commons left it with their Lordſhips to conſider, whether they would agree or no.

The Lords the ſame Day deſir'd another free Conference on the ſame Affair, in which they recapitulated what they had advanc'd before; inſiſted on this Opportunity to retrieve their Right; and adher'd to their Clauſe.

A. D. 1689. to purſue the Buſineſs of Ireland with all poſſible Vigour, and that the Members of both Houſes may repair to their ſeveral Counties, to ſecure the Peace, and to put the Militia into ſome better Poſture.

I am very ſenſible of the Zeal and good Affection which you, Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, have ſhew'd to the Public, in giving thoſe Supplies you have done already: And I do not doubt but from the ſame Inducements you will be ready to give more as Occaſions require; which I muſt let you know will be ſooner than perhaps you may expect, becauſe the neceſſary Expence of this Year will much exceed the Sums you have provided for it. And that you may make the truer Judgment in that Matter, I am very willing you ſhould ſee how all the Moneys have hitherto been laid out; and to that End I have commanded thoſe Accounts to be ſpeedily brought to you, by which you will ſee how very little of the Revenue has been apply'd to any other Uſe than that of the Navy and Land-Forces.

I muſt remind you of making an effectual and timely Proviſion of the Money for the States of Holland; and I doubt not but you will take care to ſee a fitting Revenue ſettled for myſelf.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I will add no more, but recommend earneſtly to you, to avoid all Occaſions of Diſpute or Delay, at a time that requires Union and Vigour in your Councils, upon which the Preſervation of all that is dear to us doth ſo much depend: And I do promiſe that nothing ſhall ever be wanting on my Part, which may contribute towards it."

has no Effect. But even Royal Eloquence ſeem'd to have loſt its Power; for, having once already addreſs'd his Majeſty for leave to inſpect the Council Books, and thoſe of the Iriſh Committee, and for taking Copies of ſuch Papers as related to the Iriſh Affairs, without Effect, they now voted a ſecond Addreſs on the ſame Subject, and inſtructed the Committee who were to draw it up, to enquire, why the Dutch Fleet was out no ſooner to join the Engliſh; as alſo, why the Latter was laid up, and why there was a Delay in ſetting forth another.

A Committee inſtructed to enquire why the Dutch Fleet was out no ſooner.

Now the Dutch Fleet, of thirty capital Ships, had come to anchor at St. Hellens, June 6, and had ſet ſail for the Coaſt of France, in company with the Engliſh on the 15th following; ſo that when it is conſider'd, that the Treaty between the two Powers was not ſign'd till April the 30th, and how much time is requiſite to put ſo vaſt a Body in Motion, it will appear, perhaps, that as much of this Enquiry of the Commons as related to the Dutch, was rather owing to a Spirit of Perverſeneſs and Malignity, than any real Backwardneſs on their Side, or apparent Cauſe of Suſpicion on ours: Whatever Difficulties had retarded the ſigning that Treaty ſo long; and to whatever Cauſes they were owing, there is no Proof extant that the Misfortune at Bantry was aſcrib'd to the want of Dutch Aſſiſtance, or that any Reflections were at that time ſcatter'd in the Houſe againſt our (o) Adminiſtration, for having ſo little attended to that Service, or having ſent out Admiral Herbert with a Force ſo much inferior to that of the Enemy: And yet the Subject Matter of Complaint lay chiefly there; for the Court of France was then under a Neceſſity to expoſe their Naval Force, as well to convoy the King, as to furniſh him with Supplies immediately afterwards: But having landed him ſafely, and put him in Action, their great Buſineſs was done, and they had no farther Need to carry on their Correſpondence with Ireland by the Means of their whole Navy. Thus, while the combin'd Fleet of between ſixty and ſeventy Men of War hover'd upon their Coaſts, between Breſt and Uſſent, by way of Bravade, theirs lay ſafe in their Ports; and inſtead of making a vain Effort to deſtroy ſo vaſt a Force, they let looſe their Privateers on all Sides to deſtroy the Trade by which it was ſupported; with ſuch fatal Succeſs, that Biſhop Burnet himſelf acknowledges, That tho' we ſeem'd to be Maſters at Sea, we were great Loſers there.

A. D. 1689.

A ſecond Addreſs for Leave to inſpect the Council books.

This ill Humour of the Houſe farther appear'd in the Contents of the ſecond Addreſs relating to the Iriſh Affairs, above ſpecify'd; for therein the deplorable State of Ireland was charg'd on the Neglect or ill Conduct of ſome Perſons employ'd in the Affairs of that Kingdom; and the Reaſon aſſign'd for the Inſpection deſir'd, was, That the Houſe might be enabled to give his Majeſty ſuch Advice, as might prevent the like Miſcarriages for the future: And yet farther, in refuſing to admit an additional Clauſe in the Bill of Rights, for opening a Proſpect of the Throne to the illuſtrious Houſe of Hanover. The original Purpoſe of the Bill of Rights was, to convert the ſeveral Articles preſented by the Lords and Commons of the Convention to their Majeſties, together with the Crown, into a Law, which was to be the Baſis of Government for the Time to come: And it was thought but fitting that the Settlement of the Crown on the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, the Princeſs of Denmark, &c. ſhould by the ſame Law receive the ſame Confirmation: A Proviſion was made accordingly; and when the Bill came to be read the third time, a Motion was made, that the following Clauſe ſhould be made a Part of it: "Provided always, and it is hereby declar'd, by the Authority aforeſaid, That nothing in this Act is intended to be drawn into Example or Conſequence hereafter, to prejudice the Right of any Proteſtant Prince or Princeſs in their Hereditary Additional Clauſes offer'd to the Bill of Rights.

(o) On the contrary, ſuch was their Influence there, that, ſtill by way of Pacifier, the Thanks of the Houſe was given to Admiral Herbert, not for his great Service in vanquiſhing, but engaging the French Fleet: And when the Admiral, in return, interceded with them to make a Proviſion for the Support of ſuch Seamen as were diſabled in the public Service, the Houſe came to a Reſolution to make ſuch Proviſion, and alſo for the Wives and Children of ſuch as ſhould be ſlain.

A. D. 1689. Hereditary Succeſſion to the Imperial Crown of three Realms. " Now with what View ſoever this Motion was made, it was immediately travers'd with another, which, by way of Amendment, requir'd, that the Words, after the Limitations herein mention'd, might be ſubſtituted in lieu of the Word hereafter: But thoſe who contended for the firſt, defeated the laſt, by calling for the previous Queſtion; which was carry'd in the Negative, Yeas 125, Noes 179. Another engroſs'd Clauſe was then offer'd as a Rider, in the following Words: " That from and after this preſent Seſſion of Parliament, no Diſpenſation by Non-obſtante to any Statute, or any Part thereof, ſhall be allow'd; but that the ſame ſhall be held void, and of none Effect, except a Diſpenſation be allow'd of in ſuch Statute. Provided, that no Charter or Grant of Pardon before June 1, 1679, ſhall be any ways impeach'd, or invalidated by this Act; but that the ſame ſhall be and remain of the ſame Force and Effect in Law, and no other than as if this Act had never been made." This was agreed to, and then it was reſolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That the Bill do paſs.

When it came before the Lords, to the Clauſe for diſabling Papiſts from ſucceeding to the Crown, their Lordſhips added, Or ſuch as ſhould marry Papiſts: In which Caſe, at the Inſtance of Biſhop Burnet, ſeconded by the Earl of Shrewſbury, it was provided, That the Subjects ſhould be abſolv'd from their Allegiance. " And this paſs'd, ſays his Lordſhip, without any Oppoſition, or Debate, which amaz'd us all, conſidering the Importance of it." The ſame Prelate proceeds in the following Words: " But the King order'd me to propoſe the naming the Ducheſs of Hanover and her Poſterity, next in the Succeſſion. He ſignify'd his Pleaſure in this alſo to the Miniſters; but he order'd me to begin the Motion in the Houſe, becauſe I had already ſet it on foot. And the Duke of Hanover had now other Thoughts of the Matter, and was ſeparating himſelf from the Intereſts of France. The Lords agreed to the Propoſition without any Oppoſition; ſo it was ſent down to the Commons. There were great Debates there upon it: Hampden preſs'd it vehemently; but Wildman, and all the Republican Party oppos'd it; their ſecret Reaſons ſeem'd to be, a Deſign to extinguiſh Monarchy, and therefore to ſubſtitute none beyond the three that were nam'd, that ſo the Succeſſion might quickly come to an End: But it not being decent to own this, all they pretended was, that there being many in the lineal Succeſſion, after the three that were nam'd, who were then of the Church of Rome, the leaving to them a Poſſibility to ſucceed, upon their turning Proteſtants, might have a good Effect upon them, and diſpoſe them to hearken to Inſtruction; all which would be defeated by a Declaration in favour of the Ducheſs.

One for limiting the Succeſſion to the Houſe of Hanover.

To this it was anſwer'd, in a free Conference, that for that very Reaſon it was fit to make this Declaration; ſince nothing could bring us into a more certain Danger than a pretended Converſion of a falſe Convert, who might by ſuch a Diſguiſe aſcend the Throne, and ſo work our Ruin by ſecret Artifices."

A. D. 1689.

But there was ſomething more in the Diſpute than is here recounted by the Biſhop: For the Lords, by way of Amendment, had not only provided, that, in default of Iſſue in the Queen, the Princeſs of Denmark, and the King himſelf, the Crown ſhould deſcend to the Hanover-Line; but accompany'd that Proviſion with a ſort of Teſt, which the Perſon next in the Succeſſion was to take, as a Qualification for his entering on the kingly Office; and alſo explan'd away the Reſtraint which the Commons had laid on the diſpenſing Power. When therefore the Bill was return'd with theſe Amendments, they rejected them; and the firſt, nemine contradicente: Which is ſo much the more remarkable, if it be true, as the Biſhop alledges, that Hampden ſo vehemently maintain'd the Negative. A Committee was then appointed to draw up Reaſons for this Diſagreement; which Reaſons were as follow: Namely; to the firſt Amendment, relating to the Settlement of the Crown in the Hanover-Line, Rejected by the Commons, nem. con.

Controverſy between the two Houſes thereon.

" 1. Becauſe it was not contain'd in the Declaration, preſented by both Houſes to their Majeſties, upon their Acceptance of the Crown.

2. Becauſe a farther Limitation of the Crown might be dangerous, and of ill Conſequence."

And to the laſt, " Becauſe the diſpenſing Power had been aſſum'd within Time of Memory.

Becauſe it had unreaſonably increas'd, from time to time, to the Overthrow of Multitudes of good Laws.

Becauſe all Laws, made for the Benefit of Trade, might be thereby eluded, and Monopolies erected.

And, generally, becauſe the Miſchiefs that have been conſequent thereon were ſo great, that the Commons could find no Remedy to prevent the ſame, but by inſiſting upon the Clauſe, and Proviſo."

The Buſineſs of one Conference was to deliver and receive theſe Reaſons; and in another (which was manag'd, on the behalf of the Peers, by that once zealous Champion for Hereditary Right, Lord Rocheſter) their Lordſhips reply'd,

" 1. That tho', in the Inſtrument offer'd to their Majeſties, the Limitation went no farther than their Perſons; yet in a Law which had reſpect to all ſucceeding Ages, and which ſettled for ever the Liberties of the Subject, they thought it reaſonable to carry the Limitation of the Settlement of the Succeſſion of the Crown farther than was neceſſary in that Inſtrument, in which the Crown was offer'd to their Majeſties, and which had no View but of the Succeſſion to their Poſterity.

2. That they could ſee no Danger, nor any ill Conſequences, that might follow on a farther Limitation; but very much to the contrary.

For, 1. This ſecur'd the Nation effectually from

A. D. 1689. from the Danger of having a Papiſt to reign at any time hereafter: Since, of ſuch a Number of Papiſts as ſtood next the Crown in the lineal Succeſſion, ſome might be prevail'd upon to ſhew a Change in their Religion, if they had a Proſpect of ſucceeding to the Crown, upon it; and no Danger being ſo great as the having one who is a pretended Proteſtant, but is in truth a conceal'd Papiſt, to reign over us, the moſt effectual Way to ſecure our Religion was, to declare the Succeſſion in a Family that were known to be certainly Proteſtants.

2. That it was the Intereſt of England, at preſent, to do Right to that great Houſe, by limiting the Succeſſion according to the Proviſo.

For, ſince this Limitation had been propos'd, if it ſhould be now laid aſide, it would look like an excluding of this Houſe, which might provoke them to take Reſolutions, which might be of great Prejudice to the Nation in the preſent Conjuncture.

And that ſince, for theſe Reaſons, the Lords inſiſted upon their Proviſo, the ſame Reaſons determin'd them likewiſe to inſiſt upon that Part of the Rider which related to it."

Still the Reaſons of one Houſe had no Weight with the other: The Commons remain'd unconvinc'd, and directed their Committee to prepare themſelves to diſcuſs the Matter yet farther, at a free Conference: A free Conference was held accordingly; and, upon the Iſſue, Sir William Pulteney, who manag'd for the Commons, reported, That there were Hopes, that the Lords would relinquiſh their Amendments, and agree with them: But, quite contrary to the Expectations that were thus rais'd, at another Conference, which the Lords demanded a few Days after, the Biſhop of Saliſbury, as chief Manager for their Lordſhips, declar'd, in the Name of his Principals, That they had conſider'd what was offer'd in the former free Conference; and that as to the two Clauſes, relating to the Limitation of the Crown to the Princeſs Sophia of Hanover, and the Declaration to be made by the Perſon on whom the Crown ſhould devolve, &c. and all Matters depending thereon, their Lordſhips did adhere to their Amendments. The Managers for the Commons then demanding, Whether the Lords would admit of any farther Debate touching the ſaid Matter? it was anſwer'd, No; they had no ſuch thing in charge. This of courſe put an end to the Conference. The Commons, on receiving the Report from their Meſſengers, fell into violent Heats; but being unprepar'd with an Expedient to turn the Tables on the Lords, adjourn'd (p) from the 31ſt of July to the 2d of Auguſt, when they made an (q) Order, That a Committee ſhould

A. D. 1689.

The Lords adhere.

(p) According to the Author of the Life of King William, Heaven interpos'd to put an End to the Difference between the two Houſes, by bleſſing her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Denmark with a Son (William Duke of Glouceſter.) But Sir William Pulteney made his Report July the 20th; that Prince was born on the 24th. The ſame Day the Commons, by Meſſage, put the Lords in mind of the Bill of Rights; and it was not till the 31ſt that the Lords made the Breach wider than ever, by adhering.

(q) It is ſit, however, to acknowledge, that this Order was more immediately the Reſult of another Feud, which had ariſen between the two Houſes, in the Caſe of Titus Oates; of which Caſe, and the Connection which this Order had with that of the Bill of Rights, we find a ſucciſt and ſatisfactory Account in the following Paper of Reaſons, which was deliver'd at a Conference by the Managers for the Commons to thoſe of the Lords:

"The Commons have deſir'd this Conference, on Occaſion of your Lordſhips Meſſage to them, ſignifying, that your Lordſhips adhered to your Amendments in the Caſe of Oates; and have commanded us to open it with a Brief of the Diſpute between the two Houſes.

Writs of Error were brought to reverſe two Judgments againſt Oates, for Perjury, by which he was ſentenc'd to be degraded, to be ſet in the Pillory annually ſeveral times; to be impriſon'd for Life; to be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate one Day, and from Newgate to Tyburn the next.

Theſe Judgments your Lordſhips thought fit to affirm.

Theſe Precedents being of ſuch dangerous Conſequence to every Engliſh Subject, the Commons thought themſelves under a Neceſſity of ſending up a Bill to your Lordſhips to have them revers'd; in which Bill, they are call'd erroneous, illegal, cruel, and of evil Example to future Ages.

Your Lordſhips, by Meſſage, acquainted the Commons, that you had agreed to the Bill with Amendments.

By theſe Amendments the Words illegal, cruel, and of evil Example to future Ages, are left out; and a Clauſe is added, that ſuch exceſſive Puniſhments ſhould not be inflicted for the future.

The Words relating to the annulling the ſaid Judgments of the Peers on the Writ of Error, are likewiſe left out; and a Clauſe is added, that till the Matters for which Oates was convicted be heard, and determin'd in Parliament, he ſhould not be receiv'd as a Witneſs in any Court or Cauſe.

The Commons, at a Conference, deliver'd their Reaſons why they could not agree to theſe Amendments; your Lordſhips did the ſame for inſiſting on them; but they not proving ſatisfactory to the Commons, a free Conference was deſir'd and obtain'd, in which your Lordſhips own'd that the whole Houſe of Peers was ſatisfy'd that the Judgments given by the King's-Bench were erroneous, extravagant, and the Puniſhment ſo exorbitant, as ought not to be inflicted on any Engliſh Subject, and alſo, that you would not debate whether an erroneous Judgment was not illegal: But yet your Lordſhips did declare, that, upon the Writs of Error, you had choſen to affirm the Judgment, rather than Oates ſhould be reſtor'd to his Teſtimony; which muſt have been the Conſequence of the Reverſal.

After your Lordſhips had own'd ſo much at the Conference, the Commons were extremely ſurpris'd to receive a Meſſage that you adher'd to your Amendments.

Firſt, becauſe by this general Vote of adhering, your Lordſhips depart from what was yielded at the free Conference.

Secondly, your Lordſhips proceeding to adhere upon the firſt free Conference, they look upon to be irregular; at leaſt, contrary to the ordinary Courſe of Proceedings between the two Houſes: Eſpecially, if ſuch adhering ſhould be look'd upon as concluſive, ſince 'tis uſual to have two free Conferences or more, before either Houſe proceeds to adhere.

And, as to the Courſe of Parliament, ſo it is ſuitable to the Nature of things, that there ſhould be no adhering before two free Conferences, at leaſt: Becauſe, before that time, each Houſe is not fully poſſeſs'd of the Reaſons upon which the other does proceed, or have full Opportunities of making Replies: Wherefore, to adhere ſooner, is to exclude all Poſſibility of offering Expedients.

Beſide this Method of adhering ſo ſuddenly and unexpectedly draws very great Inconveniencies after it; as hath appear'd this Seſſion; the additional Poll-Bill, having been loſt, to the great Prejudice of the Crown, by your Lordſhips adhering unto the firſt free Conference. The Bill of Rights, likewiſe, in which your Lordſhips, as well as the Commons, are highly concern'd, by that ſame quick way of adhering is in danger to be loſt: And no Inconveniences can be greater than what muſt follow the Loſs of this Bill, if your Lordſhips ſhould take upon yourſelves to be concluſive, by adhering upon the firſt free Conference.

For the Commons think it undeniable, That in Proceedings in your Judicial Capacity, upon Writ of Error, your Lordſhips are as much bound to give Judgment upon the Record, according to the ſtrict Rules of Law, as any inferior Court whatſoever, and ought not to enter into the Conſideration of Perſons, or collateral Reſpects.

That for your Lordſhips to aſſume a diſcretionary Power, to affirm a Judgment, though at the ſame time, you agree it is erroneous, is to aſſume a Power to make Law, inſtead of judging according to the Rules of Law.

That when the Commons ſend up a Bill to your Lordſhips, in order to prevent the Miſchiefs of ſuch deſtructive Precedents,

A. D. 1689. should inſpect the Journals of both Houſes, to examine, whether there was any Precedent of a free Conference, in which the Freedom of Debate was deny'd, concerning the Subject Matter of ſuch Conferences.

In this Interval his Majeſty condeſcended to try the Force of another Sweetener upon them, by a gracious Meſſage: And to render it the more gracious, ſent it by Sir Robert Howard, inſtead of Mr. Hampden, who had by this time worn out his Influence in the Service of the new Government. This Meſſage was to the Effect following: "That his Majeſty was very ſenſible of the great Burden of Buſineſs which had lain upon them, and which he hoped was now near finiſh'd, that the Country might receive the Advantage of a Receſs, by the ſeveral Members aſſiſting in the Settlement of Public Affairs; and alſo, that they might have the Benefit by it, to take care of their own particular Concerns: That tho' his Majeſty believ'd, that the Houſe was aſſur'd, that by what Preparations were made and muſt be continu'd and increas'd, there would be need of great Sums of Money; yet his Majeſty was ſo ſenſible of the Diſpoſition of this Houſe, that he was willing no farther Proceedings upon raiſing of Money ſhould be, till the Meetings towards Winter, other than what the Houſe had now themſelves deſign'd: That he had commanded him to acquaint the Houſe, That what they had given him ſhould be ſo apply'd, as that when they met again, he was confident they would receive Satisfaction, which he always deſired, in examining the Accounts thereof: And laſtly, his Majeſty commanded him to remind them of the Act of Indemnity, which was all he had in command."

The Reſult was ſimply a Vote, That Sir Robert Howard do preſent the humble Thanks of the Houſe to his Majeſty for his gracious Meſſage; and then, without any farther regard to the Particulars contain'd in it, Sir John Guiſe, who was one of the firſt that had join'd the Dutch Army in the Weſt, acquainted the Houſe from the Committee on the State of Ireland, That it had appear'd to them, that ſeveral Perſons then in Arms with the late King James, had been in Cuſtody here, and were not only releaſed, but had Paſſes given them: That Mr. Jephſon, a Member of the Houſe, was then Secretary; and that he was directed by the Committee, to move, that Mr. Jephſon might give an Account thereof. This was, in Effect, tracing the Matter to the King's Cloſet; and yet the Houſe comply'd with the Senſe of their Committee, and made an Order accordingly; as alſo another, That the Auditor of the Exchequer ſhould bring in an Account of what Moneys had been iſſu'd for ſecret Services, and to whom, ſince the Year 1682. Sir John Guiſe moreover ſignify'd, That he had waited on his Majeſty with the Addreſs for Leave, to inſpect the Council Books, and that his Majeſty's Anſwer was, That he would conſider of it: And, after a warm Debate, it was reſolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That the Perſons who had delay'd ſending Relief to Ireland, and thoſe who had adviſ'd his Majeſty to defer the giving that Leave, were Enemies to the King and Kingdom: But a Motion being afterwards made, for an Addreſs againſt the Marquiſſes of Halifax and Carmarthen by Name, accompany'd with an humble Requeſt, That his Majeſty would remove them both from his Councils, the Houſe, which had been ſo unanimous before, divided, and both Parties were ſo equally match'd, both in Strength and Perſeverance, that neither could obtain the Maſtery, and ſo the Debate was adjourn'd by common Conſent.

A. D. 1689.

His Majeſty demurs to the Addreſs for Leave to inſpect the Council Books.

Thoſe who gave him that Advice, voted Enemies to King and Kingdom.

This was the Buſineſs of July 14: On the Morrow Jephſon appear'd in his Place, according to Order: And now it appear'd that the eager Spirit of the preceding Day was ſomewhat ſoftened; for when he urg'd, That, on peruſing the Books which he had kept while Secretary to his Majeſty, he did not find any of the Perſons in diſpute mention'd there, the Houſe was pleas'd to take his Word, and purſu'd ſo tender a Point no farther.

Jephſon's Defence admitted.

All this while, the new Levies for the Iriſh Service had been indeed carry'd on, but ſo ſlowly, and in ſuch a manner, as ſeem'd to argue, that thoſe at the Helm deſpair'd of the Undertaking, and were therefore unwilling to venture what they fear'd to loſe: But when the News was receiv'd, That the Siege of Londonderry was rais'd, the Affair was purſu'd in earneſt; the chief Command was given to the Duke of Schomberg: And, poſſibly to perſuade the People without Doors, at leaſt, that the Enquiry purſu'd by the Commons, with relation to Ireland, had no other Foundation than their own Malignity, the Duke was prevail'd upon to take his ſolemn Leave of that Houſe in Perſon; which he accordingly

Mr. Jephſon call'd upon to anſwer for certain Paſſes granted to Enemies.

Duke Schomberg takes a ſolemn Leave of the Houſe.

ON THE BOMBAY ...

Precedents, for your Lordſhips to reſolve to reverſe thoſe Judgments, though confeſs'd to be erroneous (unleſs upon ſuch Terms as you are pleas'd to impoſe, and to which the Commons cannot, in reaſon, agree) is to leave the Kingdom without Redreſs againſt acknowledg'd Wrongs.

It is recorded, to the Honour of your noble Anceſtors, That they declar'd they would not change the Laws; and the Commons hope, you will purſue their Steps, and not, by affirming erroneous Judgments, go about to make that Law, which was not ſo before: and, by inſiſting upon collateral Terms, before you will reverſe thoſe Judgments in the legiſlative way, take to yourſelves in effect the whole Power of the Legiſlature; which is not only to change the Law, but to ſubvert the Conſtitution of the Government: if your Lordſhips ſhould perſiſt in ſuch a way of Proceeding, and the Commons ſhould acquieſce in it.

The Commons, therefore, hope your Lordſhips will not perſiſt in this unuſual way of adhering, which manifeſtly tends to the Interruption of a good Correſpondence between the two Houſes, at this time of ſuch abſolute Neceſſity for the eſtabliſhing the Government, and for the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom."

Upon the whole Matter Oates, by the Diet of the Struggle, made a Shift to obtain, 1. An Addreſs from the Parliament to the King, requiring that his Majeſty would be graciouſly pleas'd to grant him his Pardon, 2. The King's Pardon in Conſequence of that Addreſs, and, 3. A Penſion of 5 l. a Week in lieu of the ſeveral Penſions formerly granted him by King Charles of 624 l. 60 l. and 200 l. per ann. which he had been depriv'd of, and which he had now again apply'd for, and expected to be reſtor'd to.

A. D. 1689. cordingly did July the 16th, Sir Henry Capel having first prepar'd his way, by acquainting them, That his Grace, being on the Point of setting out on his Expedition to Ireland, desir'd that Honour; as also to make his Acknowledgments for the (r) Care which they had taken of him and his Interests; adding, That his Merit was great, and that the King had rewarded it like a King, having made him a Duke, and settled 5000 l. a Year on him and his Heirs, in lieu of the like Revenues which he had lost in France and Germany. The Duke's Compliment was to the same Effect, and the Speaker's Reply was in the Terms following:

"My Lord, the Services that have been done by your Grace to their Majesties and this Kingdom, are so great, that they can never be forgotten: I am therefore commanded by this House to acquaint you, that they are extremely satisfy'd that his Majesty's Army is committed to your Grace's Conduct; and they doubt not but the War will be prosecuted in such a manner, as will fully answer all their Expectations. This House doth likewise assure your Grace, that, at what Distance soever you are, they will have a particular Regard, as much as in them lies, of whatever may concern your Grace, or the Army under your Command."

But whatever Effect this Ceremonial had without Doors, it had none within, though back'd with a Grant of that Leave which they had so earnestly solicited of his Majesty, to inspect the Council-Books: For having in a general Committee (August 3) consider'd the State of the Nation, they came to the following Resolutions, 1. That there had been Delays in the Succour of Ireland. 2. That sufficient Preparations had not been made for transporting the Forces to that Kingdom: And, 3. That several Ships had been taken for want of Convoys to preserve them. But though the Majority proceeded thus far, when the Use and Application came to be made, by a Motion for an Address to represent to his Majesty, That it was not for his Interest to retain the Marquis of Hallifax in his Councils, it pass'd in the Negative. A. D. 1690.

Votes on the State of the Nation.

The Miscarriages in Relation to Ireland were also the great Object of Opposition in the House of Lords: They had their Committee of Enquiry: They address'd for the Minute-Books of the Council: They receiv'd the same Answer from his Majesty: When the Commons had the Leave they desir'd, their Lordships had the like Indulgence: And when it appear'd upon Examination, that the said Books did not give the Light expected from them, they order'd the Earls of Shrewsbury and Nottingham, to apply, for all the Minutes of the Irish Affairs which had been taken from the time that his Majesty accepted the Administration, to the time of his ascending the Throne; but still without the desir'd Effect; for his Majesty was pleas'd to reply, That there were NO MINUTES of the Irish Affairs in the time mention'd by their Lordships.

Proceedings in the House of Lords on the Irish Affairs.

To close on this Subject: When it became manifest to the leading Men of both Houses, that the great End they aim'd at, of making the Marquis of Hallifax accountable for all the Miscarriages they had so loudly complain'd of, was utterly unattainable, the Committee of the Commons completed and deliver'd in their Report, which turn'd principally on the Behaviour of (s) Lundee at Londonderry, and consequently he was mark'd out, Charge against Lundee.

(r) They had made him a magnificent Present of a hundred thousand Pounds.

(s) Against whom there was, indeed, sufficient Matter; as appears by the following Letter of Dr. Walker's, annex'd to a Pamphlet call'd, A true Account of the present State of Ireland, as presented to the Earl of Shrewsbury, by the Author, Andrew Hamilton, viz.

"When the Lord Mountjoy left the Garrison of Londonderry, he gave private Orders to the Colonel he left Commander in chief, That he should punctually observe whatsoever Directions he should receive from him from France. Now such were the Circumstances of that unfortunate Lord, that being suspected by the late King James, and look'd upon as the Betrayer of that Kingdom, he had no other way of insinuating into his Favour, and regaining his lost Reputation with him, but by promising to make Colonel Lundee an Instrument to break and ruin the Protestants, and render them incapable of opposing any Army that should march against them.

The deluded Protestants in Derry, and all over the North, were extremely overjoy'd that they had so good a Soldier for their Head; one whom they really believ'd to be of their own Religion, and who seem'd to be so zealously and warmly affected to their Interest; and therefore they entirely rely'd and depended upon his Courage and Fidelity, and submitted themselves to his Conduct and Management, never concerning the least Suspicion of him till it was too late: tho' it was whisper'd in every Corner of the Garrison, That he had said, he would heartily fight against Tyrconnel, but not against King James. At length a formidable and regular Army of the Irish march'd down towards the North; our Forces then having not the least Intimation of their Approach, till they came almost to the Towns where our Men were garrison'd, which they were forced to quit in great Disorder and Confusion.

The Colonel, in the mean time, sat quietly at home, neither made any Provision for the Frontier Garisons, nor gave any Orders to fortify and secure them, and oppose the Enemy, before they were blooded and animated with Success. Soon after (without any Opposition) they over-run the two great Counties of Down and Antrim; And then the Colonel sent Letter after Letter to the Lord Kingston at Sligo, where there was good Store of Provisions and Forage, to come and join his Horse at Ish with the Lagan Forces. The Lord sent him word, That if the Horse came away, the Foot would not be perswaded to continue there; and that he sent'd there was not such Plenty of Provision for their Horse and Men in the Lagan, as they had at Sligo. Upon this Answer, the Colonel sends an Express to my Lord, That both his Horse and Foot should quit Sligo, and march immediately to the Assistance of Derry.

My Lord wearied with these Importunities, and not in the least mistrusting the Integrity of the Colonel, advances with his Forces, and was follow'd by all the Inhabitants of the Town: But no sooner were they come to Ballyshannon, twenty Miles from Sligo, but they receiv'd a Message from the Colonel, That there was no Forage for the Horse in the Lagan. The Enemy by this time had possess'd themselves at Sligo, so that they were forc'd to flay at Ballyshannon, where both their Horse and Men were expos'd to the greatest Necessities, and were almost destroy'd for want of Provisions.

All this while the Towns of Inishillin and Ballyshannon had no Ammunition sent them from him, tho' he had at the same time above five hundred Barrels of Powder in the Pallas Store-house at Derry; neither could he be perswaded by any Arguments, to get Forage into Derry, tho' the neighbouring Country round about him had great Quantities of Hay and Oates, and made a voluntary Offer of them for the Service of the Garrison. Besides, as if he had along design'd the Ruin of that Place, and consequently of the Protestant Interest in Ireland, he still gave Passes in every Man that ask'd them: He endeavour'd to possess them that were the most bold and resolute with strange Apprehensions of their Danger; and where this succeeded not, out of the Abundance of his Affection, he courted and invited others to accept of Passes. Afterwards

A. D. 1689. out, to be the only Sacrifice. Indeed, Lord Warrington in his Tract, call'd An Impartial Enquiry, before quoted, is explicit, "That it was prov'd to the House by sufficient Witnesses, that when Major General Kirk first arriv'd in the River of that Place, and for some time after, there was no Boom, nor any thing like it, to interrupt his Passage, no Castle with a Gun in it, nor Musketeers on either Side of the River, nor any thing that could have hinder'd his relieving the Town, if he had intended it; that, on the contrary, it appear'd, that he withdrew and landed his Forces to secure himself, where he feasted and revell'd with some of the principal Rebels, with whom he had lately serv'd King James." But if any such Proof was offer'd, no Use was made of it; and Kirk escap'd not only without Punishment, but without Censure.

There still remain'd two other Points before the Commons, which the King had particularly recommended to their Consideration, viz. the Settlement of his Revenue, and the perfecting a Bill of Indemnity. Of both these something has already been said, and more remains to be said; for tho' they were brought upon the Carpet in the Beginning of the Session, they were left unfinish'd at the End; and thorough the whole Course of it, offer'd continual Matter to keep the contending Parties in a continual Ferment.

We have seen that the King had his Ends in recommending a Bill of Indemnity, as also, that the Whigs had their Ends in opposing it: And we are now to observe, that they disguis'd these Ends under the most plausible Pretences imaginable. "No good Men doubted, says Lord Warrington, that an Act of Indemnity was needful for quieting the Minds of thousands that had been criminal in compliance with King James; but that nothing could be more pernicious to the future Peace and Security of our Government, than an absolute, general Indemnity for ALL our late King James's Ministers, to forgive ALL Treasons, Murders in Forms of Law, Suspensions of the Laws, Establishments of Popish Courts and Convents, surrendring and betraying of Charters, Perversions of the whole Course of Justice, and professedly laying Foundations for perpetual Popery and Slavery."

Apology of the Whigs for their Proceedings in the Bill of Indemnity.

A. D. 1689.

For that Reason, the Convention took infinite Pains to form an Act of Indemnity as might have answer'd all the Ends of Mercy, yet with due regard to Justice and the future Safety of our King and Government.

They agreed in their Votes, that few should be excepted from Mercy as to their Lives, and as few as possible to their Estates and all other Punishments.

They concluded, upon many solemn Debates, first to name the several sorts of public Crimes; for every one of which, some ought to be punish'd for Example's sake, as lasting Monuments of Justice, either as to Life or Estate, or Fines, or Exclusion from public Trusts."

It is, on the other hand, alledg'd, that so many Exceptions were made in the Bill, as would have mark'd out more for Punishment than Pardon; and that the House upon this Occasion resembled a Roman Amphitheatre, and the Members the Laquearii and Retiarii, whose Business it was to throw Nets and Nooses over the Necks of each other.

The plain Truth will best be found in the Exceptions themselves, which are as follow, viz.

The Exceptions on which it was founded.

I. For asserting, advising, and promoting of the dispensing Power and suspending of Laws without Consent of Parliament, as it has been lately exercis'd, and the acting in pursuance of such pretended dispensing Power.

II. For committing and prosecuting the seven Bishops.

III. For advising, promoting, and executing the Commission for erecting the late Court for ecclesiastical Causes.

IV. For advising the levying Money, and the collecting the same for and to the Use of the Crown, by Pretence of the Prerogative.

V. For advising the raising and keeping up a standing Army in time of Peace, without Afterwards, when the Enemy made their Approaches nearer Derry, he drew out a Body of 7000 Men, pretending he would fight them at a Pass they were to come over: But as soon as ever Colonel Sheldon, with his Horse, advanc'd, he gave him the Sign to come over, and ran away, swearing a great Oath and saying, Gentlemen, I see you will not fight; tho', at the same time, they were in all Appearance very zealous and willing to engage. From thence he immediately fled to the City, and then shut the Gates upon thousands of Souls, pretending Scarcity of Provisions, who all either perish'd for Hunger, or were left as a Prey and Sacrifice to the Rage and Fury of their insulting Enemies.

Soon after Colonel Cunningham and Richards, with two Regiments, came to the Assistance of Derry, whom he discouraged from flying, declaring, That they had Provision but for a very few Days, and that the People who were in the City were but a Rabble.

However, all the Treachetions in their Council of War, as they call'd it (tho' none were admitted to it but the Colonel's own Creatures) were manag'd with the greatest Secrecy. And the better to delude the Garrison, it was given out, That the Forces would forthwith land. And of this they were so fully perswaded, that many went aboard the Ships that were in the Harbour to caress and congratulate the Soldiers safe Arrival, who were not suffer'd to return again, but against their Inclinations were brought into England. Cunningham next Day (when on board, and as it was agreed betwixt him and the confederate Colonel) sends him a Letter, That he had discover'd some Ships at a Distance, which must needs be further Succours design'd for the Relief of Derry; that he would fall down to the Harbour's Mouth, and return again with the rest of the Fleet. This Letter was handed up and down Derry to pacify the People, tho' generally they began to apprehend they were sold and betray'd; and in this their Suspicion they were confirm'd by a Lady, related to the Colonel, who had forgot her Cue, and unwarily told a Lieutenant in the Garrison, That Cunningham did not design to land, and that his Letter was a meer Sham. After this Cunningham set sail, and hover'd at a little Distance, expecting the Colonel, who had promis'd him to make his Escape, and go with him for England; but the Colonel not coming according to the time appointed, he parted his Voyage, and left us under the Apprehensions of immediate Destruction."

But notwithstanding the Notoriety of all these several Facts, and the particular Application of the House of Commons to his Majesty, that Lundee might be sent over a close Prisoner to Londonderry, there to be try'd for his Life, we are told by Lord Warrington, in his Impartial Enquiry, That those who advis'd the Employment of him, and his two Associates Cunningham and Richards, took care for their Security and Liberty without the Trouble of Trial.

A. D. 1689. out Consent of Parliament, and the quartering of Soldiers.

VI. For abusing, procuring, contriving and acting in the Surrender of Charters; in the Alteration and Subversion of Corporations; in procuring new Charters; the violating the Rights and Freedoms of Elections to Parliament, to Counties, Cities, Corporations, Boroughs and Ports, and questioning the Proceedings in Parliament, out of Parliament by Declarations, Informations, or otherwise.

VII. For undue Constructions of Law, and the undue and illegal Prosecutions and Proceedings in capital Crimes.

VIII. For the undue Returns of Juries and other illegal Proceedings in civil Cases.

IX. For requiring excessive bail, imposing excessive Fines, giving excessive Damages, and using undue Means for levying such Fines and Damages, and inflicting cruel and unusual Punishments.

X. For advising King Charles II. and King James II. by some other of their Judges and Council, that Parliaments need not be call'd, according to the Statutes.

XI. For bailing in the Court of King's-Bench Persons committed upon Impeachments from the Commons.

And, XII. For the procuring a Commission to exercise martial Law in St. Helena, and signing a Commission to put it in Execution.

This was the Catalogue of Sins; and the Mercy of those who made it, consisted in this, That they did not insist on making Examples of all the Guilty, but only such as were most obnoxious either to the Public or themselves.

It must also be acknowledg'd, that they prosecuted their Enquiries like Men who were resolv'd to take all Advantages, and who, in order thereto, endeavour'd to make the Charge as black as possible.

Reports from the Committee of Grievances.

The very same Day that these Exceptions were agreed to, Major Wildman deliver'd in a long Report from the Committee of Grievances, relating to the Misdemeanors of Burton and Graham, joint Sollicitors for the Crown in the two late Reigns; charging them with having expended vast Sums in the several unwarrantable Prosecutions of those Times, with having corrupted Juries, suborn'd Witnesses, defended several Persons, particularly Sir John Moor, against their Fellow-Subjects, with Court-Money; and generally with having been the Court-Agents in all the Illegalities of the last eight Years: In the same Report the late Chancellor Jeffreys, Chief-Justice Wright, and Judge Jenner, are also charg'd with having a principal Concern in all the said arbitrary Proceedings.

In a few Days after, Mr. Foley deliver'd in another long Report, tending to expose the Violence of the Court in the Election of Sheriffs in the Year 1682, when North and Rich were declar'd Sheriffs by the Mayor, in Opposition to Papillon and Dubois, who were return'd by the Voice of the City, and in prosecuting and fining those Persons as Rioters who carry'd on the Poll, after the said Mayor had thought fit to order it by Proclamation, to be discontinu'd, &c. As also in causing Papillon to be fin'd 10000*l.* for being concern'd with Dubois in the arresting Sir William Pritchard, when Lord Mayor, and in suing out the Quo Warrantos against the City-Charters: The whole concluding with a Resolution of the said Committee, That it was their Opinion, that Sir John Moor and Sir Dudley North were two of the Authors of the Invasion made upon the Rights of the City of London, in the said Election of Sheriffs. A. D. 1689.

In about a Fortnight after this, Mr. Bridgman and Mr. Blathwait, Clerks of the Council, were order'd to attend, and were ask'd, Who were of the Privy Council, at or about the Year 1681? As also, Who were of the Cabinet-Council? Whether any List or Roll were kept of their Names? What Books and Papers of Returns they had of such Persons Names, as agreed to take off the Penal Laws and Tests? Where those Books and Papers were? What was become of them? What Letters were sent to Lords Lieutenants? What Returns were made? &c.

About the same time, the Judges displac'd in the late Reign, were examin'd, for what Reason they had been so displac'd: Mr. Justice Powel, more particularly, was examin'd, concerning the Opinions of his Brother-Judges in the Case of Goodwin and Hales, touching the King's Power of dispensing, and gave the House so much Information, that Sir Edward Herbert, Sir Francis Withins, Sir Richard Holloway, and Sir Robert Wright, were all (t) excepted, under the first Head, out of the Bill of Indemnity.

The next Article of Enquiry was, Who were at the Council Board when the seven Bishops were committed to the Tower? and the Information they receiv'd was as follows, viz. The King, the Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, the Lord President-Sunderland, the Lord Privy Seal-Arundel, the Marquis of Powis, the Lord Chamberlain-Mulgrave, the Earls of Huntington, Peterborough, Craven, Berkeley, Murray, Middleton, Melfort, and Castlemain; the Viscount Preston; the Lords Dartmouth, Godolphin, and Dover; Sir John Ernley, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Chief Justice Herbert, Sir Nicholas Butler, and Father Petre; and that all of them sign'd the Warrant, except the King and Father Petre.

They also call'd Sir Thomas Jones and Sir Francis Pemberton to Account, for Breach of Privilege in the following Instance: Topham, Serjeant at Arms, had formerly arrested and confin'd one Jay, by Order of the House; and after the Dissolution of that Parliament, Jay brought his Action in the King's-Bench against Topham, for false Imprisonment. Topham

(t) Tho' not for their Lives; the House having previously resolv'd, that no Person should be so excepted under the said Head.

A. D. 1689. ham pleaded the Order of the Houſe, and the Court over-rul'd that Plea; which was the Offence that theſe late Judges were now to anſwer for: Both, however, maintain'd their Opinions, tho' with great Caution; and by way of Puniſhment were order'd into the Cuſtody of the ſaid Sergeant; in which, for any thing that appears to the contrary, they continued till the End of the Seſſion. The Houſe alſo came to a Reſolution, that the ſeveral Judgments given upon ſeveral Actions of the ſame kind, againſt the ſaid Topham, were illegal and pernicious to the Rights of Parliament; and moreover order'd in a Bill to reverſe the ſaid Judgments, as alſo That by which William Williams, Eſq; the late Speaker, was fin'd 10,000*l.* for Matters done by Order of the Houſe.

The late Judges, Pemberton and Jones, order'd into Cuſtody.

In this Interval, the Lord Jeffreys, the Earls of Sunderland and Huntington, the Biſhops of Durham and Cheſter, and Herbert, Wright, and Jenner again, were excepted under the ſecond Head of the Bill of Indemnity; and all of them, yet again, under the third: At which time, it was alſo reſolv'd, that no more Perſons ſhould be excepted out of the ſaid third Head; for all the reſt of the eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners had found Ways and Means to make their Peace: Sprat, Biſhop of Rocheſter, had publicly apologiz'd for his acting under it, in two Letters to the Earl of Dorſet; and had beſides the Merit to plead, of having given into all the Meaſures of the new Government, without Reſerve. The Earl of Mulgrave had done the ſame, in a (u) Letter to Dr. Tillotſon: And as to the Earl of Rocheſter, he had not only been a ſtrenuous Advocate for the Clauſe in the Bill of Rights, in favour of the Houſe of Hanover, but was driving new Bargains at Court, both for himſelf and thoſe on whoſe Shoulders he ſtood. A. D. 1689.

Thus far the Houſe ſeem'd to proceed with ſome Vigour; and they, moreover, receiv'd Mr. Papillon's Report from the Committee of Grievances, in relation to the levying the Cuſtoms and Exciſe on the Demiſe of King Charles II. which related to the fourth Exception; but came to no Reſolution thereon, nor made any farther Progreſs in the Bill from the 25th of July, to the End of the Seſſion.

It is ſaid by Lord Warrington, that the Party moſt affected by the Bill retarded their Proceedings, by throwing Stumbling-blocks from time to time in their way: And from his Lordſhip's own Paper we have ſeen, that his own Party was more intent on Puniſhment than Pardon.

The

(u) Viz. "S I R,

Nothing in this World is, or ought to be, ſo dear to any Man as his Reputation, and conſequently the Defence of it is the greateſt Obligation that one Man can lay on another: There are alſo ſome Circumſtances that render this Obligation yet more acceptable and valuable; as when 'tis conferr'd generouſly without any Self-intereſt, or the leaſt Deſire or Invitation from the Perſon ſo defended. All this happens to be my Caſe at this time; and therefore I hope you will not be ſurpris'd to find I am not the moſt ungrateful and inſenſible Man living; which certainly I ſhould be, if I did not acknowledge all your induſtrious Concern for me, about the Buſineſs of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, which now makes ſo much Noiſe in the World. You have, as I am told, ſo cordially pleaded my Cauſe, that it is almoſt become your own; and therefore, as unwilling as I am to ſpeak of myſelf, eſpecially in a Buſineſs which I cannot wholly excuſe; yet I think myſelf now a little oblig'd to ſhew my Part in this Matter, tho' imprudent enough, yet it is not altogether unworthy of ſo juſt, and ſo conſiderable an Advocate.

The leſs a Man ſays of himſelf, the better; and 'tis ſo well known already, why I was kept out of all the ſecret Councils, that I need not juſtify myſelf, or trouble you as to thoſe Matters; only I appeal to the unqueſtionable Teſtimony of the Spaniſh Embaſſador, if I did not zealouſly and conſtantly take all Occaſions to oppoſe the French Intereſt, becauſe I knew it directly oppoſite both to the King and Kingdom's Good, which are indeed things inſeparable, and ought to be ſo accounted, as a fundamental Maxim in all Councils of Princes.

This, I hope, will prepare the way a little for what I have to ſay concerning my being one of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners; of which Error I am now as ſenſible as I was at firſt ignorant, being ſo unhappily converſant in the midſt of a perpetual Court-flattery, as never to have heard the leaſt Word of any Illegality in that Commiſſion, before I was unfortunately engag'd in it.

For, tho' my Lord of Canterbury had very prudently refuſ'd to be of it, yet it was talk'd at Court, it proceeded only from his Unwillingneſs to act at that time, and not from any Illegality he ſuſpected in the Commiſſion; having excuſed himſelf from it, the moſt reſpectful way, by the Infirmities he lay under. Being thus ignorant of the Laws, and in ſuch a Station at Court, I need not deſire a Man of your Judgment and Candour, to conſider the Hardneſs of my Caſe, when I was commanded to ſerve in a Commiſſion with a Lord Chancellor, a Lord Chief Juſtice, and two Biſhops, who had all of them already acted ſome time there, without ſhewing the leaſt Diffidence of their Power, or any Heſitation in the Execution of it. And perhaps a Man of more Diſcretion than I can pretend to, might have been eaſily perſuaded to act in ſuch a Conjuncture, and to think he might do it ſafely, both in Law and Conſcience. But I need not ſay much to ſhew my Deſire to have avoided, if poſſible, a troubleſome Employment, that had not the leaſt Temptation of Honour or Profit to recommend it; and which therefore I continued in upon no Account in the World, but to ſerve both King and Clergy with the little Ability I had, in moderating thoſe Councils, which I thought might grow higher, if I left my Place to be fill'd by any of thoſe who waited for it greedily, in order to their ill Deſigns.

And I may expect the more Credit in this, when 'tis conſider'd that the two important Affairs which paſs'd in that eccleſiaſtical Court, being the Biſhop of London's Suſpenſion, and the incapacitating the Members of Magdalen College; the firſt was done ſome Months before I was a Commiſſioner, and I oppos'd the laſt, both in voting and ſpeaking, and with all the Intereſt I was able to make uſe of, which indeed was but little after that Oppoſition; in which being out-voted, I ſeldom came, and never acted in that Court after, except to reſtore the Biſhop of London, tho' ſent for continually, by reaſon of my lodging ſo near it.

And ſince I have been forc'd to mention my Good-will at leaſt, if not my Service, to ſuch learned Men of the Clergy who I thought deſerv'd it, it may be allow'd me to give this one Inſtance more of it; that altho' in preferring Men to all other Places of the Houſhold, I ever us'd to aſk Permiſſion firſt, and accordingly was often refus'd, for the ſake of Roman Catholics and others, who were recommended by Perſons more in favour than myſelf; yet I was ſo careful of keeping that conſiderable Part of the Family unmix'd with mean or unworthy Chaplains, whom others I fear'd would have impos'd on his Majeſty, that I conſtantly fill'd up thoſe Vacancies without giving him the leaſt Notice or Trouble about it, and ſupply'd them with the ableſt, approv'd Divines I could poſſibly find, moſt commonly recommended to me by the Biſhops who were not of the Court; which I conceiv'd the moſt proper Courſe, in a Matter concerning Clergymen, with a King of a different Perſuaſion from theirs, and intended for his real Service; believing it had been better for him, as well as the Kingdom, if the greater Eccleſiaſtical Dignities had been diſpos'd of by others with as much Caution.

And thus, Sir, I have endeavour'd to confirm you in your favourable Opinion of me, which muſt be acknowledg'd by every body an Approbation of ſuch weight, that as I hope it may be an Example of Authority to many, ſo 'tis ſufficient of itſelf to baffle the Cenſoriouſneſs of others. I am,

S I R,

Your Obig'd Humble Servant.

White-Hall, Mar. 27. 1689. MULGRAVE."

A. D. 1689. The King, in the mean while, it may be [illegible], was sufficiently disgusted to find [illegible] had so little Force: But this was not his only Mortification; the Settlement of the Revenue in his own way, was a Point he was more immediately concern'd in. He had not only mention'd it in his Speech and Message, but had expres'd an earnest Desire to have it settled for Life. "He had said, says the Historian of his own Times, that he was not a King till that was done; that without such a settled Revenue, a King was but a Pageant." "And he spoke of this, continues the same Author, with more than ordinary Vehemence; so that sometimes he said, he would not STAY and hold an empty Name, unless that was done: He said once (to the Bishop himself) That he understood the Good of a Commonwealth as well as of a Kingly Government; and it was not easy to determine which was best; but he was sure, the worst of all Governments, was that of a King without Treasure, and without Power. But a Jealousy was now infus'd into many, that he would grow arbitrary in his Government, if he once had the Revenue, and would strain for a high Pitch of Prerogative, as soon as he was out of Difficulties and Necessities. Those of the Whigs, who had liv'd some Years at Amsterdam, had got together a great many Stories, that went about the City, of his Sullenness, and imperious way of dictating."

Not to be too severe in our Inferences from these Words, nor to enter into a minute Discussion, whether the Whigs in this Instance were directed by Principle or Policy, or both, it may be remember'd, that when King James took Possession of the Throne, he was as impatient to have the Revenue settled for Life, as King William was now; that the entire Confidence which was plac'd in him, had like to have prov'd the Ruin of the Constitution; and that the Whigs were the Persons who had all along declar'd, that such a Confidence was never to be plac'd in any Prince whatsoever, for fear of such an Abuse. To be consistent with themselves, therefore, A.D. 1689. it must be admitted, that they ought to have taken the same Precautions against King William which they had requir'd against King James: One was a Man as well as the other; and such is the Imperfection of Human Nature, that even the best of Men are, at Times, more apt to be directed by their Interests than their Virtues.

It must farther be admitted, that in a Matter of such vast Importance as this was, it was scarce possible to be too deliberate: They had provided for the public Wants, over liberally according to some: Together with all the Prerogatives of the Crown, the King was in Possession of all that remain'd of its ancient Patrimony: That All was indeed very inconsiderable: The Fee-Farm-Rents King Charles had carry'd to Market; and those which in Exchequer Language are call'd the small Branches, he had greatly reduc'd: The Hearth-Money, the King himself had politically resign'd; and by a Vote of their own, the Commons had vacated all other occasional Grants. It is certain, therefore, that the Crown was in a necessitous State, and in Point of Honour a new Provision was to be made for it by the People: But then a new Constitution was to be made with it, and Reason requir'd, that such Care should be taken in framing it; that the People should not be Sufferers by their own Generosity.

May we not conclude then, that the Whigs never acted more like sound Politicians and good Commonwealth-men, than upon this Occasion? That the very Articles they are accus'd of, ought to be imputed to them for Righteousness? And that they are blameable only, for not carrying their new Regulations as far as their own Principles requir'd?

But however this may be, that they might not deviate from the right Road for want of sufficient Information, they call'd for a State of the Receipts and Issues of the late King's Revenues: And by these, as deliver'd in by Sir Robert Howard, it appear'd, that the Former amounted to (v) 1,858,436*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* ½, the Latter to (w) 1,699,363*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* and that

A.D. 1689. that the late Government had incurr'd a Debt of (x) 1,054,925*l.* 5*s.* to which was afterwards added a Schedule of things, call'd old Debts, the Total of which, was 861,168*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* ½. It was observable, that in these States no Distinction was made between those Branches which were the Inheritance of the Crown, and those which were deriv'd by way of Grant from the People; and that the Application of the one, was as much at the Discretion of the Ministers, as the other: And it was remember'd, that from the Over-confidence of those which gave, and the Infidelity of those which receiv'd, the Public had been oftentimes grossly abus'd: As one Step, therefore, towards the Prevention of the like Abuse for the future, they first came to a Resolution, That 1,200,000*l.* was a sufficient Sum to answer all the Demands of Government, in time of Peace: They then made an equal Division of that Sum between the King and the Nation, and allow'd one Half for the Navy and Ordnance, and the other, for what is now call'd the Civil List; under which they took care to comprehend, by express Mention, the Allowance to the Queen Regent, the Queen Dowager, the Princess of Denmark, the Marshal Schomberg, the Judges, Masters in Chancery, and Welsh Judges, and certain Perpetuities out of the Customs. They also caus'd a formal Entry to be made in their Journals of the several Charges on the said Civil List, in Pensions, &c. which, according to Sir Robert Howard's Papers, amounted to 213,270*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* ½; and another of all the Grants which had been made of the petty Farms and other particular Estates, and Parts of the Revenue, that they might know so much the more exactly the present State of it; and be so much better able to check the Use and Application of it for the future. Now all these Articles taken together, with an Exception to the first, of the Queen Regent, and allowing but 30,000*l.* per ann. to the Princess of Denmark, according to the Assignment made her from Year to Year, by the King her Father, amounted to no more than (y) 280,618*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* so that there remain'd 319,381*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* for all the Branches of the Houshold, &c. of the King and Queen, which had been defray'd by King James, for less than 235,000*l.*

It does not indeed appear, that the King or his Ministers ever complain'd that this Sum was too little to support the Honour and Dignity of the Crown, or that those who gave it thought they had given too much: His Majesty only demanded to have it secur'd to him for Life; and, after his Example, the Princess of Denmark endeavour'd to render herself as independent of the King, as the King desir'd to be of his People.

A.D. 1689.

The Regulations hitherto mention'd, were made before the End of April; and finding no further Advances likely to be made towards the Point his Heart was so much set upon, his Majesty put them in mind of it on the 28th of June following; but as we have seen, without Success: The Bill of Settlement which they had before them, and which they proceeded very heavily with, was very different from what the King desir'd; and towards the latter End of the Session, taking Advantage of the different Interests which then divided the House of Commons, and of the Clashings of one House against the other, a Motion was made in the Committee of the whole House, by the Friends of the Princess Anne of Denmark, that a Clause should be added to the said Bill, for settling a Provision for Life on her said Highness; which Motion was not only carry'd in the said Committee, but that Provision was settled at 40000*l.* a Year.

Motion for an Establishment for the Princess Anne of Denmark.

It is of this Incident that the late Duchess Dowager of Marlborough writes as follows: "The Princess, notwithstanding these Mortifications (the Refusal of the Royal House at Richmond, and certain Lodgings which her Highness had requested of the Queen) continu'd to pay all imaginable Respect to the King and Queen. But this did not hinder her Majesty from expressing a great deal of Displeasure, when some Steps were made in Parliament towards settling a Revenue on the Prince and Princess. Taking her Sister one Night to Task for it, she ask'd her, What was the Meaning of those Proceedings? to which the Princess answer'd, she heard her Friends had a mind to make her some Settlement. The Queen hastily reply'd, with a very imperious Air, Pray what Friends have you but the King and me? I had not the Honour to attend the Princess that Night; but when she came back, she repeated this to me: And indeed I never saw her express so much Resentment as she did at this Usage; and I think it must be allow'd she had great Reason: For it was unjust in her Sister not to allow her a decent Provision, without an entire Dependance on the King. And besides, the Princess had in a short time learnt, that she must be very miserable, if she was to have no Support but the Friendship of the two Persons her Majesty had mention'd.

After this the Queen said no more to the Princess on the Subject of the Settlement, tho' they met every Day; and the Affair went on so well in the House of Commons, that her Friends were encourag'd to propose for her a much larger Revenue than was at last

A. D. 1689. last obtain'd; to prevent which, by gaining time, the King prorogu'd the Parliament."

Whether her Grace is precisely right in the laſt Circumſtance, is Matter of ſome Doubt; for the Committee paſs'd this Vote in the Beginning of Auguſt, and the Seſſion was not adjourn'd till the 20th; nor can it be admitted that the Affair went altogether ſo well in the Houſe as ſhe is pleas'd to inſinuate; for when this very Vote came to be reported, which was on the ninth, it was reſolv'd on the Queſtion, That the Debate ſhould be adjourn'd till the Revenue came again under Conſideration: Whence it is pretty manifeſt, that the King was able to ſuſpend the Princeſs's Settlement as long as he thought fit to ſuſpend his own.

But though they took up all this time in their Deliberations upon the Revenue, and ſo many various ways made it manifeſt, that they thought the Power of the Purſe almoſt as great as that of the Sceptre or Sword, their Reſolutions were as defective in regard to the Safety of the Conſtitution, as their Supplies prov'd to be, to the Neceſſities of the Times: Thus, if they limited the Civil Liſt Appointments to 600,000*l.* they took no care to ſpecify the Funds out of which it ſhould be paid: And tho' in the Titles and Preambles to two of the four Grants, which they made in this tedious Interval, they ſlipt in certain Words which ſeem'd to carry along with them the Idea of Appropriations, those Words had not the real Force of Appropriations, nor were regarded as ſuch by thoſe in Power, who made no Scruple to apply the ſeveral Branches of the Revenue, promiſcuouſly as before; that is to ſay, the Product of the new Aids to the Demands of the Civil Liſt, and that of the old to thoſe of the War. The two Grants thus looſely treated, were that for raiſing Money by a Poll towards the Reduction of Ireland, and the Land-Tax of Twelve-pence in the Pound for the neceſſary Defence of the Kingdom. The preſent Aid, as it was call'd, for raiſing 240,000*l.* for his Majeſty's extraordinary Occaſions, had not ſo much as the Mark of an Appropriation: And thus it may be ſaid, that the additional Exciſe of Nine-pence per Barrel, together with the new Impoſitions on Wines, Vinegar, Tobacco, Sugar, Silk and Brandy, granted firſt to the late King James, which were allotted to the Payment of 600,000*l.* to the (x) Dutch, and 60,000*l.* to the Servants of the late King Charles, was, ſtrictly ſpeaking, the only appropriated Grant of the Seſſion. A. D. 1689.

[Lord Halifax's MSS. Vol. i. p. 211.]

Then, as to the Amount of all theſe Grants, we find the preſent Aid produc'd but 400,875*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* ½; the Poll Tax 286,662*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* ½; the Twelve-penny Land Tax, at two Half-yearly Payments, 495,604*l.* 4*s.* 9*d*; the Additional Exciſe for the two Years it was made over to the Dutch, 338,194*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* groſs; the New Impoſitions for the ſame time, about 345,735*l.* In all, 1,867,071*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* If, therefore, we except the two laſt Articles, one of which was Part of the former Eſtabliſhment, and both deſtin'd to the Payment of a Debt, as alſo the Hearth-Money; ſuppoſing the other Branches produc'd the ſame this Year as formerly (which, indeed, conſidering the Diſtractions of the Times, is ſcarce to be ſuppos'd) the Sum Total of the Revenue, may be computed at 3,210,936*l.* But in Lord Halifax's Papers, we find a farther Acknowledgment, that there remain'd in the Exchequer, November the 5th, 1678, 80,138*l.* and that there was afterwards receiv'd on the Hearth-Money Duty, notwithſtanding his Majeſty had ſo ſolemnly relinquiſh'd it, 213,966*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* which ſwells up the ſaid Total to 3,505,040*l.* Amount of it in the whole. [Ibid. p. 244.]

That this mighty Sum did not prove equal to the growing Exigencies of the Government (which will appear in its proper Place) affords ſufficient Cauſe of Wonder and Aſtoniſhment,

(x) While the Bill for theſe Uſes was before the Lords, it was mov'd, that ſeveral Members of the Houſe, and divers Servants of King Charles II. had Securities appropriated out of ſeveral Duties which paſs'd away from them by this Bill; and therefore they deſir'd they might be heard by their Council. This Motion being receiv'd, and Council heard, their Lordſhip gave their Conſent to the Bill without any Amendment; but at the ſame time they order'd their Speaker to preſent the following Addreſs to his Majeſty:

"The Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament aſſembled, upon their Concurrence with the Houſe of Commons, in a Bill entitled, An Act for appropriating certain Duties for paying the States General, &c. and for other Uſes, think it incumbent on them, in Honour and Juſtice, to lay before your Majeſty, how ſeveral of their own Body found themſelves aggriev'd thereby, in relation to ſome Debts owing to them on the Account of having been Servants to King Charles II. and that their Claims to their Arrears on that Score was weaken'd and prejudic'd by this Bill, which cuts them off from all Pretences whatſoever, except ſuch as can be comprehended within the Sum of ſixty thouſand Pounds, which is very far ſhort of anſwering their juſt Demands, and which they conceive to have been better and more amply provided for in an Act paſs'd in the firſt Year of the Reign of the late King James, entitled, An Act for granting to his Majeſty an Impoſition on all Tobacco and Sugar imported between the 24th Day of June, 1685, and the 24th of June, 1693. Yet being more concern'd for the Welfare of your Majeſty's Affairs than their own particular Benefit, and being ſenſible of the Importance it may be to your Majeſty, as well as the good of Chriſtendom in this Juncture, that the Debt owing to the States General of the United Provinces, upon account of aſſiſting your Majeſty at your coming into this Nation, for our Deliverance from Popery and Arbitrary Power, ſhould be provided for, to their Satisfaction; they have willingly deſiſted from giving an Obſtruction to the paſſing of the ſaid Bill, and have entirely ſubmitted their Share of their Recompence for their long and faithful Service to their deceas'd Royal Maſter, to the Conveniency of your Majeſty's preſent Circumſtances.

Whereupon this Houſe hath thought fit to repreſent to your Majeſty this moſt reſpectful and dutiful Acquieſcence of the Peers herein concern'd in your Majeſty's Juſtice and Goodneſs, and to beſeech your Majeſty, that you would be pleas'd to take their Condition, and the manner of their preſent Reſignation of it into your gracious Conſideration and Royal Protection, wherein this Houſe doth promiſe themſelves, that the particular Peers concern'd will find an entire Security.

And whereas there is a Clauſe in this Bill which provides that 60,000*l.* therein mention'd for the late King Charles's Servants, ſhould be apply'd to ſuch only as were his Servants at the time of his Deceaſe; it is the humble Deſire and Recommendation of this Houſe to your Majeſty, that this Reſtraint may bring no Prejudice to the juſt and equitable Pretenſions of ſuch of the Servants of his ſaid late Majeſty, as are Members of this Houſe, or of others in their Circumſtances; but that your Majeſty will be graciouſly pleas'd to look upon them, as entitled to an equal Share of your Favour and Conſideration, which others their fellow Servants have generally had, or may pretend to by virtue of this or the former Act of Parliament before-mention'd.

The Marquis of Halifax, Speaker of the Lords, having waited on the King with the Addreſs, his Majeſty, we are told, receiv'd the ſame very kindly; and as for thoſe particular Peers that were concern'd in the Bill, he ſaid 'He was ſenſible of their Behaviour towards him, upon this Occaſion, and would not forget it.'".

A. D. 1689. niſhment, as alſo, that thoſe who were ſo cautious in parting with the Public Money, did not begin with rectifying the public Oeconomy; in Conſequence of which, the Government would have been better ſerv'd, at a far leſs Expence to the People; Ways and Means would have been no Myſtery; Frauds would have found no Shelter; and every Man who contributed to the National Stock would have been ſatisfy'd, that his Money was fairly laid out, and that no more was demanded than was abſolutely neceſſary.—— But the ſame Meaſures that contribute to render the Subject eaſy and happy, contribute alſo to render a Prince independent of his Miniſters; and Miniſters find themſelves of moſt Importance to a Prince, when He is moſt encumber'd. Thoſe, therefore, who were deepeſt in the Intrigues of thoſe Times, choſe to leave the Door open to every kind of Extravagance, that Neceſſity might enter together with it; in which Caſe they hop'd to have their own Merits and Services rated at their own Price. It is now notorious, that the whole national Expence might have been provided for within the Year, and conſequently, that all the Miſchiefs and Misfortunes which have ariſen from the contrary Practice might have been prevented. There was ſcarce a Whig in the Convention-Parliament, who had not loudly clamour'd in the two preceding Reigns againſt the Influence of the Crown; more eſpecially in Elections, and the converting the Repreſentatives of the People into the Creatures of the Court. It was, therefore, particularly incumbent on thoſe Whigs to make an early and eſſential Proviſion againſt the Return of this threatning Evil; an Evil that was ſo much the more to be apprehended, becauſe of the Precautions which they had taken againſt the Prerogative: For, as while the Prerogative was yet in its full Force, Miniſters had been forc'd to have Recourſe to it, to facilitate their Jobbs; ſo now they had ſcarce any other Way left open; and conſequently it was to be preſum'd, that they would apply their whole Skill and Strength to render that way as broad and eaſy as poſſible.

Now this Proviſion could no otherwiſe have been made, than by lopping off the rotten Part of the Conſtitution; or, in other Words, by cauſing the Property of the Commonwealth to be fairly and equally repreſented in Parliament, by depriving worthleſs, inſignificant, venal Boroughs of the Privileges they had a thouſands ways forfeited, by a thouſand different Abuſes; and transferring them to thoſe Places which had ſucceeded to the Worth and Opulency that the others had loſt; and which Places were either not ſufficiently repreſented, or not repreſented at all: And, ſecondly, by forming ſuch a new Conſtitution of the Revenue, as ſhould in all its Parts have been anſwerable to the great Change it had undergone.

While the Crown ſubſiſted on its own Inheritance, and upon extraordinary Occaſions only, when that Inheritance was exhauſted, or found unequal to the Public Service, receiv'd Aids from the People, it was but A. D. 1689. reaſonable, that the Servants of the Crown ſhould be entruſted with the Management of its Income: But now when the Crown was to receive its Appointments from the People, and when thoſe Appointments were to become as ſacred as the ancient Prerogative, and were never to be adventur'd or expos'd either in the Public Service, or even that of the Cabinet, it was to the full as reaſonable, that the People, who bore the whole Burden, ſhould have the levying and diſpoſing their own Money, the appointing their own Servants, and acting as their own Stewards.—— It might have been foreſeen, that if the Nation continued to be rather nominally than really repreſented, and a gradual Increaſe of the Revenue was a neceſſary Conſequence of the new Syſtem, as ſurely as Power follow'd Property, the Power of the Crown would increaſe with the Revenue it had the Diſtribution of; and that the Manager would, in the End, be the Maſter.

But if theſe things were foreſeen, they were overlook'd; Elections were not only ſuffer'd to remain in their former State, but, in exchange for the Limitations and Reſtraints in the Bill of Rights, a handſome, ſeparate Proviſion was made for the Civil Liſt; and the King, as Steward-General for his People, was left in a Condition to ſerve his own Purpoſes, in a leſs alarming, but a more effectual manner, than ever.

Upon this whole Matter, it ought not to be forgot, that when the Poll-Bill, and another for preventing Doubts and Queſtions in collecting the Revenue, were preſented for the Royal Aſſent, Mr. Powle the Speaker clos'd his Speech on that Occaſion with the two following Paragraphs:

Speaker's Speech on preſenting the Poll-Bill.

"The Commons therefore ſeeing ſo evident a Neceſſity of reducing that Kingdom [Ireland] under your Majeſty's Obedience, and the great Expence your Majeſty muſt undergo in maintaining ſuch a War, do now humbly preſent to your Majeſty their hearty Aſſiſtance in a Poll-Bill, which they look upon as the moſt ſpeedy and effectual way of raiſing ready Money on this Occaſion, ſolemnly engaging themſelves to ſupply your Majeſty with ſuch further Aids as may be proportionable to the Charge of the War, as long as it ſhall continue.

Next to this, they have conſider'd of your Majeſty's Revenue, and the Charges that are upon it, as alſo the Complaints againſt ſeveral Exactions which have been practis'd in the late Collection: But theſe Matters requiring a longer time to examine than they expected, they paſs'd a ſhort Bill for the Continuance of it, in the ſame State it now ſtands, till Chriſtmas next, within which time they doubt not to prepare ſuch an Eſtabliſhment, as may fully ſupply the Expences of the Crown without oppreſſing the People."

As to the other Occurrences of this Seſſion, thoſe who were ſo averſe to the general Indemnity, which his Majeſty, in Perſon, condeſcended to ſolicit, had, nevertheleſs, the Precaution to provide for their own Security, by

A.D. 1689. by a Clauſe in the (a) Bill to render the Militia more uſeful, for indemnifying and ſaving harmleſs all ſuch as had taken Arms in Behalf of his Majeſty while Prince of Orange. The ſame Party alſo took care of the Perſons and Families of ſuch as had particularly ſuffer'd in their Cauſe. Of this, more than one Inſtance has already occurr'd; and under the ſame Head it is farther to be added, That by the Vote of the Houſe of Commons, the Sentence paſs'd upon Mr. Samuel Johnſon, was declar'd illegal and cruel: That by the Order of the ſame Houſe, a Bill was brought in to reverſe the ſaid Judgment; and that they made an Application to his Majeſty to beſtow ſome Eccleſiaſtical Preferments upon him, ſuitable to his Services and Sufferings: That the ſame Houſe admitted a Bill for the charging Lord Jeffreys's (b) Eſtates with the Repayment of 15,000 l. with Intereſt, which he had extorted from Mr. Prideaux: That they referr'd the Complaints of Speke, Wilmore, and others, to the Conſideration of a Committee: That they recommended even the Widow of Fitzharris to the King's Charity; and that they join'd with the Lords in reverſing the Attainders of Mr. A. Sydney, Lady Liſle, and Alderman Corniſh, and in cancelling all Proceedings and Records relating thereto.

Certain Attainders reverſ'd.

The Lords, moreover, referr'd the Caſe of the Earl of Devonſhire (who had been fin'd, as it may be remember'd, 30,000*l.* for ſtriking Colonel Colpeper in Whitehall, and who had been committed in Execution in Default of Payment) to the Conſideration of a Committee of Privileges, who reported it to the Houſe, as their Opinion, "That the Proceedings againſt the ſaid Earl in the Court of King's-Bench in Eaſter-Term, in the third Year of King James II. upon an Information of an Aſſault upon Mr. Colpeper, wherein his Lordſhip's Plea of Privilege of Parliament was over-rul'd, and he was fin'd 30,000 l. and thereupon committed to the King's-Bench in Execution, was a great Violation of the Privileges of the Peers of England: And likewiſe, that thoſe Judges, who ſat in the ſaid Court, when the ſaid Judgments were given, and the ſaid Commitment made, ſhould be requir'd to attend at the Bar of this Houſe, to anſwer for the great Offence which they committed thereby." An Order was then made for the ſaid Judges to attend the Houſe; and when they did attend accordingly, they ſeverally (c) confeſs'd their Faults, took Shame to themſelves, and begg'd Pardon both of the Houſe and the Earl. Upon the Reſult of all, the King's Council were call'd upon, for Form's ſake, to ſhew, if they could, that a Peer might be committed in Execution for a Fine: And they giving up the Point, it was finally declar'd, and adjudg'd, That the Court of King's-Bench in over-ruling the Earl of Devonſhire's Plea of Privilege of Parliament, and forcing him to plead over in Chief, it being within the uſual time of Privilege, did thereby commit a manifeſt Breach of Privilege; and that the Fine of 30,000 l. impos'd by the Court of King's-Bench upon the ſaid Earl, was exceſſive and exorbitant, and againſt Magna Charta, the common Right of the Subject, and the Law of the Land; and that no Peer of this Realm, at any time, ought to be committed for Non-payment of a Fine to the King. A.D. 1689.

Lord Devonſhire's Fine voted illegal.

Their Lordſhips alſo, in the Beginning of the Seſſion, appointed a ſpecial Committee, to make an Enquiry into the Death of the Earl Enquiry into the Earl of Eſſex's Death.

(a) "This Bill, ſays Biſhop Burnet, upon the Matter, and in conſequences of many Clauſes in it, took it (the Militia) in a great meaſure, both from the Crown, and out of the Hands of the Lords Lieutenants, who being generally Peers, a Bill that leſſen'd their Authority ſo much was not like to paſs in the Houſe of Lords. So it was let lie on the Table. By this, likewiſe, which was chiefly promoted by the Whigs, the King came to think, that thoſe who had rais'd him to the Throne intended to depreſs his Prerogative, as much as they had exalted his Perſon. He ſeem'd to grow tender and jealous upon theſe Points, the Importance of every one of them being aggravated by the Earl of Nottingham, who had furniſh'd him with a Scheme of all the Points of the Prerogative, and of their Dependence one upon another: And he ſeem'd ſo poſſeſs'd with this, that many of thoſe who had formerly moſt of his Confidence, found a Coldneſs growing upon him, which increas'd their Diſguſt, and made them apprehend that they ſhould again ſee a Reign full of Prerogative Maxims." [Vol. ii. p. 14.

(b) He himſelf had taken his Leave of the World, on the 18th of April before, in the Tower; having, as it is ſaid, haſten'd his End, by the intemperate Uſe of ſpirituous Liquors. Mr. Tindal adds concerning him, on the Credit of Sir Joſeph Jekyll, late Maſter of the Rolls, who had it from the Mouth of Dr. Scott himſelf, "That while he (Jeffreys) continued a Priſoner, he was viſited by Dr. John Scott, the celebrated Author of the Chriſtian Life; and being urg'd by him to improve his preſent Situation by a ſerious Review of his paſt Life, he expreſs'd great Concern upon the Occaſion; but with regard to one Part of his Conduct, which had expos'd him to moſt Cenſure, his Behaviour in the Weſt after the Defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, he declar'd, that, how cruel ſoever his Proceedings might be thought, they had by no means come up to the Severity which King James expected from him, his Majeſty being extremely diſpleas'd with him on that account."

(c) Mr. Juſtice Powel ſaid, That it was his great Misfortune that he was miſguided by ſome Books, which he look'd on as Authorities, and which he found, by their Lordſhips Judgments were not ſo; and he humbly begg'd their Lordſhips and the Earl of Devonſhire's Pardon. That, as to the Fine, he thought it exorbitant, and look'd upon 3000 l. as Fine enough; and that his Silence in that Buſineſs was his greateſt Fault; for which he alſo begg'd Pardon. Sir Robert Wright alledg'd, That, as to the Breach of Privilege, they were miſguided by Precedents; as to the Fine, (which is uſually ſet according to the Quality and Eſtate of the Perſon fin'd) it came from the puiſne Judge 30,000 l. and ſo to him laſt, according to the Courſe of the Court; and, if he was miſtaken, he begg'd Pardon, for he never had the leaſt Diſreſpect to the Earl of Devonſhire. Then Sir Richard Holloway ſaid, That he, as a ſecond Judge, pronounc'd the Fine 30,000 l. which was ſet nemine contradiente; that if a leſſer Fine had been propos'd, he ſhould have accepted it; and begg'd my Lord Devonſhire's Pardon, and ſubmitted all to their Lordſhips. After that, the Lords aſking them, whether they had no Diſcourſe together before, concerning the ſaid Fine, Sir Robert Wright affirm'd, it was never mention'd but in Court; and Sir Richard Holloway alſo declar'd, he had no Direction in it, either from King James or Chancellor Jeffreys; whereupon Mr. Juſtice Powel reply'd, Sir Richard Holloway might remember there was a Diſcourſe of the Fine, five or ſix Days before, at the Lord Chancellor's, where Sir Robert Wright, Sir Richard Holloway, Sir Richard Allibone, and himſelf were. Then, Sir Richard Holloway pretended he did not remember; and Sir Robert Wright deny'd that they were there purpoſely about the ſaid Fine. "Theſe two being withdrawn, Mr. Juſtice Powel was aſk'd, what Diſcourſe they had at the Lord Chancellor's? To which he anſwer'd, That the Chancellor firſt propos'd 20,000 l. and afterwards laſt, it would be better if 30,000 l. and then the King might abate 10,000 l. And that to this he declar'd his Diſlike to the other Judges, tho' not before the Lord Chancellor. Wright ſoon after dy'd in Newgate.

A. D. 1689. Earl of Essex: But tho' many Persons were examin'd, and one (Captain Holland) was committed to Newgate, under a Suspicion of being concern'd in his Murder, only some small Circumstances, says Sir John Reresby, appear'd, which, it seems, were not sufficiently material and certain, either to ground a Prosecution upon, or even to authorise such a Report, as might serve to justify Braddon's Books or the Use which had been made of them. The said Braddon, nevertheless, not only persisted in his former Charge, but long after, in a printed Apology for his own Conduct in that Affair, against the Censures pass'd on him by Dr. Burnet, more than insinuated, that the Enquiry was (d) stifled by such a Confederacy of Interests, as would have been too mighty for any Proofs or Evidences, how irrefragable or notorious soever. A. D. 1689.

Of the poor Duke of Monmouth (who had so fatally miscarry'd in the very same Part which the Prince of Orange had since acted with so much Applause and Success) no body, however, but Lord Warrington, seem'd to bestow a Thought; and He had not only the Courage to contend in private for reversing his Attainder, but also to set forth his Opinion in (e) Print, and to call upon the Nation No Countenance shewn to the Memory of the Duke of Monmouth.

(d) "I believe, says he, that no Prosecution of any Murder, in the British Annals recorded, ever met with such Opposition, as the Prosecution of this Murder did. And, first, from all the Jacobite Interest, as well Protestant as Papist. And how great that Interest, ever since the Revolution, hath been, the many treasonable Conspiracies and open Rebellions have sufficiently prov'd. Secondly, King James II. being Father to the late Queen Mary and Queen Anne, it is natural to suppose, that neither of those two Queens would have had their Father stigmatiz'd with that most infamous Character of being a Murderer, and in more Instances than one. And whether King William, out of respect to his Queen, might any ways hinder the fixing such an Infamy upon his Queen's Father, I cannot tell. But this I sensibly felt to be true, viz. That Queen Anne, upon her first coming to the Crown, struck me out of the Civil List, because, as her Majesty then said, I had thrown Blood in her Father's Face. Thirdly, the Countess Dowager of Essex, by the Influence of Bishop Burnet, did desire the Lords Committees, in 1689, not to proceed any farther in that Enquiry: for the Countess, by the Bishop, did then endeavour to perswade the Lords Committees, and several other Lords, that my Lord of Essex murder'd himself. Fourthly, there was a certain great Man charged, as ordering this Murder, who had been the main Instrument, in the Hand of Providence, of bringing about the Revolution: and by this very Gentleman's Counsels King William was, for some Years, very much influenc'd. What Interest therefore that great Man had with King William, or with any other Persons whatsoever, was apply'd to hinder the Prosecution of this Murder. And, lastly, the late Bishop Burnet himself was not only the principal Cause of hindering the Counsels from engaging in this Prosecution; but that Prelate did otherwise endeavour to blast the Credit of this Enquiry, by sometimes representing me (as in his last History) as an enthusiastical Man; and therefore no Regard was to be had to what I said or did in relation to that Enquiry. At other times, that Bishop did represent me as a Man of a very strong Imagination, (a soft Character for a Madman) from whence I was easily inclin'd to take up a Belief of things, upon such Evidence as was not sufficient to prove the things to be; but I was so possess'd of imaginary Beings, there was no convincing me, by any Arguments, of their Non-existence."

He also adds the following strange Story, as well to countenance the Tract therein mentioned, as the Fact it professedly treats of:

"Some short time before the Death of that King, (King Charles II.) there was a Pamphlet written and printed in Holland, intituled, An Enquiry into a Detection of the barbarous Murder of the late Earl of Essex; and many hundreds of these were brought to England. In this Pamphlet these were many Arguments given to prove the Murder; and the Author humbly besought his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleas'd to give his Royal Assurance of a Pardon to him who should prove that Murder; and that then the Duke of York should be prov'd to have been the principal Author and Rewarder thereof. Several hundreds of those Books were, one Night, about twenty Days before King Charles II's Death, dispersed by some Gentlemen, and for the most part laid at the Doors of Privy-Counsellors, and of other Noblemen, and Justices of the Peace. One of these Books was convey'd to the King, who read the same, and then sent for the Lord Allington, then Constable of the Tower, and charg'd his Lordship to read and consider the same, and in a short time to return the Book, and to give his Majesty his Opinion of it, and also what his Lordship thought as to the Manner of the Earl of Essex's Death. Lord Allington sent this Book to Sir Thomas Rowe, but charg'd him to return it the next Day, because his Lordship intended then to return it to his Majesty. Sir Thomas read and return'd the Book accordingly, and shortly after waited again upon Lord Allington, who then inform'd Sir Thomas, that he had been again with the King, and return'd the Book; and that his Majesty ask'd his Lordship, whether he had read and considered it? which his Lordship having assur'd his Majesty he had done, the King commanded him to give his Judgment as to the Earl of Essex's Death: But his Lordship desiring his Majesty to excuse him from giving any Judgment in that Point, the King said to him, 'I command you to deal very 'plainly and sincerely with me in relation thereunto.' 'Sir, 'reply'd Lord Allington, if your Majesty commands me to 'deal therein sincerely with your Majesty, I must then say, 'that I am of Opinion that unfortunate Lord had very foul 'Play.' 'Then, if I live, said the King, I will make a 'very strict Enquiry into that Matter; and I command you 'to come to me To-morrow.' As soon as Lord Allington withdrew the Duke of York came in, while the King had the Book in his Hand; and, as the King next Day inform'd his Lordship, the Duke ask'd his Majesty, who had brought him that villainous, lying Pamphlet? But the King then said, that he did not believe it to be a lying Pamphlet, and he was resolv'd to make a strict Enquiry into the Earl of Essex's Death; and that his Highness should go abroad before that Inquisition was made. The Duke reply'd, that he had already travelled too much.

The Substance of what is above-mention'd, says Mr. Braddon, relating to what pass'd between King Charles II. and Lord Allington, I had from Sir Thomas Rowe, soon after the Revolution. And some few Days after that Discourse between the King and the Duke, the King and the Lord Allington were seiz'd with such Illness as was generally thought to be the Effects of Poison; and the Lord Allington died about three Days before the King, and his Majesty died the 6th Day of February 1684-5. And so, by that King's being forc'd to travel too soon into the other World, King James delay'd his own Travels in this, until the just Desertion of his own Troops forc'd him to become a Fugitive and a Pensioner to that great Monarch, whose arbitrary Government he liked much better, than to be circumscrib'd by those good Laws, which hinder'd him from ruining both our Church and State." [Braddon, p. 186, &c.

(e) The most material Part of which is as follows:

"It is granted, that from any thing in the Act of Attainder it cannot be objected, That the two Houses had not before them sufficient and legal Evidence of the Duke's being then in open Hostility, it being needless to express it, because they are supposed not to proceed without it: But it is notorious, that all the Evidence they were then possess'd of was, a Letter sent to King James in the Name of the Mayor of Lyme, and a printed Declaration under the Name of the Duke of Monmouth.

As to the Letter of the Mayor of Lyme: First, there was no Proof who wrote it. Secondly, the Letter declar'd him that wrote it to be in great Disorder at the Instant of writing it. Thirdly, it gave an account of not above sixty Persons that were come on shore with the Duke. And fourthly, that upon their Approach he fled out of Town, and believ'd that by that time, his House and most of the Town was pillag'd and ransack'd.

These are such Uncertainties as would render it insufficient to be Evidence in a much less Case; for it being not prov'd who wrote it, it might, in construction of Law, be rather look'd upon as his that deliver'd it, than to be sent by Mr. Mayor: But had it been prov'd to be his, yet the Disorder he own'd he was in renders the Purport of his Letter of very little Credit; or if he had been more compos'd, the coming of sixty Persons only into the Town was no great Indication of their Hostility, having not offer'd Violence to any body; or if they had been a far greater Number, yet for aught he knew they were retir'd to their Ships, and gone away; because he ran out of Town upon their Approach. Besides this there was nothing express'd in the Letter, wherefore he did believe that such Disorders were then committed in the Town, for he neither saw nor heard of any Man that had receiv'd the least Injury while he staid, nor had the Duke then declar'd for what Intent he came. The People of the Place might perhaps flock to see the Duke, yet that could be no Evidence of an intended Outrage, it being so new thing in England for the People to croud together when an eminent Person is to be try'd, and especially on account of the Duke. Besides, as his Disposition did make him averse to commit any Inhumanity, such as was suggested by the Letter; so, in point of Prudence, it highly behov'd him to treat the Place as obligingly as was possible; for it had been the falliest Step imaginable to have done the least Violence to any body: So that this Part of the Letter destroys the Credit which the rest of it might otherwise have obtain'd; and, take it all together, is so weak and frivolous, that a Letter found in the Streets would amount to as good Evidence in any Case as this could; for, at best hand, it could not be of greater Weight than to corroborate a legal Evidence. To allow a Paper Standing alone to be good Evidence cannot be safe; and must be very dangerous, if such as this may pass; because that Evidence will not be wanting, when a Turn is to be serv'd.

As to the printed Declaration; it pass'd indeed under the Duke's Name, but there was no Proof that he drew it, approv'd it, order'd it to be printed or dispers'd, or that he ever saw it, or was privy to it. It was read in the House of Lords by the King's Command, or else it had been a Secret to them, as well as to the World, that there was such a thing; for as that was the first time that it was heard of, so not any more of those Prints came publicly abroad, and not one Man of a Million either saw or heard the Contents of that Print; and, for that Reason, 'tis not altogether improbable, but that that Declaration was a Contrivance of the Court, and fhamm'd upon the Duke of Monmouth. But to let that pass, That which makes a Man guilty of Treason, or any other Crime, is his Privity or Consent to it; and that not being prov'd, it could no more render the Duke criminal of that Declaration, than it could him that casually heard it read: For if the printing of a treasonable Paper in a Man's Name will make him answerable for it, then no Man can be safe longer than he is out of the Thoughts of his Enemies, or they are not arriv'd to that Pitch of Villany as knowingly to destroy an innocent Man.

Take then these things together, and see how precariously every Man holds his Life and Honour, if such things as they (I mean the Mayor's Letter, and printed Declaration) may pass for Evidence; for what can then be more easy, than to flam any Man out of his Life, and all that is dear to him.

But had the Evidence been as full and clear as it could or ought to be in such Cases, yet it is of the Essence of the Justice of England, that the Party accus'd should be heard, or have sufficient Time allign'd him, for as that it must be his own Fault if he do not appear and make his Defence. This is the Law not only of this, but in all Constitutions where the Government is not despotic or arbitrary. For there cannot be a greater Badge of Slavery, than that Men may be condemn'd without being heard to their Accusation: In the time of Henry VIII. Cromwell Earl of Essex, being then a great Man, and out of Design to destroy some, whom he knew not well how to ruin otherways, contriv'd and promoted a Law for a summary Way of Trial, so as that a Man might be judg'd without being heard: but, as it fell out, he perish'd by the Snare that he had laid for others; for he was condemn'd without being heard to his Charge; and he was the only Man that was touch'd by that Law, for his Case made it so odious, that, immediately upon it, it was repeal'd, as being unjust, and inconsistent with the Justice of this Government.

God, the righteous Judge of all the Earth, tho' he knows what we can say in our Defence, will hear us before he condemns us; for otherwise his Sentence would not appear to be just. The Law, in case of Blood, proceeds by slow Steps; because Blood, when spilt, cannot be gather'd up again: For it is a Maxim in our Law, that no Delay is too great, when Life is concern'd. The Law desires that every Man should prove innocent, and does suppose he is so, till he is found to be otherwise by his Peers: And for that Reason it is, that a Judge may not give the Prisoner at the Bar reproachful Language, till the Jury has found him guilty; and then too he is not to be condemn'd, till he has mov'd in arrest of Judgment, and been heard what he can further say for himself.

To hear a Cause ex parte is, in effect, to know nothing of the Truth, so as to be able to make a Judgment where the Right is. Many innocent Persons will unavoidably suffer, whenever it comes to be Law that Men may be try'd and condemn'd without being heard: This sort of Justice will set the Innocent and Guilty on the same Foot; and, to throw Cross and Pile, whether the Prisoner shall be acquitted or condemn'd, is as just as to try a Man without hearing his Defence.

Now 'tis undeniable, that there was no Time given by the Bill for the Duke to appear; which must, at best hand, be allow'd to be a great Omission: For, in all other Acts of Attainder, if the Person was alive, a convenient Time was allow'd him to come and be heard: and, till that time was expir'd, the Act was not in force against him, nor could the Penalty therein exprest'd affect him in the least.

But, besides these things, there fell out something further in this Bill of Attainder, that is very unusual and extraordinary; for it was begun and pass'd both Houses in one and the same Day; which was never heard of before in any Case, tho' the Occasion were never so pressing: The Method of passing all Bills being quite otherwise. For when a Bill is brought into either House of Parliament, or sent from one House to the other, it is not often that they give it a Reading the same Day; or if they do, 'tis seldom that a Bill is read above once in one Day; and when it has been read a second time, if it be not rejected it is committed; and then, for the most part, the Committee does proceed upon it some other Day, and not upon that: So that, regularly, no Bill can pass either House in less than three Days. And this gradual Way of proceeding upon Bills demonstrates the great Wisdom and Justice of the two Houses, and vindicates them against Precipitancy and Partiality. This has been the ancient and approved Method, beyond the Memory of Man or Records; and it has ever been found unsafe, if not fatal, to go out of the Path of our Forefathers.

And thus stands the Case as to the passing of the Bill of Attainder against the Duke of Monmouth; which must be acknowledg'd to be a summary Way of proceeding upon Presumption, without legal Evidence, or hearing the Party, or observing the usual Method of passing Bills in Parliament.

But it is objected and said in the defence of this, That the Legislature of England is confin'd to no Rules and Directions, but that of their Discretion; and that, upon sudden Emergencies, when it will be to the public Detriment to stay for the ordinary and usual Forms of Law, they may justify the dispensing with them; and, for that Reason, all that was done in the Duke of Monmouth's Case is very well warranted, because there was then flagrante Bello.

It is true that the Parliament has such a discretionary Power; and 'tis reasonable it should be so: But yet this does not prove, that a more deliberate Proceeding might not have been had upon that Bill: However, it will scarcely afford an Argument wherefore the Attainder should not now be revers'd, but rather that it ought to be; because, when the Mischief is prevented that induc'd the Parliament to such an extraordinary Course, it was the constant Practice of our Forefathers to put it out of sight as soon as could be. And nothing could be more prudent; for, so long as it remain'd a Precedent, it might be the Occasion of a greater Evil than it had prevented; and, so long as this Attainder stands in force, it will be look'd upon as an Exposition of the Law, declaring that it may be legal and just to condemn without Evidence, or hearing the Parties Defence, and thereby put our Lives and Families into a more precarious Condition, when in the Discretion of the two Houses of Parliament, than when they are to be judg'd in the inferior Courts of Justice; and so chalk out a Method, for unfortunate Times, to take off any Man that stands in the way; for tho' what was done in this Case may be said to be Just, yet it was sometimes Just; and if it was just, yet it was not done justly.

But, over and above all this, there happen'd a thing in pursuance of this Bill, which tho', in Strictness of Law, it cannot be allign'd as sufficient Error; yet, in Reason, may be an Inducement to the Parliament to reverse this Attainder.

The Life of every Man is under the Protection of the Law, even Persons condemned, outlawed, or attainted; to kill or execute them, in any other Manner than the Law directs, is criminal: In case of Outlawry for Treason or Felony in the King's Bench, if the Party be apprehended in time of a Vacation, no Warrant can go out to execute him before the next Term, but he is till then to remain in Prison, that so he may not only be heard what he can say for himself, wherefore Execution should not be awarded, but that also the Law may be satisfy'd that he is the very Person nam'd in the Outlawry; and even a Prisoner, condemn'd at the Bar, cannot be executed till there is a Rule of Court, or other Order, for it: Now it is conceiv'd, that the Duke of Monmouth ought not to have been executed till he had been brought before the King's Bench, or some other Court that could properly judge and distinguish whether he were the very Person attainted by that Act; for had he been brought to the Bar, and there deny'd that he was the same Person, a Jury must thereupon have been impannel'd, to try whether he were the proper Person, or not: For the Law delights in Certainty, and will not go out of its grave and considerate a Way, especially in so solemn a Case as Blood, where it cannot be too cautious: One Man may be so like another, that it is not easy to distinguish them when asunder; and a Mistake in such a kind would be a great Blot upon the Justice of any Government, when it is occasion'd by Precipitancy and Haste: but we have lately seen such unfortunate Times, when there was a willing Disposition to commit such Mistakes, if any Colour of Law could have been found for it.

But

A.D. 1689. were indeed without Effect; thoſe who had ſeduc'd the unfortunate Duke to his Ruin, and whoſe Martyr he was, were afraid to countenance his very Memory: And, even that none of his Lineage might ſucceed to his Popularity, together with his Title, Lord Mordaunt was made Earl of Monmouth, as we have already ſeen in the Liſt of Promotions, which accompany'd the Coronation.

Certain other Occurrences of this long and intricate Seſſion, ſtill remain to be treated of, or rather to be mention'd only; for ſo very myſterious was the State of Parties at this time, ſo many various ways did they thwart and interfere one with another, and ſo imperfect are the Footſteps which remain of the Mazes they ſeverally trod, that it is ſcarce poſſible to trace them, much leſs to account for the ſeveral Purpoſes they were to anſwer.

One Revenue-Bill (That by way of Supplement to the Poll-Tax) we have already ſeen defeated, by a Broil between the two Houſes: And there was yet another, which, for this Seſſion at leaſt, met with the ſame Fate, by the ſame Means. This was a Bill for charging and collecting the Duties upon Coffee, Tea, and Chocolate at the Cuſtom-houſe, which were then collected by the Exciſe, and which being ſent up from the Commons to the Lords, their Lordſhips added a Clauſe to it, for a Drawback on the Exportation of the ſaid Commodities, with an Alteration of the Date from the 24th of July to the 25th of Auguſt; which being diſagreed to by the Commons, it occaſion'd another warm Diſpute between the two Houſes. The Commons alledg'd, That they had always taken it for their undoubted Privilege (of which they had ever been jealous and tender) that in all Aids given to the King by the Commons, the Rate or Tax ought not to be any ways alter'd by the Lords: That the Amendment made by the Lords being in Point of Time, the Commons hop'd their Lordſhips would not, at this time, renew a Queſtion concerning the Method of granting Aids, which had formerly, in Inſtances of this Nature, occaſion'd great Debates, and which might now beget many Conferences, ſpend much Time, and end in Inconveniencies: That this Amendment propos'd by the Lords, made the Bill incoherent; for both Houſes having agreed that the Forfeitures ſhould commence from the 20th of July, it would look ſtrange that the Forfeitures ſhould be given before the Duty was made payable: That Ships were then arriving daily with the Commodities mention'd in the Bill, which would be a Loſs to the King, by putting the Commencement of the Duty ſo far off: And that as to the Proviſo their Lordſhips had ſent to the Commons, the Commons did diſagree to it, and for that did refer to their firſt Reaſons; for the Proviſo being an Alteration and leſſening of the Grant made by the Commons, they hop'd, for theſe Reaſons, their Lordſhips would agree with them, and not revive old Diſputes. A.D. 1689.

Conteſt between the two Houſes on the Bill for collecting the Duties on Tea, &c. at the Cuſtomhouſe.

On the other hand, the Lords inſiſted upon their Proviſo, and ſaid, they were much ſurpriz'd at the Aſſertion of the Commons; that in all Aids given to the King by the Commons, the Rate or Tax ought not to be alter'd by the Lords, ſince they conceiv'd it had always been their undoubted Right, in caſe of any Aids given to the King, to leſſen the Rate or Tax granted by the Commons, whereof ſeveral Precedents might be given, which, for the preſent, they were willing to forbear, that they might not revive old Diſputes. But that as to the Proviſo now offer'd by the Lords, their Lordſhips were of Opinion, this general Point was not the Caſe now in Difference, it being neither an Alteration nor leſſening of the Duty laid upon thoſe Commodities; for what was propos'd to be drawn back upon the Exportation of them, could not be ſaid to leſſen the Rates impos'd upon them: That it did indeed take away ſo much from the King's Income, but added much more to the Benefit of Trade, of which the Lords conceiv'd they were equal and competent Judges, and therefore they thought they were very well warranted to inſiſt on their Amendment."

To which the Duke of Bolton added, "That he hop'd a good Correſpondence would be maintain'd between the two Houſes, for that they were Engliſhmen as well as the Commons,"---- And here the Bill ſtuck; for the Commons, as it was foreſeen, would not abate a Scruple; and would have ſignify'd as much at a free Conference; if the Adjournment had not interpos'd.

Tumultuous Petition of the Silk Weavers.

And now, in the very laſt Stage of the Seſſion, when the two Houſes grew every Day more and more out of Humour with each

---

But ſetting all theſe things aſide, and were there not ſo many extraordinary things in the Caſe, yet ſomething ought to be done for the ſake of the Duke's Children; ſurely a great deal of Compaſſion is due to them, conſidering upon what ſcore their Father loſt his Head; by reaſon that the Cauſe of his Riſing in Arms was no other than that which prevail'd with the Prince of Orange to make a Deſcent into England, that is, to deliver us from Popery and Slavery; there being nothing that differences thoſe two Caſes, but that the one had Succeſs, and the other miſcarry'd: And, therefore, can it be politic to leave that Attainder unrevers'd, as a Reproach upon the Duke and his Poſterity for what he did?

Beſides, if this Attainder be not revers'd, it will be an utter Diſcouragement upon all others for the future, to attempt the Reſcue of their Country, if no Regard ſhall be had to their Poſterity, in caſe they don't ſucceed: I am verily perſuaded, that if the Prince of Orange had miſcarry'd, in his late Attempt to deliver us, every Man that had ſuffer'd in that Cauſe would have expected, whenever it was in the Power of the Nation, to have had a Mark of Favour ſet upon their Poſterity, at leaſt that of right their Families were to be put in ſtatu quo. There will be very ſmall Inducement for any to be concern'd for the Public, when nothing but Succeſs will make the Public take care of them: When the Virtue of a People is ſo far depray'd as to forget thoſe that have ſerv'd them, they do not after that long retain a true Senſe of Liberty, and are eaſily perſuaded to part with their Freedom: And ſo long as this Attainder remains in force, it hangs over the Nation like a dreadful Omen; for, ſo long as it is in force, we conſent to the Juſtice of it; and how can that be juſt, which we would not have done to ourſelves; for certainly no Man would like to be judg'd by ſuch Law as took off the Duke of Monmouth: And, therefore, what can be ſaid that this Attainder ſhould not be revers'd? [Lord Delamer's Works, p. 73, &c.

A. D. 1689. each other, and the Court were in Deſpair of any farther Benefit from either, a new Bill was ſent up by the Commons to the Lords, which preſcrib'd the wearing of the Woollen Manufactures of this Kingdom at certain times of the Year, and which had like to have ſet the whole Town in an Uproar: For the Silk Weavers and their Dependents, Allies, and Confederates of all ſorts, immediately taking the Alarm, not only prepar'd a Petition, praying to be heard before the ſaid Bill ſhould be paſs'd into a Law, but follow'd it in a Body to the Houſe, as if they meant to carry their Point by Terror or Force, if a due Regard was not paid to their Reaſons and Arguments: And we find it inſinuated, that there was actually ſome ſeditious Deſign at the Bottom, tho' no Evidence of any ſuch Deſign appears. The Lords, however, maintain'd their Dignity; and by their Speaker order'd the Petitioners to be told, "That their Lordſhips did not think it fit then to give them any Anſwer, becauſe they had apply'd in an unuſual and unbecoming manner, which thoſe who were their Bailiffs, Wardens and Aſſiſtants, ought to have prevented: That their Lordſhips did firſt require them to diſperſe to their ſeveral Houſes in Peace; and when that was done, their Lordſhips would ſo act, as ſhould convince both them and the whole Nation, that no body needed to doubt of Juſtice who made their Appeal to them." But tho' this authoritative Anſwer had the deſir'd Effect, their Lordſhips thought it adviſable to take the neceſſary Precautions to ſave themſelves from a ſecond Inſult of the ſame kind, by applying to his Majeſty, to command certain Parties of the Horſe and Foot Guards to be under Arms to aſſiſt the Civil Power in caſe of need; the Governor of the Tower to cauſe ſuch a Patrol to be kept as ſhould hinder any unlawful Concourſe of People within the Hamlets of that Fortreſs; the Lord Mayor of London to have a ſufficient Number of the Trained Bands in readineſs to withſtand the Paſſage of the like Multitude through the City; and the Deputy Lieutenants, and Juſtices of the Peace, to make a like Proviſion for the Security and Quiet of the City and Liberties of Weſtminſter. All theſe ſeveral Requeſts were immediately granted, and from the 13th to the 17th of Auguſt, Watch and Ward was every where kept, as if a general Inſurrection was every Moment apprehended; in all which time, no Sign of any new Diſturbance appearing, their Lordſhips firſt diſmiſs'd their Guards, and then, upon the ſecond Reading, unanimouſly rejected the Bill.

[State of Europe. Life of King William, &c.]

On the very Day that the Mob of Petitioners beſet the Houſe of Lords, and the Conference was held between the Committees of the two Houſes for ſettling the Order of Conferences for the future, a Petition was preſented to the Commons by George Mawſon, Deputy Poſt-maſter of Kingſton upon Hull, complaining, that Colonel Copley, Lieutenant-Governor of Hull, had divers times taken into his Poſſeſſion the Poſt-Mail coming to that Town, and diſpos'd of the Letters at his Pleaſure, to the great Prejudice of the Traders, &c. of the ſaid Town, and the Gentry in the Neighbourhood: That he having made Complaint of this to John Wildman, Eſq; Poſt-Maſter-General, the ſaid Poſt-maſter order'd him to cauſe the Mails to be brought directly to his own Houſe; and, likewiſe, wrote to the ſaid Colonel Copley to enjoin him, not to open the Mail for the future: Notwithſtanding which, the ſaid Colonel Copley behav'd as before, and ſent for the Petitioner to come to him; who declining it, on Account of Indiſpoſition, the ſaid Copley order'd a Sergeant and four Muſketeers to bring him ty'd Neck and Heels; which they did with ſuch ſtrange Violence, that the Blood guſh'd out of his Noſe and Mouth; and kept him in that intolerable Poſture for two Hours: In conſequence of which, the ſaid Petitioner was diſabled in his Limbs, and impair'd in his Sight, &c. and foraſmuch as the ſaid Petitioner could not have his Remedy againſt the ſaid Copley, by a due Courſe of Law, praying the Houſe to take his Caſe into Conſideration, &c.

Petition againſt Colonel Copley.

This produc'd an immediate Order for Colonel Copley to attend the Houſe; and Mawſon having made good his Allegations againſt him, it was reſolv'd upon the Queſtion, That the ſeizing the Mail, and breaking open the Poſt Letters by any military Officer, or Soldier, is a Violation of the Right of the Subject: That the breaking open Letters directed to, or ſent from, a Member, is a Breach of Privilege: That the impriſoning, or inflicting any Puniſhments, by any Officer or Soldier, upon any of the Subjects of this Kingdom, not being in actual military Service, and in Pay, is a Violation of the Rights of the People: And that the Caſe of the Petitioner ſhould be refer'd to the Committee of Grievances. Colonel Copley was, moreover, call'd in queſtion for exacting a farthing a Ton from every Ship entring the Port of Hull, under the Pretence of maintaining a certain Chain; which was voted an Exaction upon the People; and he was enjoin'd to levy the ſaid pretended Duty no more. Vote thereon.

Now, whether theſe Proceedings, which ſeem'd to indicate a Diſpoſition in the Houſe to couple the Grievances of the preſent Reign with thoſe of the paſt, produc'd a Reſolution in the Court to bring the Seſſion to a Period; or whether the ſeveral Feuds ſubſiſting between the Houſes, or, as the Ducheſs of Marlborough ſuggeſts, the Princeſs of Denmark's Affair, caus'd that Meaſure, or the Deſire of the Members themſelves, who, no Doubt, were ſufficiently fatigu'd with ſo long an Attendance, on the 20th of Auguſt the King came to the Houſe for that Purpoſe; upon which Occaſion, the Speaker again harangu'd his Majeſty, as follows: "The Commons, in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, taking into Conſideration the great ASSISTANCE that was given by the States of the United Provinces to your Majeſty, in your glorious Deſign of reſtoring theſe Kingdoms to their ancient Rights and Liberties, and how

A. D. 1689. how for that End they entrusted their Army and Fleet to your Majesty's Disposal, at a time when they had War declar'd, and an Invasion threatned by the French King, merely to divert them, they do here humbly present your Majesty with a Bill, appointing certain Duties of Excise and Customs for the raising 600,000 l. which they desire may be apply'd to your Majesty, for the Satisfaction of the Charges, which have been expended by the States in this Expedition.

It is a little more than an Age since the illustrious Prince of Orange, your Majesty's Great-grand-father, whose Name will ever be famous for his Love to his Country, did, by the ASSISTANCE of the ENGLISH, redeem those Provinces from the like Oppressions; which shews how inseparable the Interest of the two Nations are: And since it was the Policy of those that labour'd our Destruction, to divide us, it ought to be the Endeavour of all true Lovers of their Country to keep us firmly united, in order to our Preservation.

The Commons have likewise consider'd of the great Arrears that were left due by King Charles the Second, to his Servants, and have therefore made a Provision of 60,000*l.* for them; which they humbly desire your Majesty would please to distribute among them, in such Proportions as your Majesty in your Princely Wisdom shall think most fit.

And, having proceeded thus far in the weighty Affairs depending before them, they now become humble Suitors to your Majesty for a Recess, that thereby they may have the Opportunity of repairing into their several Countries and promoting your Majesty's Service; and what remains at present for want of time to dispatch, they doubt not but that they shall be able to perfect it at their next Meeting; and, as they hope, to the entire Satisfaction of your Majesty, and your whole Kingdom."

Great Notice was taken of the second Paragraph, in which the Succours formerly granted by England to the poor and distressed States of Holland, are so artfully touch'd upon; and either with Applause or Censure, according to the several Interests and Passions of the several Parties: According to some, it was a seasonable Hint, that the Account between the two States, was now ballanc'd; and, according to others, it was an impertinent upbraiding. Whether the King himself was any way affected by it, is not specify'd; but as his Majesty could scarce be insensible, that his Countrymen were already grown out of Fashion, it may be reasonably suppos'd, that he was not over-pleas'd with it. However this may be, the Commons had their Desire granted, without the usual Ceremony of a Speech of Thanks: For such Bills as were ready, having receiv'd the Royal Assent, the Marquis of Hallifax, as Speaker of the House of Lords, had the Pleasure to dismiss those who had so often clamour'd to have him dismiss'd, by signifying, That it was his Majesty's Pleasure, that both Houses should severally adjourn themselves till the 20th of September; as also, that his Majesty

The Session closed by Adjournment.

A. D. 1689. did not intend there should be a Session then, unless some Emergency should make one necessary; and that whenever a Session was resolv'd on, he would give them Notice by Proclamation.

Remarkable Acts pass'd this Session.

The most remarkable Acts of this Session, not already mention'd, were, an Act (pass'd the third of April) to revive Actions and Process in Westminster-hall, which, during the Inter-regnum, had been at a stand: An Act to remove Papists ten Miles from London: An Act for the taking away Hearth-money: An Act to encourage the Exportation of Corn: (all these were pass'd the 24th of the same Month.) An Act for enabling Commissioners of the Great Seal to act as Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper: An Act for reviving two Acts for the Exportation of Leather: An Act for the Exportation of Beer, Ale, Cyder, and Mum: (These were pass'd the 22d of May.) An Act to regulate the Administration of Oaths to be taken by Commission and Warrant-Officers: An Act for the taking away the Court of Marches in Wales: An Act for vesting in the two Universities the Presentation of Benefices belonging to Papists: (these were pass'd June the 25th.) An Act for the better preventing the Exportation of Wool, and for encouraging the Woollen Manufactures: An Act for the appointing additional Commissioners to the Land-Tax: An Act for the Relief of the Protestant Irish Clergy; and an Act to repeal the Statute of Henry IV. against multiplying Gold and Silver, which receiv'd the Royal Assent on the last Day of the Session: And, lastly, it was not the Fault of the Lords, that an Act was not pass'd, declaring it to be Treason, to keep any Intelligence, or maintain any Correspondence with the late King James: For in the Beginning of May they sent down a Bill to the Commons to that Effect; who were inconsistent enough to reject it on the second Reading, though they afterwards assented to the Bill, for committing suspected Persons without Bail; and actually made an Order for the Impeachment of those who dispers'd that Prince's Declaration.

One rejected by the Commons.

D. of Schomberg's Expedition to Ireland.

We are now to resume the great Affair of Ireland; which Kingdom was, in all Appearance, as far separated from the Dominions as from the Shore of England: King James, tho' unsuccessful at Londonderry and Inniskillin, was still at the Head of the whole Irish Interest, and had a far greater Body of Forces under his Command, than was likely to be brought against him; and there was withal so much Slowness and Backwardness in the Preparations making in England for that Purpose, that he seem'd to have Leisure allow'd him to render himself invincible. It is said, that Marshal Schomberg, early in the Season, advis'd the marching a Body of Forces to Port-Patrick in Scotland, as a Means to bridle the Scots, while they continu'd there, and also to be ready on the first Call to pass over to Ireland; which from thence they could do at any time in a few Hours: But his Advice was atally over-rul'd.—— The Consequences of which were Dundee's Revolt, the Siege of Derry, and all the other

A.D. 1689. other Calamities which befel the Proteſtants of Ireland. It was the 15th of July when his Grace took Leave of the Commons; and on the 20th following, he arriv'd at Cheſter, to quicken his Muſters, and prepare for his Expedition; yet with all the Addreſs, Induſtry, and Power he was Maſter of, or could uſe, it was the 12th of Auguſt before he could ſet ſail; and even then, it ſeems, he was not half provided. Lord Warrington makes no Difficulty to aſcribe the Fault of all to the Aſcendancy of King James's Party in King William's Councils, and the treacherous Advice they gave. "That Party, ſays he (in the Character of a Member of the Houſe of Commons) ſtuck to their Point of delaying the Diſpatch of an Army for Ireland, and gave King James the whole Spring, and much of the Summer of the Year 1689, to ſtrengthen himſelf; and they apply'd themſelves chiefly to get thoſe that hated our King in their Hearts, into the Offices upon which the Succeſs and Being of the Army depended.

He ſets ſail with Part of his Forces,

[Impartial Inquiry, p. 12.]

They ſhew'd themſelves in the Proviſion of Horſes for the Artillery and Carriages, the buying Stores of Biſkets, Meal, Oats, and Victuals, the Preparation of Tranſport Ships and Convoys, the Orders for marching the Regiments of Horſe for that Expedition, and the Commiſſaries for the Stores for the Armies Subſiſtence.

I ſay, in the Conduct of all this, and the Choice of the Officers for them, there appear'd ſo much Treachery upon the Examination taken in our Houſe (of Commons) about them, that many of us were afraid that the Armies would be betray'd into King James's Hands. Honeſt Duke Schomberg's Soul was fretted by his long waiting at Cheſter, to get together but a ſmall Body of Foot, by the Diſappointments (through the pretended Miſtakes of Orders) of the coming of his Horſe, by the Unfitneſs of the Tranſport-Ships to carry over the Artillery and Carriage-Horſes, by the Neglect of neceſſary Proviſion of Stores, and putting Wheat on board inſtead of Biſket and Meal, by the Failure of long expected Convoys, and other Supplies, that the poor Gentleman choſe to hazard himſelf without a Convoy, and his ſmall Body of Foot, with few or no Troops of Horſe, and without any Carriage or Artillery-Horſes, to try his Fortune to get upon Iriſh Land, when the Winds would ſuffer him; being willing to run the utmoſt Danger of periſhing, rather than not to attempt ſome Relief to the poor Proteſtants, and ſuffer the Treachery of thoſe employ'd to hazard the Reputation of his Faithfulneſs.

Yet when the poor Gentleman, in deſpite of all their Falſhood, had landed his ſmall Army, he could not purſue the Enemy for want of thoſe Troops of Horſe and Carriage-Horſes and other Neceſſaries left behind. But the Treachery continu'd in detaining them, and in letting the Carriage-Horſes to hire for Plow and Cart about Cheſter, and that Villany enforc'd him to decamp at Dundalk, in the Enemies Quarters, and uſe his excellent Conduct in ſaving ſo ſmall a Party againſt King James's numerous Army; A.D. 16[illegible] tho' the Unwholeſomeneſs of the Place, and the Failure of the Supplies expected, occaſion'd the Deaths of many worthy Gentlemen, and the miſerable Sickneſs and Sufferings of many more, and the Loſs of ten thouſand Proteſtants, before the Spring following."

This is, no doubt, the Language of Party; but then it is reaſonable to think, that it is in a good Degree warranted by Truth. Public Services began already to be conſider'd as private Jobbs; and the Undertakers for the Government thought only of providing for themſelves: This, it may be, was equally true of both Parties; for whatever Difference there was in their Pretenſions, there was little in their Practice; only it ſo happen'd, that thoſe who had the Charge of the Victualling and Stores for this Expedition, were of the old Prerogative-Leaven, and their Adverſaries, who never expected to have them for Rivals in Power any more, thought it more for their Purpoſe, to aſcribe their Malverſations to their Faith than their Works. It is, however, declar'd in the Gazette, [No. 2479] which ſpeaks of the Duke of Schomberg's Departure, That the reſt of the Forces were to follow with all poſſible Expedition; which was an Acknowledgment, that either all were not ready to accompany him, or that a ſufficient Proviſion had not been made for tranſporting them. The ſame Perſon, Mr. Harbord, was at firſt both Paymaſter and Purveyor to the Expedition; but afterwards, in compliance with the repeated Importunities of the General, he condeſcended to lay down the latter of thoſe Employments, in favour of one Mr. Shales; and he alſo, as we ſhall find, came in for a large Share of the Blame, as well as the Profits.

The Strength his Grace ſet out with, was about ten thouſand Men, chiefly Foot, which were all ſtow'd in about ninety Veſſels of all ſorts, and met with ſo favourable a Paſſage, that the very next Day after they ſet ſail, they reach'd the Coaſt of Ireland, and were happily landed in the Neighbourhood of Carrickfergus, without the leaſt Moleſtation from the Enemy. The ſame Parties that the Marſhal ſent out for Intelligence, brought in ſeveral others to join him: And his firſt Exploit was to reduce Carrickfergus, which capitulated on the 27th. The Siege laſted four Days, and the Garriſon conſiſted of about 2500 Men. This was a happy Beginning; and in the ſame Interval he had the additional Encouragement of being reinforc'd with ſeveral other Corps from England. But ſtill the Horſes and other Requiſites for the Train were wanting; upon which Conſideration he was forc'd to re-embark the Cannon he could not uſe; and having done ſo, and directed the Victuallers and other Veſſels which attended him, to meet him at Carlingford, he march'd on to Laughbrilane, where he was join'd by the Iniſkillin Horſe and Dragoons, who made it their own Offer to act as the Forlorn of the Army, and upon all Occaſions ſhew'd that they did not aſpire to that Poſt for Shew but Service.

Reduces Carrickfergus.

At

A. D. 1689. His Message by a Trumpet to the Duke of Berwic.

At Newry, a very ſtrong Paſs, the Duke of Berwic had his Station, but hearing of Schomberg's Approach, he thought fit to retire, having firſt ſet fire to the Town and left it in Aſhes behind him: This ſo provok'd the Marſhal, that he diſpatch'd a Trumpet after his Grace, with Orders to acquaint him, "That if, in the Courſe of his March, he found any more ſuch French Tricks play'd, he would give no Quarter to Man, Woman or Child." And this Meſſage, we are told, had ſo good an Effect, that the Iriſh forebore that inhuman Practice for the future: They had retir'd from Newry to Dundalk, and as the Marſhal advanc'd, they retir'd from thence alſo. But here the Marſhal himſelf, tho' by this time farther reinforc'd with the Regiments of Kirk, Hamner, and Stuart, thought it adviſable to halt: He had receiv'd Intelligence, it ſeems, by an Engineer who had deſerted from the Enemy, that Mr. de Roſene, with an Army of about 20,000 effective Men, well appointed, waited for him at Drogheda; and he did not think himſelf in a Condition to ſtake his own Reputation, and the Fate of Ireland, on one ſingle Caſt. Neither the Equipage for his Train was yet arriv'd from Cheſter, nor even the Ships from Carrickfergus which had the Train on board: His Forces were not only raw and undiſciplin'd, but ſickly, fatigu'd, faint, and ill provided: Poſſibly he was, beſides, not over-confident of their Fidelity; and, as he knew there was a Negociation then carrying on, at the Court of Denmark (f) for ſix thouſand Daniſh Foot and one thouſand Horſe, which were to paſs, as ſoon as poſſible, into the Iriſh Service, as alſo, that ſeveral Regiments of Horſe and Foot were actually on their March to join him from Scotland, he held it the wiſeſt Courſe to act upon the Defenſive, till they came, or ſuch an Opportunity ſhould offer to engage, as would more than counterbalance all other Diſadvantages. However this may be, in the Neighbourhood of Dundalk he encamp'd; and Mr. de Roſene was no ſooner inform'd of it, than he pronounc'd, That Schomberg wanted ſomething, and immediately ſent out a Party to ſecure the Poſt of Ardee, a ſmall Town between Dundalk and Drogheda; he alſo aſſembled all his Forces, with a Reſolution to attack him before thoſe Wants were ſupply'd: But he had a General to deal with, who would neither be ſeduc'd nor ſurpris'd, and who was ſo ſtrongly poſted that he could not be forc'd. To diſconcert him, if poſſible, was, therefore, all that remain'd to be done; to which End, he, one while, order'd out a ſtrong Detatchment to make an Attempt on the Paſs of Newry, which cover'd his Rear; and when that Project was diſappointed, he drew out his whole Army, and march'd up to him in Front, in hope he would accept the Challenge, and quit his Lines, which were his only Security. This was a Sight which the Engliſh Officers, who were weary of ſo hateful a Situation, among Bogs and Rivers, could not bear; and, we are told, they ſo far co-operated with the Enemy, as to preſs the Marſhal to come to Action, and let them rather dye Sword in Hand, than rot in the peſtilential Air they were ſurrounded with. But tho' he was not inſenſible of their Remonſtrance, he continu'd firm to his own Purpoſe, and contented himſelf with making ſuch Diſpoſitions from time to time, as at laſt convinc'd Mr. de Roſene, that, by repeating his Bravadoes, he only more and more convinc'd his Adverſary, That he had nothing elſe to truſt to.

Holds at Dundalk.

Duchines engaging Roſene.

While the two Commanders were thus endeavouring to out-general each other, Colonel Lloyd, who commanded at Inniſkillin, hearing that a Party of Iriſh, to the Amount of 5000, Regulars and Irregulars, had undertaken to reduce Sligoe, he put himſelf at the Head of four Troops of Horſe, five of Dragoons, and about 200 Foot; and having poſted himſelf advantageouſly between that Place and Boyle, receiv'd their Fire, return'd his own within Piſtol-ſhot, and taking Advantage of the Slaughter and Confuſion which it produc'd, fell in among them Sword in Hand, and put them to total Rout; above 500 being kill'd on the Spot (among whom were their three Colonels O Kelly, Dillon and Bourk) and almoſt 300 taken, together with a vaſt Booty of Cattle; and all at ſo ſmall an Expence, as of twenty Men kill'd and wounded.

Another Exploit of the Inniſkillin-Men.

Sligoe, nevertheleſs, fell into the Enemy's Hands very ſoon after; for Sarſfield having taken Poſſeſſion of Jameſtown, which had been abandon'd by its Inhabitants on his Approach, puſh'd on to Sligoe, in hope to balance the late Diſgrace, by reducing the Town which caus'd it. The Officers who commanded there, were Colonel Ruſſel of the Horſe, Colonel Lloyd with the Inniſkillin Foot, and Captain St. Sauveur with a Company of French Grenadiers. It is reaſonable to think that Sarſfield's Approach was ſo unexpected, that theſe Officers had not time to hold a Council, or at leaſt to come to a joint Reſolution; for Ruſſel reſolving to retire with his Horſe, would have perſuaded the two others to do the ſame; but they refus'd; and Lloyd threw himſelf into one Fort, and St. Sauveur into another; but neither to any Purpoſe; for Lloyd finding no Proviſion for the Support of himſelf and his Men, withdrew that very Night; and tho' St. Sauveur made a gallant Defence for ſome little time, he was forc'd to ſurrender at laſt.

Sligoe taken by the Iriſh.

(f) 'Tis remarkable enough, that the Author of The State of Europe, a profeſs'd Williamite, in his Reflections on the firſt Rumour of this Meaſure, makes uſe of theſe Words: "'Tis not to be thought, that the King of England is upon tractating with the King of Denmark for any Part of his Men; or, if there be any ſuch ſort of Negociation, 'tis not to bring thoſe Forces into his own Dominions: for that would create too great a Jealouſy in his People, who preſently began to murmur, becauſe his Majeſty kept ſome of the Dutch Regiments about him, tho' he could hardly be without them, not having a ſufficient Body of the Engliſh [that he could truſt, would have been edded] for the Occaſions of the Kingdom." Vol. i. p. 353.

A. D. 1689. [Gazette, No. 2496.]

To account for these French in the English Service, it is necessary to observe, that of the sixteen new-rais'd Regiments of Foot employ'd in this Expedition, three were of French Refugees; and if the Behaviour of St. Sauveur and his Men reflected some Honour upon those Corps, an Accident happen'd much about the same time, which had like to have blasted them as much. A Captain in one of them happen'd to receive some Intimation, that four of his Men and a Drummer, who were Papists, design'd to desert to the Irish Army; upon which he caus'd them to be seiz'd, and found Letters about one of them address'd to Mr. d'Avaux, who being examin'd, declar'd he had the said Letters from one du Plessis, who was also a Papist, and had been a Captain of Horse in the French Service, but was forc'd to run his Country, to avoid the Justice of it, on account of a Murder which he had committed. The next Step was to seize this du Plessis likewise, which was done, and who acknowledg'd in his Turn, "That he had written both to King James and Mr. d'Avaux, to the following Effect, viz. That there were many Papists in the French Regiments; and that he would undertake to bring them over to the Irish Camp, on Condition that he might have his Pardon and the Command of them." Having furnish'd this Matter against themselves, both he and his five Accomplices were brought to a Trial, before a Council of War, and having receiv'd Sentence of Death for their intended Treachery, (which, according to some foreign Authors, was to assassinate the Marshal) were executed accordingly. After which, the French Colonels made a strict Enquiry after the rest of those Papists, who were thus to have been made over in a Body to King James, by du Plessis, and discovering about one hundred and fifty, they were disarm'd and sent Prisoners to Carlingford, from whence they were first transported to England, and thence to Holland, where, we are told, they were set at Liberty; tho' it is more reasonable to think, that they were incorporated with the Troops of the Republic.

The Treachery of certain French Soldiers in the English Service discover'd and punish'd.

The Marshal farther reinforc'd with certain Regiments from Scotland.

About the Middle of October, Marshal Schomberg was yet farther reinforc'd with two Regiments of Horse, one of Dragoons, and one of Foot, from Scotland: But the Season of Action was now over; the Irish Army withdrew into their Quarters; and that of England had a more irresistible Enemy to contend with, namely, a violent Flux, which, in the Course of the Winter, prov'd fatal to many thousands; and amongst them to several Persons of Distinction; as Sir Thomas Beaumont, Sir Edward Deering, Col. Wharton, Sir Thomas Gower, Col. Hungerford, &c. According to some Authors, this Calamity was owing not only to the Dampness of the Soil, and the immoderate Rains which fell about that time, but to the Badness of the Provisions they had been furnish'd with from England: Even the Gazette acknowledges, that the Marshal, on his Arrival in the Lough of Carrickfergus, sent back great Part of the Provisions which he had brought with him; and again afterwards, that he sent back all his A. D. [illegible] No. [illegible] fault Provisions: But then the Reason assign'd for it is, the Plenty and Cheapness of the Provisions, which were pour'd in upon him by the Country: And we are again assur'd, by the same Authority, that tho' the Irish Army was forc'd to decamp for want of Necessaries, the English were plentifully furnish'd. Bishop Burnet on the contrary affirms, not only that the Irish out-number'd the English three to one; but that they were so well posted and provided, that the Marshal could not in prudence venture to dislodge them. The same Prelate indeed adds, that some blam'd him for not putting things more to hazard, saying, that he measur'd the Irish by their Numbers, and not by their Want of Sense and Courage; and that these Complaints had such an Effect even on the King himself, that he twice by Letter press'd him to put somewhat to the venture; and that others, on the contrary, were of Opinion, that the Marshal's managing the Campaign as he did was one of the greatest Parts of his Life. There is in truth so much Uncertainty and Contradiction in the Accounts given of it, that we can only conclude, that there was a Fault somewhere; that the Soldiers and Proveditors endeavour'd to lay it upon each other; and that in most Cases of this kind, the criminating Parties ought to divide the Blame between them. As to what the Bishop farther affirms, viz. That Schomberg had not the Supplies from England which had been promis'd him; and that his Army, when strongest, was not above fourteen thousand Men, it is scarce to be depended on: For if the Marshal was at first ten thousand strong, as he admits, the Addition of Kirk's Forces, which consisted of three Regiments of Foot and two of Horse, two Regiments of Londonderry Men, the Inisskillingers, the Regiments of Horse and Foot from Scotland above-mention'd, the Regiments of the Earl of Meath, Lord Lovelace, Colonel Coy, Lord Roscommon, Colonel Levefon, Duke of Norfolk, Lord Devonshire, Lord Delamere, Lord Hewit, Sir Thomas Gore, Colonel Villars, and Colonel Hamilton, must have swell'd his Muster-rolls to a far greater Number: And all these several Corps are not only mention'd in the Gazette, as successively em- [No. 2484. bark'd for Ireland, but with this further Circumstance, That these were all which were Ibid. destin'd for this Service. Again, whereas it is affirm'd in Lord Warrington's Impartial Enquiry, that the Duke was forc'd to set sail without a Convoy, this must be only understood, that he would not wait for one; since we learn also from the Gazette, that No. 2488. he had the Assistance of six Ships to reduce Carrickfergus; that he sent his Cannon to Carlingford, under the Convoy of three Men of War; that he, at the same time, sent a Squadron of Men of War towards the Bay of Dublin; and that those very Cannon ar- No. 2491.] riv'd at Carlingford on the 14th of Sept. under the Convoy of eight Men of War.

Reflections on the Irish Campaign.

It is asserted yet farther, That the united [State of Europe, An. 90. i. Fleet of England and Holland was station'd p. 393.] on the Coast of France, in the Months of

A. D. 1689. July and August, not only by way of Bravade, to provoke the French if possible to come out and give them Battle, but also to amuse them, while Marshal Schomberg and his Forces were in their Passage to Ireland: That the French did actually make a Feint of putting to Sea with sixty-two great Men of War, and of transmitting yet farther Succours to King James in Ireland: That, upon the Receipt of this Intelligence, the united Fleet was augmented to almost fourscore; and fresh Orders were sent to Lord Torrington to quit Usbant, and ply off of Kingston, to be more in the way of intercepting the said Succours, and of covering the Marshal's Descent: And that the said Fleet did not return to Torbay, till it was confirm'd, that the French had given Orders for separating their Ships, and laying them up for the Winter in their respective Harbours; which they had a fair Opportunity of doing, by this Removal of the Allies to the Coast of Ireland: All which several Steps, if consider'd with Candour, seem to argue, that the Government were, at last, sufficiently attentive to the Danger of Ireland, and apply'd themselves in earnest to reduce it; how ineffectual soever their Endeavours prov'd, or how ill soever some of their Servants discharg'd the Trust repos'd in them.

We are now to resume our Deduction of foreign Affairs, that we may be the better Judges of our own.

Foreign Affairs.

To begin with the Court of Vienna: Notwithstanding the Sollicitations of the Turkish Envoys, the Remonstrances of the Diet, and the Expediency of concluding one War, for the sake of entering with the more Strength and Vigour into another, his Imperial Majesty could not be prevail'd upon, to sacrifice the Interest of his own hereditary Dominions to that of the Empire: What he acquir'd on the Turkish Side, was to be all his own; but in the Recoveries or Acquisitions to be made from the French, every Prince concern'd in the Adventure expected a Share: Believing, therefore, that he had the Turks at his Mercy, and that France was already overmatch'd by the mighty Confederacy which was form'd against her, he caus'd the said Envoys to be inform'd by his Commissioners, That, over and above all the Conquests which he had already made, and which they had offer'd to relinquish, he expected and demanded all the other Towns and Fortresses of Hungary, which they were still possess'd of, together with all their Dependencies: And farther, That Transilvania and Walachia, which had put themselves under his Protection, should be freed from the annual Tribute which they had paid to the Porte; and that Count Teckely should be deliver'd up. This was, in Effect, making the Matter desperate: The Envoys declar'd upon the Spot, That as to the last Article, they had not so much as Power to treat upon it: And as to the two former, it was obvious, that neither the Vizier nor the Grand Signior himself durst comply with them, 'till they had try'd the Success of another Campaign. Accordingly, at the next Conference, they declar'd, they had no more to offer, and desir'd leave to return home. Thus, both the French Minister at Constantinople, and Count Teckely, were furnish'd with fresh Arguments, drawn from the Haughtiness and Greediness of the Imperial Court, to spirit up the Divan to continue the War, which they did not fail to make use of; and that with all the Success they could desire. And, on the other hand, the Emperor excus'd himself to the rest of Europe, for not embracing the Offers that were made him, by urging, that his Allies and Confederates the Venetians were not comprehended in them.

His Preparations for the two Wars.

But though the Imperial Court were thus manifestly sway'd by their peculiar Interest on one Side, it could not, on this Occasion, be said, that they acted remisly on the other: They held frequent Councils: They establish'd such Funds as they thought would be sufficient to defray the Expence of both the Wars: They caus'd new Levies to be made in all the several Provinces: They provided two great Trains of Artillery; and they erected Magazines in the several Places where their Troops were to assemble: Fearing also that the King of Poland, by the Ascendancy of his French Consort, and the Application of the French Court, might be induc'd to take such Measures, as might interfere with the great Ends in view, his Imperial Majesty, by (g) Letter, requir'd and exhorted him to adhere to the Cause he had so

The Emperor rejects the Conditions of Peace

(g) Which is remarkable enough to deserve a Place here, as follows:

"Leopold, &c. Your Serenity will have sufficiently understood, by our former Letters to you, how unjustly and treacherously the Crown of France, violating the Treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, and the twenty Years Truce concluded a few Years since, hath invaded us and the Empire, at a time that we expected nothing less. But the Enormity of this Invasion is infinitely aggravated by the horrid Cruelties and Barbarities they continue to exercise in the Places they have possess'd themselves of, pillaging whole Towns and Countries, which to preserve themselves surrender'd upon Articles, and afterwards paid the Contributions impos'd upon them, against the Faith given them, and confirm'd by the King himself, or the Dauphin, and afterwards destroying them with Fire, or levelling the Walls and Houses to the Ground, and carrying away the Inhabitants bound as Slaves, in a Manner only practis'd among Barbarians, and forcing them with Threats of Death to follow the French Army into other Parts; not sparing the stately Houses and Palaces of Princes, which had been preserv'd for Ages, and in the bloodiest Wars; and not with-holding their impious Hands even from the Churches; and exercising many other Cruelties and Inhumanities, such as are seldom committed by the Turks themselves, and which can hardly be found in any History to have been ever practis'd among Christians: which, as they most deservedly excite the Hatred of all Christendom against France, so they especially lay a Necessity upon us of providing for the Safety of the Roman Empire, and of using all Means to free it from such unheard-of Violences and Oppressions: And to this Purpose the States of the Empire, assembled by their Deputies at Ratisbon, have unanimously besought us, that, a just War being declar'd against France, we would not only as soon as might be make an honourable Peace with the Turks, but would also invite the Kings and Republics, our Friends and Allies, to join with us in the War, and to continue their Friendship and Alliance with the Empire, thereby to prevent and render ineffectual the pernicious Designs and Contrivances of France and its Adherents, against us and the Roman Empire. Wherefore having, for what concerns a speedy and honourable Peace with the Turks, already declared in our former Letters our Sentiments to your Serenity, and being glad to hear that your Serenity is sending to us an Envoy Plenipotentiary, we have now thought fit, at the Instance

A. D. 1689. so gloriously supported, warn'd him, not unartfully, against an Apostacy, which would dishonour his past Atchievements; and more than insinuated, that in siding with the French, he would, in Effect, side with the Turks also, since both were Enemies to Christendom alike. And that those of the Reformed Religion might be the better reconcil'd to the Adventure they were engag'd in, and rely the more securely on the Success they expected from it, another Letter from his Imperial Majesty to King William was made public, wherein, after expressing his Acknowledgments to that Prince, for the Moderation he had shewn to the Catholics, he promis'd to observe the like Behaviour to the Protestants, and to settle the Point of Religion in such a manner, that all honest Men should have Reason to be satisfy'd.

The chief Command in Hungary was given to Prince Lewis of Baden, not by way of Preference to the Duke of Lorrain, but that the Emperor might have the Benefit of the Duke's Services, where it was presum'd they would be most needed. The chief Command in the Empire was, indeed, the Post of Honour; and as it was rightly foreseen that this could not be bestow'd on the Duke without giving Umbrage to the Elector of Bavaria, Care was taken to put the Latter at the Head of a separate Army, which was to act on the Upper Rhine, and which was to consist of his own Troops, a Body of Imperialists, and the Suabians. The Duke of Lorrain's Post was on the Middle Rhine, with the main Body of the Imperialists and the Saxons; and the Service of the Lower Rhine was left to the Elector of Brandenburgh with his own Troops, and those of Westphalia.

Intrigues of France in the North

According to the Muster-Rolls, all these several Armies amounted almost to 120,000 Men; and it was hop'd that this vast Body would be yet considerably increas'd before the opening of the Campaign. It was therefore the Interest of France, almost at any Expence, to make a Diversion by Means of the hungry Princes of the North; and, as usual, she omitted no Endeavours to carry her Point: She offer'd Sweden an annual Pension of twelve hundred thousand Crowns to espouse her Cause, and four hundred thousand to stand neuter: But the Swedes had suffer'd so much, and so lately, in her Quarrel, and had met with so much Insolence and Ingratitude in Return, that they were deaf to the Voice of the Charmer. They had, besides, another Point to carry, of more Importance to them than any Offer the French could make, which was, to wrest the Duchy of Holstein out of the Hands of Denmark, and restore it to its proper Owner. Now in this, the Court of France neither could nor would give them any Assistance; for it was under their Influence and Protection, the Danes had made that Acquisition; whereas, on the other hand, the House of Lunenburgh, and all the neighbouring Princes, who, like them, were jealous of the Ballance of the North, were ready to co-operate with the Swedes therein; and even the Emperor himself shew'd a Disposition to throw all his Weight and Interest into the same Scale. In Answer, therefore, to the Instances of the French Ministers, his Swedish Majesty not only return'd a flat Refusal, but immediately acquainted the Court of Vienna with what he had done; and farther signify'd, That he had ten thousand Men at the Service of the Confederacy, in case they could provide him a suitable Subsidy in Return.

A. D. 1689.

The Door being thus shut on that Side, all that remain'd was to spirit up the Danes, to maintain their Possession by Force of Arms, and to reject all Offers of Accommodation, from whatsoever Quarter, or on whatsoever Terms: And such an Effect at first had their Importunities and Promises on his Danish Majesty, that he began to augment his Forces, after the Example of the Swedes and Lunenburghers, to equip his Fleet, and make all the Preparations necessary at the Eve of a War: He did not, however, think fit to suspend the Conferences which were held at Altona, under the Mediation of the Emperor, and the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh; but, on the contrary, growing at last apprehensive, that France had more Business already upon her Hands, than she could manage, and that it would be safest to side with the strongest, he gave way to the Duke of Holstein's Demands, and the Instances of the Mediators, till a Compromise was finally adjusted and agreed upon (by a Surrender of the said Duchy) June the 30th, and the Ratifications were exchang'd a Fortnight after.

There is no need to enlarge on the Importance of this Event, since it speaks for itself: The Peace of the North was thereby effectually preserv'd: The two Kings immediately dispers'd their Forces: The Lunenburghers stance of the States of the Empire, and out of the fraternal Confidence we have in your Serenity, to write this; not that we think your Serenity wants to be exhorted to prefer the Friendship which for so many Ages has continued without Interruption between us the Roman Empire and the Crown of Poland, before the Machinations of France; or that your Serenity, after having fought so gloriously against the common Enemy of Christendom, can now be induc'd to favour their Abettors, Adherents, and Confederates, to wit, the French, (for why should we not call them so, who at this very time offer to make an offensive Alliance with the Turks) or to assist directly or indirectly their Designs, and thereby become a Partner in their detestable Perfidiousness, which we persuade ourselves is very far from your Serenity's Piety, Integrity, and Prudence, who not many Years since had such Experience of the Malice of France; but amicably and brotherly to desire you on our Part, and in the Name of the Empire, to take such Measures and Resolutions with the whole Republic of Poland, that, proceeding with united Councils and Forces, the horrid Perfidiousness of France may be punish'd, and a firm and lasting Peace at last establish'd in Christendom. This we the rather promise ourselves from your Serenity and the Kingdom of Poland, for that it is an undeniable Truth, that our common Interests, or those of Germany and Poland, are equally concern'd, and that these Attempts made by the French upon us and the Empire in favour of the Turks, during our offensive Alliance against the Infidels, are likewise prejudicial to the Kingdom of Poland: for it is they that, being Enemies of our Glory and our holy League, as well as of your Serenity and the Republic of Venice, do stop the Course of those noble Conquests, which we had yet Reason to hope, and which we had propos'd to ourselves for the Advancement of the Glory of God, and the Christian Religion. We therefore doubt not your Majesty will return us an Answer agreeable to our mutual Friendship, &c. Given at Vienna, March 18, 1689."

A. D. 1689. nenburghers were at Leisure to assist in the Common Cause, and the Influence of France was at so low an Ebb at Copenhagen, as well as Stockholm, that when her Minister, as the last Card he had to play, solicited even a Neutrality at the Danish Court, it was refus'd; and he had the additional Mortification to see the seven thousand Danish Troops, before spoken of, pass into the British Service, on almost the same Terms which he had offer'd in his Master's Name, to keep them at home.

The whole Germanic Body, for once, united.

It may, indeed, be safely affirm'd, that there never was such a Confederacy of Powers and Interests against France, as at this Crisis: The King and Republic of Poland did indeed stand aloof; as did also the Switzers, who, neither by Threats nor Promises, could be prevail'd on, to take part on either Side: But then, the whole Germanic Body, except the single Town of Hamburgh, for this once, mov'd all one way; and every Member, either for Love or Fear (for the Diet had authoris'd the Emperor, to send forth his advocatory Letters, declaring all that should stand neuter, to be Enemies to the Empire) was oblig'd to move with it. Even the Bishop of Munster, who had a secret Longing to be a Stipendary to France, thought fit, not only to recall his Agent from that Court, but to furnish his Contingent to the War, with all the seeming Chearfulness imaginable; and, moreover, to offer a Body of 6000 Mercenaries to the highest Bidder among the Confederates: And the Prince of Liege, after he had actually made a Shift to procure a Neutrality, found himself under a Necessity to break it, and to take Part with the Confederates: The Manner thus: The French had bought up in this Place a great Quantity of Ammunition, and Provisions, which was to be sent to Bonne, under the Convoy of three Troops of Dragoons; Count Flodorp, Governor of Maestricht, had Intelligence of it, and sent a Regiment to intercept them; but the French Scouts perceiving the Enemy, gave Notice to their Party, who, thereupon, return'd with all Speed to Liege; and when their Pursuers came up, they found the Gates shut against them. This was call'd a Breach of the Neutrality; and Flodorp gave the Citizens to understand, in the Name of his Masters, That unless they deliver'd up both the Convoy, and those who had it in Charge, he would proceed against them as Enemies. This having no Effect, the States themselves interpos'd by Letter, and the Burgomasters still demurring, the Count invested the Town with about five or six thousand Men, made himself Master of the Chartreux in one of the Suburbs; and having brought four or five Pieces of Cannon, and a Brace of Mortars to bear upon the Town, not only renew'd his former Demands, but insisted on two thousand Crowns a Day till their Deliberations were at an End. In this Extremity the Burgomasters found themselves under a Necessity to submit; and knowing this would expose them to the Indignation of France, chose to make their Peace, and secure themselves a Protection together, by declaring for the Confederates; which they did upon the Spot; and the Result was, that the Emperor, the States, and the City divided the Convoy amongst them.

A. D. 1689.

Liege comply'd to take part with the Allies against France.

Spain, as we have seen, was another of the Powers engaged in the present almost universal Quarrel against France; and, in point of Interest, was the most concern'd of any; for, according to the great first Principle on which the War was to be conducted, whatever should be recover'd from the French was to be restor'd to its right Owner: But such was the languid and inefficient State of that Kingdom, that, tho' in proportion to its Bulk and Figure, it seem'd best able to improve the matchless Opportunity, their standing Forces in Flanders, where they had ever most Reason to be on their Guard, were far short of their Establishment; and, for some time after the most Christian King had declar'd War against the States, they were so little able to furnish the (b) Succours, which Languid State of Spain.

(b) The following Story, which is taken, in substance, from the State of Europe for the Month of February 1688-9, has such an Air of Probability, that tho' it is retracted afterwards, I cannot help submitting it to the Reader's Consideration:

"The most Christian King having declar'd War against Holland, the States Ambassador inform'd his Catholic Majesty of it, and desir'd him to send his Masters those Succours which he was oblig'd to do by the Treaty some Years ago concluded between them. These Succours ought to consist of 8000 Men; and his Majesty readily told the Ambassador, he would give Order to the Governor of the Spanish Low-Countries to send 'em away immediately. But his Excellency made answer, That whatever Orders he sent thither would signify nothing; for that, to his certain Knowledge, the Governor had scarce fifteen thousand in all, which was not a fourth Part of what was necessary for the Defence of his Majesty's own Dominions in those Parts. The King told him, he was either misinform'd, or he had forty thousand effective Men in Flanders; and that it was not above three Days ago, that his Council had shew'd him the Establishment of those Provinces. To which the Ambassador reply'd, that whoever had shew'd him that Establishment had deluded him: That Flanders had been for a long time as it were forsaken, which was the Reason that the King of France had so easily made himself Master of the best Part of it: That, if his Majesty question'd the Truth of what he said, he might be better inform'd by any other Person, who had not an Interest in misleading him; and that he took the Liberty to appeal in the Matter to the Emperor's Embassador. His Majesty, much surpriz'd at his Firmness, sent immediately for the Imperial Embassador, who confirm'd all that the Dutch Embassador had said; and then he sent for the Count of Monterey, President of the Council of Flanders, of whom he demanded, how many Soldiers he had in the Low-Countries? (For it was he who had told his Majesty he had forty thousand.) He, therefore, not to contradict himself, in his Answer aver'd what he had said before: But the King observing some Confusion in his Countenance, told him, he could produce two Witnesses, both of whom were Persons of unquestionable Probity and Honour, and who would insist upon it to his Face, That he had not a Third of that Number; and that even those few were not well paid, tho' he, the Count, well knew, he had a Fund sufficient for the Maintenance of the whole Establishment. Here his Majesty pausd; and his Minister, overwhelm'd with Confusion, endeavour'd to soften him, by urging, That if he had misinform'd his Majesty, he had been also misinform'd himself: That he could not see things with his own Eyes at such a Distance; and that he hop'd the Faults of others would not be imputed to him. The King would hear no more: But taking it for granted that the two Embassadors had led him into a Truth which he could never have come at from his Courtiers, turn'd away with Indignation, and not only order'd the Count to be corrected; but three of his Officers, who being examin'd apart, and confessing enough to confirm all, were condemn'd to lose their Heads; which was executed accordingly, tho' many of the Grandees, alarm'd at the Precedent perhaps, interceded with his Majesty for their Pardon."

A. D. 1689. which their Lordſhips had a Right to demand, in virtue of the Treaties ſubſiſting between the two Powers, that they were ſcarce in a Condition to defend themſelves. It is true that the French Miniſters did ſolicit a Neutrality at Madrid, with as much Importunity as they had done in the North: But the Spaniſh Council were ſo far from being even in a Diſpoſition to embrace it, that, on the contrary, they were at the Bottom of every Intrigue, in every Court of Europe, againſt their ancient Enemies. To have acted conſiſtently, therefore, it might have been expected, that their military Preparations ſhould have kept pace with their Negociations: And if they did all this while exert themſelves in an extraordinary Manner, it muſt have been by their Remittances to thoſe Courts, which had more Iron, but leſs Gold. Poſſibly it was their Wealth which help'd to bring about the ſurpriſing Union which now appear'd in the Germanic Body: In the French Declaration of War, they are expreſly charg'd with diſburſing conſiderable Sums, both at Madrid and Cadiz, to the Agents of the Uſurper of England, as King William is in that Piece moſt arrogantly ſtyl'd: And it is allow'd, that they hir'd certain Bodies of German Forces to complete their Garriſons; as alſo the ſix thouſand Munſter-Men above-mention'd, to enable the Marquis de Guaſtanaga, their Governor-General of the Netherlands, to take the Field; which nevertheleſs he could not do, without the Aſſiſtance of five thouſand Dutch Foot; and, when his whole Corps was aſſembled, it did not exceed twenty thouſand Men: On the Side of Catalonia and Navarre they did indeed put on a more military Aſpect; for they made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to have an Army in each of thoſe Provinces: But many of the Corps, which thoſe Armies were to be compos'd of, were to be draughted from Italy, and many were to be new-rais'd; and the Queen of Spain dying in that Interval, the Drums were ſilenc'd for ſome Days, that not one Tittle of the Funeral-Solemnity might be violated.

Eleven thouſand Britiſh Auxiliaries ſent to Flanders, under the Command of the Earl of Marlborough.

With regard to the Share that England took in this Land-War, we have already ſeen, that ſeveral of thoſe Corps which had deſerted King James, or which King James had deſerted, were ſoon diſpatch'd to Holland, out of the way: The whole Number thus diſpos'd of amounted to about eleven thouſand; among whom were the greateſt Part of the Guards: The Iriſh Troops, which Lord Tyrconnel had ſent to the Aſſiſtance of that Prince, were given to the Emperor: And it was at this time the Diſcourſe of the Hague, that his Britannic Majeſty was alſo to aſſiſt his Catholic Majeſty with another Body of his Troops. But either this Diſcourſe had no Foundation, or we muſt conclude, that, to ſave Appearances, the five thouſand Dutch above-mention'd paſs'd into the Service of Spain, in lieu of ſo many Britiſh, and that the States found an Equivalent in the Augmentations of the Britiſh Forces by Sea: For we do not find that any more of our Forces were ſhipp'd for Flanders, during this Campaign; and it is A. D. pretty remarkable, that, immediately upon the ſigning that Treaty, the Earl of Marlborough embark'd for Holland, to take upon him the Command of thoſe Auxiliaries, with Orders to join the Army of the States, under Prince Waldec, which, in the whole, was to conſiſt of about forty thouſand Men: The Place of general Rendezvous was in the County of Liege, near Tongres; and while theſe undertook to act offenſively againſt the Marſhal d' Humieres, on one Side, Prince Vaudement, at the Head of a little Army of Obſervation, compos'd of Spaniards, Hollanders, and German Mercenaries, was to keep Mr. Calvo, another of the French Generals, in check on the other.

A Body of Iriſh given to the Emperor.

This was the general State of Things at the Opening of the Campaign; and as France had never been attack'd by ſo many different Powers, from ſo many different Quarters, at once, ſo there had never appear'd the Marks of ſo good an Underſtanding in ſo vaſt a Confederacy before. That there ſhould be a thorough Union between England and Holland was no Wonder, ſince they had one and the ſame Head, and ſince Mr. Heinſius, the Dutch Penſionary, was as deep in the Orange Intereſt as Mr. Fagel his Predeceſſor. That the States and his Catholic Majeſty, or his Catholic Majeſty and the Emperor, ſhould alſo agree in the ſame Meaſures, was eaſy to be accounted for, ſince they had in the main the ſame Intereſts: But that the ſeveral Princes of Germany, whoſe Views were ever oppoſite and irreconcileable, and who were almoſt as jealous of the Emperor as of France, ſhould all cooperate in the Proſecution of the ſame Syſtem, will be Matter of Aſtoniſhment to all future Ages: Yet ſuch was the Matter of Fact. The Elector of Bavaria made his own Terms at Vienna, with the Emperor in Perſon; and the reſt by their reſpective Miniſters: At Franckfort there was afterwards a perſonal Interview between the Duke of Lorrain, the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, the Landtgrave of Heſſe, the Prince of Hanover, the Duke of Wirtemberg, Count Staremberg, &c: And, upon the Whole, ſuch a Plan of Operations was laid down as all the Princes aſſented to; and by which it was not only provided how the ſeveral Armies ſhould ſeverally act; but alſo how they ſhould ſtand connected with, and be ſerviceable to, each other.

France and its Apprehenſions.

It was now for the firſt time, that France apprehended her Days of Humiliation were at hand; and yet, tho' thus every way ſurrounded with Enemies, ſhe neither betray'd any Signs of Deſpondency, nor made any unbecoming Submiſſions; but, on the contrary, ſhe prepar'd to exert her Strength, Spirit, and Genius, in proportion to the Difficulties and Dangers that threaten'd her; and, ſingle as ſhe was, enter'd the Liſts againſt all. But the Honour ſhe acquir'd by her Fortitude and Magnanimity, was, at the ſame Inſtant, miſerably ſully'd by the Continuance of her Cruelties. Finding it impoſſible to make good her Projects in Germany, in favour of her

A. D. 1689. her Creature, Cardinal Furſtemburg, or even to maintain her Footing in the ſeveral Provinces which ſhe had acquir'd by Force of Arms, and could hold only by the ſame Means, as ſhe gradually withdrew her Forces, thoſe Forces had Orders to ſet fire to all the Towns and Villages they abandon'd, that they might be uſeleſs to the Enemy; which they perform'd without Mercy or Remorſe: Hillenſheim, Brevil, Lechenich, Kempen, and Zulpig, are among the foremoſt in the dreadful Catalogue of Places thus inhumanly laid waſte: Arweyler they only diſmantled; but the Caſtles of Godenau, Bornheim, Suitzig, and Manderſheyt, as alſo the Town of Andernach, in the Neighbourhood of Bonne and Coblentz, they left in Aſhes. At Mentz, which they reſolv'd to defend, they reduc'd the Inhabitants to the utmoſt Miſery and Wretchedneſs. They demanded two hundred ſixty-ſix thouſand Crowns, for Contributions, of the Duchy of Wirtemberg, on pain of military Execution: And they not only undermin'd the Walls and Bridge of Triers, with a Deſign to blow them up, but laid in Ruins almoſt all the Caſtles and Towns of that Electorate: They did the ſame by the Cities of Spire, Worms, and Oppenheim; ſo effectually too, that we are told ſcarce a Houſe was left ſtanding in any of them: At Heidelberg, they were ingeniouſly cruel; for the Inhabitants not being able to conceal the Joy they felt, on the Proſpect of their Deliverance from ſuch Tyrant-Maſters, they ſhut them all up in a great Church, the only one they ſpar'd, that they might ſee their City deſtroy'd to its very Foundations; which was done accordingly, without any Regard to Maſterpieces of Art, Remains of Antiquity, or the Works of Zeal and Charity: And, to complete all, they are even accus'd, of appointing a Day of ſolemn Thankſgiving to God, in all the frontier Towns, for their Succeſs in theſe diabolic Exploits, and not only enjoining the Miniſters of the Reformed Religion to aſſiſt in it, but to draw their Diſcourſes from the following Text, Come let us root them out, that they be no more a Nation.

Horrid Ravages and Devaſtations committed by the French Troops in Germany.

Thoſe who make it their Buſineſs to extenuate theſe brutal Exceſſes, in Tenderneſs to the French Nation, and the Glory of their King, endeavour to perſuade Poſterity, that they were the Reſult of Neceſſity and Policy, and almoſt as abhorrent to thoſe who committed, as thoſe who ſuffer'd under, them: But there needs no more to determine how well this Gloſs will endure the Teſt of Time and Reaſon, than to ſet in oppoſition to it, the Behaviour of the Court of Spain, at the very ſame Period, under the like Pretenſions of Neceſſity and Policy, and with the additional Weight of innumerable Provocations, viz. While Mr. de Rebenac, in the Name of the moſt Chriſtian King his Maſter, was ſoliciting his Catholic Majeſty to ſtand neuter, and almoſt every Occurrence that aroſe gave him Reaſon to deſpair of Succeſs, the Galleons arriv'd at Cadiz from New Spain, on board of which the Merchants of France had, as uſual, an immenſe Treaſure. All was regiſtred in the King's Books, and of courſe to be depoſited in the King's Ware-houſes: De Rebenac was too well acquainted with the Practices of his own Court, not to fear, that the Spaniards would copy them at this extraordinary Criſis; nor was his Fear wholly unreaſonable; there were, even in the Cabinet of Spain, Perſons who not only ſaw, but were for improving, the Advantage; urging, plauſibly enough, That the Conduct of France had abundantly authoriſ'd ſuch a Procedure; that ſhe was govern'd by Convenience always, by Equity never; that, with the Fraudulent, Fraud was lawful; that the Seizure now contended for, was no other than a Reprizal, and might be conſider'd as a Part of the very Redreſs they were on the point of drawing the Sword to procure; that to weaken an Enemy was a Part of Self-defence; that, if an abſolute Confiſcation ſhould be diſapprov'd, the Money might be at leaſt apply'd to the Uſe of the State, till the War was over; and that, even then, the Reſtitution of it might ſerve as a Means of procuring an advantageous Peace. But the Majority, with a true Spaniſh Greatneſs, reply'd, That it would be more worthy of the Crown of Spain to ſet an Example of Equity and Generoſity to the beſt of Kings, than to tread in the Steps of the Worſt; that one Perfidy of their Side was ſufficient to authorize all thoſe they had hitherto complain'd of, and to furniſh France with Arguments to confute their own; that, indeed, if the Treaſure in queſtion had been the immediate Property of the moſt Chriſtian King, his Catholic Majeſty might hold himſelf at liberty to divert it into his own Coffers; but as it was the Property of Merchant-Adventurers, who had put their Truſt in the unblemiſh'd Honour of the Spaniſh Nation, and as there was no declar'd Rupture as yet between the two Nations, it were the worſt of Treaſons to give into the ſmalleſt Violation of that Truſt: And, laſtly, That, even in point of Policy, ſhould it be admitted to be of ſome Uſe, if apply'd to the preſent Neceſſities of the State; no preſent Convenience could poſſibly counter-balance the manifold Miſchiefs which would unavoidably attend ſuch a Breach of national Faith. And ſo much Weight had theſe and the like Reaſons with his Catholic Majeſty, that the Treaſure was deliver'd in the uſual Forms, and the Miniſter of France aſcrib'd that to his own Addreſs, and the Reſpect ſhewn to the King his Maſter, which was the genuine Reſult of the Honour and Integrity of the Spaniſh Nation.

An Inſtance of the exemplary Juſtice of the Spaniards.

But the ſame cruel, if not miſtaken, Policy, which induc'd the French to make War at the Expence of all their Pretenſions to Chriſtianity, Civility, or even Humanity, induc'd them alſo, to break thro' all the Obligations of Government at home. The Huguenots were no more: The Dragoon-Miſſionaries, formerly ſpoken of, had converted all who had not fled their Country, or who had not breath'd their laſt in the Priſons and the Galleys: But then theſe new Converts were as obnoxious as the Huguenots had been before: Their Profeſſions were known to be Cruel Uſage of the new Converts in France.

A.D. 1689. be the Effect of Fear, not of Conviction; and it was apprehended they wanted nothing but Opportunity, not only to retract their new Tenets, but to manifeſt their Reſentments: As often therefore, as they ventur'd to form a Congregation, to worſhip God after their own Way, and were diſcover'd, the Soldiery were let looſe upon them; Hundreds of Wretches were often put to the Sword; and ſuch as were taken were either hang'd on the next Tree, without Proceſs or Form of Law; or, by way of Favour, ſent to the Galleys: The moſt eminent among them were moreover ſent to Priſon, either by way of Precaution, or as Hoſtages for the Fidelity of the reſt; and, by expreſs Edict, the Goods and Eſtates of ſuch as had forſaken the Kingdom, and did not return by a certain Day, were to be confiſcated, and their Fathers, Children, Brothers, and Wives, were order'd to depart the Kingdom. The Provinces moſt ſuſpected were moreover viſited with all the Terrors of a military Government; and, by the Aſpect of that Government, the Vigilance of the Commanders, the Apprehenſions they ſhew'd, the Precautions they took, and the Severities they us'd, thoſe Provinces might very well have been taken for new Acquiſitions, and the Inhabitants for ſo many declar'd Enemies.

France oblig'd to exert her whole Force.

To keep the Peace at home upon theſe Terms and by theſe Means, as well as to hold the Conqueſts they had made, and to make head againſt ſuch a Variety of potent Enemies abroad, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty not only found it neceſſary, to have no leſs than three hundred and fifty thouſand Men in Arms, but alſo, to ſet forth an Edict, by which the Ban and Arrier-Ban were order'd to hold themſelves in readineſs to take the Field, upon the firſt Warning: And after all this mighty Multitude were thus diſjoin'd from the Community, his Miniſters found Ways and Means for their Support, by draining and impoveriſhing the reſt.

To be all-ſufficient, or, at leaſt, to be thought ſo, was plainly the Ambition of this great Monarch; and that his Actions might correſpond as far as poſſible with his Pretenſions, at the ſame time that he undertook to reſtore King James to his loſt Dominions, he reſolv'd to convince the World, that he was every where able to defend his own. Thus, over and above the two Armies in Flanders, already mention'd, under the Command of the Marſhal de Humieres and Mr. Calvo, he appointed the Duke de Noailles, with a third, to act againſt the Spaniards in Catalonia: And, as it was preſum'd, that the preſent Union of the Germans would be of no long Duration, inſtead of making a Diſpoſition to face them with equal Force, and to put the Iſſue of all on one general Battle, he caus'd very ſtrong Garriſons, under the Command of his beſt Officers, to be thrown into all the Places which he thought would be attack'd, and were worth defending: And, while the Enemy, under their ſeveral Leaders, ſhould be employ'd in reducing theſe by ſo many formal Sieges, he caus'd ſeveral ſmall Armies, under the Command of the Duke de Duras, in chief, Mr. de Sourdis, the Marquis de Boufflers, the Count de Monclare, and the Marquis de Choiſeul, to take all Opportunities of ſurpriſing Convoys, circumventing Parties, plundering and burning Towns, and, in general, of ravaging the Country wherever they came.

But how politic ſoever this Method of Proceeding may be thought, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Merit of it was, in Part, the Reſult of Neceſſity; for, in certain intercepted Letters from Mr. de Louvois to the Marquis d'Uxelles, Governor of Mentz, which fell into the Hands of the Duke of Lorrain, it is acknowledg'd, "That the King had been forc'd to ſend the Arier-Ban towards the Coaſts; and that by reaſon of ſome Diſappointment, he (the Marquis) muſt not expect very conſiderable Succours; for that the Demand of Troops was too great every where, and that the Enemy had never had before ſo great a Force in the Field."

Thus we find, that even this Briarius of Kings had all his Hands full; and that, how great ſoever his Strength really was, it was, for this once, overmatch'd.

To paſs on to the Campaign itſelf: While the French were, on all Sides, buſy in laying waſte the Territories they abandon'd, the firſt Undertaking of the Allies was to reduce ſuch Places in the Electorate of Cologne, as, having admitted mix'd Garriſons of French and Germans, ſtill adher'd to the Cardinal of Furſtemburg who had plac'd them there; and that not more to compliment the Elector with the entire Poſſeſſion of his new Dominions, than to reſtore to Germany the Command of the Rhine. This fell to the Lot of the Elector of Brandenburgh, and the Troops under his Command; and the Places thus to be reduc'd, were Rhineburgh, Keyſerwaert and Bonne. Care was taken, however, that the firſt ſhould give him no Trouble. The Baron de Berenſau, the Governor of it, had given out, That he was under no Engagements to France; and that thoſe he had enter'd into, were ſimply to hold the Place for the Prince, who ſhould be canonically choſen. This made way for a Negociation: An Offer was made him to pay his Garriſon, and continue him in the Command, in caſe he would open his Gates to the new Elector: He embrac'd it: The Agreement was ſign'd May 15, N. S. The next Day both he and the Magiſtracy took the Oaths of Fealty, and four hundred Brandenburghers, and five Companies of Dutch, took Poſſeſſion. The French, who amounted to ſix hundred, being ſent to to Armberg and Warle, and the twelve hundred Germans, who made up the Reſidue of the Garriſon, being reſerv'd to take the Field.

Rhineburgh admits to the Elector of Cologne.

The Cardinal of Furſtemburg himſelf had till now continued his Reſidence at Bonne; but after the Loſs of his Convoy at Liege, and the Surrender of Rhineburgh, finding the Ground ſink under him on all Sides, he ſtripp'd the Electoral Palace of all its valuable Furniture, to the very Ornaments of the Chapel, and retir'd to Metz; from whence he made the beſt of his Way to Paris.

While the Treaty with the Governor of

A. D. 1689. Rhinebergh was depending, the Brandenburgers inveſted Keyſerwaert, and would have induc'd Mr. Marcognet, who had the Command there, to follow Berenſau's Example: But he had other Notions of the Truſt repos'd in him, and reſolv'd to be true to it, tho' aſſur'd, that, if he did not capitulate before the 25th of May, he ſhould have no Quarter: Accordingly, the Place being rather blockaded than attack'd, he ſuffer'd the Time preſcrib'd to elapſe, without making the leaſt Conceſſion; which oblig'd the Elector to proſecute the Siege in Perſon, with his whole Army: It was the 21ſt of June, N. S. when he arriv'd in his Camp; the ſame Night the Trenches were open'd; and by the 24th, all his Bomb and Cannon Batteries began to play on the Town, with ſuch Succeſs, that the great Tower was ſet on fire, and many Houſes beſides: A Storm was the next thing to be apprehended, and the Governor ſeem'd reſolv'd to abide all Extremities; but the German Part of the Garriſon being of another Opinion, he found himſelf under a Neceſſity to beat a Parley the next Day, and ſurrender the Place, on condition that the French ſhould march out with all the Honours of War, and be conducted to Luxemburgh; and that the Germans ſhould be at liberty to retire with their Baggage to whatever Place they pleas'd, or to enter into the Service of any of the Confederates; but not to continue any longer in that of France: The Governor had alſo Leave to take two thouſand Crowns along with him, out of the Contribution-Money, which he had in his poſſeſſion, and which amounted to upwards of eighty thouſand Crowns: The reſt was left to the Diſpoſal of the Elector; who having garriſon'd the Place with four hundred Brandenburghers, two hundred Dutch, and two hundred Munſterians, gave the Command of it to General Schoening (who had diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in the Beginning of this Year, by defeating the Marquis of Sourdis, together with about ſeven or eight thouſand French, in the Neighbourhood of Neyss); and ſoon after made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions for laying ſiege to Bonne.

Keyſerwaert reduc'd by the Elector of Brandenburgh.

In this Interval the Duke of Lorrain, with the Army under his Command, paſs'd the Rhine at Coblentz, as alſo the Moſelle at Alcken, in his Way to Honſdruch; where he was join'd by the Troops of Lunenburgh; and (having left five thouſand Imperial Horſe in the Territories of Triers, to hinder the Excurſions of the French Garriſon at Mont-Royal; as alſo thrown Garriſons into Meyen, Hilleſheim, and Aſchaffenburg, to cut off the Communication between Mont-Royal and Bonne) continu'd his March thro' the great Foreſt of Saxn, in order to lay Siege to Mentz; but halted ſix Leagues ſhort of that City, to reduce the ſtrong Caſtle of Ebernburg, which was alſo held by the French. The Saxons had Orders, at the ſame time, to lay a Bridge of Boats over the Rhine, a little below Oppenheim, to facilitate their Junction with the Duke, in the Neighbourhood of Mentz; and the Heſſians, who, together with a Party of the Saxons, were to keep their Poſts at Coſtheim and Caſſel, on the other Side of the Rhine, had already erected ſeveral Batteries, with which they endeavour'd to annoy that City; and, more eſpecially, to demoliſh the Forts which the French had rais'd to command the Paſſage of the Main into the Rhine. A. D. 1689.

On the 17th of July the Duke of Lorrain with the Imperial Army ſat down before Mentz, and the ſame Day was join'd by the Elector of Saxony and his Troops; the Horſe paſſing the Rhine over the Bridge before-mention'd, and the Foot in Boats: On the 22d the Trenches were open'd; and on the ſame Day the Elector of Bavaria arriv'd in the Camp, and was prevail'd upon not only to reinforce the Army with a large Body of his Troops, but alſo to co-operate in carrying on the Siege in Perſon, while the reſt of his Forces continued at Ladenburgh, to reſtrain the Excurſions of the French from Philipſburgh, who threaten'd to put the neighbouring Country under Contribution: The Enemy had in Garriſon twelve Battalions of their very beſt Troops, a Regiment of Horſe, a Regiment of Dragoons, a Company of Bombardiers, and a Company of Miners; all under the Command of the Marquis d'Uxelles, who, by the Works he had added, the Stores he had provided, and the Preparations of all ſorts he had made, very plainly manifeſted his Deſign was to defend the Place to the laſt Extremity. Mentz inveſted:

On the very ſame Day that the Trenches were open'd before Mentz, the Elector of Brandenburgh came in ſight of Bonne: A Party of his Forces had ſome Days before reduc'd the Fort on the Side of the Rhine, over-againſt that Place, and rais'd three Batteries therein: On the 23d, theſe Batteries began to play on the Town; and on the following Days the Garriſon found themſelves ſurrounded with the Fire of a hundred Pieces of Cannon and thirty Mortars, which were ply'd with great Vigour, and with equal Succeſs; if the Progreſs of Deſtruction and Confuſion deſerves that Name: But as no Trenches were open'd, nor Approaches were made, the French maintain'd their Poſts, return'd Fire for Fire, and ſeem'd diſpos'd to defend themſelves againſt this Method of Proceeding, as long as their Ammunition laſted. Why his Electoral Highneſs did not open the Siege in form, as he was preſs'd to do, by the Envoy of Munſter and the Magiſtrates of Cologne, is, perhaps, to be accounted for partly by the Maxim which is common to the German Princes; namely, of ſaving their Men, when they make their Levies at their own Charge; and partly by the Backwardneſs of the ſaid Magiſtracy to make the Payments requir'd of them, to defray the Charge of ſo expenſive an Undertaking. But his Advocates will needs have his Slowneſs to be rather the Reſult of actual Neceſſity, than of Non-payment on one hand, or of that ſaving Policy on the other: For, according to them, his Army was ſo diminiſh'd, by the ſeveral conſiderable Detachments he was forc'd to make, that the Remainder was not ſufficient And Bonne; [State of Europe, vol. i. p. 380.]

A. D. 1689. sufficient to profecute the Siege in any other Way. They inſtance, 1ſt, The Demand made upon him by Prince Waldeck, who being out-number'd in Horſe by the Marſhal d'Humieres, in Flanders, made it his Requeſt, that thoſe of the States his Maſters, which ſerv'd under the Elector, might be ſent back to reinforce him: But this Requiſition was not made till the Beginning of Auguſt, nor comply'd with till September the 5th. 2. The Detaching General Schoening, with ſix thouſand Men, on what Service will be made appear in its Place: But Schoening did not begin his March till the 28th of Auguſt. And, laſtly, his ſending ſix thouſand more, to reinforce the Confederates at Mentz: But neither did theſe ſet out on that Service, till the 7th of September: So that from the 22d of July till the 28th of Auguſt, he had his whole Army entire: And yet, in that long Interval, he had not ſo much as completed a Line of Circumvallation.

Excurſions of the Duke de Duras.

While the Confederates were thus employ'd upon the Rhine, the Duke de Duras, by way of Diverſion, paſs'd the Rhine with about fifteen thouſand Men; and to ſhew the Germans what they had to expect, in caſe they preſum'd to make any Reſiſtance, having taken a ſmall Place upon the Neckar by Aſſault, he put all the Inhabitants to the Sword; after which he puſh'd on to Heidelberg, or rather the Ruins of that Place; which the Allies had again taken poſſeſſion of, had garriſon'd with five hundred Men, and had endeavour'd to re-fortify, as well as they could, by throwing up Trenches, ſurrounding the Place with Paliſades, &c.: Which had ſo good an Effect, that tho' the Duke came before the Place on the 4th of Auguſt, he did not make his Attack till the 7th; in which Interval, the Garriſon was happily reinforc'd by the Regiment of Wirtemberg, and by their Help were enabled to make ſo good a Defence, that the Marſhal was glad to retire the next Day, having loſt about three hundred and fifty Men, in his Attempt to ſtorm the Place: Upon the News of this Excurſion, the Confederates lying before Mentz detach'd Count Dunewaldt, with a Body of ſix thouſand Horſe, to harraſs the Enemy in their Retreat; and Count Serini, who commanded the reſt of the Bavarians, lying at Ladenburgh, made a like Detachment, under the Command of Count Rabatin, to do the ſame: But Dunewaldt never was able to come up with them; and the only Advantage obtain'd by Rabatin was, over a Party of eight hundred Horſe, of whom he kill'd about a hundred, and took ſixty Priſoners; which was, about the ſame time, more than balanc'd by M. de Duras; for, coming to Bruſchal, where two Battalions of Bavarian Troops were poſted, he oblig'd them to ſurrender at Diſcretion, and, together with the Inhabitants, ſent them Priſoners to Straſburgh: He then caus'd the Place itſelf to be burnt to the Ground; as, in the Courſe of his March towards Baden, he did alſo by Bradheim, Dourlach, Ellingen, Heydelſpeim, (i) Weingarten, Stollhofen, Maulbron, and, in general, all the Towns and Villages that lay in his Way; inſomuch that the whole Face of the Country preſented nothing but one vaſt Scene of Deſolation.

About the ſame time that the Duke de Duras ſet out on this barbarous Expedition, the Marquis de Boufflers advanc'd from Luxemburgh into the Territories of Triers, having under his Command three thouſand one hundred Horſe and Dragoons, according to ſome Accounts; but, according to others, ſix and forty Squadrons of Horſe, and near three thouſand Foot: All however agree, that his Commiſſion was of the ſame kind with that of the Duke, and that he made the ſame Uſe of it, by burning and deſtroying all before him; which he found no very difficult Taſk; for, except at Cochem, a ſmall Town upon the Moſelle, about five Leagues from Mont-Royal, it does not appear that he found any to reſiſt him: But there lay a Party of Germans, half Imperialiſts, half Inhabitants of Triers, conſiſting of ſeven hundred Men, ſay ſome; of ſixteen hundred, ſay others; who, on the Marquis's Approach, ſtood to their Arms, refus'd to ſurrender, unleſs upon honourable Conditions, and, that being refus'd, prepar'd for a vigorous Defence: The French had no Artillery; being therefore under a Neceſſity to proceed by Storm, they made three ſeveral Attacks at once, and were repuls'd in all, three ſeveral times: The Place itſelf was little better than a Ruin; for it was one of thoſe which they had before demoliſh'd; and when they were returning to the Charge a fourth time, all enrag'd with the Difficulty they had met with, and the Loſs they had ſuſtain'd, thoſe within, who were poſted in the Caſtle, were at that Inſtant retiring into the Town, thinking it the moſt tenable; which gave them an Opportunity not only to enter on that Side, but even to ruſh into the Town itſelf together with the unfortunate Defendants: The Latter did not however throw down their Arms; but, on the contrary, drawing up in the Market-place, fought on deſperately, till they were overpower'd by Numbers; and then the exaſperated Victors put them all to the Sword, as alſo all the Inhabitants, Man, Woman and Child; except about three hundred, who, more thro' Wearineſs than Remorſe, had the Favour to be made Priſoners of War.

It was the News of this Exploit, and that the Marquis was marching on to Meyen, that induc'd the (k) Elector of Brandenburgh to detach General Schoening from the Siege of Bonne, as above-mention'd: And all the Service perform'd by that Detachment was, the frightening the Marquis back to his Den; for Schoening never came up with him.

In this Interval Prince Waldeck having ſo far

(i) In their firſt Attempt on this Place, the French were ſo warmly receiv'd, that out of four hundred but fourteen eſcap'd: But, in their ſecond, they carry'd it without Reſiſtance.

(k) Thoſe who undertake to juſtify that Prince's Conduct, ſpeculate this Action a whole Month, viz. the 25th of July for the 25th of Auguſt.

A. D. 1689. far reinforc'd his Army, that he was superior in Foot to the French, tho' he remain'd still inferior in Horse, thought it high time to put his Troops in Motion; and, accordingly, without waiting for the Detachment, which he had requir'd from before Bonne, he march'd towards the Sambre, August the 12th; and having been re-inforc'd by the way with 4000 Lunenburgh Horse, pass'd that River on the 16th, and took post on the 19th, at Hom-sur-Heur; upon which Mr. de Humieres retir'd towards Maubeuge. On the same Day the Marquis de Gastanaga, Governor of the Netherlands, join'd the Army under Prince Vaudement; and, together with that General, concerted the necessary Measures for forcing Mr. Calvo's Lines, between the Schelde and the Lys, which extended from Pont-Espierres to Menin.

Both Calvo and de Humieres had express Orders to put nothing to the Hazard; but to keep on the Defensive only; and for the very same Reasons that these Orders were given, the Allies made it their Business to oblige those Generals to break them. It was with this View that Prince Waldec, having drawn out his Army on the 21st, offer'd the Marshal Battle; and when he found the Marshal had so much Command of himself as to withstand the Bravade, and keep close in his Camp, which he had also taken care to fortify, he made a Feint in the next Place to attack Philippeville; and when that Artifice also fail'd of its Effect, he sent out his Parties on every Side to bring in or destroy the Forage of the whole Country.

The Allies at Walcourt. It was thus a large Party of his Army was employ'd in three several Divisions, under the Command of the Generals Webbenau, Marlborough and d' Hulst on the 25th, when he receiv'd Advice, that the Marshal, having been re-inforc'd with 6000 Men, was on his March towards him, and of which he gave immediate Notice to the Foragers, by causing certain Pieces of Cannon to be fir'd, which was the Signal for their Return to the Camp; and also by sending Major de Reo, with certain Light-Horse to bring them back. But while this was doing, the Van of the French Army, not only appear'd in Sight, but actually push'd on to attack that of the Allies, which was in no Disposition to receive them. The Prince had, however, posted eight hundred Foot, mostly English, under the Command of Colonel Hodges, at a Village call'd Forge, to cover the Foragers, who, for two Hours together, defended the Place with the utmost Bravery; and then, seeing the whole French Army at hand, retreated fighting, under the Cover of those very Light Horse which had been detach'd to call home the Foragers, till they gain'd the Top of a Hill near Walcourt, where was posted a Battalion of Lunenburghers, who not only stood the Shock of the Enemy, but held them at bay, till they were reinforc'd by another Battalion. The Town of Walcourt was the Pass to the Camp of the Allies, and to gain and defend it, was the great Business of the Day. To gain it the French made their Attack with six Battalions of Guards, certain Regiments of Horse and Foot, and several Pieces of Cannon: And to defend it Prince Waldec rais'd a Battery on a Hill above it, and caus'd two several Bodies of Troops to advance; the first consisted of three Regiments, one of them English, conducted by Brigadier Talmash, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Ashau; and the second, all English, under the Command of the Earl of Marlborough. These bore the Brunt of the whole Dispute, which lasted till six o'Clock in the Evening; at which time Talmash's Regiment, which had been detach'd, under the Command of Major-General Slangenburg, to charge the Enemy in Flank, perform'd that Service so resolutely and effectually, that they thought fit to retire, leaving behind them their Cannon and Ammunition, as also their Dead and Wounded; which, according to the French Account, amounted to less than (l) seven hundred, but according to that of the Allies, to two thousand. There was, however, no Pursuit; which, notwithstanding what is urg'd, that the Ground was hilly, &c. argues, that the Advantage was not very great, and that Mr. d'Humieres was in a Condition to sustain his Party. Prince Waldec, in his Letter to the States, signifies, "That the Enemy, in their Retreat, sent two Drums to desire a Cessation to bury their Dead, who acknowledg'd, That the six Battalions of Guards engag'd in the Attack, were, for the most part, ruin'd." Speaking of his own Loss, he at the same time says, "On our Side, none of any Consideration were kill'd, besides Lieutenant-Colonel Grahme of the English, the Major of the Lunenburgh Dragoons, and a Captain-Lieutenant; and a Captain of some Foragers was taken; and in the Town there were very few kill'd or wounded." These few are made to amount by some, to between two and three hundred: And as to the Issue of all, it is thus modestly summ'd up in the Prince's Letter, "The French retir'd to their Camp, and our Troops kept their Ground till Night." Now this keeping their Ground was apparently all the actual Advantage the Allies had to boast; and as that Advantage consisted in the Honour only, it may be said, that that Feather was the General's Fee: But even the General himself had scarce worn it in his Cap, before it was blown away; for, on the first of September, he repass'd the Sambre; and on the sixth, a Party of fifteen thousand French erected a Battery at Chasteler, to cannonade him in his Camp; which, tho' a mere Piece of Ostentation, serv'd, however, to manifest, that the Affair of Walcourt, was, in point of Consequence, scarce worth the Expence of a Courier; for Prince Waldec was so far from calling them to an Account for this Insult, that he

A. D. 1689. he kept close within his Lines, answer'd their Challenge with his Cannon only, and suffer'd them not only to go off without Punishment, but without Molestation.

The Spaniards join the French Lines.

The Marquis de Gastanaga and Prince Vaudemont, in the mean while, continued their March towards Mr. Calvo; but he, having Notice of their Intentions, decamp'd on the fifth Instant, and made the best of his way towards Tournay: But that his Retreat might have the Air of an Enterprize, he, at the same time, sent a Detachment to plunder and burn Courtray; which was, however, prevented by the Vigilance of Prince Vaudemont. The Allies took immediate Possession of the Lines which the French had abandon'd, and not only summon'd in the Boors of several Villages, within the French Territories, to demolish them, but laid the adjacent Country under Contribution.

It was about this time, that the French talk'd of nothing less than raising the Siege of Mentz: And there is some Reason to think they were in earnest; for Marshal d'Humieres was order'd to send a Detachment of eight thousand Men, to reinforce the Duke de Duras on the Rhine, and to replace them, by drawing ten Battalions out of the Garrisons in Flanders: But, whether they were in earnest or not, this Measure made no Alteration in the Conduct of the Allies on that Side; for, instead of weakening himself, by sending another Detachment to follow that of the French, Prince Waldec did no more than send a Courier to the Duke of Lorrain, to put him on his Guard; who was thereupon furnish'd with the Brandenburghers from Bonne; on the contrary, they seem'd to redouble their Preparations to finish the Campaign with some Master-stroke: Thus, on the 25th, the Spanish and Dutch Armies join'd each other at Hall: The next Day, the long-expected Body of Horse arriv'd from Bonne; eight thousand Hanoverians, in Spanish Pay, commanded by the Duke in Person, were also in full March, to reinforce them yet farther (and would have been in Flanders much sooner, if, thro' the Importunities of the Emperor, they had not been detain'd at Mentz); and, on the 3d of October, the combin'd Army march'd from Enghien, in quest of the Marshal; who, having decamp'd from Leffines two Days before, had taken post at Leuze, between two Rivers; and, for farther Security, tho' reinforc'd by Mr. Calvo and his Corps, had fortify'd his Camp with Intrenchments, Redoubts, Cannon, &c. This did indeed argue Fear, but then it bestow'd Safety; for when the Allies came up, they found it impossible to make use of their Superiority; and, after putting in practice all the Arts they could think of, to draw the Marshal from behind his Works, in vain, had at last the Mortification to see him decamp on the 15th, and take Refuge under the Cannon of Tournay, without having it even in their Power to insult his Rear, or snatch any Advantage of any kind: Soon after which the several Armies broke up, and were distributed into Winter-Quarters.

During a great Part of this time, the Siege of Mentz was carry'd on with the utmost Vigour, by the confederate Princes; and the Place was defended with as much Resolution by the French: The Works which the Former rais'd, the Latter made it their Business to destroy: Both were under the Dominion of the same violent Passions: These believ'd the Glory of their great Monarch was committed to their Keeping; Those, that they were the Avengers of their bleeding Country. The same eager Spirit, whether of Rage or Ambition, which animated the Commanders, possess'd even the private Men: Hence every Attack, and every Sally, was equally desperate; every Day the Sun rose and set in Blood; and every Hour produc'd some new Spectacle of Horror.

The Progress of the Siege of Mentz.

On the 20th of August, the Besieged made no less than three Sallies, within two Hours of each other; and the Last with three thousand Men, in Battle-Array, Drums beating, Colours flying, and with as much Fury, as if they meant to storm the Trenches that surrounded them: All these several Actions were fatal to Numbers of gallant Men; but the last the most: For the Confederates, not expecting a new Effort, were scarce in a Condition to defend themselves, much less to give a proper Reception to the Enemy: The Consequence of which was, that the French kill'd six hundred on the Spot, spik'd two Pieces of Cannon, fill'd up the Trenches, and posted their Main-guard of Horse in the Place where the Besiegers had begun to make their Approaches, before they could be repuls'd; tho' not without very considerable Loss to themselves. They also intended to have made another Sally, with a much greater Force, on the 25th, being St. Louis's Day; but were prevented by one of the Besiegers Bombs, which fell among three thousand Hand-Granades, prepar'd for that Occasion, and blew them all up. On the 28th, when the Grand-Battery at the Bavarian and Saxon Attack, consisting of thirty-six Pieces of Cannon and ten Mortars, was to be play'd for the first time on the Town and Citadel, all the Musqueteers were drawn out, and order'd to give three Volleys, in the Front of the Lines, by way of Prelude; every Volley was follow'd by a Discharge of eight Bombs; and all was accompany'd with a a grand Chorus of Trumpets, Kettle-drums, and Hautbois; as if the Experiment of the Day had been to render Destruction pleasing, and make Men proud of being sacrific'd: And if ever it answer'd, it was now; for the French, in emulation of the Besiegers, made continual Returns of the like military Gallantries, and were led, under the same deceitful Appearances, to the same Ruin. It was after this Manner, and with prodigious Slaughter on both Sides, that these dreadful Operations were carry'd on till the 6th of September: And by that time, the Besiegers, in spite of all Opposition, having brought their Approaches close to the Walls, and several wide Breaches appearing therein, Preparations were made throughout the whole Camp for storming the Counterscarp; which took up the whole Day, till almost five in

the

A.D. 1689. the Afternoon: At which time the Signal being given, by a Diſcharge of four Pieces of Cannon and the firing a Bomb into the Air, the Attack was open'd at three ſeveral Places, with three ſeveral Columns of twelve thouſand Men each; who were divided into many ſeparate Bodies, that they might be able to ſecond and ſupport each other, as Exigencies ſhould ariſe. To break the Fury of this Storm, which they ſaw thus burſting upon them on every Side, the French gave fire to their Mines; but ſo raſhly and prematurely, that they had little or no Effect: The Aſſailants then fired their Counter-Mines, and, while the Earth trembled with the Shock it had ſuſtain'd, and the City was in a manner loſt in the Smoke which ſurrounded it, puſh'd on through the Cloud, mounted the Ruins they had made, and, after a moſt obſtinate Reſiſtance, which laſted four Hours and a half, not only carry'd the Counterſcarp Sword in hand, but cut in pieces all that oppos'd them, and purſued thoſe that fled, even to the very Gates. But this boaſted Succeſs coſt the Confederates, even by their own Confeſſion, the Lives of two thouſand five hundred Men; and, according to the Accounts of others, of thouſands more; for of three thouſand Grenadiers, that made the firſt Impreſſion, it is ſaid, hardly one thouſand return'd to the Camp. On the other Side, the French loſt above twelve hundred of their braveſt Men; and, ſeeing themſelves ſo expos'd on every Side to the Fury of an irreſiſtible Enemy, without any Proſpect, or even Poſſibility, of a timely Relief, they beat a Parley, and ſurrender'd the Place on the eleventh Inſtant; the Remains of the Garriſon marching out with their Arms and Baggage, Drums beating, Colours flying, ſix Pieces of Cannon, and two Mortars; but being oblig'd to leave behind them all the Contributions which they had exacted from the Inhabitants, and the Parts adjacent.

The Place re-du'd;

Upon the Whole, it muſt be allow'd, that if the Acquiſition was great, it was dearly purchas'd: Every Day's Expence amounted to a vaſt Sum, and every Advance the Beſiegers made coſt them Numbers of Lives: Even among the Princes and Grandees, many who were in purſuit of Glory met with Death: Scarce was the Place inveſted, before the young Prince Palatine was kill'd: And, in one of the terrible Sallies abovemention'd, the Prince of Hanover eſcap'd ſo narrowly, that a Shot went through his Hat: On the 25th of Auguſt, the Prince of Weidentz receiv'd a mortal Wound in the Trenches; as did alſo Duke Chriſtian of Saxe-Hall, on the 3d of September: And, in the Grand Aſſault, General Wallis, and ſeveral Colonels, were kill'd; and moſt of the commanding Officers were deſperately wounded.

Still the Siege, or rather Blockade, of Bonne continued; and the Elector of Brandenburgh was become ſo weary of it, that he was on the point of leaving the Direction of it to General Swartz: But, on receiving the News that Mentz was ſurrender'd, and that a Body of Imperialiſts were in full March to his Aſſiſtance, he alter'd his Purpoſe, and reſolv'd to command in perſon, till the Place was reduc'd. Accordingly two Attacks were open'd on the 16th, which were carry'd on with great Vigour till the 24th, when the Duke of Lorrain arriv'd in the Camp with four thouſand Horſe; and two Days after came up the Foot, conſiſting of eleven thouſand Imperialiſts and Lunenburghers, together with twenty-four Pieces of Cannon and ſeveral Mortars. A.D. 1689.

The Siege was now carry'd on with two hundred and fifty Pieces of Cannon, beſides Mortars; and the Progreſs made was ſuitable to the Strength employ'd in it: On the 9th of October the Counterſcarp was carry'd by Storm, as before at Mentz, and with proportionable Loſs on both Sides: This produc'd an Offer to capitulate the next Day; which was accepted by the Beſiegers; but the Treaty was not perfected till the 12th: For Mr. d'Alſfelt, the Governor, having demanded, that twenty Perſons ſhould be permitted to go out maſk'd, the Confederates abſolutely refus'd it; and the Terms at laſt agreed upon were, in the main, the ſame with thoſe of Mentz: In virtue of which, the Garriſon march'd out on the 15th, being reduc'd to half their original Number; and the Troops of Brandenburgh, Holland, and Munſter, took poſſeſſion: And immediately after, the two Armies, ſufficiently fatigued with ſo long and deſperate a Campaign, broke up, in order to paſs into their Winter-Quarters. as alſo Bonne.

As by the means of the French, who had their Agents perpetually at Work, both to perſuade the King and Republic of Poland, to ſtrike up a Peace with the Porte, and to induce the Porte to continue the War with the Emperor, there was a ſort of Connection between the Wars on this Side of Europe and thoſe of the other; it is alſo neceſſary to throw in a Sketch of the moſt material Paſſages which happen'd on the Latter, as well as the Former.

The Campaign was open'd with an Action in Croatia, between five thouſand Turks and a Body of Croats, who were encamp'd near the River Urna, between Vibitz and Novi; ſo much to the Diſadvantage of the Turks, that the greateſt Part of them were either put to the Sword or drown'd, their Commander taken Priſoner, and, together with eleven Standards, ſent to Vienna, in evidence of the Victory.

The Prince of Baden, according to the dilatory Cuſtom of the Germans, did not take the Field till about the 10th of June; and had even then the Mortification to find but fifteen thouſand Germans, or regular Troops, in his Army; while the Turks, as he was adviſ'd, were making Preparations to paſs the Morawa. This induc'd him to quicken the March of the Regiments that were ſtill to come up; as alſo, to order General Piccolimini to join him immediately with the Troops under his Command, on the Frontiers of Boſnia; after which he advanc'd towards that River, (Morawa) with all poſſible Expedition; deſigning to engage the Turks, if they attempted

A. D. 1689. tempted to pass over; but, finding by the way that the Enemy were not so forward with their Preparations as he expected, he thought it advisable to suspend his Design, and retire, till he was farther reinforc'd by the Forces under General Veterani, from Transilvania; who join'd him July 12, at a Place call'd Collar. In this Interval, the Turkish Seraskier, hearing of his Retreat, pass'd the Morava, and follow'd him with his whole Force, which was said to be forty or fifty thousand Men; but receiving Intelligence, by two Deserters, that the Imperial Army was now fully form'd, repass'd it again; and, to keep up the Spirit of his Troops, gave out, that he was soon to be join'd by the Grand Vizier, who was on his March, with the rest of the Forces from Adrianople.

The Battle of Passarowitz, or Patochin.

But the Prince, having thrown a Bridge over the Morava at Passarowitz, and secur'd it with a sufficient Redoubt at each End, without the least Regard to these intimidating Speeches, resolv'd to go once more in quest of the Enemy; who, we are told, had form'd a Design to enclose him in on every Side, and had actually begun to put it in Execution: August the 29th the advanc'd Parties of the two Armies met, and the whole Day was spent in several little Actions; in all of which, we are told, the Imperialists had the Advantage: The next Day, the Engagement became general: The Prince attack'd the Turks in their Intrenchments, near Patochin; which, being poorly defended, he became Master of, and, before Night, of their very Camp itself; the whole Turkish Army being struck with such a Panic, that they gave way before two Regiments of Foot, supported indeed by all the Cavalry, and at last made off in the utmost Confusion; leaving behind them all their Tents, Ammunition, Provision, Waggons, Camels, Buffaloes, &c. besides an hundred and five Pieces of Cannon, and three Mortars; and in their Flight becoming a Prey to the Hungarians and Rasciani, who made a far greater Slaughter amongst them, than they had suffer'd in the Action itself.

The Turks, who, before this Defeat, had form'd a Design of entering into Sclavonia, now thought only of preserving themselves: The Seraskier had directed his Course to Nissa, where his Magazines lay; and finding his Army was still far superior in point of Number to that of the Imperialists, resolv'd to make another Stand, and so to post himself, that, the Goodness of his Disposition might, if possible, restore the Confidence of his Troops. Accordingly he contriv'd to cover his Camp in such a manner, by making a proper Use of the happy Situation of the Place, that it was accessible only in the Rear; which he chose to leave open, that, in case the Enemy should prevail in the Front, he might be sure of a Retreat.

The Battle of Nissa.

On the 23d of September the Imperialists came up; and were surpriz'd to find the Infidels become such Proficients in the Art of encamping, which they had hitherto despis'd: Nothing pass'd that Day but insignificant Skirmishes; for the Turks were too cautious to quit their Lines, and the Prince of Baden was soon convinc'd that he could not force them: But, the next, the Imperialists having quitted their Camp an Hour before Day, and having rounded the Hill, discover'd the Opening before spoken of, and made as much Haste as the Ground would allow, to seize that only Advantage: The Seraskier, on the other hand, who now saw his Error, lost not a Moment in endeavouring to repair it: He set all his Pioneers to work, to fortify the Pass, order'd the Flower of the Janisaries to cover them, and the Spahies to issue out, and hold the Assailants in play, till these supplemental Lines were finish'd: But these were soon repuls'd; and tho' they charg'd a second time, with greater Fury than before, it was with worse Success; for now they were driven back upon the Janisaries, who also fir'd upon them, to oblige them to stand their ground, as did all the other Turkish Troops within Reach: But, instead of the desir'd Effect, this only serv'd to increase their Confusion: The Imperialists made their Onset at the same time, and had nothing to do but to hew their Passage thro' the Rout they had made. The Janisaries were themselves in the mean while attack'd; and, after a stout Resistance, which was fatal to General Vellen, who had the Command of the Right Wing, fell into Disorder, and mix'd with the fugitive Spahies, whom they had before so roughly handled: The rest was nothing but Confusion; and, had not Night come on immediately after, the whole Turkish Army had probably been broken to pieces: As it was, Numbers were kill'd, Numbers were drowned in the River which bounded one Side of their Camp; and all their new Tents, (including that of the Seraskier, which had been just presented to him by the Grand Vizier) Baggage, Cannon, Stores, &c. fell a second time into the Hands of the Victors: Nor was this all; for in Nissa, which they enter'd without Opposition, they found Provisions enough for the Subsistence of the whole Army, for five or six Weeks, and above three thousand Horses.

On the 6th of October, the Prince resum'd his March, with the best of his Troops; and on the 11th, came in sight of Widin; in which Place he found the Enemy, advantageously posted as before, but not as before relying on the Strength of their Intrenchments only: For their Cavalry now, as if ambitious to retrieve their lost Characters, issued out, and attack'd the left Wing of the Imperialists, where Prince Lewis commanded in person; but were again repuls'd, and driven back to their Intrenchments: The Janisaries also not only receiv'd but cover'd them, and fought like Men that resolv'd to sell their Lives as dearly as possible.--- But the Ottoman Star had lost its Influence.--- The Imperialists surmounted all Opposition; and, having storm'd the Lines on all Sides, gain'd another complete Victory, which was accompany'd with the Surrender of Widin: After which the Prince dispers'd his Troops and that of Widin.

A. D. 1689. into their Winter-Quarters, and return'd himſelf.

Thus it became univerſally manifeſt, that the Emperor, with leſs than half his Forces, could humble the Turk; and, when vigorouſly ſupported by the Princes of the Empire, and the reſt of his Allies, was not only able to hold the French at Bay, but even to wreſt their Conqueſts out of their Hands. It became alſo manifeſt, from the Stand which they had made on all Sides, that nothing leſs than a Continuance of the ſame Confederacy, and a Continuance of the ſame Harmony in the ſeveral Members of which it was compos'd, could poſſibly bring to Perfection the great Deſign in hand, of ſetting Bounds to the encroaching Genius of that haughty People, and of preſerving a due Balance of Power, which now, for the firſt time, began to be the current Language of England, as well as the other confederated Powers of Europe.

And yet, before this very Summer was quite expir'd, an Incident occurr'd, which ſerv'd to ſhew how rightly France had reaſon'd, with reſpect to the Union of the German Princes; and how liable the greateſt Fabrics, which were founded on public Good, were to be ſhaken by the ſmalleſt Gale of private Intereſt.

Death of the Duke of Saxe-Lawenburgh, and the Diſſenſions it occaſion'd.

The Duke of Saxe-Lawenburgh had departed this Life at Repſtadt in Bohemia, where he had a large Patrimony, conſiſting of many Lordſhips, towards the End of September: He had a Family-Clame to the Electorate of Saxony, as being deſcended from Bernard II. Brother and Heir to Eric V. who dy'd without Iſſue in 1431; for this Bernard ſuffering the Time of demanding the Inveſtiture to lapſe, the Emperor Sigiſmund took the Advantage to beſtow it on Frederic, Landtgrave of Thuringia. A long Diſpute enſued between the two Houſes; which was at laſt compromis'd in the Year 1671; on condition, that if there ſhould be a Defect of Male Iſſue on either Side, the other ſhould ſucceed to the Inheritance. Now this was the Caſe of Duke Julius-Francis, of whom we are now ſpeaking; and, in right of the ſaid Treaty, the Elector of Saxony not only laid clame to his Territories, but made all poſſible Haſte to take poſſeſſion; as being aware, that other Clamants would immediately ariſe; as alſo, that all the neighbouring Princes would interfere in the Conteſt, and ſeverally eſpouſe the Pretenſions of him that was moſt in their Intereſts. Theſe other Clamants were the Houſe of Anhalt and the Houſe of Lunenburgh; both of whom had Deeds of Settlement to ſhew, under the Hand of the late Duke, of a later Date than the Treaty of Compromiſe above-mention'd. That of Anhalt was the weakeſt of all, and therefore had the moſt Friends; tho' not out of Kindneſs, but Policy: For the Duchy in queſtion was not conſiderable enough to make them formidable; and yet was held too conſiderable to deſcend to thoſe who were formidable already. Among theſe the Elector of Brandenburgh intereſted himſelf the moſt, as being moſt jealous of the Houſe of Lunenburgh: And, at his Inſtance, even the Elector of Saxony, the original Clamant, was prevail'd on to wave his Pretenſions, in favour of the Prince of Anhalt. On the other hand, the Princes of Lunenburgh had the Countenance of the King of Sweden, and no more; for that Prince had declar'd, he would interpoſe with his good Offices only: But then they took the moſt effectual Meaſures imaginable to make their Party good, whether they were aſſiſted or not: For the Duke of Zell had the Start of the Elector of Saxony; and not only threw his Forces into the Towns of Radzeburg, Mollen, and Lawenburgh, but caus'd thoſe Places to be fortify'd, and declar'd his Reſolution to defend them againſt all Perſons whatſoever: This alarm'd the whole Circle, and indeed the whole Empire. The Electors of Brandenburgh and Saxony made a Shew of oppoſing Force to Force: The Former directed a Body of Troops to advance towards Mecklenburgh; the Latter another towards the Elbe; and the Lunenburghers, with all the Diligence imaginable, made new Levies on all Sides, and took all the Meaſures that could ſhew a ſettled Determination to vindicate all they had done, againſt Both. A. D. 1689.

The Houſe of Anhalt, in the mean while, appeal'd to the Diet of the Empire; who, after a ſolemn Examination, tranſmitted a State of the ſeveral Clames to the Emperor; and made it their Requeſt, that his Imperial Majeſty would enjoin the contending Parties to ſtop their military Proceſſes, and leave the Matter to be decided according to the Conſtitutions of the Empire. The Emperor did accordingly interpoſe; and ſo much Regard was paid to his Authority, that Hoſtilities were ſuſpended, and Conferences held: But no Accommodation was made; and it became every Day more and more apparent, that this ſelfiſh Broil had a Tendency to weaken, if not diſjoint, the whole Confederacy.

Campaign in Catalonia.

Such was the State of Germany, at the Cloſe even of a ſucceſsful Campaign: And as to the Progreſs of the War on the Side of Catalonia, of which we are ſtill to ſpeak, to complete the military Operations of the Year; it was ſuch, on both Sides, as ſcarce deſerv'd that Name. The French, it is true, were ſo early in the Field, that in their March to Campredon, where they arriv'd May 18, they found none but the Miquelets, or Militia, to interrupt their Progreſs; and ſo ſmall a Garriſon in the Place, that they carry'd both Town and Caſtle in three Days Time. After which they gave out, that, for their next Exploit, they would undertake the Siege of Roſes: But hearing that the Duke de Villa Hermoſa, with a Body of ſix thouſand Foot and four thouſand Horſe, beſides the Miquelets of the Province, was advancing towards them, they thought fit to retire to their own Borders, under pretence of the exceſſive Heats, which had already caus'd a Mortality among them: The Spaniards, nevertheleſs, follow'd them; and having blockaded Campredon, where the French had left a Garriſon of fifteen hundred Men, laid Rouſſilon under Contribution:

A. D. 1689. tribution: This oblig'd the Duke de Noailles to quicken the Reinforcements which he expected out of Languedoc; and, while these were coming up, the Duke de Villa Hermosa laid siege to Campredon, in form; but not with such Success as the French had met with before; for the Garrison made a resolute Defence, till M. de Noailles came up to their Relief; and tho' the Latter could not raise the Siege, neither could the Former reduce the Place: The French had posted themselves on an Eminence, which at once commanded the Camp of the Besiegers, and had a Communication with the Garrison; and under the Fire both of their own Cannon, and those of the Besieged, sent out a strong Party, to force the Enemy's Lines; but were so vigorously repuls'd, and with so great Loss, (almost the whole Party being either cut off, or taken Prisoners in their Retreat) that they not only gave over their Enterprize, but three Days after, having withdrawn their Garrison, spik'd the Cannon, and sprung their Mines in order to dismantle the Place, retir'd with so much Precipitation, that they left several Pieces of Cannon, and a great Quantity of Ammunition and Provision, behind them. But the Spaniards made no Pursuit; and, tho' they enter'd the Place time enough to take the Matches from some of the Mines, found others had open'd such irreparable Breaches, that they resolv'd to complete the Ruin which the French had begun: And thus ended the Campaign.

Death of Pope Innocent XI. There remains yet another important, foreign Event to speak of, before we can resume the Thread of our own immediate Affairs, viz. The Death of Pope Innocent XI. among those of the Reformed Religion, commonly called, The Protestant Pope, tho' for no better Reasons that appear, than his Opposition to France, and the Share he had in setting the Prince of Orange on the Throne of England. He had fill'd the Papal Chair ever since September 22, 1676; and when he died, which was on the 12th of August, he left the Holy See, to all Appearance, as much embroil'd with France as ever: Indeed his most Christian Majesty had found it so far expedient to mollify his Behaviour, that he had recall'd Lavardin, and nominated the Duke de Chaulnes to succeed him; but then, he still retain'd Avignon, and suffer'd all the other Points in dispute to remain in statu quo.

The Death of the Pope, as usual, set all the political Humours of Rome afloat at once; a thousand Cabals were immediately form'd; a thousand Castles were built; and above all, those of the Imperial and French Factions left no kind of Practice untry'd, to give the ensuing Election such a Turn as would prove most favourable to their respective Interests.

On the 14th the College of Cardinals assembled, and chose Don Livio, the late Pope's Nephew, to be General of the Church. On the 22d they enter'd into the Conclave, and in the Beginning of September the Cardinal d'Estrees presented a Letter to them from the most Christian King, in Answer to their Notification of the Pope's Death; in which he requested them not to proceed to an Election, till they had heard what the Duke de Chaulnes had to propose to them, who was then making all possible haste to Rome, with the French Cardinals, de Bouillon, Bonzi and Furstemburg in his Train. The Imperial and Spanish Factions, on the other hand, not caring to suppose that the Holy Ghost was of their Party, were against any such Delay, and did so far prevail, that an Express was sent to that Minister from the Conclave, with Notice, that they could not receive him in quality of Embassador, unless he would renounce all Pretensions to the Franchises, and the King his Master would agree to quit Avignon. The same thing was also told his Excellency, when he demanded an Audience of the Conclave, on the second Day after his Arrival, namely, the 24th. But so effectual was the Mediation of the French Cardinals (who, we are told, came very well provided with Money, and who did not care to make that a Preliminary, which they design'd, if possible, to make an Ultimatum) that he was admitted on the second of October, on Condition, that he made the Renunciation requir'd, during the Vacancy of the Holy See. And on the sixth, as if the Conclave had waited only for the Presence of their Brethren of France, Cardinal Peter Ottoboni, a Venetian, Bishop of Porto, and Sub-Dean of the Sacred College, was declar'd Head of the Church (being in the eighteenth Year of his Age) by the Name of Alexander VIII. Ottoboni elected.

After he had receiv'd the Adoration of the Cardinals, as usual, sitting on the Altar of the Chapel, (at which Ceremony the Duke de Chaulnes, had the Honour to hold up his Cope, in quality of Embassador from the eldest Son of the Church) that Minister not only complimented him on his Elevation, in the Name of the King his Master, but gave him farther to understand, That as a solid Proof of his Majesty's Satisfaction therein, and the Sincerity of his Intentions to correspond as became him, with the Father of Christendom, he restor'd Avignon to the Patrimony of the Church. The Drift of this sudden Concession was partly to persuade the World, That the new Pope was in the Interest of France, and partly to induce him to adopt that Interest. His most Christian Majesty also, in a Letter writ with his own Hand to his Holiness, renounc'd the Franchises, without any Reserve, and signify'd his Readiness to contribute all in his Power towards a thorough Accommodation. His Holiness, on the other hand, overflow'd with Acknowledgements; kiss'd the condescending Letter several Times; and talk'd as if he was all Meekness and Resignation: But when he was call'd upon to verify his Words by his Works, he turn'd a deaf Ear, and appear'd almost as intractable as Pope Innocent had been before him. This, instead of granting the Suit of Cardinal Furstemburg, who, in Person, besought him to give all the Proceedings in relation to the Cologne-Election, a Re-examination, and in which he was seconded by the daily Importunities of Mr. de Chaulnes, he confirm'd the Dispensations granted to the Prince of Bavaria, The most Christian King restores Avignon, and renounces the Franchises.

varia, by his said Predecessor, and thereby enabled him to take Possession of that Electorate; though he had not yet attain'd the Age requir'd by the Canons to qualify him for it: Upon which that Cardinal withdrew from Rome in Discontent, and once more repair'd to Paris; where, as the Victim of France, he still met with a cordial Reception from his most Christian Majesty; who immediately on his Arrival rewarded him with the Abbey of St. Germains.

King William grows unpopular.

While these were the Transactions abroad, the People at Home, or at least a great Part of them, grew more and more sick of their own Choice, and made no Difficulty to avow, that their Experiment had not fully answer'd: It is, at this Distance of Time, generally suppos'd, that these Murmurers were only those of King James's Party, who had acquir'd the Name of Jacobites. But this is far from being the Case: Those who had never contributed to the Choice could not be said to repent of it: We have, besides, already seen, that not only disappointed Churchmen and Courtiers, who had for selfish Motives co-operated with the Prince of Orange against their own Tenets, appear'd among the Malcontents, but even staunch Whigs, who had follow'd his Standard (and run all Lengths in his Service) upon Principle, in their Country's Cause, and for Reformation-sake: And this is not only acknowledg'd by Bishop Burnet himself, but often complain'd of by him; tho' he, at the same time, insinuates such things of the new King's Temper, Carriage, and Demands, as serve to shew, that this Change of Disposition towards him was not wholly without Cause.

As that very Prelate has drawn his Picture, he was peevish, sullen, reserv'd, and self-sufficient; as others have drawn it, he was morose and cynical; not to say, brutal and tyrannical; Qualities that very ill became a Deliverer and Preserver: It is farther said of him, that his Manner of Life was wholly different from that of his two Predecessors: For, instead of condescending to mix with his Nobility, in the Charms of social Life, or taking any Pleasure in the Compliments of his Circle, he liv'd either in his Closet, where scarce any, besides his Ministers, had ever the Honour of being admitted; or amus'd himself with Hunting, to which he was immoderately addicted; or busy'd himself among his Troops; for he also had his Camp of Observation at Hounslow, and made it one of his favourite Places of Resort.

That he made Hampton-Court his chief Place of Residence, though he could scarce breathe in the Smoke of London, was another unlucky Circumstance, which contributed to render him unpopular; and that he should undertake to enlarge and beautify it, after a very expensive, if not an over-elegant, Plan, at a Time when the Nation was opening all its Veins for the Support of a consuming War, expos'd him to many bitter Reflections, which, after being industriously circulated all over his Dominions, were from thence re-echo'd to his own Cabinet.

His own Success had shewn him the surprising Effects of such Impressions as these; and, for that Reason, he was not only so much the more easily induc'd to listen to the Remonstrances of his Ministers on that Head, but also, to promise them, to assume a more frank and open Deportment for the Time to come; and even to give into some of those Measures, which the best-beloved of our Kings had taken to captivate the Hearts of their People.

A. D. 1689.

Thus we find him resorting to Newmarket, and vainly endeavouring to be among the Sportsmen what King Charles had been before: We find him also accepting an Invitation from the University of Cambridge; and, in return to the Compliments which Dr. Covel their Vice-Chancellor overwhelm'd him with, as the Redeemer of the Church and Nation, from the imminent Dangers which threaten'd both, graciously replying, "That as God had bless'd him in that Undertaking, so he should faithfully discharge his Trust, in preserving the Church of England, and giving all Protection and Favour to the Universities." We find him the next Day not only patiently undergoing the whole Ceremonial of his Reception; but when one of the Fellows of King's-College, in the Course of his Speech, signify'd the Apprehensions of his Brethren, that they had offended his Majesty, by a late Petition, in which they had mention'd but one single Person, as duly quality'd to succeed in the Vacancy of their Provostship; and humbly besought his favourable Construction of that Matter, yet more graciously assuring them, "That he willingly granted all they desir'd, or could wish; and that they might admit Dr. Rodoric, [the single Person refer'd to] to be their Provost, when they pleas'd." And, lastly, we find his Majesty condescending to be the Sovereign-Master of the Grocers Company, knighting Mr. Box, who waited on him with the Instrument of his Freedom, and submitting to the Fatigue of dining with the City, and being deafen'd with the noisy Acclamations of the Mob.

and dines with the City of London.

But whatever Effect his Majesty's personal Condescensions had, or seem'd to have, on those immediately within the Reach of them, beyond that Circuit they had little, or none at all: In this Interval, the Oaths of Allegiance to the new Government, which the Parliament had prescrib'd, were to be taken; and tho' such of the Clergy as were directly or indirectly under the Influence of those in Power, took (m) them, without any Scruple; some of their Brethren (who from thence were Controversies about the Oaths.

(m) Of which, the following ostentatious Mention is made in the Gazette, Numb. 2463, viz. "On Monday last, about fourscore of the City Clergy went in a Body to the Court of Chancery, where they took the Oaths requir'd by the Act of Parliament. The like was done the same Day, by others of the Clergy, in the Court of King's-Bench.

were branded with the Name of Nonjurors) chose to run the risque of Suspension, rather than comply; many took them with such Reserves and Distinctions, as shew'd they were better reconcil'd to the Profits of their Benefices, than the Legality of the Imposition; and both these latter Parties, tho' at variance with each other, so far concurr'd, that they made use of all the Arts in their Power to blacken the Government, and enflame the Troubles of the Times. According to Bishop Burnet, it was the Persuasion of the leading Men in both Universities, tho' chiefly Oxford, That the King was in his Heart an Enemy to the Church, as appear'd by his abolishing Episcopacy in Scotland: That tho' he did not openly endeavour to subvert, he secretly undermin'd, it: That Latitudinarians in Religion were the only Favourites at Court; that they engross'd all Preferments, &c. And the Credit these Notions receiv'd began to have very ill Effect, all over England.

Then as to the Matter of the Oaths, it begat Controversy upon Controversy; and that not more for Conscience than Party's sake: For tho' many well-meaning Clergymen did actually sacrifice their Livings to their Scruples; many of those who had been the stiffest Advocates for Non-resistance and Passive-obedience, thought fit to satisfy the Law, by transferring their Allegiance from King James to King William, and endeavour'd to set a Gloss on the Satisfaction it gave to themselves, by declaring previously, That they took the Oaths in no other Sense, than a peaceable Submission to the Powers that were; which, they would needs have it, they had Authority for, even from the Legislature itself; since they had dropt the Word Rightful, when the Form was under Debate; which they would scarce have done, said they, if they had not allow'd the Distinction between a King de facto, and a King de jure. Now these Latter found themselves between two Fires; for as those who swallow'd the Oath whole, would not allow the Sense of it to be thus fritter'd away; so those that wholly rejected it, treated these Temporisers, at first, with all the (n) Bitterness imaginable; who, in answer to both, alledg'd, That as Prudence oblig'd them to conform to the Letter of the Oath, so Conscience requir'd them to give it their own Interpretation.

Among the Nonjurors, were five of the seven Bishops, who had of late been call'd the Seven golden Candlesticks of the Church, for the Stand which they had made in the late Reign, against the Religion of the Court; viz. Canterbury, Ely, Chichester, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough; and who probably believ'd, that their Credit with the People was so great, that they could turn the Scale of Government as they pleas'd: With these join'd Frampton of Gloucester; and as to the other two, St. Asaph was at Court, and Bristol was dead. A. D. 1689.

Six Bishops suspended for refusing them.

It is not to be suppos'd, that those in Power were altogether easy, under this Separation, or without some Apprehensions of ugly Consequences; for which Reason they proceeded as tenderly with them as possible: They first invited them to come in; and, when they found it necessary to proceed to Compulsion, they began with Suspension; after which they waited long, before they proceeded to Deprivation; and, in the mean while, ply'd them from the Press, with Arguments, Remonstrances, and every other Battery which affects the Mind of Man; but, as we shall find, without Effect: Those who had made the Breach resolv'd to keep it open; and, instead of being induc'd to swear, as the Law requir'd, endeavour'd (at least their Emissaries did) to convince their half-conforming Brethren, that they ought not to (o) pray for those, as their lawful and rightful Governors, whom they refus'd to acknowledge as such, in the Oath of Allegiance.

Lake of Chichester, moreover, falling dangerously ill, soon after his Suspension, was induc'd to take the Sacrament, in the Presence of Dr. Green his Parish-Minister, Dr. Hicks Dean of Worcester, his own Secretary, Chaplain, and Amanuensis, after having solemnly adopted, (for it does not appear to have been his own Composition) and subscrib'd the following Paper:

Bishop of Chichester's Death-Bed Declarative. [Som. Collect. vol. xxv. Tract. 20.]

"Being called by a sick (and I think a dying) Bed, and the good Hand of God upon me in it, to take the last and best Viaticum, the Sacrament of my dear Lord's Body and Blood, I take myself oblig'd to make this short Recognition and Confession, That whereas I was baptized into the Religion of the Church of England, and sucked it in with my Milk, I have constantly adhered to it thorough (n) Of which the Papists immediately took advantage, to set forth the whole Church of England in the following Colours:

"The Innovations and Contradictions I have mention'd are chargeable upon your whole Church. As, for Instance, It was formerly the profess'd Doctrine of the Church of England, That it is not lawful, on any Pretence whatever, for Subjects to take up Arms against their King; which evidently implies, that neither should they themselves deprive him of his Right, nor be assistant to those that would do it; but, on the contrary, that they should stand by him, and support him in it. That this was formerly the Doctrine of the Church of England does evidently appear from this, That no Person was to be admitted into the Ministry, in any Degree whatever, without subscribing to it: And it does no less evidently appear, on the other hand, that the present Clergy are of a quite contrary Opinion, insomuch as they have actually sided, join'd Hands, and taken part, with those that have invaded his Right, and violently detain it from him; and that at such a Time, and in such a Manner, that, without such a base Compliance, it can hardly be imagin'd how Things could have been brought to that Pass they now are at. This, I say, your Church has done; and, in so doing, has justify'd, and incorporated into her new Religion, a Doctrine which, by the former Church of England, was not barely disown'd, but detested with the greatest Degree of Abhorrence. In a Word, your Clergy are so latitudinarian, both in their Principles and Practices, nay, even in their very Oaths, that it is impossible to know either when or where to fix them; for they have so cunningly order'd Things, that on the same Grounds on which they now swear, and preach, and pray, against King James, on the very same Grounds, if ever he should return and prevail, they would as heartily swear, and preach, and pray, against King William; so that they are always sure to be of the strongest Side, and yet always in the Right. A. D. 1689. rough the whole Course of my Life, and now, if so be the Will of God, shall die in it, and had resolved, through God's Grace assisting me, to have died so, tho' at a Stake. And whereas that Religion of the Church of England taught me the Doctrine of Non-Resistance and Passive-Obedience, which I have accordingly inculcated upon others, and which I took to be the distinguishing Character of the Church of England, I adhere no less firmly and stedfastly to that; and, in consequence of it, have incurred a Suspension from the Exercise of my Office, and expected a Deprivation. I find in so doing much inward Satisfaction; and if the Oath had been tender'd at the Peril of my Life, I could only have obey'd by Suffering.

I desire you, my worthy Friends and Brethren, to bear witness of this upon occasion, and to believe it as the Words of a dying Man, and who is now engag'd in the most sacred and solemn Act of conversing with God in this World, and may, for aught he knows to the contrary, appear with these very Words in his Mouth, at the dreadful Tribunal."

He did indeed die soon after: The Paper was immediately set forth in Print, under the following Title: The Declaration of the Right Reverend Father in GOD John, late Lord Bishop of Chichester, upon his Death-Bed; together with this Attestation, This Declaration was READ and subscrib'd by the Bishop, in the Presence of, &c.; and as much Use was made of it by the Party, as if the Bishop had indeed been a Martyr.

Proceedings on the Comprehension Project.

But, notwithstanding the Prevalence of this Ill-humour among the Clergy, and the Use that was manifestly intended to be made of it, the Court seem'd resolv'd to proceed with their Project of a Comprehension: And whereas the House of Commons had made it over to the Convocation, with no very favourable Purpose, it was thought advisable to put the Affair previously into such Hands, and give it such a Form, as should bespeak it a more favourable Reception from that Meeting, than those Gentlemen design'd it.

King's Commission.

Accordingly a special Commission, under the Great Seal, was issued, to ten Bishops, and twenty Dignitaries of the Church, in the following Words:

"Whereas the particular Forms of divine Worship, and the Rites and Ceremonies appointed to be us'd therein, are Things in their own Nature indifferent and alterable, and so acknowledg'd; it is but reasonable, that, upon weighty and important Considerations, according to the various Exigencies of Times and Occasions, such Changes and Alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in Place and Authority should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient.

And whereas the Book of Canons is fit to be review'd, and made more suitable to the State of the Church: And whereas there are Defects and Abuses in the ecclesiastical Courts and Jurisdictions; and, particularly, there is not sufficient Provision made for the removing of scandalous Ministers, and reforming of Manners either in Ministers or People. And A. D. 1689. whereas it is most fit, that there should be a most strict Method prescribed for the Examination of such Persons as desire to be admitted into Holy Orders, both as to their Learning and Manners.

We therefore, out of our pious and princely Care for the good Order and Edification, and Unity of the Church of England, committed to our Charge and Care; and for the reconciling, as much as is possible, of all Differences among our good Subjects, and to take away all Occasions of the like for the future, have thought fit to authorize and impower you, &c. and any nine of you, whereof three to be Bishops, to meet from time to time, as often as shall be needful, and to prepare such Alteration of the Liturgy and the Canons, and such Proposals for the Reformation of Ecclesiastical Courts, and to consider of such other Matters, as in your Judgments may most conduce to the Ends abovementioned."

The ten Bishops were, Lamplugh of York, Compton of London, Mew of Winchester, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Sprat of Rochester, Smith of Carlisle, Trelawney of Exeter, Burnet of Salisbury, Humfreys of Bangor, Stratford of Chester, Stillingfleet of Worcester, and Patrick of Chichester; and the Dignitaries were Tillotson Dean of London, Meggot of Winchester, Sharp of Canterbury, Kidder of Peterborough, and Aldrich of Christ-Church; Jane and Hall, Divinity-Professors of Oxford, and Beaumont of Cambridge; Montagu Master of Trinity College Cambridge, Goodman Archdeacon of Middlesex, Beveridge of Colchester, Battely of Canterbury, Alston of Essex, and Tennison of London; Scott Prebendary of St. Paul's, Fowler of Gloucester, Grove and Williams of London. And all these, says Bishop Burnet, were nam'd so impartially, that no Exceptions could be against any of them. The same Prelate, also, in Justification of the Design itself, observes, that the seven Bishops, in the very Petition to King James, for which they were try'd, had mention'd it: That the Clergy in general, about the same time, express'd an Inclination of the same kind; and that the King was bound by a Promise of his own, in his Declaration, to endeavour an Union between the Church and Dissenters. It ought to be farther recollected, that the last Clause in the remarkable Paper, formerly quoted in the History of the last Reign, (under the Title of, Some Heads of things to be more fully insisted upon by the Bishops in their Addresses to the Clergy and People of their respective Dioceses) runs in these Words, "And in the last Place, that they warmly and most effectually exhort them [their Brethren, the Protestant Dissenters, as they were then pleas'd to call them] to join with us, in daily, fervent Prayers to the God of Peace, for an universal blessed Union of all reformed Churches, both at home and abroad, against our common Enemies: And that all they who do confess the Name of our Dear Lord, and do agree in the Truth of his holy Word, may also meet in ONE HOLY COMMUNION,

A. D. 1689. Dr. Wake. and live in perfect Unity and Godly Love." As alſo, that another great Prelate of the Church has ſince, in the moſt public manner, aſſerted, that the Biſhops, with their Metropolitan, Sancroft, at their Head, had actually agreed on a Project of a Comprehenſion, when ſuch a Meaſure was held of Conſequence to themſelves; that is to ſay, before the landing of the Prince of Orange; and that the ſeveral Parts of it were committed, not only with his Approbation, but under his Direction, to ſuch Divines of the Church as were then held moſt proper for the Charge.

Notwithſtanding all which, when this deſirable Union might have been obtain'd, or at leaſt when the Church might have had the Honour of making a Tender of it, the Majority of the Clergy, not only refus'd to aſſiſt in it, but endeavour'd to deter the reſt from proceeding, by loading it, ſays Burnet, with a Word of ill Sound, A NEW Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, and aſſerting it was as dangerous, if not as illegal, as the former.

The Jeruſalem Chamber at Weſtminſter was the Place of meeting; and no ſooner was the Commiſſion open'd, than the Legality and Authority of it were call'd in Queſtion by Sprat Biſhop of Rocheſter, who had [Calamy.] made ſo little Scruple to act under an illegal one before: And tho' he was told, that they were not requir'd to enact Alterations, but Several of the Commiſſioners recede. only to prepare ſuch as ſhould be thought moſt reaſonable, in order to lay them before the Convocation, he retir'd in Diſguſt, and was follow'd by Mew of Wincheſter, and the A. D. 1689. Doctors Jane and Aldrich.

Concerning theſe Separatiſts, Biſhop Burnet, in his ſummary Way, ſays, That either they never came, or ſoon withdrew, declaring themſelves diſſatisfy'd with the Deſign; and ſome owning plainly, That they were againſt all Alterations whatever: That, according to their Thoughts, too much had been done already, in the Toleration which had been granted the Diſſenters: That therefore they would be concern'd in nothing, to make them ſtill eaſier: That the altering the Cuſtoms and Conſtitution of the Church, to gratify a peeviſh and obſtinate Party, would only make them more inſolent, as authoriſing a Suggeſtion, that the Church, by her own Confeſſion, had been hitherto in the wrong: That the very Attempt to make Alterations would divide the Clergy among themſelves, and draw the Liturgy into Diſeſteem with their People, by giving them Scope to think, it wanted Correction, &c.

Others again endeavour'd to account for their Seceſſion, by ſaying, They were willing to have gone as far as they could with Safety to the Church; and would have conſented to any reaſonable Abatements: But that the moderate Gentlemen ſoon ſhew'd, that they did not intend to inſiſt on ſmall (p) Matters: That ſome of them were ready even to give up epiſcopal Ordination; which was inconſiſtent with their Honour as Men, and their Duty as Divines, as well as with their Oaths, Subſcriptions,

(p) The Matters they inſiſted on were theſe:

"That the chanting of divine Service in Cathedral Churches ſhall be laid aſide, that the Whole may be render'd intelligible to the common People.

That beſides the Pſalms being read in their Courſe, as before, ſome proper and devout ones be ſelected for Sundays.

That the Apocryphal Leſſons, and thoſe of the Old Teſtament, which are too natural, be thrown out, and others appointed in their ſtead, by a new Calendar, which is already fully ſettled, and out of which are omitted all the legendary Saints Days, and others not directly referr'd to in the Service-Book.

That not to ſend the Vulgar to ſearch the Canons, which few of them ever ſaw, a Rubric be made, ſetting forth the Uſefulneſs of the Croſs in Baptiſm; not as an eſſential Part of that Sacrament, but only a fit and decent Ceremony. However, if any do, after all, in Conſcience ſcruple it, it may be omitted by the Prieſt.

That likewiſe, if any refuſeth to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper kneeling, it may be adminiſter'd to them in their Pews.

That a Rubric be made, declaring the Intention of the Lent-faſts, to conſiſt only in extraordinary Acts of Devotion, not in Diſtinction of Meats; and another to ſtate the Meaning of Rogation-Sundays and Ember-Weeks; and appoint, that thoſe ordained within the Quatuor Tempora do exerciſe ſtrict Devotion.

That the Rubric, which obliges Miniſters to read or hear Common-Prayer, publicly or privately every Day, be changed to an Exhortation to the People to frequent thoſe Prayers.

That the Abſolution in Morning and Evening Prayer may be read by a Deacon, the Word Prieſt in the Rubric being changed into Miniſter, and thoſe Words, and Remiſſion, be put out, as not very intelligible.

That the Gloria Patri ſhall not be repeated at the End of every Pſalm, but of all appointed for Morning and Evening Prayer.

That thoſe Words in the Te Deum, thine honourable, true, and only Son, be thus turned, thine only begotten Son, honourable being only a civil Term, and no where uſed in ſacris.

The Benedicite ſhall be changed into the 148th Pſalm; and other Pſalms likewiſe appointed for the Benedictus and Nunc dimittis.

The Verſicles after the Lord's-Prayer, &c. ſhall be read kneeling, to avoid the Trouble and Inconveniences of ſo often varying Poſtures in the Worſhip. And after theſe Words, Give Peace in our Time, O Lord, ſhall follow an Anſwer promiſſory of ſomewhat on the People's Part, of keeping God's Laws, or the like: the old Reſponſe being grounded on the predeſtinating Doctrine, taken in too ſtrict an Acceptation.

All high Titles or Appellations of the King, Queen, &c. ſhall be left out of the Prayers, ſuch as moſt illuſtrious, religious, mighty, &c. and only the Word Sovereign retained for the King and Queen.

Thoſe Words in the Prayer for the King, grant that he may vanquiſh and overcome all his Enemies, as of too large Extent, if the King engage in an unjuſt War, ſhall be turned thus; proſper all his righteous Undertakings againſt thy Enemies, or after ſome ſuch manner.

Thoſe Words in the Prayer for the Clergy, who alone worketh great Marvels, as ſubject to be ill interpreted by Perſons vainly diſpoſ'd, ſhall be thus, who alone art the Author of all good Gifts; and thoſe Words, the healthful Spirit of thy Grace, ſhall be, the holy Spirit of thy Grace; healthful being an obſolete Word.

The Prayer which begins, O God, whoſe Nature and Property, ſhall be thrown out, as full of ſtrange and impertinent Expreſſions, and beſides not in the Original, but foiſted in ſince by another Hand.

The Collects for the moſt part are to be changed for thoſe the Biſhop of Chicheſter has prepar'd, being a Review of the old ones with Enlargements, to render them more ſenſible and affecting; and what particular Expreſſions are needful, to be retrench'd.

If any Miniſter refuſe the Surplice, the Biſhop, if the People deſire it, and the Living will bear it, may ſubſtitute one in his Place, that will officiate in it; but the whole thing is left to the Diſcretion of the Biſhops.

If any deſire to have Godfathers and Godmothers omitted, and their Children preſented in their own Names to Baptiſm, it may be granted.

About the Athanaſian Creed they came at laſt to this Concluſion, that, leſt the wholly rejecting it ſhould by unreaſonable Perſons be imputed to them as Socinianiſm, a Rubric ſhould be made, ſetting forth or declaring the Curſes denounced therein, not to be reſtrain'd to every particular Article, but intended againſt thoſe that deny the Subſtance of the Chriſtian Religion in general.

Whether the Amendment of the Tranſlation of the reading Pſalms (as they are called) made by the Biſhop of St. Aſaph and Dr. Kidder, or that in the Bible, ſhall be inſerted in the Prayer-Book, is wholly left to the Convocation to conſider of, and determine."

A. D. 1689. Subſcriptions, &c.: That they, the Seceders, were ſo much the leſs diſpos'd to join in the Work, becauſe ſo many Fathers of the Church, and others of diſtinguiſh'd Merit and irreproachable Characters, ſtood already excluded from any Concern in it, by the Diſqualifications brought upon them by the Oaths: and that, above all, they could not bear to think, that the Church ſhould be the Boat, and the Diſſenters the Shore; or that, in other Words, the Church ſhould deſcend to make an Offer, which the Diſſenters were at liberty to refuſe.

But in contradiction to what is thus advanc'd on the orthodox Side, concerning the great Point of Ordination, we are told, That even moderate Men, without pronouncing Ordination by Preſbyters to be altogether invalid, did inſiſt, That Miniſters ſo ordain'd ſhould alſo take Orders from a Biſhop, who, in conferring the ſame, was at liberty to add a Clauſe to the common Form, according to the Cuſtom already us'd by the Church, in caſe of uncertain Baptiſm, to this Effect, If thou art not already ordain'd, I ordain thee, &c. and that this was the greateſt Conceſſion that was made by the Commiſſioners.

Laſtly, it is roundly aſſerted by Burnet, "That Matters were well conſider'd, and freely and calmly debated; and that all was digeſted into an entire Correction of every thing that ſeem'd liable to any juſt Objections."— Notwithſtanding which, the Party that was now at work for King James, as the ſame Author gives us to underſtand elſewhere, took hold of the Occaſion to enflame Mens Minds, and were join'd by the Univerſities, who declar'd againſt all Alterations, and all that promoted them, not ſparing even the King himſelf, whom they ſet forth as an Enemy to the Church: A Charge which was perhaps ſo much the more eagerly inſiſted on, becauſe it had operated ſo irreſiſtably againſt his Predeceſſor. In ſhort, the Elections of Convocation-men were now, for the firſt time, as warmly conteſted as thoſe of Parliament-men uſually are: And as the Fate of the Nation is really in the Hands of the one, the Fate of the Church was ſuppos'd to be in the Hands of the other.

The Convocation meets.

It ſo happen'd, that the Anti-Court Clergymen had the greateſt Intereſt among their Brethren; which became apparent on the firſt Day of Meeting: For the Lower-Houſe proceeding to the Choice of a Prolocutor, and the Comprehenſioners putting up Dr. Tillotſon, Clerk of the Cloſet to the King, and the moſt of any Clergyman in his Eſteem, the other Party ſet up Dr. Jane, one of the moſt furious Churchmen among them, and carry'd it by a Majority of two to one againſt him: When this Champion of theirs was moreover preſented to the Biſhop of London, as Preſident, for his Approbation, and was to make a Latin Speech, as uſual upon that Occaſion, he deliver'd it as the Senſe of the Lower-Houſe, That ſuch was the tranſcendant Excellence of the Liturgy eſtabliſh'd by Law in England, above thoſe of all other Chriſtian Churches, that it needed no Amendments; and concluded, in their Name, with the famous Declaration of the old Barons, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. It is remarkable enough, that Jane had been Chaplain to the Biſhop whom he thus haughtily confronted; as alſo, that his Lordſhip, in his Reply, which was altogether as gentle and perſuaſive, as the Prolocutor's Speech was rough and imperious, deduc'd one of his Arguments in favour of the Union propos'd, from the Conſideration of its being their Duty, to make ſuch Abatements in things indifferent, as might ſerve to open a Door of Salvation to Multitudes of ſtraying Chriſtians; as if the Door of Salvation was only to be open'd with a Church-of-England-Key; and that, for another, he urg'd, That it was ſo much the more incumbent on them to extend their Indulgence and Charity to the Diſſenters under King William, becauſe ſome of the Biſhops had promis'd it to them, in their Addreſſes to King James.

A. D. 1689.

But the Spirit they were poſſeſs'd with was not to be conjur'd down by the Words of Meekneſs and Moderation: When therefore they were return'd to their own Seats, an Adjournment was call'd for, and agreed to; under pretence that the Houſe was not full: And, when they met the next Day, the Preſident put a farther Stop to their Career for the preſent, by acquainting them with an important Diſcovery he had made, by the Help of an eminent Civilian, namely, "That the Royal Commiſſion, by which they were to act, was defective, for want of the Great Seal; and that therefore he ſhould be oblig'd to prorogue them till that could be obtain'd."

They are prorogu'd.

Whether there was really ſuch a Defect, or not; or, if there was, whether it was by Accident, or Deſign; is not very material: It is ſufficient for us to know, that the Uſe made of the Prorogation was, to try every Experiment which could be thought of, to mollify the Rigour of theſe uncharitable Rabbies; and that all prov'd ineffectual: They would hear of nothing, it ſeems, but preſerving and defending the Church; and continued to clamour as loudly againſt all Innovations, as any of the Prieſts of Rome had done before them againſt Luther, without once thinking of that Precedent, or, what is worſe, of the Goſpel itſelf, on which the Church was founded.

Their ſecond Meeting.

At their ſecond Meeting, December 4, the Earl of Nottingham, who, in the preceding Seſſion had been the firſt Mover of this Matter in the Houſe of Lords, brought their Commiſſion from the King, and deliver'd it to both Houſes, then aſſembled conjointly in Henry the Seventh's Chapel; with a Meſſage from his Majeſty, prefac'd with a Speech of his own, containing a Repetition of all thoſe Arguments and Perſuaſions, which, to his Knowledge, the Majority of the Lower-Houſe had rejected as before.

The Meſſage was as follows:

"WILLIAM R.

The King's Meſſage.

His Majeſty has ſummon'd this Convocation, not only becauſe it is uſual upon holding a Parliament, but out of a pious Zeal to do every thing that may tend to the beſt

A. D. 1689. Eſtabliſhment of the Church of England, which is ſo eminent a Part of the Reformation, and is certainly the beſt ſuited to the Conſtitution of this Government; and therefore does moſt ſignally deſerve, and ſhall always have, both his Favour and Protection. And he doubts not but that you will aſſiſt him in promoting the Welfare of it, ſo that no Prejudices, with which ſome Men may have labour'd to poſſeſs you, ſhall diſappoint his good Intentions, or deprive the Church of any Benefit from your Conſultations. His Majeſty therefore expects, that the things that ſhall be propos'd, ſhall be calmly and impartially conſider'd by you; and aſſures you, that he will offer nothing to you, but what ſhall be for the Honour, Peace, and Advantage both of the Proteſtant Religion in general, and particularly of the Church of England."

The Biſhops ſend an Addreſs to the Lower-Houſe for their Concurrence:

And as to the Effect of it, among the Biſhops, it was ſuch as the Court deſir'd: For being adjourn'd to the Jeruſalem-Chamber, they drew up the enſuing Addreſs, which they ſent to the Lower-Houſe for their Concurrence.

"We the Biſhops, &c. in Convocation aſſembled, having receiv'd your Majeſty's gracious Meſſage, together with a Commiſſion from your Majeſty, by the Earl of Nottingham, hold ourſelves bound in Gratitude and Duty, to return our moſt humble Thanks and Acknowledgments of the Grace and Goodneſs expreſs'd in your Majeſty's Meſſage, and the Zeal you ſhew in it for the Proteſtant Religion in general, and the Church of England in particular; and of the Truſt and Confidence repos'd in us by this Commiſſion. We look on theſe Marks of your Majeſty's Care and Favour, as the Continuance of the great Deliverance Almighty God wrought for us by your Means, in making you the bleſſed Inſtrument of preſerving us from falling under the Cruelty of popiſh Tyranny; for which, as we have often thank'd Almighty God, ſo we cannot forget that high Obligation and Duty, which we owe to your Majeſty; and on theſe new Aſſurances of your Protection and Favour to our Church, we beg Leave to renew the Aſſurance of our conſtant Fidelity and Obedience to your Majeſty, whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

Which they refuſe, and propoſe Amendments.

But neither the King's Meſſage, nor his Miniſter's Speech, had brought the Lower-Houſe into a concurring Mood: On the contrary, they firſt ſhew'd a Diſpoſition to inſiſt on the Privilege of preſenting an Addreſs of their own; and then, concluding that Alterations and Amendments would ſerve their Turn as well, (tho' they would give way to neither in the Liturgy) they ſent up a Meſſage to the Biſhops, in theſe Words: "We are deſirous to confine our Addreſs to his Majeſty's moſt gracious Meſſage; and to thoſe things only therein, which concern the Church of England." This produc'd a Conference; which was manag'd chiefly by Bp. Burnet on one Side, and Dr. Jane on the other; and theſe Reaſons were reported, why their Lordſhips inſiſted on the expreſs Mention of the Proteſtant Religion, namely, "1. Becauſe it is the known Denomination of the common Doctrine of the Weſtern Part of Chriſtendom, in oppoſition to the Errors and Corruptions of the Church of Rome. 2. Becauſe the leaving out this may have ill Conſequences, and be liable to ſtrange Conſtructions, both at home and abroad, among Proteſtants as well as Papiſts. 3. Becauſe it agrees with the general Reaſon offer'd by the Clergy for their Amendments, ſince this is expreſly mention'd in the King's Meſſage; and in this the Church of England being ſo much concern'd, the Biſhops think it ought to ſtand in the Addreſs." The Lower-Houſe, nevertheleſs, by way of Reply, ſignify'd, "That, inſtead of the Proteſtant Religion, they would rather ſay Proteſtant Churches." The Biſhops deſir'd a Reaſon in their Turn; and were anſwer'd thus: "We, being the Repreſentatives of a formed, eſtabliſh'd Church, do not think fit to mention the Word Religion, any farther than it is the Religion of ſome formed, eſtabliſh'd Church." The Biſhops, upon this, would have compounded the Matter, by ſaying, "The Intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion in This and all other Proteſtant Churches;" but met with another Difficulty; for the Lower-Houſe happen'd to think, that theſe Words put all Proteſtant Churches on a Level; which they would by no means admit; and therefore inſiſted on leaving out the Words [This and]; which being comply'd with, the following Addreſs was finally agreed on, and preſented to the King on the 12th:

A. D. 1689.

"We your Majeſty's moſt loyal and moſt dutiful Subjects, the Biſhops and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, in Convocation aſſembled, having receiv'd a moſt gracious Meſſage from your Majeſty by the Earl of Nottingham, hold ourſelves bound in Duty and Gratitude, to return our moſt humble Acknowledgments for the ſame; and for the pious Zeal and Care your Majeſty is pleas'd to expreſs therein, for the Honour, Peace, Advantage, and Eſtabliſhment of the Church of England: Whereby we doubt not, the Intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion in all other Proteſtant Churches, which is dear to us, will be the better ſecur'd, under the Influence of your Majeſty's Government and Protection. And we crave Leave to aſſure your Majeſty, that, in purſuance of that Truſt and Confidence you repoſe in us, we will conſider whatſoever ſhall be offer'd to us from your Majeſty, without Prejudice, and with all Calmneſs and Impartiality; and that we will conſtantly pay the Fidelity and Allegiance, which we have all ſworn to your Majeſty and the Queen; whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

The Addreſs as at laſt agreed on.

Debates thereon.

And whatever Cauſe his Majeſty had to be diſſatisfy'd with them and their Proceedings, he choſe to conceal his Reſentment, and reply'd as follows:

"My Lords,

I take this Addreſs very kindly from the Convocation. You may depend upon it, that all I have promiſed, and all I can do, for

The King's Anſwer.

A. D. 1689. for the Service of the Church of England, I will do; and I give you this new Assurance, that I will improve all Occasions and Opportunities for its Service."

Of all Oppositions those of Ecclesiastics are the most fierce and irreconcileable, and withal, the most insipid and unentertaining: As therefore the Specimen already before us is sufficient to shew the Spirit and Disposition of both Parties, we shall cut short the Process by observing, that Jane and his Mirmidons, for their next Exploit, made an Effort in favour of the Bishops and others, at that time under Suspension for refusing the Oaths, by urging, "That something might be done to qualify them to sit in Convocation, without exposing the Convocation itself to any Danger on that account:" That when it appear'd a Matter of Difficulty to find out a proper Expedient to answer the Purposes requir'd, to fill up Time, they fell upon such Books and Pamphlets as were obnoxious to them, and requir'd that the Authors might be laid under the Censure of the Church: That finding them so much more dispos'd to do Hurt than Good, his Majesty was advis'd to put a stop to their Proceedings: That, according to Bishop Burnet, this was in reality a Favour to them, since they were thereby hinder'd from doing Mischief, as also reliev'd from the Expence of living in Town, to no other Purpose than the meeting together to read a Latin Litany: That, upon the Whole, the same Prelate pronounces, that, by a happy Direction of Providence, the Evil they intended was turn'd into Good; for, it seems, the Jacobite or non-juring Clergy lay in wait to make a new Schism in the Church, in case the Comprehension had taken place, which he supposes would have had worse Consequence than the old: And as to the Dissenters, they, by their own Confession, stood by, making their Remarks, in hopes they should be no Losers, in the Issue, by such Debates.

Parliament re-assembled.

In this Interval, it was also found advisable to reassemble the Parliament; whether upon an English or foreign Principle will best appear from his Majesty's Speech, which, we are told, was of his own composing, in French; as also, that when he laid it before his Privy-Council, for their Approbation, he express'd himself to the following Effect, viz. "That he knew most of his Predecessors had committed the drawing up of their Speeches to their Ministers, who generally made them subservient to their own Views and Interests; and that, by way of Precaution, he had thought fit to deliver his own Sentiments in his own Words," &c. As it does not appear, that any of the Ministers present upon this Occasion thought themselves affected by this Preamble, which at the first Glance seems to have been made at their Expence, it may be concluded, that they were prepar'd for it, or rather, that it had been preconcerted in the Cabinet, that his Majesty should make himself thus answerable for his own Measures, as well for their Ease and Security, as to facilitate the Course of the Session: For, after this formal Declaration, those in the Opposition could no longer avail themselves of the old Subterfuge, That they withstood the King's evil Counsellors, not the King: And Experience had shewn, that the fiercest Declaimers, in either House, seldom car'd to make their Quarrel with Power desperate, by attacking the personal Conduct of their Prince. As a farther Sweetener to the eager Spirit of the Whigs, who were as much exasperated as ever against their old Masters and new Rivals, the Tories, more especially against the Marquis of Halifax, that Lord was prevail'd upon to resign the Office he had hitherto held, of Speaker to the House of Lords; which he did at this very Council; making it his own Instance, and insinuating, that he had many Reasons for so doing, tho' he specify'd none: His Request was granted of course, and a Commission was issued to the Lord Chief-Baron Atkins to officiate in his Room. A. D. 1689.

These preparatory Steps having been thus taken, the Session was open'd October 19; and the Translation of the King's Speech was read, in his Majesty's Name, by the new Speaker, to both Houses, as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech.

Tho' the last Sitting continued so long, that perhaps it might have been more agreeable to you, in relation to your private Concerns, not to have met again so soon; yet the Interest of the Public lays an indispensable Obligation upon me to call you together at this time.

In your last Meeting you gave me so many Testimonies of your Affection, as well as Confidence in me, that I do not at all question but in this I shall receive fresh Supplies of both.

I esteem it one of the greatest Misfortunes can befall me, that in the Beginning of my Reign I am forc'd to ask such large Supplies; tho' I have this Satisfaction, that they are desir'd for no other Purposes, than the carrying on these Wars in which I enter'd with your Advice, and Assurance of your Assistance; nor can I doubt of the Blessing of God upon an Undertaking, wherein I did not engage out of a vain Ambition, but from the Necessity of opposing their Designs of destroying our Religion and Liberties.

It is well known how far I have expos'd myself to rescue this Nation from the Dangers that threaten'd not only your Liberty, but the Protestant Religion in GENERAL, of which the Church of England is ONE of the greatest Supports, and for the Defence whereof I am ready again to venture my Life.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

That which I have to ask of you at present is, That what you think fit to give towards the Charges of the War for the next Year may be done without Delay; and there is one Reason which more particularly obliges me to press you to a speedy Determination in this Matter, because the next Month there is appointed, at the Hague, a general Meeting of all the Princes and States concern'd

A. D. 1689. cern'd in this War againſt France, in order to concert Meaſures for the next Campaign; and, till I know your Intentions, I ſhall not only be uncertain of myſelf what Reſolutions to take, but our Allies will be under the ſame Doubts, unleſs they ſee me ſupported by your Aſſiſtance; beſides, if I know not in time what you will do, I cannot make ſuch Proviſions as will be requiſite, but ſhall be expos'd to the ſame Inconveniences the next Year, which were the Cauſe that the Preparations for this were neither ſo effectual or expeditious as was neceſſary. The Charge will be alſo conſiderably leſſen'd by giving Time to provide Things in their proper Seaſon, and without Confuſion.

I have no other Aim in this but to be in a Condition to attack our Enemies in ſo vigorous a manner, as, by the Help of God, may, in a little time, bring us to a laſting and honourable Peace, by which my Subjects may be freed from the extraordinary Expence of a lingring War: And that I can have no greater Satisfaction than in contributing to their Eaſe, I hope I have already given Proof of.

That you may be ſatisfy'd how the Money has been laid out which you have already given, I have directed the Accounts to be laid before you whenever you ſhall think fit to call for them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I have one thing more to recommend to you, which is the Diſpatch of a Bill of Indemnity, that the Minds of my good Subjects being quieted, we may all unanimouſly concur to promote the Welfare and Honour of the Kingdom."

And now the Effect of his Majeſty's taking upon him to be his own Miniſter ſeem'd to be the happieſt imaginable: The Speech, we are aſſur'd, was receiv'd with univerſal Applauſe. Among the Lords, no Objection was ſtarted; and among the Commons but one, (which met with little Countenance) by Sir Thomas Clarges, who made it a Matter of Complaint, that the Words, as by Law eſtabliſhed, did not follow the Mention that was made in it of the Church of England: Both Houſes return'd their ſolemn Thanks; and after this ſeeming Earneſt of their good Humour, it was thought adviſable to provide yet farther for the Peace of this Seſſion, by extinguiſhing as far as poſſible the Broils of the laſt: As that had been clos'd by Adjournment only, the ſeveral Conteſts between the two Houſes were left open, and the ſeveral inflammatory Bills depending; which might be again proſecuted at Pleaſure: But a Prorogation cancell'd all, and laid the Malignants under a Neceſſity to begin their Webs again. A Prorogation was therefore reſolv'd upon; and yet ſuch was the Caution of his Majeſty at this Criſis, that he would not exerciſe that Branch of his Prerogative, without the Concurrence of both Houſes: Accordingly he apply'd to them for their Senſe of the Matter, and had the Pleaſure to find that of the Lords exactly conformable to his own: But among the Commons there was a Party who aſſerted, that ſuch a Prorogation was altogether irregular, after his Majeſty had in his Speech propos'd new Matter to their Conſideration: And in truth it ſeem'd reaſonable enough to conclude, That if a Prorogation deſtroy'd all Connection between Seſſion and Seſſion, in relation to the Matters depending in either Houſe, it would alſo do the ſame with reſpect to the Matters propos'd to them from the Throne. But the Majority were of another Mind: And thus fortify'd with the Approbation of both Lords and Commons, his Majeſty on the 21ſt put a ſtop to the Current of public Buſineſs, that it might flow the more freely on the 23d following: For it was then that he came again to the Houſe, for Form's ſake, and open'd the Seſſion anew with a ſhort Reference to his laſt Speech, as containing the Sum of what he had then to lay before his People. A Prorogation for one Day.

A. D. 1689.

It may be remember'd, that King William was ſcarce in poſſeſſion of the Throne, before he endeavour'd to bring about an Accommodation between the Diſſenters and their Allies on one hand, and their Tory-Adverſaries on the other, by ſtickling for a Bill of Indemnity in favour of the Latter, and by requeſting, that the Teſts might be ſo far remov'd from before the Doors of Places and Offices, as might make way for the Admiſſion of the Former: And that theſe Endeavours of his Majeſty, however laudable in one Light, or politic in another, were ſo far from producing the deſired Effect, that they render'd the Breach wider than ever: The Diſſenters, &c. as much dreading to ſee their old Tyrants pardon'd, as They to ſee the Diſſenters put into a Condition to tyrannize in their Room.

But in this laſt Speech his Majeſty ſeems to give over ſo vain a Purſuit; and, inſtead of amuſing himſelf with airy Schemes of reconciling all Parties to his Intereſt, made it his chief Concern to be well with the ſtrongeſt. Thus, while he again recommends a Bill of Indemnity, he paſſes over his firſt Favourites, the Proteſtant-Diſſenters, in Silence: And the main Tendency of all he ſays is, to ſet the Neceſſity of granting a ſolid and ſeaſonable Supply in ſuch a favourable Light, and ſo effectually to prevent all Suſpicion of Miſapplication, as might countenance the Majority, in making it the firſt and principal, if not the only, Buſineſs of the Seſſion. Reflections on his Majeſty's Speech.

Now it ſo happen'd, that the very Diſtempers of the Times help'd to facilitate his Majeſty's Views: For the two Parties which divided the Houſe of Commons, and which were like Froſt and Fire, in all things immediately relating to themſelves, ſeem'd to have but one Heart and one Voice, when any Court-Point came before them: And this unnatural Coalition is thus ſhrewdly treated of, and accounted for, by one of the occaſional Writers of thoſe Times, who has been moſt undeſervedly over-look'd by all our Hiſtorians: "Every body knows, ſays he, there are two Sorts of Men, in each of which there are ſuch as are engag'd to King William's Intereſt, as abſolutely and without Reſerve as he has requir'd of them, or can require of

A.D. 1689. them, in any proſtitute Senſe: And yet thoſe Two are perpetually oppoſing one another, and make two Sides, which are commonly diſtinguiſh'd by the Names of Whig and Tory. According to the too good Succeſs that the Courtier has had, we ſee, that, notwithſtanding any Intereſt that the Patriots (as many as there are) can make, and notwithſtanding the Odium which ſo many of the Court-Followers have incurr'd, yet there is ſtill this Fatality, that Thoſe continue mainly prevalent in each, Thoſe move the Herd of both theſe Parties; Thoſe have, in effect, the Sway, that are, with all the Latitude I have ſaid, engag'd in the Intereſt of the Court: For whoever calls this Court in queſtion, whoever doubts its good Intention to Engliſhmen, to Engliſh Liberty and Government, whoever quotes paſt Declarations, or inſtances a preſent Grievance, nay, or that, in Diſcourſe, is but lukewarm towards the State, a Way is found, and it ſeldom fails, to make that Man ill-thought-of by the Herd, ſuſpected by the Vulgar of his Party, and ſhunn'd as a Deſerter: For with one Party he is inſtir'd as a Commonwealth's-man, and with the other a plain Jacobite: For what elſe ſhould he be that acts againſt this Government? Thus with one ſhort Queſtion, and that equivocal Term of Government, as it is put there, the Courtier does his Buſineſs.

This ſhews what is underſtood here by Whig and Tory, meaning as the Court is prevalent over both theſe Parties: And as thus, let us conſider how they act.---- The Tories have it for their End to ſee the Church eſtabliſh'd in as high Power as ever; to ſee it freed from the Eye-ſore of Diſſenters and Fanatics; to remove the ill Precedent of Scotland; to ſet up Epiſcopacy in ſuch Strength as is requir'd by the Clergymen themſelves; to put them out of Fear of every thing; and to have a King governing with as large a Prerogative as may be, but ſtill by the Means, and under the Tuition, of ſuch a Church. The Whigs dread ſuch a Power in the Church, and are ſo diſſatisfy'd with what is of that kind already, fearing what may come, that they expect a greater Security than is given them at preſent; that thoſe who are Diſſenters from, or under the Mark of, the Church, for being ill Friends to it, may never ſee it in a Condition to take its Revenge, or give them any Diſturbance. Theſe Men generally exclame againſt all arbitrary Power; but more eſpecially that which the Church would introduce, and that their Enemies would profit by. Neither of theſe Parties, towards the Satisfaction they deſire, go (q) now about the making of any new Laws, or attempt any Alteration in the preſent Settlement: But their Labour is, the gaining of the KING, and the getting thoſe of their Fraternity (whatever otherwiſe they be) into the Government. This is the only Means by which they, at this time, think to ſerve their Intereſt: This is the only Pledge they now aſk for the Succeſs of their reſpective Parties: Each promiſing to themſelves, that, within a little time, or whenever his Majeſty has made an end of his Enemies, he will declare for them, and, for the future, employ only the Men of that Stamp."

A.D. 1689.

This is ſo full, ſo clear, and ſo impartial an Account of theſe rival Factions, that it may ſerve as a Clue to their Counter-Intrigues, thro' the whole Reign; and, without it, we ſhould run a riſque of loſing our Way, even in the Seſſion before us.

On the firſt Day of ſitting, (viz. October 23.) nothing was done in the Houſe of Commons, except reading the King's Speech; but on the ſecond, the Houſe, being reſolv'd into a general Committee, of which Mr. Hampden was Chairman, came to the following Reſolutions, which were agreed to on the Report, nemine contradicente, namely, That they would ſtand by and aſſiſt his Majeſty, in reducing Ireland, and joining with his Allies abroad in a vigorous Proſecution of the War againſt France; and that his Majeſty ſhould be humbly addreſs'd to cauſe the neceſſary Eſtimates to be laid before the Houſe. Unanimous Vote to aſſiſt his Majeſty.

Thus far all imaginable Deference was paid to the King's Speech, and no Diſtinction appear'd between Whigs and Tories: But now the Former thought themſelves at Liberty to act for themſelves, and did accordingly endeavour to render the Paſſage of the Indemnity-Bill as difficult as poſſible, by throwing all poſſible Obſtructions in its way. Their firſt Step was to appoint a Committee to inſpect the Bills which had been left depending at the Cloſe of the laſt Seſſion, who had alſo Inſtructions to prepare a Bill of Rights: And on the Morrow they renew'd their Proſecution of Burton, Grahme, and Jenner, and inforc'd the Neceſſity of making public Examples of ſuch bad Men, with as much Vehemence as ever. Nor was this all; for, during this very Interval, the Houſe being inform'd, that all three of them (taking Advantage of the Expiration of the Act to enable his Majeſty to commit ſuſpected Perſons without Bail) had been brought up to the King's Bench, in order to be admitted to Bail; that Jenner was actually, and that the two others were on the Point of being, ſet free, on the ſame Terms, They order'd the Sergeant at Arms to take them into his Cuſtody, and appointed a Committee to examine Witneſſes, and prepare a Charge againſt them. Meeting again next Day, in the ſame Humour, they re-committed Sir Edward Hale, Obadiah Walker, and the Earl of Caſtlemain, who had ſeverally demanded the Benefit of the Habeas-Corpus Act, to the Tower; and order'd Articles of Impeachment to be drawn up againſt the Latter, for endeavouring to reconcile theſe Kingdoms to the See of Rome, and other high Crimes and Miſdemeanors. They alſo order'd Mr. Foley to impeach the Earls of Peterborough and Saliſbury at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, for departing from their Allegiance, (q) This Pamphlet was not ſet forth till the Year 90.

A. D. 1689. Allegiance, and being reconcil'd to the said See; and resolv'd, That a Bill should be brought in for inflicting Pains and Penalties upon such as had been the Occasion of violating the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom in the two late Reigns. Finding, however, in the Course of these warm Proceedings, that the State-Prisoners in general, had been treated with more Rigour (r) than was consistent with the Clames and Rights of Englishmen, they so far relented, as to appoint a Committee to prepare a Bill for the better regulating of Imprisonments, with Power to enquire into the Abuses of Goalers; and to order the Attorney-General to prosecute Richardson the Keeper of Newgate, in particular, for his illegal Usage of the unhappy Persons committed to his Charge.

Both Parties Courtiers alike.

On the 30th, after two Readings of the Bill of Rights, the Concerns of the Court coming again under Consideration, the two Parties again mix'd in the same Channel. It was resolv'd nem. con. That a Bill should be prepar'd for the better securing the Government, by more effectually enjoining the tendering and taking the Oaths; and another to attaint all such Persons as were in Rebellion against their Majesties.

November the 1st, as a farther Compliment to his Majesty, the Attorney-General was order'd to prepare a Bill of Indemnity; and then the Estimates for the ensuing Year being laid before the House by his Majesty's Command, and severally read, it was resolv'd, 1. That a Committee should be appointed to inspect the Accounts of the last Year, and make their Report to the House. 2. That another Committee should examine, by what means Intelligence came to be given to his Majesty's Enemies, concerning the several Stations of the Navy-Winter-Guards; as likewise into the Miscarriages committed in victualing the Navy; the Transportation of the Troops, and whatsoever related to the Conduct of the War. Now, tho' the latter of these Resolutions pass'd Nemine Contradicente, the Motion which gave Rise to it, ought to be plac'd to the Account of the Whigs. It was one of their favourite Assertions, That the Tories, or Prerogative-Men in the Service of King William, were secret Friends to King James; and that they reconcil'd themselves to the first, only to facilitate, so much the more securely and effectually, the Restoration of the last. This Motion, therefore, we are to presume, was made, only to disgrace these Rivals of theirs in the Government, not the Government in general. The Earl of Nottingham, and their old Enemies, the Lord President (Danby) and the Lord Privy-Seal (Hallifax) were at the Fountain Head of Intelligence: Those concern'd in the Victualing and Transports, were all of the same Party; tho', upon this Occasion, for political Reasons, they had not the Countenance of it: And if they could have fasten'd any flagrant Proofs of Treachery or Mal-administration upon them, the King would have been oblig'd, for his own sake in one Instance, and for the Credit of his Government in the other, to have dismiss'd them from his Service, and left them to the Mercy of the Laws. That, on the other hand, they had no Intention to expose the Secrets of the Cabinet, or render his Majesty's own Measures obnoxious to the Public, appears from this: The Estimates for the War were deliver'd in under the following Heads, viz.

For the English Forces in England.
For the Dutch Forces in England.
For the English Forces in Holland.
And for the Forces in Ireland.

A. D. 1689.

The Whigs endeavour to blast the Conduct of the Tories.

And yet evidence of the Cabinet.

And almost on the very Surface of them appear'd one of the strongest Instances of Partiality to the Dutch Interest that could well be imagin'd: For if by the Treaty of 1677, between King Charles and the States, the Government of England was oblig'd to assist their Lordships with ten thousand Men, their Lordships were equally oblig'd by the same Treaty, to assist the Government of England with six thousand; and if it rested with us to pay and provide for our Quota, it rested with them to do the same by theirs; whereas by these Estimates we see, that England was to be burden'd with both: Then, as to the last of them, which relates to the Forces in Ireland, the hiring seven thousand Danish Mercenaries to assist in reducing that Kingdom, without either the Consent or Knowledge of Parliament, tho' fitting at the same time when the Contract was made, was liable to many shrewd Exceptions: And of both these Points, as well as the King's continuing to employ and protect the Ministers of the two last Reigns, the Malcontent (s) Writers,

(r) At the Remonstrance of the Earl of Castlemaine; who, having been examin'd at the Bar of the House of Commons, took occasion to complain, That he and several others had of late been kept close Prisoners, and debarr'd even the Attendance of their own Servants, &c. and inside it his Request, that he might have the Liberty of the Tower, and such other Indulgencies as were reasonable, for the future.

(s) As appears by the following remarkable Passages:

"The King himself shews us he is infected with Dominion; and that by two broad Instances, Scotland, and his Ministers at home: for he has not only already violated the very Fundamentals of the Constitution of that Kingdom he swore to maintain, when he receiv'd that Crown, but buffs those Men of Quality that came up from that Nation to represent the Breach of those Conditions upon which he took the Crown: And for the present Ministers of his Government here, the very naming of them is giving the Reason, both for the Sins of Omission and Commission; and indeed how should we hope to have our Liberties establish'd, under them who in the late Reigns were the Authors of the Miseries we call'd in this Prince in hopes to be deliver'd from; and by what we have already seen of their Management, we must conclude they have either a King James in their Belly; or in their Hearts, the Principles of making more than a King James of King William; and truly they have carry'd him a good way towards it, when they have made him afraid of protecting that gallant Gentleman Lieutenant-General Ludlow, because forsooth he was a Commonwealth's man, and one of the Judges of King Charles I. tho', upon his [Ludlow] Principles, we have abdicated the Son; which is to refute him the Benefit of the Reasons upon which we pretend to save ourselves."

[Ludlow had been sent for, about this time, from his Retirement in Switzerland, in order to be employ'd in the Reduction of Ireland. But the Commons, at the Motion of Sir Edward Seymour, having address'd the King to issue out a Proclamation to apprehend him, as being attainted by Act of Parliament for being concern'd in the Murder of Charles I. his Majesty was pleas'd to reply, in effect, That nothing was more just and reasonable; and, when it was known that Ludlow was safe on the other Side of the Water, such a Proclamation was issued accordingly: The Consequence of which was,

A. D. 1689. Writers, immediately after, took the advantage to villify the new Establishment, and to enflame the People against it. But, within Doors, these Matters were so far from being objected to, that they were not so much as mention'd: And the very next Day after the Estimates were receiv'd, another lumping Vote was pass'd, That a Sum, not exceeding two Millions, should be added to the Revenue, for reducing Ireland, and carrying on the War; agreeable to the former, of the 24th of October. Ways and Means to raise this Sum, came next under Consideration; and with so much Zeal did the House, at first, prosecute this desirable Work, that in a Week's time they came to all these several Resolutions, viz. That there should be a Review of the Poll-Bill: That a Tax of 20 s. be laid on every Shopkeeper, Tradesman, and Artificer, worth 300 l. clear personal Estate: That a Tax of 100,000 l. be laid on the Jews residing in this Nation: That the pecuniary Penalties incurr'd by all Magistrates, Officers, &c. who had acted in the late Reign, without qualifying themselves by taking the Tests, should be apply'd to the current Service: That a Committee should sit to receive Proposals for advancing Monies upon the Securities of Estates forfeited by King James's Adherents in Ireland: That 1,400,000 l. should be rais'd by a Land-tax of two Shillings in the Pound: That Non-jurors should be tax'd double: And, That a Clause of Credit should be annex'd for three hundred thousand Pounds. A. D. 1689.

Ways and Means for raising the Supply.

From all these forward Steps it was reasonable to expect that his Majesty would have been gratify'd to his own Desire in the Dispatch of the Grant, if not in the Amount of it: But, if such Expectations were rais'd, they met with a sudden Damp: For having proceeded thus far together, in the Service of the Court, and growing mutually jealous that one would be rewarded at the Expence of the other, the two Parties, as if by Consent, thought it advisable to leave the Issue in Suspence till they had obtain'd a sufficient Security for themselves.

Further Proceedings of the Whigs against the Tories.

It is scarce to be doubted that the Tories had been promis'd the Indemnity-Bill, not that many of the leading Whigs in Office had undertaken to promote it: But then the Majority of the Latter not only stood aloof, but thought it their Interest to oppose it with all their Might, as a Measure which had a Tendency to ruin their Party. Thus, tho' the Whigs had given way to the bringing in such a Bill as the Tories requir'd, their real Design, as above hinted, was to make their own Bill of Pains and Penalties so large and comprehensive, was. That as the King was complain'd of on one hand for being afraid to give him Protection, so he was equally complain'd of on the other for suffering him to escape.]

This makes me believe a Story of this King, which I was ever sorry to hear, that upon some body's telling him t'other Day, the Commonwealth's-men began to be very busy, he should say, "Let me alone with them; for after I came to the Government of Holland, they were very civil to any thing." And it is certain, his Party were the Tories of that State.

But it is not only domestic Errors that make me despond, tho' they are enough to fink this Government, but the very Nation is in hazard, in reference to our Affairs abroad, more than ever; and I would not, while we reproach the Governments that went before us, that we should do worse for the common Safety. What Condition we are in as to France and Ireland, the Charge it has been to the People, and how much greater it is like to be, and that we have now a more melancholy Prospect of the Conclusion of the War than we had six Months ago, is felt as well as seen. I need not tell my Countrymen, that our Interest is grounded upon Trade, and that whatever lessens that lessens us; and that That Country that rivals us in that Point is our Enemy by Interest, and we can hardly have a greater: But perhaps it may surprize them to tell them at this time, that Holland is that Country; but so it is, and the indifferent World sees it, and even the Partial among us begin to feel it. It would have been the Wisdom of this King, as soon as he became so, to have consider'd his Interest changed upon his being so; instead of that, we have ever since had our English Interest govern'd by Dutch Councils, and we have felt the Effects of it; which our Enemies are free to improve to our Dishonour and Danger; as if we had deliver'd up the Wealth and Glory of England to Holland, instead of making that Country an Handmaid to her Greatness; and truly it is a scurvy Dilemma that we are brought into, that we cannot hope for Peace with France, nor to be long at Peace with Holland and keep our Trade, nor to support a War with both; if to out-live our own Factions: And this the Dutch know as well as we, and therefore you see they help us Time, but make the War their great Gain; for, as we let them manage it, they add our Money to their own. It is the Language of all Parts, both abroad and at home: Sink therefore we must, when our Friends help to do it, and the King we have made will not see it. If this Partiality proceeded only from the Sense he has of the Kindness the Estates have shewn him, one would hope it were but to be once done; but I am told there is more in it: that he intends to purchase them to himself, at our Cost, for a worse Purpose, viz. an unreasonable Greatness: And if fully put with the Dutch Interest; for with them it is a Maxim, the less We are free, the less They have to fear; nothing being more prevalent in England than a Dutch Republican. That, if I know any thing, completes our Misery, that we are got into a War, for the sake of a Country that is, in Reason of State, the most firm Enemy to our Liberties at home and our Trade abroad, and that they will only be of our Side as long as we let them go away with our Trade; but the Hour we shew we understand them, we may depend upon it they will make up with France, and leave us in the lurch. It is not enough that the Parliament will give Money; I do not doubt that; but that may be our Misery, as it may be given: Let us first consider for what we give it. It will be task, to put down France; but that is the Emperor's Work, whose Competitor he is, and not ours. But, as things now move, shall we not let up Holland, that is our Competitor every where, and in every thing? Taxes must rise heavily upon such Prospects of our Affairs. There is, in my Opinion, a nearer Way to the Mill than all this, and I think the only one; Let the Parliament but make it plain to the People that they have the Estate of the Clergy, and I will pay my Head for them they will be at the Charge of it: But that they should allist such a Revolution, and involve their Person to all Hazards, and their Estates to the Consumptions that will follow it, and at last sit down with a less Trade abroad, and with something worse than the worst Part of King Charles II's Reign at home, is, I hope, too gross to put upon the Nation. They that long since ow'd their Heads to the Public must not now think to set up for the Guides of it. The Reflection of a Commonwealth is too stale a Calumny to put a zealous and just Claim of Rights out of Countenance.

It was flung at my Lord Russel, and at all the Patriots and Martyrs of the People; but in vain are their Attainders reverse'd, while their Endeavours are impeach'd. That a Commonwealth should be an Objection now to such a Settlement of our Freedom as can only save us, is a most severe one against the Government, especially when the same Gentlemen have the Power of making it that made it once before. We can go upon no other Principles, except we will set up that arbitrary Power we have ventur'd all to oppose. Nick-names must not scare us, nor vain Flatteries abuse us: We must have our Liberties, or dust for ourselves, and that quickly, before he brings in more foreign Forces upon us: A Reproach we can never wipe off; that what we objected against King James should be endur'd from a Stranger, in so unfaithful a Manner, and a Parliament sitting uncontinued.

I will end with this Question: Is it not a Breach of public Faith and Safety, for a Prince, of his own Head, to call in foreign Force to rule a People that call'd him in but Yesterday to rule and protect them by their own Laws and Arms? It shews a plain Diffidation of Truth and Confidence in the People that trusted him, as well as a Violation of the Conditions of the Relation: And if so, are not the Obligations of the People discharg'd; nay, are they not oblig'd before God and Man to take speedy Care of their own future Safety one way or other. [The Englishman's Compleat Folio, p. 2. out of Lord Somers's Collection, ed. XXXV. Treat. 19.

A.D. 1689. comprehensive, as should render the Former of little Use: It was with this View, that they continued the Persons above-mention'd in Custody; that they labour'd hard to bring other obnoxious Persons of the same Party into the same Circumstances; that they brought in a Bill to forfeit the Estate of the late Lord Jeffreys (which was even admitted nem con.); that they set on foot an Enquiry into the Irish Affairs, together with the Abuses committed in the Victualling, &c; and that they gave all imaginable Countenance to the Complaints of the Merchants of London, in relation to the Losses they had sustain'd, by Captures, Want of Convoys, &c.

According to the Sense of all Courts, that Time is waited which is not employ'd in their immediate Service; and, agreeable to that Sense, it has been the Fashion to speak of these wayward Proceedings of the House of Commons, with the utmost Bitterness, and to represent them as the Cause of all King William's Misfortunes: But, according to the Constitution, which King William at his coming undertook to restore, whenever the Crown demanded Aids, the Subjects had a Right to make the Grant on their own Terms; and even it is the fundamental Duty of their Representatives, to take advantage of the Distresses of the Crown, to provide for the Satisfaction of the People. What indeed is chiefly to be regretted in the Case before us, is, that, except in the Bill of Rights, which was held to be very imperfect, the two Parties, during this whole Interval, never thought of the Public, but made use of all their Arts, only to circumvent and supplant each other.

To come to Particulars; and first of the Enquiry concerning Ireland, which was narrow'd to the Miscarriages of the Summer only: It appear'd, that, according to the Establishment for that Service, Duke Schomberg ought to have had twenty-three thousand effective Men under his Command; whereas the House was inform'd, that he had scarce fourteen thousand: That even Those had all along wanted Bread, Shoes, Cloathing, and Medicines: That Numbers had been swept off by Sickness: That the Duke had waited above a Month for his Artillery, Horses and Carriages: That such was the Consternation of the Irish at his first Approach, that he might have march'd directly to Dublin, in case he had been supply'd as he ought to have been: And that Commissary Shales, who had been Purveyor to King James's Army, when encamp'd on Hounslow-heath, was answerable for all these Miscarriages. Upon these several Informations, the House made their Application to his Majesty, by one Address, To appoint some fit Person to go over to Ireland, to take an Account of the Number of the Army there, and of the State and Condition it was in: By another, To order the said Shales to be taken into Custody, his Accounts, Papers, &c. to be secur'd, and also to appoint some other Person or Persons to officiate in his Place; and, by a third, (which was carry'd on the previous Question by forty-six, and on the main Question by forty-nine, Voices, and which was conceiv'd in very (t) strong Terms) That he would be graciously pleas'd to let the House know, who recommended the said Shales, that they might be the better enabled to give him such humble Advice, as might tend to the Preservation of his Majesty's Person and Government. A.D. 1689. Several Addresses.

As every one of these Steps help'd to increase the Ferment of the House, and of course to postpone the grand Affair of the Supply, his Majesty found it no easy Matter to conceal the Displeasure they gave him: Such, however, was the critical Situation of Things, and so far did his Policy get the better of his Resentment, that to the first he reply'd, That he would forthwith send some Persons to Ireland, according to the Desire of the House; and, to the second, That being appriz'd of Shales's Misdemeanours, he had already order'd him to be secur'd, &c. But, in his Answer to the third, he could not help discovering himself, by saying bluntly, Gentlemen, 'tis impossible for me to give you an Answer to this Question: Which some Persons endeavour to account for, by urging, That Shales was nam'd and approv'd of in full Council: The Majority, nevertheless, appear'd so much enflam'd at a Negative of so extraordinary a Kind, that it was thought proper to appease them by a Condescension as extraordinary; namely, by the following Message: The King's Answers.

" W. R.

His Majesty having already declar'd his Resolution to prosecute the War in Ireland, with the utmost Vigour, and being desirous to use the Means that may be most satisfactory and effectual in order to it, is graciously pleas'd, that this House do recommend a Number of Persons, not exceeding seven, to be commission'd by his Majesty, to take care of the Provisions and such other Preparations as shall be necessary for that Service. His Majesty is farther pleas'd to let the House know, That, upon Consideration of the Address of November 11, he gives them His second Message.

(t) Viz. " We your Majesty's, &c. being filled with the sincerest Affection to your Majesty, and tenderly concern'd for the Safety of your Majesty and your People, and for the Honour of your Government, do most humbly represent the extreme Danger we conceive the Nation and your Majesty's Affairs to be in, by the Employment of Persons in the greatest Trust, who have corruptly and treacherously endeavour'd the Destruction of both; especially Mr. John Shales, who was made Commissary-general in Ireland, tho' notoriously known to be Popishly affected, &c. The Mischiefs which have happen'd by the Employment of this Man are so very great, that without God's infinite Mercy they might have entirely defeated your Majesty's good Intentions, and the Effect of the Resolutions of this House; and in particular, when that experienc'd General Duke Schomberg went into Ireland, he left strict Orders for the speedy transporting the Ordnance and Horse design'd for the Service of that Kingdom; and it pleas'd God to bless his first Attempt in that degree, that had his said Orders been executed, your Majesty's Affairs had been in a better Posture than now they are. But the said Commissary Shales, to satisfy his Avarice, and partly out of Disaffection, did delay the Execution of the said Orders for several Weeks; by reason whereof your Majesty's Forces were not only disabled from pursuing the Advantages they had gain'd, but were also necessitated to encamp at Dundalk; which occasion'd the Loss of some thousands of your Majesty's Subjects: Wherefore, we the Knights," &c.

A. D. 1689. them leave to nominate some Persons to go over into Ireland, to take an Account of the Number, State, and Condition of the Army, who shall receive his Majesty's Orders accordingly."

This produc'd an unanimous Vote of Thanks: And yet when the Undertakers for the Court would have improv'd this relenting Fit, to the King's Service, by moving the House to enter immediately on Ways and Means for raising the Supply, they lost the previous Question by a Majority of seven Voices: And the Result of all was, that they return'd his Majesty's Compliment, and left the Nomination of those Persons to himself.

Some Days before, Walker, the Defender of Londonderry, had presented a Petition in behalf of the Widows and Orphans of those slain in the Siege of that Place, and not only procur'd a Grant of ten thousand Pounds for their present Relief, but was honour'd with the Thanks of the House, for his own particular Merits and Services, which Mr. Powle, the Speaker, took care to enhance, by an express Mention of the shameful, if not perfidious, Behaviour of Lundee, Cunningham, and Richards.

A Report was also made, in this Interval, of the Abuses discover'd in the Victualling of the Navy; which were such as did indeed cry aloud not only for Examination but Punishment: The Seamen had been serv'd with great Quantities of corrupt and unwholsome Provisions; Numbers had dy'd; and the rest were dangerously provok'd with such unjust and inhuman Treatment: But then the Contractors seem'd to be more immediately answerable for these Abuses than the Commissioners: The Commons were however of a different Mind; as being more incens'd against the Men than the Crime; and so high did they carry their Resentment, that they order'd Sir John Parsons, Sir Richard Haddock, Alderman Sturt, and Mr. Nicholas Fenn, the Commissioners, to be taken into the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms; and it was even with Difficulty that they were admitted to Bail, under the Penalty of ten thousand Pounds each.

Complaints of the London Merchants.

As to the Complaints of the London Merchants, they were open'd by a Petition, setting forth, in effect, "That, notwithstanding the great Customs which they paid for the Guard of the Seas, when the War with France was declar'd, (which they had no Foreknowledge of, nor were prepar'd for) the very Mouth of the Channel was so infested with Privateers, that they lost near a hundred Sail of Ships, to the Value of 600,000*l*; that many of those which escap'd the Enemy had lain in the western Ports near three Months, for want of Convoy; that others had been forc'd to hire Foreigners, or pay considerable Sums to the King's own Ships, to convoy them to the Downs." Being called upon to prove the last of these Allegations, they did so, at the Expence of Captain Charles Churchill, a Member of their House, who had exacted forty Pounds from one Hudson and others, who was thereupon committed to the Tower, but soon releas'd, without being oblig'd, as far as appears, to make Reparation to the Injur'd. They also charg'd several Captains of Men of War with having acted more like Pirates, with respect to Merchant-ships, than their Guards and Defenders: That, in particular, the Captains Leyton and Beaumont, had seiz'd on a Ship bound from Cork to Copenhagen, and confiscated her Cargo, to the Value of three thousand Pounds: That Captain Guilman had plunder'd a Pink homeward-bound from Bourdeaux, of twenty Casks of Brandy, &c.: That Captain Nevil had impress'd so many Hands from on board a Virginia-Ship of three hundred Tons, (freighted with five hundred and ninety Hogsheads of Tobacco, for which seven thousand Pounds had been paid and secur'd to the King) off of Beachy, that she was unable to defend herself against a Privateer of eight Guns, by whom she was taken and carry'd into Dunkirk: That two Ships bound to Barbados (one of which had on board the Value of twelve thousand Pounds) which had obtain'd a Promise of Convoy, and receiv'd Instructions and sailing Orders from Commodore Raines, were detain'd by Captain Avery, in order to impress their Hands, tho' the whole Fleet of Merchantmen had weigh'd Anchor, till the Convoy was out of Sight; whereby they lost their Voyage: And that Captain Leyton, again, had seiz'd a Ship homeward-bound from Madeira, had carry'd her into Plymouth, where he plunder'd her, to the Value of two thousand six hundred and sixty-five Pounds, and had refus'd to obey a Decree given against him in the Admiralty-Court, to make Restitution. All these several Complaints were referr'd to the Consideration of a Committee; and the House, in the mean time, resolv'd, That the requiring or receiving Money for Convoys was illegal, oppressive to Merchants, and destructive to Trade.

A. D. 1689.

Lords Enquiry into the Advisers, &c. of the Murder of Russel, &c.

But the Party-Mine which was deepest laid, widest spread, and which was calculated to do the most Execution, (as having Relation to every Circumstance in the two last Reigns which might now be improv'd to the defeating of the Indemnity-Bill, and establishing that of Pains and Penalties on its Ruins) was sprung in the House of Lords by the Duke of Bolton, and of which a solemn Notice was given to the Commons by the following Message: "We are commanded by the Lords to acquaint this Honourable House, that a Committee being appointed to examine, who were the Advisers and Prosecutors of the Murders of the late Lord Russel, Colonel Sydney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Mr. Cornish, and others; who were the Advisers of issuing out the Writs of Quo Warrantos against Corporations; who were the Regulators, and also who were the public Asserters, of the dispensing Power; they desire, that Mr. Serjeant Trenchard, John Hampden, Esq; and such other Members of this House, as can inform the Lords of the said Committee about these Matters, may have Leave to appear when desir'd, to declare their

A.D. 1689. their Knowledge therein." The Commons gave their Consent, and the said two Members did give their Attendance accordingly: But tho' they had both partaken so largely of the same Persecution, and Mr. Hampden in particular had all the Reason imaginable to contribute all the Lights in his Power, as having been chiefly brought within the Reach of it, by the Artifices of the Marquis of Halifax, (against whom, in the first place, the Enquiry was intended) neither of them now appear'd in a Disposition to take the Revenge which seem'd to be in their Power: Of Trenchard's Informations no Memorial remains: And of Hampden it is only said, That he made a long Speech, tending more to magnify his own Concern in the Revolution, than to discover the Advisers of Lord Russel's Murder. Sir Peter Rich, Colonel Godfrey, and Mr. Anthony Rowe, (all Members) were also call'd upon by the Lords, to declare what they knew concerning the several Points, before the Committee; nor was any other Person omitted, who had either acted in, or suffer'd under, the Violences of the late Times: It was the Business of the Latter to accuse, and Endeavours were us'd to make the Former confess: But Those were too much upon their Guard, and Those were so defective in their Evidence, "that, as Bishop Burnet observes, tho' the Enquiry lasted some Weeks, and gave occasion to much Heat, nothing appear'd, that could be prov'd, upon which Votes and Addresses might be founded."

Reflections on Mr. North's Account of it.

According to the Representation of Mr. North, both in his Examen and in his Life of Sir Dudley North his Brother, we are to understand, that the Commons, in a Committee of the whole House, had the very same Matters under their Consideration, at the very same time: He names the Month of November; and adds, that he was himself in the House when Sir John Moor, and his said Brother, were under Examination: But, if he was, his Memory deceiv'd him strangely, for the attentive Reader will recollect, that the Committee of the Commons, which was appointed to enquire who were the Authors and Advisers of several Grievances relating to the City of London, and of which Mr. Foley was Chairman, deliver'd in their Report on the 29th of May, in the midst of the preceding Session. Mr. North moreover insinuates, that those two eminent Citizens pass'd the Ordeal of both Committees, not only safely but triumphantly, by insisting, That they were warranted in all they had done, Moor, as Mayor, by the Advice, and North, as Sheriff, by the Direction, of the Court of Aldermen, of whom five were present, and were sheltered in the Herd of the prosecuting Party: Whence we are taught to conclude, that because they confess'd no more, and no more could be prov'd against them, they had no more to answer for: Whereas, the same Author, as we have seen in the former Volume, has circumstantially shewn, tho' for a different Purpose, the whole Proceeding to be a Court-Intrigue, and that his Brother Dudley consented to serve, on his being convinc'd by the Lord-Keeper (who, at the same time, gave him a thousand Pounds, to be a joint Sharer with him in the Profits of the Adventure) that he was like to be a Gainer by it. Let us have Leave to add, that, speaking yet farther of the abortive Conclusion of these Examinations, he ascribes it, in the most sanguine Terms he can use, to the matchless Innocence of those suppos'd Delinquents, which neither the Power nor Malice of their Prosecutors was able to tarnish: Whereas the plain Truth is, That the King himself, who came over expressly to do Justice to the Nation on their Oppressors, great and small, had stood forth as their Advocate, and, together with a Majority of his Ministers, made it his Business to procure them an Indemnity; with which singular Advantage, it is no Wonder that they obtain'd it. A.D. 1689.

Proceedings of the Commons in the Case of Sir T. Armstrong.

But, to return: While the Lords were thus the principal Figures on the Stage, the Commons did not disdain to act an Under-Part in the same Scene: They resum'd the Consideration of Sir Thomas Armstrong's Verdict, and came to the following Resolutions upon it, viz. "1. That Sir Thomas Armstrong's Plea on the Statute 5 Ed. VI. ought to have been admitted; and that the executing him upon the Attainder, by Outlawry, was illegal, and a Murder by Pretence of Law. 2. That the Heirs and Executors of the said Sir Thomas ought to have Reparation of their Losses, out of the Estates of the four Judges and two Prosecutors. 3. That a Writ of Error, for Reversal of Judgment in Felony or Treason, is the Right of the Subject, and ought to be granted at his Desire, and is not an Act of Grace or Favour which may be deny'd or granted at Pleasure." In consequence of the second of these Resolutions, they also order'd a Bill of Reparation to be brought in, which was to pass without Fees; and when the Committee, to whom the Case of Lady Armstrong and her Daughter Mrs. Mathews was referr'd, confirm'd the Allegations contain'd in their Petition, some of which bore hard upon Sir Robert Sawyer, they expell'd him the House, by a Majority of sixty Voices.

In this manner the whole Month pass'd, which the King had prescrib'd in his Speech for the Dispatch of the Supply: But, on the 7th of December, the Genius of the Court so far prevail'd, that the Land-Tax Bill was brought forward; and almost in the same Breath that a Clause was admitted for appropriating Part of the Product to the Service of the Navy, two others were rejected, viz. a Proviso for exempting such Merchandizes from this Tax as should be detain'd in Ships Port-bound, for want of Convoys; and another for a like Exemption in favour of Money lent on Mortgages. On the 9th, the Sum for the Use of the Navy was fix'd at four hundred thousand Pounds. On the 11th, when a Rider was offer'd, importing, that the Money so appropriated should not be diverted to any other Use, it pass'd in the Negative,

A.D. 1689. Negative. A Motion being also made for an additional Clause, to empower Commissioners to review the Assessments, to examine upon Oath, and if they found any Person omitted or under-rated, to re-assess them, by such Ways and Means, and under such Penalties, as had been before provided, the House divided, and the Question was carry'd by nine Voices, viz. Yeas 136, Noes 127. And then the Bill was sent up to the Lords.

Proceedings on the Bill of Rights.

It was now reasonable to think, that a more compliant Spirit had taken possession of the House; and no doubt some Temperaments had been apply'd, to qualify thus far the jarring Humours which prevail'd in it: Perhaps the Assent of the Lords to the Bill of Rights was one of those Qualifiers: Their Lordships, as it may be remember'd, had in the last Session grafted upon it a Clause in favour of the Hanover Succession: This the Commons rejected; and both Houses adhering, with unusual Heat and Obstinacy, the Bill was lost. The Commons, however, began where they had left off: The Bill which they now sent up was a Copy of the former; and possibly was sent up so early as the 6th of November, on purpose to convince the Court, and the Lords of the Court-faction, that the Supply depended upon it; for, till their Lordships had pass'd it, the Land-tax Bill, as we have seen, was hung in the Hedge: Their Lordships, on the other hand, we may presume, were appriz'd of this Purpose of the Commons, for they no longer insisted on the Hanover-Clause, and contented themselves only with providing, "That the Crown and Government of these Realms should, from time to time, descend to, and be enjoy'd by, such Persons, being Protestants, as should have inherited the same, in case the several Persons who by the same Act were disabled from succeeding, on account of their being Papists, or having marry'd Papists, were naturally dead." Some of their Lordships also, upon this Occasion, made a new Attempt to shew, that there was a dispensing Power in the Crown; but whether it was to countenance the last Reign, or flatter the present, has not been explain'd: Their Arguments, however, had no more Weight with the House, than before; and, on the third reading of the Bill, certain other Lords, who were irreconcileable Enemies to the Marquises of Halifax and Carmarthen (Danby) offer'd a new Clause, by way of Rider, by which it was to be provided, "That all Pardons upon an Impeachment of the House of Commons should be declar'd null and void, unless granted with the Consent of both Houses of Parliament." This produc'd a long and vehement Debate, but, on the Issue, was over-rul'd by a Majority of thirty-three Voices; upon which, twelve Peers enter'd their Dissent in the following Words:

"1. Because to impeach being the undoubted Right of the Commons of England, and by which alone Justice can be had against Offenders that are too big for the ordinary Courts of Justice, Impeachments would be render'd altogether ineffectual, if the King can pardon in such Cases. A.D. 1689.

2. Because such a Power of pardoning would cause a Failure of Justice, which the Law of England will not allow of in any case.

3. Because the Government becomes precarious, when there is wanting a sufficient Power to punish evil Ministers of State, the bringing of such Ministers to Justice being then a Matter of Grace, and not of Right.

4. Because such evil Ministers are in a much securer Condition than any other Offenders, it being the Interest of ill-disposed Kings to protect them from Justice, since they are so much the more useful and necessary to such Kings, by how much they have been instrumental in subverting the Government.

5. Because the King can only pardon such Offences as are against himself, but not in case of an Appeal, nor wherever the Wrong or Injury is to a third Person.

6. A fortiori, the King cannot pardon an Impeachment, because all the Commons of England have an Interest in it, and it is at their Suit.

7. Because it is inconsistent with the Government of England to vest a Power any where, that may obstruct the public Justice.

8. Because such a Power of pardoning sets the King's Prerogative above the Government, which is inconsistent with the Reason and Nature of this Constitution.

9. Because the rejecting of the Rider, and the Vote of this House against the dispensing Power in general, don't seem to be very consistent, since the Power of pardoning upon Impeachments is altogether as great as that of a dispensing Power."

The Lords who sign'd this Protest were, Macclesfield, Ossulstone, Bolton, Warrington, Cornwallis, Bath, J. Lovelace, R. Montagu, Herbert, Stamford, Granville, and Crewe: And, to close on this Head, both the Bill of Rights, and the Land-Tax Bill, receiv'd the Royal Assent on the 16th of November.

The Royal Assent given to the Land-Tax Bill and Bill of Rights.

But tho' the Heats of the House of Commons had been somewhat allay'd, they were far from being extinguish'd. A little before the King came to the House on this double Occasion, they had resolv'd themselves into a general Committee on the State of the Nation; in which they came to the following Resolutions; namely, That a Committee be appointed to examine and state the Condition of the public Revenue when his present Majesty accepted the Administration of the Government, and also to and at Michaelmas last; and also what Loans have been made thereon, and how the same had been apply'd: And that an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to lay before him the ill Conduct and Success of our Affairs with respect to Ireland, the Armies, and Fleet; and humbly to desire his Majesty that he would be pleas'd to take into Consideration, and in his Wisdom to find out, the Authors of Miscarriages, and to appoint Affairs to be manag'd by Persons unsuspected, and more to Resolutions on the State of the Nation.

A. D. 1689. to the Safety of his Majesty, and Satisfaction of his (u) Subjects.

Now the very Words of these Resolutions, which, on the Report, had also the Sanction of the House, are sufficient to shew, that these several Censures of the Administration arose from the Whigs: And that, under the Mask of detecting Miscarriages, and proscribing Offenders, the great Point they drove at was, to divide among themselves the whole Power and Profits of the Government.

The Tories, in the mean while, who found themselves out-number'd by the Whigs, and who had as yet no great Reason to expect, that the King would, on any Terms, consent to turn the Scale in their Favour, made their Court on all Occasions to the Princess of Denmark, and her Favourite the Countess of Marlborough; and at this Crisis, in particular, resolv'd to give the Nation another publick Proof of their seeming Attachment to her Interests. They had, in the former Session, been the first Movers for settling a Revenue on her Highness for Life, independent of the Crown, and had so far prevail'd, in the general Committee, as may be recollected, that forty thousand Pounds was nam'd and agreed to for that Use: But it was post-pon'd on the Report, and in the End, defeated by the Adjournment of the Session. The same Intrigue was now resum'd: The Princess's Friends, namely the Lord and Lady Marlborough, could not bear to think, that she should depend on the King's (v) Generosity, which, it seems, they had no Opinion of, and therefore made a general Muster of all who were willing to be Adventurers in her Service. No Affair of this Nature can long be a Secret: The Court had soon Intimation of it, were alarm'd, and endeavour'd to stifle the Bomb, before it should have Time to burst. Lady Marlborough was attack'd on all Sides, and in all Manners; threaten'd with Ruin; wheedled with Promises of Favour; and, at last, told, that, instead of serving, she would undo, the Princess: That she (the Princess) could not hope to carry her Point; and, if she did not, the King would not think himself oblig'd to do any thing for her, &c. Her Ladyship, however, continued immoveable, and, instead of giving over her Pursuits, doubled and re-doubled all her Efforts to render it successful. Finding her thus firm, a new Expedient was put in practice: The Duke of Shrewsbury was sent to make her Highness an Offer of fifty thousand Pounds a Year, if she would desist from soliciting the Settlement by Parliament, and undertook of himself to be a sort of Guarantee for his Majesty's Performance, by saying, "That he was confident he would keep his Word; and that, if he did not, he would not serve him an Hour after he broke it." This Message, also, was brought to Lady Marlborough, and as she had declar'd herself dissatisfy'd with it, and even insinuated, that his Majesty's Promise was not to be depended on, it may be fairly presum'd, that when she reported it to the Princess, she prevail'd with her to return the following Answer: "That she could not think herself in the wrong to desire a Security for what was to support her; and that the Business was now gone so far, that she thought it reasonable to see what her Friends could do for her." This was peremptory; and all that the King and his Ministers had now to do was, to manage the Matter as well as possible in the House of Commons: Now it is reasonable to think, that, before this Message was sent, both were convinc'd, that the Princess had already made sure of a formidable Party there; for Sovereigns never stoop to such Expedients, till all others have been found unsuccessful: Instead therefore of making the Princess popular, by rendring her the Object of public Pity, as the opposing her whole Demand would scarce have fail'd of doing, they compounded the Matter with her Partisans: The Latter demanded 70,000 l. a Year, and the Former offer'd 50,000; "which was at last accepted, rather than have any farther Struggle, (says the Duchess (w) of Marlborough) considering the great Power and Influence of the Crown, by reason of its Dependants."

A. D. 1689.

The Princess of Denmark renews her Demand of a parliamentary Settlement.

But

(u) "The Member that spoke the loudest on this Occasion was Mr. Hampden, jun. who, tho' his Life had been in danger under the preceding Reign, tho' both he and his Father had much contributed to the late Revolution, and tho' both were in favour with the present King, yet made a long Speech against those that had the Management of Affairs, by saying, he could not but wonder to see those very Persons in the Admiralty whom the late King James had employ'd, even when his Affairs were most desperate, to treat with the (then) Prince of Orange. He alledg'd the Example of William first Prince of Orange, who never made use of the Duke of Alva's Ministers; of Henry IV. of France, who never employ'd those of his Competitor the Duke of Mayenne, and of several other Princes; and mov'd for an Address, to desire his Majesty to remove the Persons he had mark'd out, from his Presence and Councils. This Speech might, perhaps, have made an Impression on the Minds of some Members, but because at the same time he complain'd, that several Commonwealths-men were employ'd by the Government, the House, who knew both him, his Father, and their Predecessors, to have ever adher'd to the Republican Party, broke out immediately into a general Laughter. As soon as the Commons had recover'd their Gravity, several Members stood up in defence of the illustrious Person on whom Mr. Hampden had reflected, alledging, that the Reason why they had been deputed to the Prince of Orange was, not because they were in King James's Interest, but rather, because they had all along disapprov'd his Majesty's Conduct, and as such, had the general Approbation of the Nation, and were most likely to be agreeable to his Highness.

"The tune Day Sir Thomas Clarges represented to the Commons, that it was dangerous to bring so many foreign Troops into the Kingdom, and that it was both safer and more expeditious to employ English-men in the Reduction of Ireland. He supported his Opinion by the Example of Cromwell, whose English Troops not only had a natural Antipathy against the Irish, but likewise a constant Ascendant over them; but somebody very justly reply'd, That Cromwell's Army was compos'd of well-train'd, weather-beaten Soldiers, whereas the present English Forces were made up of raw, undisciplin'd Men. Sir Thomas Clarges made this Motion, upon a false Report, that, besides the seven thousand Danes, the King had sent for eight thousand more, either from Hanover or Sweden." [Life of King William, vol. ii. p. 103, 104.

(v) "For, says that Lady, in her Memoirs, the late Lord Godolphin had told me, that the King, on some Morning at the Treasury, speaking of the Civil List, wonder'd very much how the Princess could spend thirty thousand Pounds a Year; though it appear'd afterwards, that some of his Favourites had more."

(w) The same great Lady adds, just after, "That most of those who had been prevail'd with to promote it were Tories; and that their Zeal, on the present Occasion, was doubtless to reward King William's Foes, continues her Grace, I never observ'd that, on any other, they discover'd much Regard for the Princess of Denmark."

A.D. 1689. But tho' this Compromiſe was the Effect of private Cabals, it ſeem'd, without-doors, to be the Effect of fair and open Deliberations: Lord Eland, (the only Son of the Marquis of Hallifax) Mr. Finch, and Mr. Godolphin, ſtickled in the Houſe for ſeventy thouſand Pounds: And others, among whom was the younger Hampden, inſiſted, That it was dangerous to ſettle any Revenue on a Princeſs who had ſo near a Clame to the Crown, independently of the King, whoſe very Title was diſputed by the Malcontents: Upon the Reſult of all, it was reſolv'd,

And obtains it. "That an humble Addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, That he would be pleas'd to make a Proviſion for the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark of fifty thouſand Pounds in the whole, in the Year, beginning at Chriſtmas next." And ſuch an Addreſs was accordingly preſented by the whole Houſe; to which his Majeſty was pleas'd to anſwer, "Gentlemen, Whatſoever comes from the Houſe of Commons is ſo agreeable to me, and particularly this Addreſs, that I ſhall do what you deſire of me."

It is however acknowledg'd on all hands, that the Conſequence of this Struggle, was a Breach between the Two Royal Siſters, which never was made up: And it is obſervable, that the Queen's particular Complaint, mention'd by Burnet, namely, That ſuch a Motion ſhould be made before the Princeſs had try'd, in a private Way, what the King intended to aſſign her, has never been anſwer'd.

The Revenue granted for one Year, as before. But tho' it was held reaſonable to render her Highneſs independent of the King, the Majority could not, by any Pretence of a Parity of Reaſon, be brought to think, that the King ought to be render'd independent of his People: Thus, when the Revenue was under Conſideration, their Complaiſance extended no farther than to ſettle it, as before, on his Majeſty for one Year: And the Bill for that Purpoſe was, on the third Reading, paſs'd, nem. con. and ſent up to the Lords.

Addreſs on the State of the Nation. This was the Buſineſs of December 19; and, two Days after, the Addreſs on the State of the Nation was reported by Mr. Hampden, jun. who is accus'd of having ſet that Affair in motion, partly out of Diſappointment, and partly out of Pique to the Earl of Nottingham, who had croſs'd his Ambition, by ſtepping between him and the Secretary's Office: The ſaid Addreſs contain'd in Subſtance, the deep Senſe the Commons had of the ill Conduct of foreign Affairs, and of the unhappy Succeſs it had produc'd; pleaded, that it was the Duty of their Truſt, to lay before his Majeſty the Wrong done both to him and his People, and the imminent Danger of the Kingdom, from the Want of Ability or Integrity in thoſe who had the Direction of the ſaid Affairs; communicated a great Variety of Particulars, to ſpecify wherein this Want of Integrity or Ability conſiſted; and concluded with declaring, that the Remedy, under God, conſiſted in his Majeſty's Wiſdom, and Affection to his People; and recommending to him to find out the Authors, &c. according to the Words of the Vote. But tho' this Remonſtrance, for ſuch in effect it was, was exactly agreeable to the Senſe of the Houſe, as it appear'd on the 15th, and that Senſe could no otherwiſe be juſtify'd than by a Deduction of Facts, the Wind was now come about, and, by the ſtrangeſt (x) Coalition imaginable, of Tories in ſupport of their Leaders, and Whigs in Place, who thought it their Duty to ſhew more Concern for the Honour of the Court than the Intereſt of their Country, the Addreſs was recommitted; which was held the decenteſt, and found to be the moſt effectual, Way to ſtifle it for good and all.

A.D. 1689.

Ordered to be recommitted.

A Call of the Houſe. Both Parties however continued ſo fearful of each other, that, in hope of a Reinforcement, they join'd in a Motion for a Call of the Houſe; which was fix'd, on the 23d, for that Day Fortnight; and it was farther reſolv'd, That all ſuch Perſons as ſhould not then appear, or cauſe a ſatisfactory Excuſe to be made for their Abſence, ſhould have their Names printed, to the end that the Nation might know, who attended, and who neglected, their Duty.

Both Parties again make their Court to the King. But now it was that the Struggles of the two Parties, once more, threw the whole Game into the Hands of the King; for both being thoroughly convinc'd, that which ever had his Majeſty on their Side had the other at diſcretion, made their Court not only at each other's Expence, but at the Expence of every other Conſideration: The King was out of meaſure provok'd at the (y) Revenue-Bill, by which he was convinc'd, that the Whigs were determin'd to keep him to his good Behaviour, by having him annually at their Mercy: The Tories had either found this out, or had the Secret communicated to them; and, having the Corporations ſtill in their Power, made an Offer to his Majeſty, to make him eaſy in that and every other Point, in caſe he would diſſolve the preſent Parliament, in which both They and He had ſo precarious an Intereſt: The Whigs had ſoon Intimation of this Treaty, and, by way of Countermine, out-promis'd the Tories, in caſe he would help them, ſays Biſhop Burnet, to get the Corporation-Bill paſs'd, which, as before-mention'd, was calculated to take the Election out of the Hands of the Tories, and put it into Theirs. The King demurr'd on theſe ſeveral Offers, and, to incline him to the Whiggiſh Side, the Committee of Ways and Means prepar'd the following new Reſolutions, which were ſeverally agreed to by the Houſe, viz. That a Bill be brought in to forbid all Perſons to ſell Beer, Ale, &c. or diſtil or ſell Brandy, &c. without a Licence: That for every Licence to (x) It is particularly mention'd, that Hampden, the Father, appear'd at the Head of the Oppoſition againſt his Son, and ſhew'd himſelf more offended with the Addreſs, than the Miſcarriages complain'd of in it.

A.D. 1689. to sell Beer, &c. an Imposition, not under twenty Shillings, shall be paid; to sell Coffee, &c. not under forty Shillings; to distil Brandy, &c. not under five Pounds; and to sell Brandy, &c. not under twenty Shillings: That an Imposition be laid upon Tea and Coffee, at the Custom-house: That an Imposition of one Quarter of a Year's full Value be laid upon every House erected upon a new Foundation, within the Bills of Mortality; and that the farther Sum of one Shilling in the Pound, for one Year, be laid on all Persons and Estates charg'd by the late two Shilling Act.

Proceedings in the Corporation-Bill.

It ought to be observ'd, that the Recess for the Christmas-Holidays was very short; that all these Resolutions, except the last of all, A.D. 1689-90 were made on the 30th and 31st of December; that on the 2d of January, the Sollicitor-general, Somers, who was Chairman of the Committee to whom the important Corporation-Bill had been refer'd, made his Report to the House of several Amendments, which he read in his Place, and which were severally agreed to; and that, as the Bill then stood, it contain'd little more than a bare Restitution of Corporations to the State they were in, at the Year 1675. By this time, however, the Whigs had some Reason to suspect, that, as a Party, they had lost the King; and, therefore, they thought it high time to take care of themselves, by the following Means: As soon as the House had given their Sanction to the Votes of the Committee, Mr. Sacheverel rose up, and mov'd that the following Clause might be admitted:

"And whereas it is necessary, for the sake of public Justice, and securing the Government for the future, that such open Attempts upon the Constitution, and so notorious Violations of Oaths and Trusts, should not go unpunish'd; lest hereafter ill Men might be encourag'd to the like Guilt, in hopes to come off with Impunity, tho' they should fail of Success:

Be it enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, that every Mayor, Recorder, Alderman, Steward, Sheriff, Common-Council-man, Town-Clerk, Magistrate, or Officer, who did take upon him to consent to, or join in, any such Surrender, or Instrument purporting such Surrender as aforesaid; or did sollicit, procure, prosecute, or did pay or contribute to the Charge of prosecuting any Scire facias, Quo Warranto, or Information in the Nature of Quo Warranto, by this Act declared void, shall be, and is declar'd, adjudg'd, and enacted to be, for the space of seven Years, uncapable and disabled, to all Intents and Purposes, to bear or execute any Office, Employment, or Place of Trust, as a Member of such respective Body-Corporate, or in or for such respective City, Town, Borough, or Cinque-Port, whereof or wherein he was a Member, at or before the Time of making such Surrender, or Instrument purporting such Surrender, or the suing out, or prosecuting, such Scire facias, Quo Warranto, or Information in nature of Quo Warranto; any thing in this Act contained, or any other Case, Statute, or any Ordinance, Charter, Custom, or Thing, to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding." A.D. 1689-90

The said Clause was accordingly admitted; and Mr. Sacheverel was no sooner set down, than Sir Robert Howard propos'd a second, in these Words:

"And be it further enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That if any Person, hereby enacted and declar'd to be incapable and disabled to bear or execute any such Office, Employment, or Place of Trust as aforesaid, shall at any time after the 25th Day of March, 1690, take upon him to bear or execute any such Office, Employment, or Place of Trust, as aforesaid, every such Person shall forfeit the Sum of five hundred Pounds, to be recover'd by any Member or Inhabitant of the respective Body-Corporate, City, Town, Borough, Cinque-Port, who shall sue for the same by Action of Debt, Bill or Plaint, in any of their Majesties Courts of Record at Westminster; wherein no Essoin, Protection, Privilege, or Wager of Law, or more than one Imparlance, shall be allow'd. And also, upon Verdict found, or Judgment given by Confession, or otherwise, in such Action against the Defendant, the said Defendant shall be for ever incapable to bear or execute any Office or Place of Trust whatsoever, within this Kingdom of England, or Dominion of Wales.

Provided also, and be it enacted, that a former Action depending shall be no Plea for the Defendant in any Action to be brought upon this Statute, if such former Action hath depended by the Space of three Terms; nor shall a Nonsuit of the Plaintiff, or a Judgment for the Defendant, in any former Action, be a Bar to the Plaintiff, in any Action to be brought upon this Statute."

This was admitted also, and, together with the Bill thus amended, was order'd to be engross'd; to the infinite Astonishment and Confusion of the few Tories present, and whose Objections and Complaints were alike disregarded. The Body of that Party, not dreaming of any such Attempt, had withdrawn from the Town during the Holidays, to visit their Country-seats; and their Adversaries, willing to make the most of the precious Opportunity, push'd it on with so much Expedition, that, on the very next Day but one, it was read a second time, and might have been carry'd thro' at a Heat, if one of the principal Promoters of it had not thought fit to concur in a Motion for Time, and induc'd the rest of his Party to follow his Example. A Concession so sudden, unexpected, and irreconcileable with the rest of the Proceeding, occasion'd much Speculation. The Tory-Party gave out, or their Oracle Mr. Finch (Sollicitor in the late Reign) for them, That the King having express'd his Dislike of the Bill, the Undertakers, as a Test of its Utility, had affirm'd, That the Majority of the House were for it, and that, to shew they were so, they would consent to the Trial at any indifferent Time, when the House was fullest. The Whigs, on the other hand, set forth, "That they were trick'd into the Delay, by one who was thought to

A.D. 1689-90 look one Way and row another. However this may be, the farther Conſideration of the Bill was put off till the 10th; at which time the two Parties having completed their Muſters, it fell to Mr. Sacheverel's Lot, as Champion for the Whigs, to open the Debate; which he did, by recommending what he call'd a more moderate Clauſe to the Houſe, in lieu of the Former: But on the bare reading it was rejected; the Tories, and their Partiſans for the Day, pronouncing it to be ſo, in Shew more than Subſtance. The Aſtoniſhment and Mortification were now on the Whiggiſh Side, who, ſcarce believing it poſſible, that they could either be out-number'd or out-reaſon'd, debated the Matter for twelve Hours together, and divided the Houſe ſeveral times, but always with the ſame Succeſs; for they loſt their Clauſes, and were forc'd to be contented with the Bill in its primitive State, which was call'd, A Bill to reſtore Corporations to their ancient Rights and Priviledges.

[V. ii. p. 39.] Biſhop Burnet, who undertakes to give a Summary of this Matter, and who is follow'd verbatim by our Cotemporary-Hiſtorian, is pleas'd to ſay, That the Bill (in which he lumps the two Clauſes thus violently conteſted) was carry'd by a great Majority in the Houſe of Commons; whereas the Truth is, that the Tory-Party had the Majority on every Diviſion; tho' that Majority was never above eighteen; and the Whigs, to countenance their own Defeat, gave out, "That even the unexpected Addition to their Numbers, which the Tories that Day receiv'd, had not given them the Balance, if a too great Confidence in the Reaſonableneſs of the thing contended for, had not made others careleſs."

Tindal.

[State Tracts, ut ſupra, p. 756.]

In following the Bill to the Houſe of Lords, thus gutted as it was, we find the ſame Prelate ſpeaking of its Fate there, in the following Words: "The firſt Point in debate was, upon the declaratory Part, whether a Corporation could be forfeited or ſurrender'd: Hole, and two other Judges, were for the Affirmative; but all the reſt were for the Negative: No Precedents for the Affirmative were brought higher than the Reign of King Henry VIII. in which the Abbies were ſurrender'd; which was, at that time, ſo great a Point of State, that the Authority of theſe Precedents ſeem'd not clear enough for more regular Times. The Houſe was ſo equally divided, that it went for the Bill only by one Voice." But, according to the Journals of the Houſe, it appears, that their Lordſhips (being in a general Committee on the ſaid Bill, January 23, the Earl of Mulgrave in the Chair) were not in a Humour to go ſo far in the Bill as even the Houſe of Commons had done; for they would not allow, that even the firſt enacting Clauſe was rightly founded, or that the Proceedings were illegal which gave riſe to the Bill: And accordingly the Iſſue of the Debate was put on the following Queſtion, viz. Whether the Words [declared, and were, and are, illegal] ſhould ſtand in the Bill, which paſs'd in the Negative, both in the Committee and on the Report; on which laſt Occaſion, the Numbers ſtood thus, namely, Contents (to agree with the Committee) fifty-one; Not-contents forty-three: The Biſhop adds, That little doubt was made of the paſſing the Act: But ſurely this Negative ſeem'd to indicate, that nothing leſs was to be expected; for having thus remov'd the Foundation, the Superſtructure was ſure to fall with the next Breath: And it was, probably, in the clear Foreſight of ſuch an Event, that the following ſevere Proteſt, (ſign'd Bolton, Herbert, Macclesfield, Bedford, Aſhburnham, Montagu, Vaughan, Stamford, Sydney) was enter'd in the Journals of the Houſe:

P. 39.

"Becauſe that there hath been only two Caſes cited, in all the Law-books, towards the maintaining the Surrender of Corporations, viz. Dyer 273, 282. The Opinions in theſe Caſes are not taken upon Argument; the firſt of them, as appears by the Book, needed, and had, an Act of Parliament to confirm it, being deny'd to be Law, in my Lord Coke's third Report, in the Dean and Chapter of Norwich's Caſe, 44 Eliz. The other of them is deny'd to be Law by the Judges of the King's-Bench, in Fulcher and Heywood's Caſe in 2 Charles I. in Palmer's Reports; and by the expreſs Reſolution of the Judges in that Caſe, a Corporation cannot, by Surrender, diſſolve itſelf.

2. Becauſe that Beda, in the Time of Henry V. and the Corporation of Newbury, did ſurrender to that King, which was not allow'd; but the Houſe of Commons call'd upon them to ſend up Members, notwithſtanding the ſaid Surrender; and until they petition'd the ſaid Houſe, ſetting forth their Inability of ſupporting that Charge, they were not excus'd; but the Houſe allow'd their Petition, and they have ſent none ſince.

3. Becauſe the Surrenders in debate, being for the Intent and Purpoſe of returning ſuch Parliament-men whom the King ſhould appoint, was for the Subverſion of the Laws and Liberties of England, and introducing of Popery and arbitrary Government; and that the putting out theſe Words ſeems to be the juſtifying of the moſt horrid Action that King James was guilty of during his Reign; and we humbly conceive, a denying the chiefeſt Grievance mention'd in King William's Declaration when he was Prince, and the greateſt Inducement for the People's taking up Arms in defence of their Liberties and Properties, and Proteſtant Religion, and the eſtabliſhing this King upon the Throne."

In ſhort, never any Bill was more fiercely contended for by one Party, or more fiercely oppos'd by the other; and why it was ſo, thoſe Parties have themſelves explan'd: Says the Letter-Writer before-quoted, and his Followers, "It was calculated to exclude the whole Church-of-England-Party out of Parliaments, for ſeven Years." And the Vindicator acknowledges, "It was levelled againſt them who uſurp, or engroſs to themſelves, the Name of the Church of England, and would make a Faction of the national Church, from which they would exclude moſt of the conformable Laity." But then he

OF THE BOMBAY BRANCH OF THE

A.D. 1689-90 he adds, " That none were truer to the Church's Intereſt than thoſe who ſtickled for thoſe Clauſes, as a Means to prevent thoſe Diſturbances, which were contriv'd by Men who us'd the Name of the Church to countenance the worſt of Crimes, and who aim'd at nothing more than the advancing themſelves."

And now, before we finiſh the final Cataſtrophe of this Bill, we muſt return to the Houſe of Commons, where we ſhall find the Whigs, who were by this time fully ſenſible, that their own King had ſet his Face againſt them, ſtruggling hard to regain the Aſcendancy over their Adverſaries, which they had loſt; but without the deſired Effect; for having been defeated in their main Point, all the Trimmers to a Man look'd upon them as undone, and attach'd themſelves to the victorious Side.

The Bills of Indemnity and Pains and Penalties incorporated.

The two Bills, of Indemnity and Pains and Penalties, had, by Order, been blended into one, and the Well-management of this was the laſt Card which the Whigs had to play: On the other hand, while that Red hung over the Tory-Chiefs, they did not know how to think themſelves ſafe. The Preſs they had made a very free Uſe of; ſometimes to ſoften, ſometimes to terrify, their Adverſaries, and ſometimes to juſtify themſelves. A notable Tract of theirs, formerly quoted under the Title of The Magiſtracy and Government of England vindicated, was compos'd of all thoſe ſeveral Ingredients. It was divided into three Parts; the firſt of which contain'd an expreſs Defence of all the Proceedings againſt Lord Ruſſel: The ſecond, a Defence of that Defence: And the third, ſeveral Reaſons for a general Indemnity: All ſhew'd the Author to be ſufficiently vers'd in the Matters he treated of; and alſo, that his Paſſions were to the full as much concern'd in the Diſpute as his Reaſon: Nor ought we to forget, that, in the Cloſe of all, he diſcourſes as follows:

" But if Vengeance be requiſite, it ought to be without Reſpect of Perſons, the Juſtice of it ought to be impartial, true, and catholic: And then come in the Penſioners and Surrenderers, the Regulators and Promiſers, the old High-Commiſſioners, and the new Creed-Makers, &c. and God knows, quis non, &c. Nay, ſince the Revolution ſome muſt come in for a Snack of Cenſure too; the (z) Buyers and Sellers of Places, the Members that took (a) Offices, contrary to their own Motion and Vote in the Weſtminſter-Parliament: The Proclamation-Men for prohibiting of importing French Commodities, under pain of Confiſcation of Ship and Goods, three Weeks before a War proclam'd, contrary to eleven Acts of Parliament for free Trade, even in Parliament-time: The Treaſury, for farming Lotteries, which are common Nuſances, contrary to Multitudes of Statutes, and continuing them ſtill with non obſtante's in the Indenture, tho' illegal, and void ab initio. The great Seal, for paſſing four Patents at one Seal in this Lent Vacation, with non obſtante's, contrary to the Bill of Rights: The new Sheriffs, for practiſing what themſelves condemn'd in a Moor and a North, cum multis aliis, quos nunc deſcribere longum, &c. To conclude, our Saviour's Rule, if obſerv'd, will be the moſt infallible Indemnity that can be contriv'd, and that is, John viii. 7. Let him that is without Sin amongſt you caſt the firſt Stone. And in truth a Cenſor of the Manners of others ought himſelf to be pure, clean, and innocent in omni re quacunque; and if there be no Danger but from ſuch, I'm ſure there's no Danger at all; and that it ſhould be ſo is the trueſt Juſtice in the World, quod fuit probandum.

I'll not mention the Argument from the (b) Vacancy, that the Government was diſſolv'd, every thing reduc'd into its primitive State of Nature, all Power devolv'd into Individuals, and the Particulars only to provide for themſelves by a new Contract; for, if ſo, there's yet no new Conſent for Puniſhment of Acts done before the Diſſolution, and conſequently Revenge for that is at an end; Indemnity therefore ought to be promoted by thoſe who made that Vote, for otherwiſe their Truth may be ſuſpected, &c."

How far theſe ſhrewd Recriminations weigh'd within-doors it is hard to ſay; but this is certain, that when the Bill, ſo blended as above, came under Conſideration, on the 21ſt of January, and a Motion was made to name particular Perſons, the Houſe divided on the previous Queſtion, and it paſs'd in the Negative, Yeas 170, Noes 190, tho' what was now reqnir'd, the Houſe had actually agreed to, in the former Seſſion.

This ſhew'd, that the Tide was effectually turn'd, and that, in conſequence of it, the Whiggiſh Intereſt would ſoon be left aground: A new Trial was however to be made the next Day. Sir Thomas Pilkington, and his Fellow-Sufferers in the Affair of the pretended Riot at the Election of the London-Sheriffs, in the Reign of Charles II. had on the 12th petition'd to be reliev'd out of the Eſtates of their Proſecutors: And on the 22d the Merits of their Plea were argued; and,

(z) In the preceding Seſſion, one Bearcroft, in a Petition to the Houſe of Commons, after ſetting forth his Sufferings in the former Reigns, proceeds to the following Effect: " That, on this moſt happy Revolution, he did not doubt but Sufferers would have been rewarded: But that he had experienc'd the contrary; his Petitions having been all rejected by thoſe who had the Diſpoſal of Places, who openly ſold them to the higheſt Bidder: That, tho' he wanted Bread, he was order'd to trouble them no more: That therefore he pray'd the Houſe would be pleas'd to call before them Florentine Shepherd, Simon Smith, and Richard Colling, Eſqrs; to account for the many thouſand Guineas they had unjuſtly got, for the Diſpoſal of the ſaid Places; and that he the ſaid Petitioner might be allow'd to produce his Witneſſes to prove the ſame." It ought to be added, That the Practice herein complain'd of was ſo notorious, that a Committee was appointed to enquire into the Particulars; and that a Bill was order'd to be prepar'd to prevent the like Abuſes for the future.

(a) In this very Seſſion, a Queſtion had been put, " Whether a Perſon having a Place at Court, or any Dependance on the King, ſhould be a Member of that Houſe?" but was carry'd in the Affirmative: It being alledg'd, " That otherwiſe the fitteſt Perſons for public Employments would be excluded, and be thereby debarr'd the Opportunity of ſerving either King or Country."

A.D.1689-90 and, upon the Whole, the Queſtion being put, Whether the ſaid Petitioners ſhould have the Reparation they requir'd, it paſs'd in the Negative, Yeas 152, Noes 169.

On the 23d, the Conſideration of the Indemnity-Bill was reſum'd, and, poſſibly in deriſion of that Party, which was of late ſo formidable, and was now ſo impotent, the Houſe agreed, without dividing, in all the ſeveral Articles of Exception formerly enumerated; among which even that relating to the Surrender of Charters maintain'd its Place.

Royal Aſſent given to ſeveral Acts.

In this Interval, his Majeſty came to the Houſe, and gave the Royal Aſſent to the additional (e) Land-Tax Bill of one Shilling in the Pound, as alſo to the Bill for charging and collecting the Duties upon Coffee, Tea, and Chocolate, at the Cuſtom-houſe, the Preamble to which was as follows: "Whereas it has been found by Experience, that the collecting of the Duty ariſing by virtue of ſeveral Acts of Parliament, by way of Exciſe upon the Liquors of Coffee, Chocolate, and Tea, is not only very troubleſome and unequal upon the Retailers of thoſe Liquors, but requireth ſuch Attendance of Officers as makes the neat Receipt very inconſiderable; for Remedy thereof, be it enacted," &c. And by way of Equivalent for ſo deſirable an Alteration, an additional Duty, over and beſides what was then payable at the Cuſtom-houſe, for the ſaid Commodities, of five Pounds twelve Shillings a Hundred, was impos'd on Coffee; eight Pounds eight Shillings on every hundred Weight of Cacoa-Nuts; and five Shillings on every Pound of Tea.

This Act was paſs'd on the 16th; and on the 27th, when the Commons were ſtill brooding over the Indemnity-Bill, his Majeſty came again to the Houſe, and gave the Royal Aſſent to the Bill for reviewing the Poll, and for an additional Poll, (d) a Bill for the better ſecuring, and Relief of, the Iriſh Proteſtants, and a Bill to prevent vexatious Suits, againſt ſuch as acted in order to bring in their Majeſties, or for their Service; the Preamble to which is alſo remarkable enough to deſerve a Place in Hiſtory, viz. "Whereas, about the Time of his Majeſty's glorious Enterprize for delivering this Kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power, and in Aid and Purſuance of the ſame, divers Lords, Gentlemen, and other good People, well-affected to their Country, did act as Lieutenants, Deputy-Lieutenants, Juſtices of the Peace, or other Officers civil or military, tho' not ſufficiently authoriz'd thereunto, and did A.D.1689-90 apprehend and put into Cuſtody ſeveral criminous and ſuſpected Perſons, and did ſeize and uſe ſeveral Horſes, Arms, and other things, and did enter into the Houſes and Poſſeſſions of ſeveral Perſons, and did quarter and cauſe to be quartered Soldiers and others there; in which Proceedings ſome Force and Violence and Defect of Form was unavoidable, which in a Time of Peace and Safety would not have been allowable: And alſo, ſince their Majeſties happy Acceſſion to the Crown, by reaſon of the Wars and Troubles rais'd and occaſion'd by the Enemies of their Majeſties and this Kingdom, divers like Matters and Things have been acted and done; all which were neceſſary and allowable, in regard of the Exigence of public Affairs, and ought to be juſtify'd, and the Parties concern'd therein indemnify'd: Nevertheleſs, ſome Perſons, ill-affected to their Majeſties Government, and the Safety and Welfare of this Kingdom, have commenced and proſecuted, and threaten to commence and proſecute, Actions and Suits againſt their Majeſties good Subjects, for and by reaſon of their Actings and Doings aforeſaid: Therefore, for the preventing the Trouble and Charges which the ſaid good Subjects might be put to, by the means of ſuch vexatious Suits, Be it enacted," &c.

Theſe ſeveral Acts being thus paſs'd, his Majeſty was pleas'd, in a moſt gracious Speech, to expreſs himſelf as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

His Majeſty's Speech at the Cloſe of the Seſſion.

I am ſo ſenſible of the Readineſs you have ſhewn to ſupply me with Money for the carrying on the Wars I am engag'd in, that I am glad of this Occaſion to give you Thanks for your chearful Diſpatch, which was abſolutely neceſſary for the common Safety. The beſt Return I can make to your Kindneſs is, to aſſure you, that, as far as it will go, it ſhall all be employ'd to the Purpoſes it was given.

It is a very ſenſible Affliction to me, to ſee my good People burthen'd with heavy Taxes; but ſince the ſpeedy recovering of Ireland is, in my Opinion, the only Means to eaſe them, and to preſerve the Peace and Honour of the Nation, I am reſolv'd to go thither in Perſon, and, with the Bleſſing of God Almighty, endeavour to reduce that Kingdom, that it may no longer be a Charge to them.

And as I have already ventur'd my Life for the Preſervation of the Religion, Laws, and

(d) "By which it is enacted and declar'd, That the Kingdom of Ireland being annex'd to the imperial Crown of England, by the Laws of both Kingdoms, all Acts paſs'd there, without Authority deriv'd from the Kings and Queens of England, are abſolutely null and void; that all Perſons who oppoſe the Authority of their Majeſties are Rebels; and that all Acts by them paſſed ſince the 13th of February 1688, are null and void.

All Acts of Attainder, Statutes, Judgments, Outlawries, Decrees, and Sentences, are likewiſe declar'd null.

All Cities, Boroughs, Bodies-Corporate, Eccleſiaſtical, or Temporal, were reſtor'd to the Condition they were in upon the 24th of June 1683, and all Proceedings againſt them, Judgments, Seizures, and Executions, are adjudg'd null and void.

No Perſon whatſoever, of the Proteſtant Religion, ſhould be liable to any Loſs, Forfeiture, or Prejudice, in Eſtate, Office, Perſon, or otherways, by reaſon of their Abſence from Ireland ſince the 20th of December 1685.

All Proteſtant Subjects of Ireland are abſolutely diſcharg'd and acquitted from the Payment of all Quit-rents, Crown-rents, Hearth-money, and every thing elſe becoming due to the Crown of England, from the 25th of December 1688, until the ſaid Kingdom ſhall be by their Majeſties declared to be reduced, and the War and Rebellion there ended."

A.D. 1689-90 and Liberties of this Nation; so I am now willing again to expose it, to secure you the quiet Enjoyment of them.

The Spring draws on, and it being requisite I should be early in the Field, I must immediately apply my Thoughts to the giving Orders for the necessary Preparations; which, that I may have the more Leisure to do, I have thought convenient now to put an end to this Session."

Which was accordingly done by the Lord Chief-Baron Atkins, in the Form of a Prorogation to the 2d of April.

This was a stunning Blow to the Whigs; who had not only the Loss of the Corporation and Indemnity-Bills (or rather of the Exceptions to the last of them) to regret, but that of the King himself: For, notwithstanding the smooth Language he had made use of, it was manifest enough that he had not put an End to the Session with any favourable Intentions towards (e) them. Nor was this all; for in a very few Days afterwards, namely February the 6th, a Proclamation was issu'd, signifying, That his Majesty, by and with the Advice of his Privy-Council, had thought fit to dissolve the present Parliament; and (notwithstanding the Expediency of his being early in the Field, and of his being at leisure to make the necessary Preparations) to summon another, to meet on the said 2d of April following. It is observable, that the Letter-Writer for the Tories on the Corporation-Bill, reproaches the Whigs, with having form'd a Design, to press the Common-Council of London, to address the King to dissolve the Parliament, and call a new one, in case that the said Bill had been carry'd; that they, the Whigs, might fall at once into the Enjoyment of the Fruits of their Endeavours: And yet, no sooner had the Tories, by the help of the Court, got the better of these Endeavours, than they also contracted for a Dissolution, with a View to enlarge their Corps upon a new Election, and be enabled thereby to fulfil their Bargain.

A new Parliament summon'd.

The King resolv'd not to trust the Whigs.

According to Bishop Burnet, the King was never under such Distraction of Mind, as when the Fate of the Corporation-Bill depended on his Decision. "The passing the Bill, says that Prelate, put the King and the Nation into the Hands of the Whigs; as the rejecting it, and dissolving the Parliament upon it, was such a Trusting to the Tories, and such a Breaking with the Whigs, that the King was long in Suspence what to do. He was once near a very (f) desperate Resolution: He thought he could not trust the Tories; and he resolv'd he would not trust the Whigs: So he fancy'd the Tories would be true to the Queen, and confide in her, tho' they would not in him. He, therefore, resolv'd to go over to Holland, and leave the Government in the Queen's Hands: So he call'd the Marquis of Caermarthen, with the Earl (Duke) of Shrewsbury, and told them, he had a Convoy ready, and was resolv'd to leave all in the Queen's Hands, since he did not see how he could extricate himself out of the Difficulties into which the Animosities of Parties had brought him. They press'd him vehemently to lay aside all such desperate Resolutions, and to comply with the present Necessity. Much Passion appear'd among them. The Debate was so warm, that many Tears were shed. In conclusion, the King resolv'd to change his first Design into another better Resolution, of going over in Person, to put an End to the War in Ireland." The Bishop adds, That he was let into these Particulars by Lord Shrewsbury; that, such was the King's Reserve, that even the Queen herself was not in the Secret, till he, the Bishop, imparted it to her; and that the immediate Cause of so sudden a Dissolution was the Intelligence which the Court had receiv'd, that a great Party was form'd to oppose his Majesty's Expedition to Ireland, by a formal Address from each House, which, by Concert, were to have been presented on the same Day.

A.D. 1689-90

To account for his Majesty's deserting his old Friends, the Whigs, or rather to justify it, the same Author moreover intimates, in several other Places of his Work, that those old Friends of his Majesty's, were grown jealous of him, and had propagated Stories to his Disadvantage; that they would make no Advances of Money; that the Supplies they did grant, were on remote Funds, which were doubtful in their own Nature, and were half devour'd by Premiums and Interest; and, lastly,

Bishop Burnet's Endeavours to account for that Resolution.

(e) Among the Endearments which began now to pass between his Majesty and the Tories, the following seems to deserve particular Notice and Mention, since the Persons concern'd thought fit to print it in a single Half-sheet, for the Entertainment of the Public:

"The Effect of what was spoken by Sir John Lowther to the King, at the Desire of several Members of Parliament, that din'd together on Wednesday, January 29, 1689.

This Day a great Number of Parliament-men din'd together, They thought themselves oblig'd to give your Majesty an Assurance of their Loyalty: now, that by your Majesty's Prorogation they are going into their several Countries where they live, they thought it would be a Trouble to come to attend your Majesty in so great a Body: so commanded me, with the rest of these Gentlemen, to represent the whole, and give your Majesty this Assurance, 'That they present 'their humble Duty to your Majesty, and assure you, Sir, 'they are ready to venture their Lives, and all that is dear 'to them, in your Service; that they will make it their 'Business to see that such Moneys as is given, may be 'speedily and effectually rais'd. And because your Majesty 'is resolv'd in Person to go into Ireland, they heartily pray 'for your Majesty's happy Journey, Success in your Arms, 'a speedy and safe Return, a long and happy Reign over 'us."

The Effect of his Majesty's Answer.

Gentlemen,

I take this Address very kindly, and desire you will return my Thanks to all the Gentlemen; and assure them, that as I have ventur'd my Life in defence of these Kingdoms, nothing shall be wanting of my Side to compleat their Happiness. I think my going in Person into Ireland will be a great Means to put an end to the War, therefore am resolv'd upon it. I also assure you, I will make it my particular Care to protect and defend the Church of England, as BY LAW ESTABLISH'D. I shall desire you will, in my Absence, take care that all things be kept in good Peace and good Order; and at my Return, I hope in God, all things will be well settled; that we may be happy, and enjoy one another, and every Man his Right." [Out of Lord Somers's Collection, vol. XXIV. Tract. 8.

(f) The Earl of Bellcarres takes notice, That the Prince of Orange, to he calls King William, was so weary of both Sides, and so embarrass'd with their Broils, That he told Duke Hamilton, "That he wish'd he were a thousand Miles from England; and that he had never been King of it."

A.D.1689-90 haſtly, that they actually enter'd into Meaſures for the reſtoring of King James.

Sir James Montgomery, who had been one of the Scotiſh Commiſſioners that came up with the Tender of that Crown, and who had alſo been one of the great Promoters of the Remonſtrance of the Scotiſh Members, formerly quoted, having been diſappointed in his Pretenſions, "fell a treating, ſays the Biſhop, with King James's Party in England, and came to have great Credit with the Whigs, particularly with the Earl of Monmouth and the Duke of Bolton: And he employ'd it all to perſuade them not to truſt the King, and to animate them againſt the Earl of Portland. (Theſe are his Lordſhip's own Words.) This wrought ſo much, that many were diſpos'd to think they would have good Terms from King James; and that he was now ſo convinc'd of former Errors, that they might ſafely truſt him. The Earl of Monmouth let this out to myſelf twice, but in a Strain that look'd like one who was afraid of it, and who endeavour'd to prevent it. But he ſet forth the Reaſons for it with great Advantage, and thoſe againſt it very faintly. Matters were truſted to Montgomery and Pain (one of King James's Emiſſaries;) and Ferguſon was taken into it, as a Man that naturally lov'd to embroil things. So a Deſign was manag'd, firſt to alienate the City of London ſo entirely from the King, that no Loans might be advanc'd on the Money-Bills, which, without Credit upon them, could not anſwer the End for which they were given.-- This corrupted Party had gone ſo far, that they ſeem'd to fancy that the reſtoring him would be not only ſafe, but happy to the Nation." His Lordſhip then proceeds to ſay, That Montgomery's own Brother, on Aſſurance of Pardon, &c. came in to him, and inform'd him, That a Treaty was ſettled with King James; that Articles were agreed on; that an Invitation was ſubſcrib'd by the whole Cabal to King James to come over; that he had ſeen the Writing; and that he undertook to put the Government in Poſſeſſion of it: That he, A.D.1689-90 ſhortly after, did actually give Notice, that one Williamſon was on that very Day, ſet out with it in the Dover Stage-Coach, in his way to Flanders, from whence he was to proceed to Ireland; that Williamſon being ſeiz'd in Conſequence of this Information, nothing was, however, found upon him; for the Papers had been committed to the care of one Simpſon, who was to have gone over with Williamſon, but who did not bear him Company to Dover, and who made his Eſcape to France, while the Latter was in the Meſſenger's Hands; that Montgomery, upon this, diſappear'd; that all Diſcoveries of this nature, were treated as the Fictions of the Court; and that the City of London were generally poſſeſs'd with a very ill Opinion of the King.

The Mention of all theſe ſeveral Particulars was unavoidably neceſſary; and now it is as unavoidably neceſſary to make ſome Reflections upon them, in order to have a tolerably-true Idea of the Intrigues of theſe Times.

That King James had ſtill a very ſtrong Party in both Kingdoms, and that they were ever on the watch for his Service, is indiſputable. That they had alſo a more intimate Communication with the Cabinet, than can be well accounted for, appears from the (g) Caſe of Lord Griffin, who had obtain'd the Copies of ſome Reſolutions of Council, and among them of one which had been taken by the King and four other Perſons only: And that Sir James Montgomery did actually enter into a League with the Jacobites, for the reſtoring of King James, is ſcarce to be doubted; for Lord Belcarres unfolds the Intrigue at large; but then he never once mentions the Names of the Duke of Bolton or the Earl of Monmouth, or any other Engliſh Whig whatſoever; or even ſurmiſes, that the Whigs of this Kingdom had any Share in their Cabals, or gave them the leaſt Countenance. It appears, therefore, moſt unreaſonable animadverted upon.

(g) The Whole of which was as follows: "The Lord Griffin having been often requir'd by Letters and otherwiſe to attend the Houſe of Lords, and ſtill refuſing to appear, their Lordſhips deſir'd the King by an Addreſs to ſummon him by his Royal Proclamation to render himſelf (at ſuch a Day as his Majeſty ſhould appoint) to their Houſe, if then actually ſitting, or to one of the Secretaries of State. His Lordſhip being accordingly ſummon'd, ſurrender'd himſelf to the Lord Nottingham, and on the 19th of October having made his Appearance before the Houſe of Lords, the Speaker told him, That he knew what he had to do before his ſitting in that Houſe; whereupon his Lordſhip deſir'd Time to conſider of taking the Oaths, he not being prepar'd for it: Which was readily granted.

The ſame Day the Parliament was prorogu'd a Packet was intercepted, which plainly diſcover'd how little the Lord Griffin was inclin'd to own the preſent Government. This Diſcovery happen'd in the following Manner: His Lordſhip having caus'd a large Tin [Pewter] Bottle to be made with a double Bottom, order'd his Cook to go to a Pewterer's at an unſeaſonable Hour of the Night, to get the falſe Bottom ſodder'd: The Pewterer finding a Packet between the two Bottoms of the Bottle, began to ſuſpect ſomething; and the Cook not giving him a ſatisfactory Anſwer about its Contents, he made bold to open it. The Superſcription of ſeveral Letters directed to King James, the Duke of Berwick, &c. juſtify'd the Pewterer's Suſpicion, who immediately ſeiz'd the Lord Griffin's Cook, and carry'd him to one of the Secretaries of State; but he being gone to Bed, and his Servants refuſing to admit the Pewterer to their Maſter's Preſence, the Lord Griffin, who by this time began to apprehend what had befain his Meſſenger, took this Opportunity to make his Eſcape. Beſides the Letters, there was found an Account of ſome private Reſolutions of the Council, and an exact Liſt of all the Land and Sea Forces of England; whereupon the Lord Griffin's Houſe and Papers were ſearch'd, his Lady committed to the Tower, ſeveral ſuſpected Perſons arreſted, and the Cuſtom-houſe Officers order'd to ſtop all unknown Perſons, that offer'd to croſs the Seas without Paſſes. The Lord Griffin having abſconded himſelf ſome few Days, and finding it difficult to go out of the Kingdom, ſurrender'd himſelf to the Earl of Shrewſbury, Secretary of State, who having examin'd him, committed him to the Cuſtody of a Meſſenger, from whence he was ſent into the Tower. Thereupon the Commons appointed a Committee to enquire how the Lord Griffin came to know a Reſolution, which the King had communicated to four Perſons only; and the Lords addreſs'd his Majeſty to be him underſtand, that the ſaid Lord being one of their Members, they were conſequently his proper Judges. The King having left the Cognizance of this Affair to the Peers, they began to examine the Papers intercepted in the Pewter-Bottle, which were the only Evidence againſt the Lord Griffin; and becauſe, ſome few Days before, it had been reſolv'd in that Houſe, that Colonel Algernon Sidney was unjuſtly condemn'd, nothing but Writings, found in his Cloſet, having been produc'd againſt him, the Earl of Rocheſter argued, from a Parity of Reaſon, in favour of the Lord Griffin; who, after ſeveral warm Debates was ſet at liberty upon ſufficient Bail." [Life of King Will. vol. II. p. 152, 153.

A.D.1689-90 able and unjuſt in the Biſhop, to draw any ſuch Inferences from the Intimacy of Montgomery with thoſe two Lords, or the private Converſation of the laſt; and to treat of this Conſpiracy in ſo ambiguous a manner, as to leave his Readers to conclude, that all the Anti-court Whigs were plotting to undo their own Work, and to re-admit King James, in order to be aveng'd on King William.

As to his Lordſhip's Accounts of the Money Matters in the Houſe of Commons, they are ſo much the leſs to be regarded, as they are inconſiſtent with each other: For in one Place he ſays expreſly, "The Houſe of Commons granted the Supplies that were demanded for the Reduction of Ireland, and for the Quota to which the King was oblig'd by his Alliances." And yet in the next Page but one, to ſet forth the Neceſſity of calling a new Parliament, he ſays as expreſly, "The Seſſion had not rais'd all the Money that was demanded for the following Campaign." And with regard to the remote Funds which his Lordſhip talks of, and blames the Court for accepting, we find Mr. Powle, the Speaker, at the preſenting the Two-ſhilling Land-tax-bill, telling his Majeſty, "That his faithful and loyal Commons had reſov'd to charge the greateſt Part of the two Millions they had granted, on their Lands, as the moſt ſpeedy and effectual way of raiſing preſent Money; and that they had taken up much time in endeavouring to provide againſt the great Abuſes which had been committed in aſſeſſing the late Supply of the like Nature." Then the additional Aid of a third Shilling, which went thro' both Houſes, and receiv'd the Royal Aſſent in leſs than a Fortnight, was render'd yet more acceptable and efficacious, by a Clauſe of a Loan, at ſeven per cent. Nor was it then believ'd, that the Reſidue of the Supply could have been rais'd by any Method more certain or expeditious than the ſupplemental Poll-Bill: And beſides all theſe ſeveral Aids, they had yet other Ways and Means to gratify the Court on the Carpet before them, at the time of their Prorogation.

But the Whigs themſelves, whom the Biſhop has thus endeavour'd to ſacrifice in ſtark Zeal to the Court, will not allow, that they were defective in any Point of Duty to his Majeſty; and, on the contrary, more than inſinuates, that his Majeſty was guilty of much Ingratitude and Injuſtice towards them, as appears by the following remarkable Paſſages out of the Earl of Warrington's Impartial Enquiry:

Lord Warrington's Reflections on the Diſſolution, &c.

(b) Lord Lieut. Sir, upon our Review of this firſt Year's Adminiſtration, it is a Wonder to me, that the King did not ſee how King James's Party flatter'd and betray'd him in his Councils, and Management of his Forces; and while they pretended to come into his Intereſt to ſettle him, they had weaken'd him in Reputation, Treaſure, and Force; and more unſettled him in Feb. 1689, than when he was firſt proclaim'd King in Feb. 1688. A.D.1689-90

Dep. Lieut. My Lord, I cannot imagine what that Party whiſper'd to our King, to create in him a Diſtruſt of thoſe that had been and were more faithful to him; nor how they gain'd ſuch Credit with him, that, rather than part with them from his Councils, he choſe to diſguſt the principal Noblemen and Gentlemen, who had hazarded their Lives and Fortunes for his Advancement to the Throne.

But it was ſo plain to our Houſe of Commons, that the firſt Councils of the Revolution were declin'd, and all Affairs directed by the Advices of thoſe who had been Inſtruments in the late Subverſions, that there were daily Complaints of it in our Houſe, and many Members ſpoke it out, that ſuch and ſo many Miſcarriages, both at Sea and Land, could proceed from nothing but Treachery; from thence aroſe Debates about Addreſſes to remove thoſe from his Councils who had openly oppos'd the Settlement of our King, and formerly betray'd England to France, and been declar'd Enemies to the Laws and Liberties of England, and that they ought to have been remov'd from King Charles the Second's Councils and Preſence for ever.

But that Party falſely ſuggeſted at Court, that our honeſt Members intended to reſtrain kingly Power, and ſo cry'd out of the Danger, for the King to ſuffer his Servants and Miniſters to be torn from him by Parliament, that at laſt they perſuaded him it was his Intereſt forthwith to diſſolve that great Convention: And, to gratify their Revenge upon thoſe who had diſcovor'd their Treacheries, they induc'd the King to diſſolve it ſuddenly, without thoſe Reſpects (of declaring his Intentions before-hand, and adviſing them to finiſh the ſeveral Bills before them) which all our Kings, who are well with their People, were wont to pay to Parliaments.

Lord Lieut. Sir, I think Time hath made it manifeſt, that treacherous Councils caus'd the King to diſſolve that Convention; and the Time and Manner of its Diſſolution ſurpriz'd every Man that had been active in the Revolution, with a Senſe of his Danger: Yet I doubt ſome of us, that might have been heard, did not ſhew the King, ſo plainly as we ought, how he was therein betray'd, and the Ground cut from under his Feet, by thoſe wicked Flatterers.

He ought to have been told, That he deſtroy'd his own Title and Clame to the Crown, by diſſolving the Convention, before they had provided (by Oath, or Subſcription of a Declaration, as was propos'd, or any other Way proper for a Convention of the People to ſettle a Government, when the Throne is vacant) for the Peoples general Allowance of the Right and Juſtice of the new Settlement, and for a perpetual Succeſſion of Authorities to be deriv'd only from them.

(b) The Reader muſt remember, that this Piece is in the Manner of a Dialogue between a Lord Lieutenant, and one of his Deputies.

A.D. 1689-90

He should have been minded, that some of his own Council had asserted in the Convention, that the People could not make him King, and that there could be no legal Parliament, unless call'd by K. James's Writ, and the Members took the Oaths of Allegiance to King James, as the Statute of 5 Eliz. requires.

If he believ'd those his Counsellors, he had no Power to call a Parliament, nor was there any lawful Declaration that the Throne was vacant; and all King James's Party were as much at Liberty to maintain his Authority, as when the King landed at Torbay.

It ought to have been told him, that the Authors of those Counsels to dissolve that Convention before such a Settlement, knew too well that they made himself cancel all his Proclamations against the Irish as Rebels and Traitors to him, and all his Commissions given to suppress and subdue them, as of no Authority.

They knew that by making the Legality of the Acts of the Convention doubtful, they reviv'd the Disputes concerning the collecting and levying the public Revenues payable to the late Kings, and the Legality of all the Taxes impos'd for the Year 1689, which they were confident the Judges durst not have determin'd. Not to mention more Particulars, they gave a fair Occasion for King James to play his Game in Ireland, and to have sent out his Writs for a Parliament in England.

Dep. Lieut. My Lord, has not your Lordship forgotten to mention one Part of the Cunning of the treasonable Advice to dissolve the Convention? was it not, to put it into the Power of the Corporation-men appointed by King James's Charters to chuse the greatest Part of the Members of the Parliament they advis'd our King to call?

When the People chose the Convention, those that had betrayed the Liberties of the Corporations were under the dread of their own Guilt and Punishment, and durst not oppose the Favourers of the Revolution; but they had been so long shelter'd, and so many of their Leaders put into Powers and Trusts under our King, that they durst contest the Validity of King James's Charters, and presum'd to set up for Members of Parliament, such as they hop'd would keep them in the Powers of the Corporations which they had gotten.

Lord Lieut. Sir, There were so many Treacheries in that Advice to dissolve the Convention at that time, that they cannot be all nam'd. It delay'd the Relief of Ireland for two or three Months of the Spring of the Year 1690: It lost those Money-bills for that Expedition, which lay upon the Table almost finish'd by the House of Commons.

It kept the Forces under Duke Schomberg in a starving Condition, unable to take the Field against the Enemy.

It prevented the Provision of a sufficient Force at Sea, and so retarded the setting out of our Fleet, as gave the French the Boldness to enter our Channel, and attack us almost in our own Harbours, with such Success against us, and our Allies, as lost some thousands of Lives, and many a good Ship, to our eternal Dishonour.

The French had such Hopes, that by dissolving the Convention, the Power of King James's Party was reviv'd, that they braved it up and down upon our Coasts, and took up the Harbour where our King landed, and caused such Distractions in the Kingdom as cost at least a Million of Money in drawing out the Militia.

Yet among all the mischievous Intentions of this Advice, I take the worst of all to have been that kind of Necessity which their Councils and Management of Affairs put upon our King, to expose his Royal Person to the Suffering and Hazards of that Irish War, from which they wickedly hoped he should never have return'd."

The Facts alluded to in the Close of this Quotation will be explan'd hereafter; and all that remains to be said on the Point immediately before us, is, That the Jacobites appear'd as overjoy'd with the Dissolution, as the Tories; and in the bitter Writings which they set forth about this time, made no Difficulty to declare, with an Air of Triumph and Satisfaction, That the Prince of Orange, meaning King William, having made all the Use he could of those who set the Crown on his Head, had sent them home in Disgrace, by way of Requital.

Proceedings in the general Election.

The general Election became now the general Concern. And such was the Ferment of the two Parties, that it disturb'd the whole Nation from the Bottom to the Surface. The Press had full Employment on both Sides, as usual. It was now the Letter, above quoted, appear'd, on the Corporation-Act, and the Answer in Vindication of the Friends of that Act. In the State Tracts we yet see the Names of Hampden and Wildman prefix'd to a formal Defence of the Convention-Parliament: And as this contains the Glosses of the Court-Whigs on the late Proceedings, so there is another (t) Paper still extant, which, tho'

(t) " A Letter to a Friend, upon the Dissolution of the late Parliament, and the calling of a new one.

SIR,

As I do fully acquiesce in the Wisdom and Authority of the King in his dissolving of the late Parliament, so I'm perfectly satisfied, that he did it upon Motives relating to his own Honour, and to the Safety and Happiness of his People, and not in Subserviency to any Prerogative Design, nor to please himself with an Exercise of Royal Power. And I will venture to say, that nothing could have induc'd him so abruptly as well as unexpectedly, to have dissolv'd a Parliament, that had restor'd him unto, and then by so many free and vast Contributions endeavour'd to support him in, the Throne, but the finding them unservicable to the uniting of Protestants, the vindicating of our Laws and Liberties, and the punishing of those who had subverted our Constitution; which, as they are the only justifiable Grounds both of his coming hither, and of his accepting the Royal Authority, so nothing less than the pursuing of those Ends can vindicate his Descent into England from being an unrighteous Invasion, and his ascending the British Throne, from the Reproach of an ambitious Usurpation. How could a Prince of his Integrity and Wisdom think, that the obtaining and wearing of a Crown was honourable and just, while the Reasons upon which he receiv'd and possesseth it were not only controlled and reproach'd, but expos'd and ridicul'd? Not tho' levell'd at the very Root of the Tory Interest, very artfully upbraids the King with departing from his old Friends and his old Principles; and, at the same time, endeavours to persuade the Public, that his Majesty had dissolv'd the Parliament, only to be in a better Condition of observing the one, and of making up all Breaches with the other. At the End was inserted a List of one hundred and fifty Tory Members, who had voted against the Abdication: And no Care nor Cost was wanting to circulate this inflammatory Paper all over the Kingdom. The Tories also on their Part circulated a List of those who had voted for the Corporation-Bill, who were stigmatiz'd for Republicans, Fanatics, Latitudinarians, or Atheists, as the Tories had been for Jacobites: And under the Influence of these mutual Reproaches, and every other unfair and corrupt Practice, the Returns were made on both Sides. As to the Result of all, it is certain, that tho' many of the abovemention'd List were thrown out, and Whigs were elected in their Places, the Majority was compos'd of Tories, as the Latter had foretold, in case the Corporation-Bill was rejected. Even the City of London, alienated in Affection to the King, by the Artifices of the Whigs, as it is represented by Bishop Burnet, fell into the Court Scheme, and return'd Sir William Turner, Sir Samuel Dashwood, Sir William Pritchard, and Sir Thomas Vernum, who were on the Tory List, in Opposition to Sir Thomas Pilkington, Lord Mayor, Sir Robert Cloyton, Sir Patience Ward, and Sir William Ashurst, the old Members: And tho' the Latter had Pretensions to complain of an undue Election, and did afterwards prefer a Petition accordingly, they found it to no manner of Purpose. In short, Bp. Burnet makes no Scruple to say, "The Elections went generally for Men, who, probably, would have declar'd for King James, if they could have known how to manage Matters for him."

The Elections go in favour of the Tories.

The Whigs, however, tho' soon sensible of their Inferiority, did not throw up the Cards; but, on the contrary, resolv'd to make their Court to the King, at the Expence of their Adversaries; that is to say, either to oblige them to act as Whigs, and thereby bring them into Disgrace and Contempt with their Party without Doors, or from their refusing to do so, to infer they were Jacobites, and, by Consequence, to break the new Alliance which had been form'd between them and the Court: And, agreeable to this Plan, when the new Parliament was on the Point of meeting, they set forth a Paper, in which (k) they first affected to give a Detail of the Hopes is it possible for his Majesty to believe, that the late King was so unmanly guilty as to forfeit all Right to Sovereignty, while those who advis'd him unto, and were the Ministers of, all his Misgovernment, whom the Law makes clearly, if not only, accountable, were esteem'd guiltless and innocent. He could not but foresee, that the Abdication of King James is easily reversible, and that he himself holds his Crown very precariously, if there was nothing to justify the enforcing the one, and the declaring the other, but the hasty and arbitrarious Vote of the Majority of the two Houses. And he must needs look upon all that was allegd'd, concerning the late King's violating the original Contract, and his subverting the Laws of the Constitution, as Fiction and Dream, while there were none to be found that counsell'd him unto, or assisted him in it.

And as this justifies the Wisdom of his Majesty in the dissolving the late Parliament, so we may from hence easily conclude, both upon what Prospect and Hope he hath been pleas'd to call a new one, and by what Measures those to whom the Right of electing Members doth belong, are to guide themselves in the ensuing Choice. Nor do we only want a Parliament that may confirm, establish, and support his Majesty in the Throne, but which may proceed on those Principles, as do render his Accession unto it necessary, as well as honourable and just. And as the Nation is once more furnish'd with an Opportunity of chusing such a Representative Body, as may vindicate and assert its ancient Laws, Rights and Liberties; so there is a fresh Advantage afforded us, of testifying our Loyalty to his present Majesty, and of promoting his Greatness, as well as of providing for our own future Safety. I need not tell you that the Ends to be propos'd in the Service of those who are to be elected, are, that the Throne may be settled upon firm and righteous Foundations; and, that all his Majesty's Subjects may live at Ease and Unity under his Government. 'Tis therefore, 1. Incumbent upon all wise and honest Men, that they elect such to represent them as may both allow and confirm unto the King all the ancient and legal Rights of the Crown, and yet at the same time recover and secure all those Privileges unto the People, which the invading and rejecting from them gave occasion unto, and can alone justify, the late Revolution. Whosoever seeks to enrich the King with the Spoils of his Subjects, and to adorn them with what our late Monarchs ravish'd from them, can design no less than that the same Fate should befall him, which overtook his Predecessor, which is the robbing him first of his People's Affections, and then of his own Authority. 2. 'Tis no less the Duty than it is the Interest of all that would have the Nation formidable to its Enemies, and the King successful in his Undertakings, that they depute and authorize those to act for them in Parliament, who, without subverting or undermining the Church, may not only preserve unto Dissenters that Liberty vouchsafed unto them, for worshipping God, but who may restore them unto, and vest them in, all the common Rights and Privileges of Englishmen. Nor will it be easy to persuade to grant a Company of People that they find their Account in the late Revolution, unless they be admitted by Law to enjoy the same Advantages under the present King, which, by dispensing with, and an Usurpation over, the Law, they were possess'd of under the last. 3. We are to chuse them the first of all others to be return'd to serve in the ensuing Parliament, who are likeliest to maintain in our Allies a Confidence of us, and to encourage them both to continue the Confederacy, and to pursue the Ends of it. And therefore, as we would not give Jealousy unto them, and weaken the Union among themselves and with us, we ought to avoid the chusing of those that have heretofore promoted the Grandeur of France, or that have either sought the Destruction of the Dutch, or express'd a Malice and Rancour towards them. 4. As we would not betray both the King and ourselves, we are to chuse none but such who are entirely in his Majesty's and in the Kingdom's Interest; which, as it is impossible to believe of them who acknowledge him only a King in fact, but not by Right; so it is not easy to conceive how they should be forward and zealous to support him in the Throne, who oppos'd his coming to it. The Enemies to King James's Abdication are not likely to be true and lasting Friends to King William's Sovereignty. In brief, it is the Duty of all that love the present Establishment to be against those whom you find them to be for, that refuse to swear Allegiance to their present Majesties. Nor are they worthy of the Vote of an honest Man, who are not satisfy'd with the Protection of the Royal Power, unless they have both the Mastery of it, and the exerting and applying it to the Oppression and Enslaving of their Fellow-subjects. 'Tis not a King, but a Tool under that Name, which they desire; and, instead of allowing him to be the universal and equal Ruler of all his People, they seek to reduce and degrade him to be the Head of a little and peevish Faction: Which that his Majesty may be preserved from all Temptations, and, thro' the wise Choice of those that are to sit in the ensuing Parliament, it the undesigned Desire of,

(k) This Paper was call'd, [illegible] Expectation of the Enemies to the Church [illegible] mind to the Consideration of the present [illegible] was conceiv'd as follows:

"For the understanding what at this time becomes a [illegible] Representative of this Protestant Nation, which, [illegible] standing all the Arts and Insinuations of the Enemies of its Peace, did, upon the Dissolution of the Contract between the late King and his People, according to that Power which God

A.D.1689-90 Hopes and Views of the Diſaffected, upon the late Diſſolution, and to indicate the Steps neceſſary to be taken, to diſappoint them; which were, in Subſtance, To recognize the Authority of the late Parliament, and the Legality and Equity of the King's Title, and to make ſome Examples of the many Criminals in the two late Reigns. But tho' this Paper was calculated to be a ſort of Teſt of his Majeſty's own Conduct, as well as that of his new Allies, it was no farther conſider'd at Court than it favour'd the Court-views. The Evil Counſellors, againſt whom the Prince of Orange had declar'd, and whom he came over to puniſh, King William had reſolv'd to forgive; and the Party on whoſe Shoulders they ſtood, ſeem'd now to ſtand foremoſt in his Majeſty's Favour. One Part of the Bargain which the Tories had made, was, That the Lieutenancy of the City of London ſhould be chang'd. "Upon the King's coming to the Crown, ſays the Hiſtorian Biſhop, he had given a Commiſſion, out of which they were all excluded; which was A.D.1689-90 ſuch a Mortification to them, that they ſaid, they could not live in the City with Credit, unleſs ſome of them were again brought into that Commiſſion. The King recommended it to the Biſhop of London to prepare a Liſt of thoſe who were known to be Churchmen, but of the more moderate, and of ſuch as were liable to no juſt Exception, that ſo the two Parties in the City might be kept in a Balance." But tho' we have hitherto ſeen that Prelate acting a Whiggiſh Part in oppoſing the late Government, and eſtabliſhing the preſent, he was now, it ſeems, a Tory again, and as ſuch, without any Regard to the King's Inſtructions, brought in a Liſt of the moſt violent Tories in the City (at leaſt, we are ſo told by the Author laſt quoted) who had been engag'd in ſome of the worſt things which had paſs'd in the End of King Charles's Reign: And this Liſt, by the Management of the Marquis of Caermarthen, and the Earl of Nottingham, was approv'd, to

The Lieutenancy of London put into their Hands. [V. ii. p. 40.]

God Almighty has plac'd in all Communities for their Preſervation, declare King William and Queen Mary King and Queen of this Realm: We are to conſider what were the Hopes and Expectations of the Papiſts and other Jacobites, upon his Majeſty's diſſolving the laſt Parliament.

1. They thought it was diſſolv'd, becauſe the Legality of it was queſtion'd by ſome of our Miniſters, and others depending upon them, and hop'd, under the Influence of great Men of ſuch an Opinion, to gain a Parliament that ſhould ſpin out the Time for Action in unneceſſary Debates about Forms.

2. They were in hopes, by a ſeeming falling in with the Church of England, the Indolence of whoſe Members have vented Notions inconſiſtent with our preſent Settlement, and by encreaſing the Cry againſt all who have not eſpous'd a ſeparate Church-Intereſt, without regard to the Public-weal, and the Proteſtant Cauſe throughout Chriſtendom, to gain one of theſe three Points, either of which would be of great Service to them; but all together would certainly make way for another Change.

3. To get ſeveral choſen whoſoever abſolutely for the late King, and declare that they are for, as they are, true Sons of the Church of England, but regard the Church no farther than as it ſerves for a Cloak to their Deſigns.

2. To have many of no Deſigns whatever, but well-meaning Bigots to what is call'd the Church, and who will think themſelves oblig'd to believe as Churchmen tell them they ought, or as perhaps ſome of thoſe Guides, at top to themſelves, muſt; and therefore labour to draw others in to ſtrengthen their Party.

3. To have many to thruſt for the Church-Forms, eſtabliſh'd when popiſh Councils prevail'd, as to be ready to let looſe former Severities againſt all who cannot come up to them; and thereby to diſable Numbers of his Majeſty's good Subjects from acting in the common Cauſe, againſt Popery.

4. Finding that the Surrenderers of Charters were ſtill in the Government of Corporations, and that the Returns of Members to Parliament in many Places would be made by them, and that, if they were truly made, they would be likely to be puniſh'd for their former Violations of the Conſtitution, they did not doubt but the Artifice above-mention'd, join'd with the Intereſt of Criminals to prevent their own Puniſhment, would give them the Majority of fitting Members, who might ſecure their own Places, and vote others in, even where the Returns of fitting Members were fair.

5. They thought, that by the plauſible Pretence of the Deſire of Unity and Moderation, they might diſpoſe the Members of a new Parliament to a general Act of Indemnity, without making Examples upon any of thoſe Heads which were agreed on by both Parties in the laſt Houſe of Commons: By which they might not only weaken the Nation by endleſs Diviſions and Competitions, while guilty Men would have the Advantage of thoſe Riches and Honours which they got'd by their Crimes, to enable them ſtill to trample upon every true Engliſhman: But they would gain an effectual Advantage againſt this Government, whilſt the open Violation of the Contract on which it is founded, would receive a public Approbation, by their acquitting the Inſtruments of Mal-adminiſtration; and, by conſequence, this Government might be thought an unjuſt Uſurpation upon one, whoſe Right would thereby ſeem to continue.

To doſh ſuch Expectations at the Beginning, it ſeems requiſite,

1. That the firſt thing which this Parliament proceed to, ſetting aſide all other Buſineſs whatever, be to prepare an Act for the Royal Aſſent, declaring the laſt Parliament a true Parliament, and full Repreſentative of the People of England, and that all its Acts ought to be held valid and lawful.

Some Firmaſſores may oppoſe this; but all Men who are true to this Government will be hearty in maintaining its Foundation. To condemn the Acts of the laſt Parliament; to go about to confirm them, as wanting Confirmation; would be again to bring our Settlement in queſtion, and to tie Men of Form harangue it to as dangerous a Loſs of Time, as they occaſion'd before.

2. This being over, it may be leſs difficult to paſs an Act to recognize King William and Queen Mary to be lawful and rightful King and Queen, adding lawful and rightful to the Oath of Allegiance.

Few will dare directly to oppoſe this, but ſome may endeavour to decent it, by propounding a Settlement of the Revenue for his Majeſty's Life, or a large Supply for the Wars, which can ſignify nothing, if he leave England, before there is Proviſion made againſt receiving the late King, or declaring for him, and ſetting up ſome Regent till he come.

Here every Friend to this Government ought to ſet his Foot, and not to advance one Step till this Point is gain'd; whoever propoſed a Settlement of the Revenue, or farther Supplies, till this is paſs'd, or at leaſt without tacking it to the firſt Gift of either kind, in effect, are for another Abdication; upon which them would be an eaſy Tranſition of the Revenue and Supplies to James the 3d, their ſuppoſed rightful King, while they allow this King to be only in fact, and by Uſurpation.

3. Diſputed Elections ought to be ſettled with all poſſible Diligence and Expedition; and ſevere Enquiries made into all Abuſes in Elections or Returns.

4. For the effectual juſtifying his preſent Majeſty's Declaration, when he was but Prince of Orange; and his Title now as King of England; and for Admonition to future Ages, as well as ſatisfying the juſt Deſires of an oppreſs'd People, ſome Examples ought to be made, among the many Criminals in the two laſt Reigns.

That the Impunity of Criminals hitherto has encourag'd great Abuſes in relation to the Choice and Returns of Members, even for this Parliament, is too evident; yet it is not to be doubted, but thoſe very Means, whereby the Subverters of our Conſtitution have ſought to free themſelves from Puniſhment will draw it more heavily upon them.

And ſuch Men would do well to conſider, that ſome Crimes ſtand in need of a Pardon in Parliament; which will be very evident to them who obſerve the common Form of Pardons out of Parliament, which, as appears by the Records, always had this Clauſe, If any Suit be or ſhall be proceeded upon to be found to Right, if any body has any thing to ſay againſt him. [Sam. Coll. of Pard. 101.] In which Caſe, if Men, who would maintain another Opinion, ſhall think fit to produce their Precedents, I doubt not to make it manifeſt to them, that they are either miſtaken or perverted, or elſe all ſuch that they are either miſtaken or perverted, or elſe all ſuch that they are either miſtaken or perverted, or elſe all ſuch things conſider'd, cannot be look'd upon to have any Weight with a Parliament. to the great Mortification of the Whigs, who said, invidiously enough, That his Majesty was now putting himself into his Enemies Hands, and that the Arms of the City were given to those who would be glad of an Opportunity to use them for King James. His Majesty, however, either did not heed their Complaints, or thought he had done enough to oblige them in parting with Lord Halifax, and (l) putting the Privy Seal into Commission: For, as if to mortify them yet farther, two Days before the new Parliament was to meet, he dismiss'd the Lords Monmouth and Warrington, and Sir Henry Capel from the Treasury-Board, and made Sir John Lowther first Commissioner, who had risen thus high under the Patronage of the Marquis of Caermarthen. He also remov'd Lord Godolphin; possibly on account of his Attachment to the Princess of Denmark, and her favourite Lady Marlborough: But, continu'd Mr. Hampden, who had so much the less Reason to repine at Lowther's being plac'd above him, because he was made Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer. Sir Stephen Fox, and Mr. Thomas Pelham made up the rest of the Board, which now consisted of two conformable Whigs, and two as conformable Tories. About the same time also, Herbert, Lord Torrington, was remov'd from the Head of the Admiralty, and the Earl of Pembroke (who had been the King's Embassador Extraordinary to the States) was appointed to succeed him. This drew on the Resignation of Sir Miles Wharton, and Mr. Sacheverel: And, instead of promoting two in their Places, the Commission was clos'd with the Name of Sir John Chichley only. Burnet adds, "That other lesser Changes were made in inferior Places, so that Whig and Tory were now pretty equally mix'd; and both study'd to court the King, by making Advances upon the Money Bills."

Several Changes at Court.

It was under this Aspect of things, that the two Houses met at Westminster on the 20th of March; on which Day the Commons discover'd their Complexion, by the Choice of Sir John Trevor for their Speaker, who had been made Master of the Rolls by King James, and was remov'd by King William, to make Room for Powle the late Speaker, who was now, in his Turn, supplanted by the Man whom he had supplanted before. His Majesty, however, was pleas'd to confirm the Choice which the Commons had made; and B. Burnet helps us to account for it, by saying, "That he was a bold, dextrous Man, who knew the most effectual way of recommending himself to every Government." And, again, in the same Paragraph, "Being a Tory in Principle, he undertook to manage that Party, provided he might be furnish'd with such Sums of Money as might purchase some Votes: And by him began the Practice of buying off Men, in which the King, hitherto, had kept to stricter Rules." I took the Liberty once to complain to the King of that Method; he said, He hated it as much as any Man could do; but he saw it was not possible, considering the Corruption of the Age, to avoid it, unless we would endanger the whole.

Sir John Trevor chosen Speaker.

And undertakes to buy a Majority.

This Ceremonial being over, his Majesty open'd the Session with the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

I am resolv'd to leave nothing unattempted on my part, which may contribute to the Peace and Prosperity of this Nation: And, finding my Presence in Ireland will be absolutely necessary, for the more speedy reducing of that Kingdom, I continue my Resolution of going thither as soon as may be; and I have now called you together for your Assistance, to enable me to prosecute the War with Speed and Vigour: In which I assure myself of your chearful Concurrence, being a Work so necessary for your own Safeties.

The King's Speech.

In order to this, I desire you will forthwith make a Settlement of the Revenue; and I cannot doubt, but you will herein have as much Regard for the Honour and Dignity of the MONARCHY in my Hands, as has been lately shewed to others. And I have so great a Confidence in you, that if no quicker or more convenient way can be found, for the raising of ready Money (without which, the Service cannot be perform'd) I shall be very well content, for the present, to have it made such a Fund of Credit, as may be useful to yourselves, as well as to me, in this Conjuncture; not having the least Apprehensions, but that you will provide for the taking off all such Anticipations as it shall happen to fall under.

It is sufficiently known, how earnestly I have endeavour'd to extinguish (or, at least, compose) all Differences among my Subjects, and, to that end, how often I have recommended an Act of Indemnity to the last Parliament: But since that Part of it, which related to the preventing of private Suits, is already enacted, and because Debates of that Nature must take up more of your Time than can now be spar'd from the Dispatch of those other things, which are absolutely necessary for our common Safety; I intend to send you an Act of Grace, with Exceptions of some few Persons only, but such as may be sufficient to shew my great Dislike of their Crimes, and, at the same time, my Readiness to extend Protection to all my other Subjects, who will thereby see, that they can recommend themselves to me by no other Methods than what the Laws prescribe, which shall always be the only Rule of my Government.

A farther Reason, which induceth me to send you this Act at this time, is, because I am desirous to leave no Colour of Excuse to any of my Subjects, for the raising of Disturbances in the Government, and Peace, in the time of my Absence; and by this both to inform you, and to let [illegible] affected Men see, that I am not unmindful [illegible] love

(l) This was on February 19, and the Commissioners were William Cheney, Esq; Sir John Knatchbull, Bart. and Sir William Portman, Bart.

A.D. 1689-90 how busy they are, in their preſent Endeavours, to alter it.

Among other Encouragements, which I find they give themſelves, one of the Ways, by which they hope to compaſs their Deſigns, is by creating Differences and Diſagreements in your Counſels, which, I hope, you will be very careful to prevent; for be aſſured that our greateſt Enemies can have no better Inſtruments for their Purpoſes, than thoſe who ſhall any way endeavour to diſturb or delay your ſpeedy and unanimous Proceeding upon theſe neceſſary Matters.

I muſt recommend alſo to your Conſideration an Union with Scotland: I do not mean it ſhould be now entred upon; but they having propos'd this to me ſome time ſince, and the Parliament there having nominated Commiſſioners for that Purpoſe, I ſhould be glad that Commiſſioners might alſo be nominated here, to treat with them, and to ſee if ſuch Terms could be agreed on, as might be for the Benefit of both Nations, ſo as to be ready to be preſented to you in ſome future Seſſion.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I have thought it moſt convenient to leave the Adminiſtration of the Government in the Hands of the Queen, during my Abſence; and, if it ſhould be judg'd neceſſary to have an Act of Parliament, for the better Confirmation of it to her, I deſire you will let ſuch an one be prepar'd, to be preſented to me.

I have this only to add, that the Seaſon of the Year, and my Journey into Ireland, will admit but of a very ſhort Seſſion; ſo that I muſt recommend to you the making ſuch Diſpatch, that we may not be engag'd in Debates, when our Enemies ſhall be in the Field. For the Succeſs of the War, and the more thrifty Management of it, will both principally depend upon your ſpeedy Reſolutions. And I hope it will not be long before we ſhall meet again, to perfect what the Time will not now allow to be done."

It is not ſaid who compos'd this Speech, the King or his Miniſters: But, whoever compos'd it, we may fairly conclude, that it was the Reſult of the late Bargain with the Tories; ſince the Intereſt of both the contracting Parties is provided for in it. His Majeſty, on one hand, deſires, or rather demands, an immediate Settlement of his Revenue on the old monarchical Footing, and offers an Act of Grace, on the other; he wants ready Money, and he offers that Revenue, when ſo ſettled, as a Fund upon which to raiſe it.--- Now the laſt of theſe Circumſtances has been treated as a great Condeſcenſion, by the Whigs of later Times: But the Convention Whigs, who ſet the Crown on his Head, could never be brought to think, that any Condeſcenſion on his Side could be an Equivalent for ſuch a Stretch of Confidence on theirs: And there was, beſides, more of Policy, than Matter of Grace or Favour in it: Some popular as well as Party-inducement was to be made uſe of; and as the King wanted ſtill more Money, and the People had already granted ſo much, that Expedient which ſupply'd him, without impoſing any additional Burthen, immediately upon them, was the beſt.--- As to Anticipations, which were ſo dreadful to the Exchuſioniſts in the Reign of Charles II. and againſt which ſuch thundering Votes are ſtill to be found in the Journals of the Commons, they had loſt their Terror: The King was to be oblig'd at any rate; and even the Whigs themſelves, who, till now, had ſome Remains of Modeſty at leaſt, being convinc'd of the Neceſſity of conforming, by the Example and Succeſs of their Adverſaries, reſolv'd to put in for their Share of Merit, by ratifying the Bargain which the others had made. A.D. 1689-90

Unanimous Votes of the Commons to ſupport the Government.

Thus when the Speech was reported, inſtead of making Exceptions, or calling for Explanations, or ſtarting any reaſonable or popular Objection whatſoever, it was reſolv'd, nemine contradicente, "1. That the humble and hearty Thanks of the Houſe be preſented to his Majeſty, for his gracious Speech to both Houſes: 2. That the Houſe would aſſiſt and ſupport the Government, under their preſent Majeſties King William and Queen Mary, both by their Counſel, and with their Aſſiſtance, to the utmoſt of their Power: And, 3. That the whole Houſe ſhould attend his Majeſty with the ſaid Reſolutions. The whole Houſe did accordingly attend; and his Majeſty was moſt graciouſly pleas'd to balance theſe Reſolves of theirs with another of his own, which he had repeated on almoſt every Occaſion ſince his landing at Torbay; namely, That as he had ventur'd his Life for the Nation, ſo he was reſolv'd always to do; adding, "I hope you will take my Speech into your Conſideration, and that this may be a happy Seſſion."

On the 25th the Speaker reported the Anſwer to the Houſe; on the 27th, it was reſolv'd, nemine contradicente, That a Supply be given to their Majeſties, to enable his Majeſty to proſecute the War againſt France, and for reducing Ireland with Speed and Vigour; and on the 28th the Houſe agreed with the Committee in the following Reſolutions: 1690 and raiſe a Supply.

"That the hereditary Revenues, which the late King James was entitled to December 10, 1688, became, and are veſted in, their preſent Majeſties King William and Queen Mary, in right of the Crown of England, except the late Revenue ariſing by Firehearths and Stoves.

That a Bill be brought in to declare that the ſaid Revenues are ſo veſted, and that therein Proviſion be made, that they ſhall not be alienated from the Crown, nor chargeable with any Gift or Grant to be made for the future.

That a Bill be brought in for the ſettling on their preſent Majeſties that Moiety of the Exciſe which was granted to the late Kings, Charles and James, or either of them, for their Lives, and the Life of the longeſt Liver of them, with a Clauſe to make the ſaid Revenue a Security for raiſing Money towards a Supply not exceeding the Sum of—

That a Bill be brought in to grant to their Majeſties,

A. D. 1690. Majeſties, for the Term of (m) four Years, from Chriſtmas next, the Cuſtoms which were granted to the late Kings Charles and James for their Lives, with a Clauſe to make the ſaid Revenue a Security for raiſing Money towards a Supply; not exceeding the Sum of——.

But tho' theſe Votes were carry'd without a Diviſion, they were not carry'd without a Debate: Some thought they were too comprehenſive, and ſome that they were too limited. The Latter were for having the Cuſtoms for Life, as well as the Exciſe: Biſhop Burnet ſays, "This was much preſs'd; but, continues he, it was taken up as a general Maxim, that the Revenue for a certain and a ſhort Term, was the beſt Security that the Nation could have for frequent Parliaments (n)." The Former, on the contrary, were for huſbanding the public Stock, and for making thoſe in Office more ſenſible of the Burthen impos'd on the People, by bearing their Share; and, among theſe, Sir Charles Sedley diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in a very remarkable Manner (o).

On the 1ſt of April, the Amount of the Supply for the public Occaſions between that Time and Michaelmas, was fix'd at one Million two hundred thouſand Pounds: On the 2d, the Sum to be rais'd on the Credit of the Bill or Bills for ſettling the Revenue, as Part of that Supply, was alſo fix'd at one Million, or, as it was expreſs'd by Amendment, at ten hundred thouſand Pounds: And on the 3d it was agreed, that the remaining two hundred thouſand Pounds ſhould be provided for by another Poll-Bill.

Proceedings in the Bill of Recognition.

In this Interval, agreeable to the Hint in the whiggiſh Pamphlet laſt-quoted, a Bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, for recognizing their Majeſties as the rightful and lawful Sovereign of theſe Realms, and for declaring all the Acts of the laſt Parliament to be good and valid: This put the Tories under great Difficulties; for as they were on one hand unwilling to looſen the Hold they had newly acquir'd at Court, ſo, on the other, they were aſham'd thus ſolemnly to retract all their former Arguments and Diſtinctions, under the Umbrage of which they had dextrouſly contriv'd to be ſafe under the preſent Government, and to leave a Door open for the Re-admiſſion of another.

A. D.

According to the Hiſtorian of his own Times, the firſt Part however paſs'd with little Contradiction, ſome Exceptions only having been made to the Words rightful and lawful, as not at all neceſſary; but the ſecond bore a long and warm Debate; the Tories offering to enact, that thoſe Laws ſhould be good Laws for the Time to come, yet refuſing to declare them ſo for the Time paſt: But unluckily the Words rightful and lawful are not in the Act; and the Sequel of his Lordſhip's Account, tho' ſervilely follow'd by our Cotemporary, as uſual, is far from being ſo perfect as it ought to be, or as might have been expected from the Pen of a Perſon who was preſent at the Debate. He takes no notice that the Bill was committed, that the Whigs carry'd their Point in that Committee, that they loſt it again on the Report, by ſix Voices; and that, by the dint of one of the warmeſt and moſt alarming Proteſts that ever was made, they recover'd it again, tho' not in the ſame Words as before.

The ſaid Proteſt (which was ſign'd Bolton, Macclesfield, Stamford, Newport, Bedford, Herbert, Suffolk, Monmouth, Delamere, and Oxford,) was founded on the following Reaſons:

"1. Becauſe there appears to us no Reaſon to doubt of the Validity of the laſt Parliament; the great Objection inſiſted upon being, the Want of Writs of Summons, which we take to be fully anſwer'd, by the State the Nation was in, at that time, which made that Form impoſſible, ſuch Exigencies of Affairs having been always look'd upon by our Anceſtors, (however careful of parliamentary Forms) to be a ſufficient Reaſon to allow the Authority of Parliament, notwithſtanding the ſame, or other Defects in point of Form; as the Parliament which ſet Henry the Firſt and King Stephen on the Throne; the (m) Biſhop Burnet erroneouſly ſays five, and that the other Branches were granted for the ſame Term: Whereas the Matter was apparently compromis'd, and the limited Time in the Cuſtoms was made acceptable by the Perpetuity in the Exciſe.

(n) His Lordſhip adds, "The King did not like this: He ſaid to myſelf, Why ſhould they entertain a Jealouſy of him, who came to ſave their Religion and Liberties, when they truſted King James ſo much, who intended to deſtroy both? I anſwer'd, They were not jealous of him, but of thoſe who might ſucceed him: And if he would accept the Gift for a Term of Years, and ſettle the Precedent, he would be reckon'd the Deliverer of ſucceeding Ages, as well as the preſent."

(o) As appears by the following Speech:

"Mr. Speaker, We have provided for the Army; we have provided for the Navy: And now, at laſt, a new Reckoning is brought us: we muſt likewiſe provide for the Kids. Truly, Mr. Speaker, 'tis a ſad Reflection, that ſome Men ſhould wallow in Wealth and Places, while others pay away in Taxes the fourth Part of their Revenue, for the Support of the ſame Government. We are not upon equal Terms, for his Majeſty's Service: The Courtiers and great Officers are charg[illegible] while the Country-Gentlemen are ſhot through and through by them.—— The King is pleas'd to [illegible] Wants before us, and I am confident, expects our [illegible] by his Wants before us, and I am confident, expects our Advice upon it.—We ought therefore to tell him what Penſions are too great; what Places may be extinguiſh'd, during the Time of the War, and public Calamity. His Majeſty ſees nothing but Coaches and ſix, and great Tables, and therefore cannot imagine the Want and Miſery of the reſt of his Subjects: He is a brave and generous Prince, but he is a young King, encompaſs'd and beſmir'd in by a Company of crafty, old Courtiers. To ſay no more, ſome have Places of 3000 l. ſome of 6000 l. and others of 8600 l. per ann. and I am told, the Commiſſioners of the Treaſury have 1600 l. per ann. a-piece. Certainly, public Penſions, whatever they have been formerly, are much too great for the preſent Want and Calamity that reigns every where elſe: And it is a Scandal, that a Government ſo lick as Ours is, ſhould look ſo well in the Face.—We muſt ſave the King's Money wherever we can, ſo I am afraid this War is too great for our Purſes, if things are not manag'd with all imaginable Thrift: When the People of England ſee all things ſav'd, that can be ſav'd; that there are no unneceſſary Penſions, nor unneceſſary Salaries, and all the Expence is to the Uſe to which they are given; we ſhall [illegible] they ſhall pay, whatever his Majeſty can want, to ſecure the Proteſtant Religion, and to keep out the King of France, and King James too; whom, by the way, I have not [illegible] nam'd this Seſſion; whether out of Fear, Diſcretion, or Reſpect, I cannot tell. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let us ſave the King what we can, and then let us proceed to give him what we are able."

the

A. D. 1690. the Parliament held 28 Edward I; the Parliament ſummon'd by the Prince of Wales, 20 Edward II; the Parliament ſummon'd 23 Richard II; the Parliament held 1 Henry VI; and the Parliament held 28 Henry VI; the Acts of which Parliaments have been held for Law.

2. Becauſe the rejecting this Clauſe muſt neceſſarily diſturb the Minds of the greateſt Part of the Kingdom; for if thoſe be not good Laws, all Commiſſioners, Aſſeſſors, Collectors and Receivers of the late Taxes are not only ſubject to private Actions, but to be criminally proſecuted for one of the higheſt Offences againſt the Conſtitution of the Engliſh Government, viz. the levying Money on the Subject, without lawful Authority; all Perſons who have lent Money, upon the Credit of thoſe Laws, will be in dread of their Security, and impatient to get in their Money; all Perſons concerned in levying the preſent Taxes will be fearful to proceed; all Perſons who have accepted any Offices or Employments eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military, will be under the Apprehenſion of having incurr'd all the terrible Forfeitures and Diſabilities of the Act of 25 Charles II. cap. 2. and all who have any way concurred to the Condemnation or Execution of any Perſon upon any Act of the late Parliament, will think themſelves in danger of being called to an Account for Murder.

3. Becauſe to leave a Doubt touching the Validity of the laſt Parliament is to ſhake all the Judgments and Decrees given in the Houſe of Peers, or in Weſtminſter-Hall, during this Reign; and to bring a Queſtion upon the whole Courſe of judicial Proceedings.

4. Becauſe if the Authority of the laſt Parliament be not put out of the Queſtion, the Authority of the preſent Parliament can never be defended; for the Statute of 5 Eliz. cap. 1. makes the Election of every Member of the Houſe of Commons abſolutely void, if he enters into the Houſe without taking the Oath of Supremacy, which no one Perſon having done, there is an End of this Houſe of Commons: And by the Statute made 30 Car. II. if any Peer, or Member of the Houſe of Commons, preſume to ſit and vote without firſt taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, before the Speaker of the reſpective Houſes, he does not only forfeit five hundred Pounds, and become a popiſh Recuſant, and diſabled to take a Legacy, to hold any Office or Place of Truſt, to proſecute any Suit, to be a Guardian, Executor or Adminiſtrator, but is made for ever incapable to ſit and vote in either Houſe of Parliament; and conſequently this can be no Parliament, nor any who have ſat in either Houſe be capable of ſitting in Parliament hereafter.

3. Becauſe to leave Room to doubt of the Authority of the laſt Parliament is to ſhake the Succeſſion of the Crown, eſtabliſh'd by it, and the Credit and Authority of all Treaties made with foreign Princes and States by King William, as the undoubted King of theſe Realms; ſo that if the laſt was no Parliament, and their Acts no Law, this is our Caſe: The Nation is engag'd in a War without the Conſent of Parliament, the old Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance remain in force, and the Nation forced, under colour of Law, to ſwear Fidelity to King William, tho' they can never act as a lawful Parliament without taking the Oaths of Allegiance to King James: All Judgments and Decrees in the Houſe of Lords, during the late Parliament, are of no Force; great Sums of Money have been levy'd, without Conſent of Parliament, and Men have been put to death, not only without, but againſt, Law; which is the worſt Sort of Murder: Laſtly, the King upon the Throne, the Peerage of England, and the Commons freely elected by the People, have been Parties to all this: The Peers and Commons now aſſembled are under a perpetual Diſability, and the Nation is involv'd in endleſs Doubts and Confuſions, without any legal Settlement, or Poſſibility to arrive at it, unleſs a Parliament be ſummon'd by King James's Writ, and the Oaths of Allegiance taken to him." A. D. 1690.

The firſt Clauſe of the Bill was conceiv'd in theſe Words: "We, &c. do beſeech your moſt excellent Majeſty, That it may be publiſh'd and declar'd in this high Court of Parliament, and enacted by the Authority of the ſame, That we do acknowledge your Majeſties were, are, and of Right ought to be, by the Laws of this Realm, our Sovereign Liege Lord and Lady King and Queen of England, France and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whoſe Princely Perſons the Royal State, Crown and Dignity of the ſaid Realms, with all Honours, Styles, Titles, Regalities, Prerogatives, Powers, Juriſdictions and Authorities to the ſame belonging and appertaining, are moſt fully, rightfully and entirely, inveſted and incorporated, united and annexed." And on the Strength of the foregoing Proteſt, the ſecond Clauſe was conceiv'd as follows: "And for the avoiding of all Diſputes and Queſtions concerning the Being and Authority of the late Parliament, aſſembled at Weſtminſter the 13th of February 1688, we do moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſties, that it may be enacted, and be it enacted, by the King and Queen's moſt excellent Majeſties, by and with the Advice and Conſent of the Lords, &c. in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, and by the Authority of the ſame, That all and ſingular the Acts made and enacted by the ſaid Parliament were and are Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom, and as ſuch ought to be reputed, taken and obey'd, by all the People of this Kingdom." This alſo was oppos'd by the ſame Lords who had oppos'd the former Clauſe, but not with the ſame Succeſs: For the whole Weight of the Court was now collected and thrown in the Scale of the Bill, and the Tories found themſelves too light to counter-balance it. As a laſt Reſource, therefore, on the third Reading, they alſo, in Imitation of their Adverſaries, enter'd their Proteſt, which is here inſerted as the Counter-part of the other:

"1. Becauſe we conceive, that ſaying It

A. D. 1690. is enacted by the Authority of the present Parliament, That all and singular the Acts made in the last Parliament were Laws, is neither good English nor good Sense.

2. Because, if it were good Sense to enact for the Time past, it must be understood, on this Subject, to be the declaring of Laws to be good, which were pass'd in a Parliament not called by Writ in due Form of Law, which is destructive of the legal Constitution of this Monarchy, and may be of evil and pernicious Consequence to our present Government under this King and Queen."

Bishop Burnet is positive, that Lord Nottingham, notwithstanding his great Office at Court, was at the Head of these Protesters: But if he was at the Head of the Debate, the Duke of Somerset was at the Head of the Subscribers; and was follow'd by the Lords Rochester, Jermyn, Westmorland, Huntington, Abington, Feversham, Scarsdale, Weymouth, Dartmouth, and Nottingham, (who was the last of the temporal Lords in the List) and six Bishops, among whom were Lloyd of St. Asaph, and Compton of London, who had set the Crown on the King's Head, by the Authority of that very Assembly, whose Acts they now refus'd to ratify.

But tho' these Lords had, according to Custom, ask'd and receiv'd the Leave of the House to enter their Dissents, the Majority were of opinion, that the Use they had made of it was of such dangerous Consequence to the Safety of the Government, and the Peace of the Nation, that, after another long and fierce Debate, they order'd the Protest to be expung'd; which was done accordingly, and was follow'd by another Protest, in the following Form and Words:

"Whereas the Questions for expunging the Reasons of our Protestation April the 8th, were carry'd in the Affirmative; and whereas these Reasons were only against some Words in one Clause in the Bill, intituled, An Act for recognizing King William and Queen Mary, and for avoiding all Questions touching the Act made in the Parliament assembled at Westminster the 13th Day of February, 1688, which enacted, That the Acts of the late Parliament were Laws and Statutes of this Realm:

And Leave being given to enter our Dissents to those Questions, we do so accordingly, for these Reasons:

1. Because it is the Privilege of the Peers to enter their Dissent; and it has been the ancient Practice to enter also the Reasons of such Dissent, of which the Lords that so dissent are the most proper Judges, as well knowing what Arguments persuaded them to be of that Opinion; and no Reasons can be more proper than such as they conceive are founded upon Matter of Fact and the Law of the Land.

2. Because there is no other Precedent of expunging the Reasons of any Protestation.

3. Because the Protestation was not against the whole Bill, but some particular Words of it; but by expunging the Reasons of that Protestation it appears that we have protested against the whole Bill, which is contrary to our Sense and Intentions.

A. D. 1690.

On the very Day that the Bill pass'd the Lords, it was sent down to the Commons, and on the Morrow it was taken into Consideration by that House. Great and long Debates were expected, "But, to the Wonder of all People, says our Lord of Salisbury, it pass'd in two Days, without any Debate or Opposition." His Lordship adds, "The Truth was, the Tories had resolv'd to commit the Bill, and, in order to that, some trifling Exceptions were made to some Words, that might want Correction: for Bills are not committed, unless some Amendments are offer'd: And when it was committed, it was then resolv'd to oppose it. But one of them discover'd this too early; for he question'd the Legality of the Convention, since it was not summon'd by Writ: Somers, then Solicitor-General, answer'd this with great Spirit. He said, if that was not a legal Parliament, they who were then met, and who had taken the Oaths enacted by that Parliament were guilty of High Treason: The Laws repeal'd by it were still in force; so they must presently return to King James: All the Money levied, collected and paid, by virtue of the Acts of that Parliament, made every one that was concern'd in it highly criminal. This he spoke with much Zeal, and such an Ascendancy of Authority, that none were prepar'd to answer it. So the Bill pass'd without any more Opposition. This was a great Service done, in a very critical Time, and contributed not a little to raise Somers's Character." It farther appears, by the Journals of the House of Commons, That a Motion was actually made, for committing the Bill, which was over-rul'd without a Division: Whence it follows, that the Tories were divided among themselves upon this Subject; for, as they were the Majority, had they been unanimous, they might have rejected it at the first Reading. Lord Warrington, in his Impartial Enquiry, indeed suggests, That a certain Set of Men were busy in persuading the Members, That all the Convention did was null and void: That when others insisted on the Necessity of confirming their Acts, it was reply'd, That what was void from the Beginning could never be confirm'd: And that there wanted not Whisperers about the King, who insinuated, that it was of dangerous Consequence to offer the Bill, and who treacherously advis'd him to use his Interest among the Members of both Houses to lay it aside; with a Design, says his Lordship, to keep up the Notion of King James's Right, and to make this Parliament, as well as the Convention, to be of no Authority: Knowing, that it had been call'd, and held only by Force of the Acts of the Convention: For, however busy these Men were, it is plain their Labour was without Profit, and that the Speaker's Ascendancy over his Party was greater

A. D. 1699. greater than theirs: For the Bill receiv'd the Royal Assent on the 14th. And thus the Tories themselves gave the last Hand to that Settlement, which they had hitherto affected both to consider and represent as illegal.

Vote of Thanks to the King for the Care he had taken of the Church, by the Alterations he had made in the Lieutenancy.

About this time the Alterations in the London-Lieutenancy having increas'd the Ferment among the Whigs, and it being apprehended that they would endeavour to interest the Parliament in their Quarrel, or, at least, prevail with the King to let them have their Share in that Trust, the Tories, by way of Prevention, mov'd, on the 24th, That the humble Thanks of the House be presented to his Majesty, for the great Care he had express'd of the CHURCH of England, in the Alterations he had made in the said Lieutenancy. This, as it may be imagin'd, created a long and violent Debate: The Whigs were more dispos'd to think, that the Measure in question deserv'd the Censure than the Thanks of the House; nor could be brought to acknowledge, that the King's Care of the Church had any Connection with the new Disposition he had made of the Lieutenancy. But if they could not be out-reason'd, they were out-number'd; for upon the Question it appear'd, that the Tories had a Majority of 49: And it was moreover order'd, That the Vote should be presented by the whole House; which was done accordingly. It is however observable, that his Majesty made no Return of Thanks for this Party-Vote; but contented himself with saying, "It should always be his Endeavour to employ such Persons as should be most serviceable to Church and State."

Proceedings on the Abjuration-Bill.

There was at this time also a Bill before the House, which provided, That all Persons in any Employment or Trust, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, should take an Oath of Abjuration of the late King James, and his Title: Or, according to a certain Tory-Author, that all their Majesties Subjects should do so, "under no less Pain than Imprisonment without Bail or Mainprize. An Attempt, continues he, so dangerous to the public Peace, and so fatal to the Liberties of the Subject, which had lately cost so dear to recover, that had the like been offer'd in any other Reign, or by any other Party, it would have made such a Noise, as would have stunn'd the Ears of future Generations. Yet this good Bill obtain'd a second Reading; but, being too gross to pass, it dropp'd thro'." But this is all Misrepresentation; for the Bill related to those in Office only; and consequently could have no such terrible Penalty annex'd to it: Bishop Burnet affirms, that some of the Tories were at first for it: But even he is mistaken, when he also affirms, That the Clergy were excepted out of it, to soften the Opposition that might be made; for we find, by the Journals of the Commons, that Ecclesiastics were comprehended in it at the last Reading, as well as at the first. His Lordship farther says, "But still the main Body of the Tories declar'd, they would never take any such Oath; so they oppos'd every Step that was made in it, with a great Copiousness of long and vehement arguing: They insisted much on this; that when the Government was settled, Oaths were made to be the Ties of the Subject to it, and that all new Impositions were a Breach made on That, which might be called the Original Contract of the present Settlement: Things of that kind ought to be fixed and certain, and not mutable and endless: By the same Reason that the Abjuration was now propos'd, another Oath might be prepar'd every Year; and every Party, that prevail'd in Parliament, would bring in some discriminating Oath or Test, such as could only be taken by those of their own Side: And thus the Largeness and Equality of Government would be lost, and contracted into a Faction. On the other Side it was said, that this was only intended to be a Security to the Government, during the War; For, in such a time it seem'd necessary, that all who were employ'd by the Government should give it all possible Security: It was apparent, that the comprehensive Words in the Oath of Allegiance had given occasion to much Equivocation; many who had taken them having declar'd, which some had done in Print, that they consider'd themselves as bound by the Oaths, only while the King continued in peaceable Possession; but not to assist or support his Title, if it was attack'd or shaken: It was therefore necessary, that Men in public Trust should be brought under stricter Ties. The Whigs press'd the King to set it forward; they said, every one who took it would look on himself as impardonable, and so would serve him with the more Zeal and Fidelity; whereas those, that thought the Right to the Crown was still in King James, might perhaps serve faithfully as long as the Government stood firm; but as they kept still Measures with the other Side, to whom they knew they would be always welcome, so they would never act with that Life and Zeal which the present State of Affairs requir'd. At the same time, the Tories were as earnest in pressing the King to stop the further Progress of those Debates: Much time was already lost in them; and it was evident that much more must be lost, if it was intended to carry it on, since so many Branches of this Bill, and Incidents that arose upon the Subject of it, would give occasion to much Heat and Wrangling: And it was a Doubt, whether it would be carried, after all the Time that must be bestow'd on it, or not: Those who oppos'd it would grow sullen, and oppose every thing else that was mov'd for the King's Service: And, if it should be carry'd, would put the King again into the Hands of the Whigs, who would immediately return to their old Practices against the Prerogative; and it would drive many into King James's Party, who might otherwise stick firm to the King, or, at least, be Neutrals: These Reasons prevail'd with the King to order an Intimation to be given in the House of Commons, that he desir'd they would let that Debate fall, and go to other Matters that were more pressing."

[Context against the Whigs, Part iii. p. 49, 50.]

A. D. 1699.

It was fit to copy his Lordship thus far, because

A. D. 1690. because no other Author gives so full an Account of this critical Affair. But we are not to abandon ourselves entirely to his Direction; for whatever Intimation of his Pleasure his Majesty gave to the House of Commons, it is most certain, that the two Parties contested the Matter with all their Power: That a Motion was made to commit the Bill, which pass'd in the Negative, Yeas 178, Noes 192: And that it was the same Day finally rejected by the same 192 against 165. It is also equally certain, that the Dispute was so far from taking up much Time, that the Bill was brought in one Day, viz. the 25th, when it was read once, and order'd, Nemine Contradicente, to be read again, and actually rejected the next; tho' his Lordship farther says, That the King's Interposing was represented as an Artifice to prevent that Affront.

Which is rejected.

The same Prelate, moreover, says, "That this Affair of the Abjuration was also, at the same time, as violently contested in the House of Lords, with this Difference, That the Debates lasted longer among the Latter than the Former, and that the Object was not altogether the same; for the Whig Lords requir'd no more than an Oath of Special Fidelity to King William, in Opposition to King James. But even this the Tories thought too much, and offer'd in lieu of it, says our Author, a negative Engagement, against assisting King James, or any of his Instruments, knowing them to be such, with severe Penalties on such as should refuse it. In Opposition to which it was said, That this was only an Expedient to secure all King James's Party, whatever should happen; since it left them the entire Merit of being still in his Interests, and only restrain'd them from putting any thing to the Hazard for him." It is added, "That the House was so near an Equality, in every Division, that what was gain'd in one Day, was lost in the next; and that by the Heat and Length of these Debates, the Session continu'd till June." But in the last of these Circumstances his Lordship's Memory has deceiv'd him, for the Session was clos'd on the 23d of May, and was the shortest in the whole Reign: And, probably, he is not to be thoroughly depended upon in his Account of the Former: For an Oath of special Fidelity to King William can scarce be call'd an Abjuration of King James: And scarce any thing can be suppos'd stranger, than that the two several Proposals of the Whigs and Tories in the House of Lords, which occasion'd such Divisions there, should be incorporated in the House of Commons, and adopted by both Parties. And yet we find, that the next Day but one, after the Abjuration Bill was rejected, the Commons, as if to justify themselves at Court, took into Consideration the Heads of a Bill to secure the Government under King William and Queen Mary, against the late King James and all his Adherents; and came to the following Resolutions, viz. That, by order of their Majesties, the Lord-Lieutenants be empower'd to assemble the Militia, with a Month's Pay (notwithstanding the Month's Pay already advanc'd had not been reimburs'd) and for a longer time than the Law already allow'd. 2. That all Papists and reputed Papists be oblig'd, forthwith, to repair to their respective Dwellings, &c. 3. That a Test, or Declaration of Fidelity to the Government, under their present Majesties King William and Queen Mary, against the late King James, and all his Adherents, and all other Enemies to the present Government, as it is now establish'd in Church and State, be enjoin'd to be made, repeated, and subscrib'd by all Persons above sixteen Years of Age." And a Committee was appointed to prepare and bring in a Bill accordingly.

A. D. 1690.

Here, however, the Affair stopp'd; and perhaps it was here that the King declar'd himself satisfy'd; for, whereas our Right Reverend Historian farther intimates, That the rejecting the Abjuration-Bill had a very ill Effect abroad (both Friends and Enemies looking upon it as a Sign of a great Decline in the King's Interest with his People) it is reasonable to suppose, that these Resolutions were made at his Majesty's Instance, and that the mere Credit of them was all He aim'd at: An Order had been made in the Beginning of the Session for the printing the Votes, which had been over-rul'd in the preceding Parliament; and thro' this Channel every Declaration of the Sense of the House was immediately circulated all over Europe.

There is yet another Incident arising out of this Affair, which remains to be mention'd; and for the Particulars of which, we must depend on Burnet only, since we have no other Vouchers. "The Earl of Shrewsbury (says he) was at the Head of those who press'd the Abjuration most; so, upon this Change of Counsels, he thought he could not serve the King longer with Reputation or Success: He saw the Whigs, by using the King ILL (that is to say, by refusing to abandon all to his Discretion) were driving him into the Tories; and he thought these would serve the King with more Zeal, if he left his Post. The Credit that the Marquis of Caermarthen had gain'd, was not easy to him; so he resolv'd to deliver up the Seals. I was the first Person to whom he discover'd this; and he had them in his Hands when he told me of it; yet I prevail'd with him not to go that Night. He was in some Heat. I had no mind that the King should be surpriz'd by a thing of that kind; and I was afraid that the Earl of Shrewsbury might have said such things to him as should have provoked him too much; so I sent the King word of it. It troubled him more than I thought a thing of that sort could have done: He lov'd the Earl of Shrewsbury, and apprehended, that his leaving his Service at this time, might alienate the Whigs more entirely from him; for now they, who had fought him before of too cold a Temper, when they saw how firm he was, came to confide and trust him more than ever. The King sent Tillotson and all those who had most Credit with the Earl, to divert him from his Resolution. But all was to no Purpose. The Agitation of Mind that this gave him, threw him into a Fever, which almost cost him his Life. The King preſs'd him to keep the Seals till his Return from Ireland, tho' he ſhould not act as Secretary; but he could not be prevail'd on."

Revenue-Bills paſs'd.

In this Interval, the Commons had not only perfected their Poll-Bill towards the reducing Ireland, and proſecuting the War againſt France, but alſo That for granting to their Majeſties for their Lives, or the Survivor of them, the Temporary Exciſe; with Thankfulneſs and Admiration, according to the Preamble, of his Majeſty's glorious and ſucceſsful Undertakings for the Deliverance of the People of this Nation from Popery and arbitrary Power. The Latter contain'd a Clauſe of Credit for 250,000*l.* at 8 per cent. as alſo another for repealing the Act for ſettling the Revenue on King James; and a third, for ſettling on the Prince and Princeſs of Denmark, and their Children, the additional Allowance of 20,000*l. per ann.* procur'd for them in the laſt Parliament. Both receiv'd the Royal Aſſent on the 23d. On the 28th following, the Commons completed the Tonnage and Poundage-Bill, and ſent it up to the Lords; with Truſt and Confidence in their Majeſties (to it is expreſs'd) for guarding the Seas, and defending the Trade of their Subjects, &c. And on the 2d of May it was finally paſs'd into a Law.

The Paper, called, A Letter to a Friend, voted a Libel.

On the ſame Day the two Parties in the Commons had another Struggle on the following Occaſion. Sir Edward Seymour roſe up and charg'd Mr. Rowe, a Member, with having diſpers'd the Paper, call'd, A Letter to a Friend upon the Diſſolution, &c. together with the Liſt, &c. (inſerted in the Note (t) p. 189) which he ſaid reflected highly on his Majeſty's Government, and upon ſeveral Members of the laſt Parliament. The Whigs, to a Man, ſided with Mr. Rowe; but finding their Adverſaries had the Majority, endeavour'd to defeat their Purpoſe by a Motion to adjourn the Debate; which was over-rul'd by 180 Voices againſt 156. And upon the Iſſue, it was reſolv'd, "That the ſaid Paper was a falſe and ſcandalous Libel, reflecting upon their Majeſties and their Government, and the Rights and Privileges of Parliament."

Bill to reverſe the Judgment in a Quo Warranto againſt the City of London.

After ſo many clear Manifeſtations of their Superiority, the Tories now reſolv'd to make a further Uſe of it, by bringing in a Bill to reſtore the City of London to its ancient Rights and Privileges, which they had formerly been ſo inſtrumental to ruin and deſtroy. They were in Poſſeſſion of the Lieutenancy, but not of the Magiſtracy: And in order to facilitate their preſent Views, they made no Scruple to condemn their paſt Practices. Thus, in the Preamble, they admitted, that the Judgment upon the Quo Warranto againſt the ſaid City, and the Proceedings thereupon, were illegal and arbitrary; in the ſecond Clauſe they enacted, that the ſaid Judgment and Proceedings were null and void; in the third, they re-erected the Lord Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens into a Body Corporate and Politic, ſo to continue for ever; and reſtor'd them to all and ſingular their ancient Rights: And in the fourth, That all Charters, Grants, Letters Patents, &c. made or granted by either of the late Kings ſince the ſaid Judgment, were null and void; with a Proviſo, that the Act ſhould not extend to diſcharge any of thoſe Perſons who had acted as Magiſtrates by Authority of the ſaid Charters, &c. without duly qualifying themſelves; and under an expreſs Stipulation, that all Officers, and all Miniſters who rightfully held any Office, &c. in the ſaid City, at the time of the ſaid Judgment, ſhould be confirm'd. A. D. 1690.

The Whigs, who clearly ſaw the Driſt of this Bill, did not fail to oppoſe it thro' every Stage, but with no viſible Succeſs; for, all they were able to obtain, was, That the preſent Mayors, Sheriffs, Chamberlain and Common Council, ſhould continue till the uſual Terms of annual Election (which, by the ſame Clauſe, were fix'd on the Days formerly ſet apart for that Purpoſe) and when they divided the Houſe againſt the Bill on the third Reading, they loſt the Queſtion by ninety Voices. All that now remain'd, was to follow it with the like Oppoſition thorough the Houſe of Lords; which was done accordingly, but with no better Succeſs than before, tho' the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council join'd in a Petition to be heard by their Council againſt it. This, indeed, was granted; and when the ſaid Council made it their Requeſt on Behalf of the City to be indulg'd with farther time, it was the Opinion of the Committee, that they ought to be ſo indulg'd: But when that Opinion came to be reported to the Houſe, and it had been conſider'd, that ſuch an Indulgence might endanger the Bill, it was over-rul'd by three Voices; Contents forty-four, not Contents forty-ſeven. Upon which, the Lords Cornwallis, Macclesfield, Bridgewater, Monmouth, Bath, Manchester, Devonſhire, Clifford, Lovelace, Bolton, Bedford, Clare, Carteret, Herbert, Wharton, Newport, Montagu, Sydney, Stamford, Vaughan, Warrington, Offulſtone, Eure, Oxford, Dorſet, and Granville, enter'd their Reaſons for diſſenting, in the following Words:

1. Becauſe it ſeems very hard, that a further time of Preparation ſhould not be allow'd in a Caſe of the higheſt Importance, to which the City, by their whole repreſentative Body, had deſir'd to be heard, eſpecially ſeveral Lords having inform'd the Houſe on their Behalf, that the time granted them was not ſufficient to inſtruct their Council, who, at the Bar, did alſo deſire a further Day to be able to ſpeak to ſuch important Points, declaring themſelves not ſufficiently prepar'd, having their Inſtructions but late the Night before.

2. Becauſe of how much greater Moment any thing is, ſo much the greater Deliberation and Advice ought to be had upon it; and this is of ſuch high Importance, that it not only concerns the City of London, but all the Corporations in England, that are by Preſcription, and, in Conſequence, the Legiſlative of this Government.

The Truth is, that this Motion for farther time, was, at the Bottom, no better than a Piece

A. D. 1690. a Piece of Parliamentary-Craft, to keep the Bill in Suſpence till the Cloſe of the Seſſion, which was known to be at hand; and it was for that very Reaſon that the other Party were as eager to bring it to an Iſſue.

Proceedings on the 500 l. Forfeitures. There was yet another Point before the Commons which kept the Houſe in a Ferment for ſeveral Days together; and this was a Bill for veſting the 500*l.* Forfeitures (which thoſe Perſons were liable to who had acted as Magiſtrates, or Officers, without duly qualifying themſelves to ſerve, as the Law requir'd) in his Majeſty. The main Drift of this was to make the Diſſenters ſmart for their Ductility in the late Reign: And it was the Buſineſs of their Allies in the Houſe to ſhew them all poſſible Countenance and Honour; but then they were out of Heart; the Stream of the Seſſion had ſet againſt them; Numbers were tir'd of a vain Oppoſition, and had made their Retreat to the Country. And hence it follow'd that the Tories had it in their Power to make the Bill as ſevere as they pleas'd. Thus it being apprehended, that if the Forfeitures were left to the Diſcretion of his Majeſty, few would be demanded, and fewer would be paid, a Clauſe was added in the Committee, and afterwards adopted by the Houſe; by which it was provided, That all the Money ariſing from the ſaid Forfeitures ſhould be paid into the Exchequer, and that a diſtinct Account ſhould be kept thereof. In vain the Whigs try'd all their Arts to evade the Preſſure of this rigid Clauſe. On a Diviſion of the Houſe it appear'd they were but 93 to 176. The Bill and Amendments were order'd to be engroſs'd; and there remain'd ſcarce a Probability either of diverting or withſtanding the Torrent.

In hope, however, that a Diverſion might be obtain'd, and with a View to muſter the whole Strength of their Party, they gave out, that ſeveral Perſons were confederating and deſigning to raiſe a Rebellion, and diſturb the Peace of the Kingdom; and that they would prove it by ſufficient Evidence at the Bar of the Houſe: Accordingly, on the Day appointed for the third Reading of the Bill, theſe Evidences made their Appearance; and did, indeed, give in ſuch (p) Informations as produc'd a Vote, That a Bill ſhould be brought in for the more effectual ſecuring their Majeſties Government againſt all ſuch Perſons and Practices: But when this was over, and a Motion was made to adjourn, it was not only over-rul'd, but the prevailing Party carry'd it, on the Queſtion, for reading the Bill the third time. All that now remain'd was, for the Minority to cover their Retreat as well as they could; and, in order thereto, they offer'd two engroſſed Clauſes, A. D. 1690. providing, That no Perſons ſhould be liable to the Penalties to be inflicted, in caſe they took the Qualification-Oaths, or the Oaths appointed in lieu of the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, by a certain Time: But both were rejected; as was alſo a third, for involving the Judges and Barons, who concurred in the Judgment given in Hale's Caſe, or who at any time declar'd for the Diſpenſing-Power; nor was it without ſome Difficulty that a Rider was at laſt admitted for excuſing thoſe who had accepted any Office between October 8, and February 13, 1688, that is to ſay, during the Inter-regnum; for, the Houſe dividing, it appear'd, that the Noes were 150, and the Yeas but ten more; and laſtly, the Queſtion being put, that the Bill do paſs, it was carry'd in the Affirmative, by 137 Voices againſt 91.

Hitherto the Act of Grace, promis'd in the King's Speech, had not been heard of, and probably this invidious Bill had been thus warmly puſh'd in order to quicken the other. It was the 15th of May when the former was paſs'd; on the 20th the King came to the Houſe, and gave the Royal Aſſent to the Act for the Exerciſe of the Government by her Majeſty, during (q) the King's Abſence; the Act for reverſing the Judgment on the Quo Warranto againſt the City of London, &c; and, on the 22d, the Lords ſent down the following Meſſage, to the Commons, by Mr. Juſtice Eyre, and Mr. Baron Turton, viz. "Mr. Speaker, his Majeſty has been pleas'd to ſend this Bill, intituled, An Act for the King and Queen's moſt gracious, general, and free Pardon, which the Lords have paſs'd and accepted, nemine contradicente, and now ſend it down to this Houſe." And now all the Roar of Oppoſition ſeem'd to be at an End; the Bill was immediately carry'd thro' all the Forms of the Houſe, and paſs'd without any one Diviſion, Amendment, or Attempt to interrupt its Courſe, tho' they had the faireſt Opportunity before them imaginable: It had never been uſual for either Houſe, in their Intercourſe with the other, to intimate by what Number any Bill had paſs'd; and conſequently the Words Nemine Contradicente in their Lordſhips Meſſage might have been repreſented, as an Attempt to over-awe the Opinion and treſpaſs on the Privileges of the Houſe. But no body choſe to hit this Blot, till after the Bill had been return'd to the Lords: And then a Committee was appointed to ſearch Precedents, and draw up Reaſons to be offer'd at a Conference, by way of Proteſt againſt that Innovation, and in bar of its being made an Example. But in the very Bills paſs'd.

An Act of Grace.

(p) "Many Diſcoveries were made of the Practices from St. Germains and Ireland. But few were taken up upon them: And thoſe were too inconſiderable to know more than, that many were provided with Arms and Ammunition, and that a Method was projected for bringing Men together upon a Call. And, indeed, Things ſeem'd to be in a very ill Diſpoſition towards a fatal Turn." [Burnet, vol. ii. p. 46.

(q) The Purport of this Act was, That whereas, by the Act of Settlement, the perfect and full Exerciſe of the Regal Power was veſted only in the King, tho' it was to be exerciſe'd in the Names of both King and Queen [illegible] as his Majeſty had reſolv'd to make a Royal [illegible] and had declar'd his Pleaſure to have the Adminiſtration in the Hands of the Queen; it was enacted, That whenever, [illegible] as his Majeſty ſhould be abſent, it ſhould be lawful for the Queen to adminiſter the Government; provided nevertheleſs, that the King's Orders, during his Abſence, ſhould be as good and effectual, as if his Majeſty was within the Realm: and that, on his Return, the whole Adminiſtration ſhould return to, and remain in, his Hands, as before.

A. D. 1690. next Day, before the intended Conference could be held, his Majesty came again to the House, and having given the Royal Assent to his own (r) Act of Grace, put an End to the Session, with the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have such Assurance of your good Affections to me, that I come now to thank you, particularly for the Supply you have given me. The Season of the Year is so far advanc'd, that I can no longer delay my going into Ireland; and therefore I think it necessary to have an Adjournment of the Parliament.

Altho' it shall be but a short Day, yet, unless some great Occasion require it (of which you shall have due Notice) I do not intend you shall sit to do Business until the Winter; and, I hope, by the Blessing of God, we shall then have a happy Meeting.

In the mean time, I recommend to you the Discharge of your Duties in your respective Counties, That the Peace of the Nation may be secur'd by your Vigilance and Care in your respective Stations."

It ought not to be forgot, that there were two Bills still depending before the Commons; namely, That, beforementioned, for securing the Government against Rebellions and Conspiracies; which seem'd to be of Importance to the Crown; and a Bill for appointing Commissioners to take the Account of all public Monies, &c. which seem'd to be of almost equal Importance to the People: And that as to the Act of Grace, it was equally (s) complain'd of by the Whigs and the Jacobites; and with equal Bitterness; tho' upon different Principles, and for the sake of different Conclusions. A. D. 1690.

Before we accompany the King in his Royal Expedition, it will be necessary, by way of Preparation, to take a general Survey of the State of Europe at the Opening of the Year; and more especially of his Majesty's Affairs in Scotland and Ireland.

The first Object of his Imperial Majesty's Attention, was to procure his Son, the Arch-Duke Joseph, to be elected King of the Romans. It was this which had drawn the Imperial Court to Augsburgh in the Close of the last Year; when it was presum'd, from the general Harmony which had reign'd among the Princes of Germany, that all the Electors would have assisted at that Solemnity in Person: But the Protestant Electors of Brandenburgh and Saxony had their Scruples it seems; and could no further be prevail'd upon, than to send thither their Plenipotentiaries to represent them. The Election was, however, made, with one Voice, on the 24th of January, N. S. with this favourable Circumstance, That the Electors granted a Dispensation

The Arch-duke Joseph elected King of the Romans.

(r) Out of which were excepted by Name, William Marquis of Powis, Theophilus Earl of Huntington, Nathaniel Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of St. Davids, Robert Earl of Sunderland, Lord Thomas Howard, Henry Lord Dover, John Earl of Melfort, Roger Earl of Castlemain, Sir Edward Hales, Thomas Tilesley, Esq; Rowland Tempest, Esq; Colonel Robert Lundy, Mr. William Mallerton, Sir Edward Herbert, Sir Francis Wythins, Sir Edmund Lutwyche, Sir Thomas Tanner, Sir Roger Lestrange, Sir Richard Hastlerigg, Sir Richard Heath, Collonel Trevanion, Sir Nicholas Butler, Edward Morgan, Esq; Robert Rowe, Esq; Mr. Richard Graham, Mr. Philip Burton, Mr. Obadiah Walker, Edward Petre, Jesuit, Matthew Crane, and George Lord Jeffries, deceas'd.

The Marquis de Fresnierre, in his Memoirs, says, that Father Petre was hang'd for the Mischiefs he had committed, but does not say where, nor by whose Command: It is certain he made his Escape from hence; and it is very unlikely that he should be executed elsewhere.

(s) As is most remarkably illustrated in the two following Passages.

Says Lord Warrington, for the Whigs, "May I not reckon among these Treacheries, the Advices and Solicitations to our King to send a general Bill of Grace and free Pardon, and without regard to exemplary Justice, for these Treasons and Murders, and other high Crimes, committed before his coming hither?

I am sure the same Sort of Men, that solicited against the Security of the Government were those that flatter'd his Majesty by that Act of Grace to provide for their Security, if it should fail; they not only deceiv'd the King of the great Forfeitures and Fines that ought in Justice to have borne some Part of the Charge of his Expedition hither; but have set all their Party at least upon even Ground with the most innocent Subjects for their Country, to be preferr'd to all Sorts of Magistracies and Authorities, and sav'd them from making Reparations to Multitudes, whom they had oppress'd, under Colour of Authority, in the two last Reigns.

I have heard some of them laugh at the Desire put upon the King by the Act of Grace, and the formal Exception of a few Persons, that were not the greatest Criminals. They know that those Exceptions could be of no Effect for exemplary Justice and Security, as the Convention intended.

Neither Crimes committed in those late Reigns, both in the Councils and Courts of Justice, were Treasons at the Common Law, and triable in Parliament only, (being of a more pernicious Nature than those specify'd in the Statutes) and these Offenders with their Adherents of lesser Guilt, should have been reserv'd for their Trials in Parliament, and Penalties to have been set by them, and exempted from the Power of the King to pardon, as in such Cases has been usual.

But the Exception made of a few, such as they are, without naming or distinguishing their Crimes, without enacting any Course for their Prosecution, and without Exemption from common Pardons at Pleasure, could amount to no more than to make the People hope in vain for some Vindication of public Justice.

Time has shew'd the Craft of this Contrivance by the Indemnity of all the Persons excepted, that are not since in Rebellion against our King. No Process has issued against any of them, not a Penny of their Estates, nor one Hair of their Heads hath been touch'd; and several of them have ever since sit in the House of Lords, as our Legislators." [Impartial Enquiry, p. 15.

Say the Jacobites, "It is a Maxim in our Law, That the King can do no Wrong; the Meaning whereof is not, that nothing can be done amiss that he does, in point of Government; but that whatever there is amiss in it is not to be imputed to him, but to those by whose Advice and Ministry he acts; and consequently, that not he, but they are punishable for them. But in this Pretence concerning King James, the Case is quite inverted; for here the King himself is charg'd with all the Faults of Government; and not only charg'd with them, but punish'd for them; whereas they that were his Counsellors and Ministers, who were much more to blame than he, inasmuch as they not only persuaded him, that his Royal Prerogative would very warrantably and safely bear him out in all the arbitrary Courses he took, but also push'd him forward to them even contrary to his Inclinations, maliciously suggesting, that the hard Usage that some of his Subjects met with (to which in some Cases he consented with great Reluctancy) was no more than what was necessary for the asserting and vindicating of his Authority, and the chastising of their Stubbornness and Undutifulness: These Men, I say, at least some of them, were not only suffer'd to escape Punishment, but were highly preferr'd and rewarded, even by your good King William; than which I challenge any Man to give an Instance either of greater Iniquity or deeper Hypocrisy. To punish that openly in one as a grievous Crime, which is secretly approv'd of and rewarded in another as a very acceptable Service. To cry out against Grievances, to pretend a most tender Compassion for those that suffer them, and a mighty Zeal for having them redress'd, when yet it appears, that those very Grievances are chiefly owing to the pernicious Counsels and mischievous Contrivances of such Persons, to for that very Purpose have been employed by Such as prevailed, to such a Measure piece of Hypocrisy and Dissimulation as, I think, none but a Dutchman is capable of." [Apology for the Times, p. 29.

A. D. 1690. Dispensation of two Years of Age to the young King (who was then but in his 12th) by which he was authoris'd to act as Emperor at fixteen (in case of his Father's Death) tho' the Constitution of the Empire requir'd, that he should be eighteen. On the 26th, he was crown'd with all imaginable Magnificence; and in a few Days afterwards, the whole Imperial Court set out on their Return to Vienna; having first receiv'd the melancholy News, that a large Body of Hanover and Holstein Horse and Dragoons, with about two hundred Foot, who had been detach'd by the Duke of Holstein, to observe the Motions of the Turks and Tartars in the Neighbourhood of Kazenecke in Albania, had been totally routed by the Latter, with the Loss of two thousand two hundred Men either kill'd or taken; amongst whom was the Prince of Hanover, who was slain at the Head of the Regiment he commanded.

A Party of Imperialists defeated by the Turks in Albania.

But neither this ill Accident, nor the Prospect of a long and doubtful War on the other Side of Europe, excited any real Disposition in the Imperial Court towards an Accommodation with the Porte. The Turkish Envoys were still detain'd, but, instead of pressing their Negociation, as they had formerly done, kept themselves wholly on the Reserve. In order, therefore, to bring them to an Explanation of some kind or another, the following Propofals were made them in the Name of the Allies. 1. That the Kingdom of Hungary should be restor'd, with all its Dependencies, and the Principality of Bosnia, in such a Manner, that the Grand Signior should never more claim any Right therein. 2. That Moldavia, Walachia, and the Republic of Ragusa, which had put themselves under the Emperor's Protection, should be compriz'd in the Treaty of Peace, and not be disturb'd by the Turks in any manner whatsoever. 3. That all the Tartars should depart the Countries. 4. That the Port should pay 6,000,000 towards the Expences of the War, immediately after the Conclusion of the Peace, and 2,000,000 every Year for free Passage to Constantinople. 5. That all the Christians that had been taken during the War, which were above one Million, should be set at Liberty. Lastly, That Tekely and all his Adherents should be deliver'd up to the Emperor. The King of Poland demanded the Restitution of Caminiec, and 4,000,000 in Silver. And for the Venetians, they requir'd, 1. The Restitution of all the Islands that formerly belong'd to them, and particularly the Island of Negropont. 2. The Restitution of the Dukedom of Athens. 3. The Exchange of Lepanto for Ragusa. 4. The Restitution of Duleigno and Malvona. 5. A Regulation of the Limits of the conquer'd Cities and Countries. And, lastly, That the Grand Signior should pay to the Republic 400,000 Ducats.

The Turks tore their Beards as they read, and would not hear of a Treaty on such extravagant Terms; on the contrary, they requir'd in their Turn the Restitution of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Walachia, in the same Condition as they were in before the War: That the Emperor should exchange Belgrade and all the conquer'd Country beyond the Save, for Temeswar, Giula, and the other Places possess'd by them on the Tibiss. They also reserv'd great Waradin; and made no Mention of the Republics of Poland and Venice at all. Upon which, all Thoughts of Peace were given over: And it was resolv'd, on all hands, to carry on the War with as much Vigour as ever.

A. D. 1690. Negociations for a Peace between the Emperor and the Porte.

As to the Preparations for opening the Campaign, they were talk'd of in very high Terms; but, according to the German Custom, they proceeded very slowly. A new System of Action was to be form'd every Year, and every Party concern'd had his own Terms to adjust, before he could be prevail'd upon to co-operate in it. The Affair of Saxe-Lawenburgh, in particular, not only embarrass'd the Imperial Court, and the Diet of the Empire, but all the Powers of the Confederacy. All were solicitous to bring the Dispute to an Issue, but none could furnish an Expedient. It was propos'd to appoint the King of Sweden, as Duke of Bremen; the Elector of Brandenburgh, as Duke of Magdeburg; and the Princes of Lunenburgh to be Guardians of that Duchy, and to divide the chief Places amongst them, which they were to hold with an equal Number of Forces. But the Princes of Lunenburg, who were already in Possession of the whole, would not relinquish any Part of it; and the Elector of Saxony would hear of no Temperament whatsoever, till those Princes had relinquish'd the whole. But what most of all retarded the Operations of the War on the German Side, was the sudden Death of the gallant Duke of Lorrain (t) of a Quinsey, in the Beginning of April, at a Convent near Linze. The Elector of Bavaria had all along aspir'd to the chief Command of the Imperial Army, and not without Reluctance had submitted to the Preference which had been given to the Duke; and which, he suppos'd, was rather the Result of Favour and Policy, than of superior Merit and Service. It was the Interest of the Emperor to hold the Elector in Dependence on him, but not to make him too considerable; and, therefore, it was a Point of the utmost Delicacy, whether to gratify his Electoral Highness in his Pretensions, or to explore some such Expedient as should once more defeat them, without wholly disobliging him.

Death of the Duke of Lorrain.

But while these were the peculiar Embarassments of the Emperor and Empire, the Plenipotentiaries of all the several Powers assembled at the Hague, according to Agreement,

Congress at the Hague.

(t) He had just before set forth a Manifesto, in which he declar'd War against Tekely, in his own Right, as a Sovereign Prince, against the Porte, for the King's Injustice, in detaining his Territories from him; threaten'd to enter them in Person at the Head of forty thousand Men, as soon as the Summer came on, exhorted his Subjects to shake off the Yoke of Slavery; and laid his Commands on the Germans to join him, on pain of being degraded of their Nobility, and depriv'd of their Privileges.

A.D. 1690. ment, to adjust the general Plan of the Year. But tho' King William had assur'd his Parliament from the Throne, that these Conferences were to be open'd in November, they were not open'd till the sixteenth of March, N. S. Lord Dursly, who was then his Majesty's Minister to the States, appear'd in Public on this Occasion, as the Plenipotentiary of England: But whatever his Character was, it is not altogether clear, that his Powers were answerable to it; for, some time before the Lord Portland, his Majesty's Bosom-Favourite, had been sent over, as we are told, to pacify the Feuds which had broken out among the Magistrates of Amsterdam, upon what Occasion we do not find sufficiently explan'd, either by the Dutch Writers or our own; and while he remain'd in Holland, which was till the End of that Month, it is reasonable to suppose, that his Ascendancy there, in the Right of the Stadtholder his Master, was as great in all things as it was in England: It is certain, that he succeeded in his Commission at Amsterdam; that all Memorials of the Contest were raz'd out of the Registers of the States, by express Order; and that, during his Stay at Loo and the Hague, their High and Mighty Lordships came to all the necessary Resolutions, with regard to the Estimates of the Year, the Ways and Means of providing for them, and whatever had a Relation to the ensuing Campaign.

Of what past at the Congress we have no distinct Account: But 'tis natural to suppose, that the Points principally argu'd therein, were, the several Schemes of the several Powers for carrying on the War, the Quotas they were to furnish, the Time of taking the Field, the Places of Rendezvous, the Disposition of the several Armies; and, in general, the whole Oeconomy of the Year. It is also uncertain, whether the Misunderstandings among the German Princes, who had all their Representatives there, were at any time the Subject-matter of their Deliberations. Tho' the Protestant Electors had concurr'd in the Election of the King of the Romans, they were so much offended by the Proceedings in relation to the Duchy of Saxe-Lawenburgh, that it was long a Doubt, whether they would be prevail'd upon to act with the same Vigour in the common Cause, as they had shewn the Year before; and the Princes of the House of Lunenburgh, on the other hand, were too powerful to be disoblig'd: As therefore the Assistance of all was necessary, 'tis not improbable, that the Ways and Means of bringing about an Accommodation, or, at least, of suspending the Contest, were occasionally consider'd; and that, among These, the most Attention was paid to the Project of erecting a new Electorate, in favour of that House, which now, for the first time, began to be the general Talk of Europe; and which was contended for, on a Presumption, that the Protestant Interest in the Empire was weaken'd by the Defect of the Palatinate to the Catholic Princes of Newburgh.

The Northern French continue neuter. As to the Kings of Denmark and Sweden, they are to be consider'd as Neuters; or rather, Traders in the Business of War; for tho' the Latter, as Duke of Bremen, was oblig'd to furnish his Contingent, and the Former had supply'd King William with certain of his Troops, as before-mention'd, neither embark'd in the War as Principals, or seem'd in any Disposition to do so: On the contrary, they lent an Ear to the Offers of both Parties, and made Advances to each alternately, as they rose upon each other. Thus, when it was suppos'd that an Agreement was as good as made between the Crown of Sweden and the States, by which his Swedish Majesty, for a valuable Consideration, was to supply their Lordships with a Fleet of twelve Men of War, and eight thousand Land-men, that Prince, for a more valuable Consideration, struck up a Treaty of Commerce with France; which produc'd another between him and his Danish Majesty, (who was at the same time in Treaty with King William for an additional Corps of four thousand Men; and with the Emperor for another of six thousand): And, by this last, we are told, the two Crowns mutually engag'd to set forth an equal Number of Men of War; with Orders to act in concert, in convoying the Merchant-ships of both Nations, to and from France, and to protect and defend them against all that should attempt to oppose, or molest them in their Passage: As also, that public Notice of this Treaty was given in all the Ports of both Kingdoms, that the Subjects of each might take the Benefit thereof.

The Conduct of the Swiss-Cantons, towards the two Parties at War, was also pretty much the same with that of Sweden and Denmark: They were beset with the like Importunities, and came to a Resolution to observe the like Indifference: They suffer'd both the Confederates and the French to make Levies and recruit in their Dominions: But no Persuasions could induce them to take part on either Side: King William had his Resident among them, as well as the Imperialists and Spaniards, and none was more assiduous than he, in his Endeavours of all kinds, to bring the Cantons into the Measures of his Master: But they were deaf to the Voice of the Charmer, and persisted in their Resolution to maintain a Neutrality; which had this good Effect, that it render'd them respected on both Sides, and preserv'd them from the Resentment of either: The Confederates had indeed their Faction; but that of France appears to have been the stronger; and M. Amelot, the French Minister, lost no Opportunity of convincing his Antagonists, that he was as much a Master in the Arts of negociating as they.

Wherever France had an Interest to serve, Intrigues of the French Minister in Poland. she had Instruments to promote it: And as those Instruments were generally well chosen, their Undertakings were as generally successful. Thus it was owing to their Intrigues at the Porte, That the Turks were induc'd to rise so high in their Proposals to the Emperor, and to assert the Pretensions of Count Teckely as warmly as ever: And that the King of Poland had prosecuted his Share of the War against the common Enemy, in a Way

A. D. 1690. so little advantageous to the common Cause. But then it was at the last of these Courts, that they met with one of those few Mortifications which are to be met with in the Course of their Politics.

His Polish Majesty had discover'd a strong Inclination to have his Son Prince James succeed him in his Throne, and Mr. de Gravelle, the French Minister, had not only assur'd him of his Master's good Offices, but endeavour'd to convince him, that the Emperor was in a different Interest, and had already engag'd to favour the Election of his Favourite the Duke of Lorrain. The Artifice took; the King believ'd; and for a while follow'd implicitly the Directions of his new Guide: Unluckily the Court of Vienna found out the Clue to this Labyrinth, and immediately offer'd to lead his Polish Majesty a nearer Way: They propos'd a Marriage between Prince James and the Princess Palatine of Newburgh, who was Sister to the Empress, the Queen of Portugal, and the new Queen of Spain, with the joint Interest of the whole Alliance for her Dowry: His Polish Majesty was all Ear, and, upon so desirable a Condition gave his Consent to all that was demanded of him. While the Turks were at once beset with the Imperialists, the Venetians, and the Poles, the Muscovites, at the Instance of the Latter, had also broke with them, and, during the last Summer, had done them considerable Mischief: In conformity, therefore, to the mutual Obligations that subsisted between the Grand Signior and his most Christian Majesty, Mr. de Gravelle made it his Business first to prompt the King of Poland to strike up a separate Peace, and when a Negociation was actually open'd to that End, he apprix'd the Czar of all that was doing at Warsaw, with an Insinuation, that he would do well to get the Start of his Ally, that he might have the better Terms for himself: About the time that the Marriage abovemention'd was propos'd, this under-hand Correspondence was detected, and the Fact made evident under Mr. de Gravelle's own Hand; and if this Discovery did not occasion, it serv'd to excuse, the sudden Alteration which appear'd in the Conduct of his Polish Majesty: For the Treaty with the Turks was immediately broke off; an Express was sent to the Czar, with fresh Assurances, that the King and Republic would punctually fulfil all their Engagements; and the Dyet was assembled, in order to give their Sanction to such Measures, as should most contribute to a vigorous Prosecution of the War.

Mr. de Gravelle was now on the Verge of Despair; for, unless he could find Means to defeat the intended Alliance, and break up the Dyet in Confusion, he foresaw the End of his Commission was at hand: To compass both these Points, he, therefore, address'd himself with all the Dexterity he was Master of, but not with the Success he desir'd: For tho', in consequence of his Cabals, Sabres were several times drawn in the Dyet, and once such a Quarrel arose between the Poles and Lithuanians that several were wounded on both Sides, the King always found Means to compose Matters, and at length to bring the Session to a happy Conclusion: And what was still worse for his Excellency, it was yet farther discover'd, that he was the Author of all this Confusion, that he had endeavour'd to create a Division in the Royal Family; and that he had not only labour'd to dissolve the Diet, but to stir up the Poles to a Revolt: All this was expressly laid to his Charge, and he was withal order'd to depart the Kingdom; which he thought proper to obey with the utmost Privacy, after having endeavour'd, tho' in vain, to pacify the King by a Letter, in which he acknowledg'd, That he had endeavour'd to dissuade Prince James from intermarrying with the House of Newburgh, and that he had perhaps spoken with too much Freedom of those who had promoted that Measure, seeing the Queen was at the Head of them.

Poland was too far off to feel the immediate Vengeance of France, for having dealt thus freely with her Embassador: But Savoy, which had the Misfortune to be too near a Neighbour to her, had no sooner shewn a Disposition to assert her own Independency, than she was made to feel the whole Weight of her Indignation.

Italy till now had been free from the Contentions and Calamities which rag'd on this Side of the Alps, and possibly might have so continued, if the Allies themselves had not made it a Part of their Plan, to form a Diversion on that Side, in order to render their Work so much the easier on the other: The Count de Fuensalida, who was Governor-General for the Spaniards in those Parts, had not only enter'd very willingly into this Design, but had very confidently undertaken for the Success of it: In this Presumption, he made all imaginable Preparations for an early and vigorous Campaign; but without any sort of Reserve, as if the Enemy could reap no Benefit from their Knowledge, or could make no Disposition to withstand him.

France, on the other hand, kept a watchful Eye on all his Motions; and resolv'd to be ready with a Fence against the Storm, whenever it should fall. But the Conduct of the Court of Turin was what they first and principally regarded: Ever since the Duke of Savoy's Adventures at the Carnival of Venice, in the Year 1687, they had entertain'd a Jealousy, that his Royal Highness had enter'd into some Engagements with the Emperor, and, according to (a) some Accounts,

They grow jealous of the Duke of Savoy.

(a) In the Year 1688, and a short time after the League of Ausburgh, the Marquis de [illegible] was sent to Turin the Count of B——, to negociate something there to sift the German Ministers, sent to his Royal Highness so well, that the Duke was after, who during [illegible] to the Emperor's Envoy in Presence obliged to give Audience to the Emperor's Envoy in Presence of the French Agent, who obstinately insisted upon his Right to be there; and in this Interview, intended for the treating of Affairs of the highest Importance, was spent only in Ceremonies and Compliments.

But afterwards, the Count having dispatch'd himself in the Habit of one of his Pages, by a local Pair of Stairs got into the Duke's Chamber; where all he could do, was only to present him with a seal'd Writing, containing only some

A. D. 1690. Accounts, not without ſufficient Grounds. But, however this may be, during theſe Armings of the Spaniards, he affected to avoid every Circumſtance that could poſſibly give any juſt Cauſe of Umbrage to France: He gave out Orders, indeed, for the raiſing of twelve thouſand Men; but then it was under a Proteſtation of obſerving an exact Neutrality; and he forbade all foreign Levies in his Dominions, on pain of Death.

But France was not to be ſatisfy'd with Appearance and Outſide only, and reſolv'd not only to have it in her Power to come at the Bottom of his Deſigns, but even to force him, if poſſible, to embark in hers. The Vaudois, a miſerable People of the Reformed Religion, whom the Duke, at the Inſtance of France, had expell'd from their Receſſes among the Mountains, which ſhelter'd them from the Rage of the French, were not only permitted to harbour there again, but even to make Inroads on their Perſecutors, by the Aſſiſtance of the Spaniards, who furniſh'd them from Milan with Arms and Ammunition for that End. This was thought a criminal Connivance in his Royal Highneſs; and what was ſtill more ſuſpicious, there had paſs'd of late certain extraordinary Endearments between him and the Emperor: His Imperial Majeſty had admitted the Duke's Claime to the Kingdom of Cyprus, allow'd him to uſe the Style of Royal Highneſs, conſented to receive his Embaſſador with the ſame Honours ſhewn to thoſe of Crowned-Heads; and, for the Conſideration of one hundred and twenty thouſand Piſtoles, moreover, granted him the Inveſtiture of all the Fiefs which he held of the Empire, and which he had long ſollicited in vain. On all theſe Accounts, Mr. de Rebenac was diſpatch'd to Turin, to demand an immediate Explanation, and met with ſuch a Reception as, at any other Time, or to any other Court, would have been held the moſt ſatisfactory that could have been expected or deſir'd: For the Duke made no ſcruple to declare, That he had no Deſign to forfeit the Friendſhip of France, or commit the leaſt Infraction in the Treaties ſubſiſting between that Crown and him. But though fair Speeches are made current Coin in the Payments of France, they never receive them as ſuch: And in proportion to the Opinion which that Court had of the Duke's Underſtanding, A. D. 1690. they ſuſpected his Integrity. Upon the Heels, therefore, of Mr. de Rebenac, Mr. de Catinat was diſpatch'd to his Royal Highneſs, with a Commiſſion of a rougher Tendency: He was appointed Commander in chief of the French Forces deſtin'd to act in Italy, amounting to about ſixteen thouſand, and had march'd at their Head, with a ſeeming Intention to fall into the Milaneſe; but alter'd his Route, all at once, and, having left his Army on the Borders of Piedmont, accompany'd by a few Officers only, made his Appearance at the Court of Turin; where he gave his Royal Highneſs immediately to underſtand, That the King his Maſter was ſo little pleas'd with his Conduct, and had ſo little Dependance on his Promiſes, that he reſolv'd to have Security for his good Behaviour; and ſuch Security as ſhould put it out of his own Power to be unfaithful: And firſt, by way of Preliminary, he demanded two thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe, to paſs immediately into the French Service; becauſe the Duke had already furniſh'd the Emperor with the ſame Number; and, becauſe till this was done, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty could not be brought to believe, that there was any ſuch thing as a Neutrality ſubſiſting between them. He then demanded, that Verue, one of the ſtrongeſt Places in Piedmont, and the Citadel of Turin, might be put into his Hands, together with Verceil for a Place of Arms: And concluded, with aſſuring his Royal Highneſs, that theſe were the only Conditions upon which he was to expect to be reſtor'd to the Friendſhip and Confidence of the King his Maſter; and that his Majeſty would not hear of any Abatement. and demand Security for his good Behaviour.

The Duke, who was in the Prime of his Youth, could not liſten to ſuch Language as this, without Indignation: But ſo much was he Maſter of himſelf, that none appear'd; and he only ſeem'd ſollicitous to find out ſome middle Way, by which he might recover the good Graces of the moſt Chriſtian King, without laying himſelf wholly at his Mercy: With this View, and ſeemingly with this View only, he procur'd the Pope's Nuncio to interpoſe with his good Offices, to ſoften Mr. Catinat, and facilitate an Accommodation: He alſo apply'd to the Duke of ſome general Propoſitions, and to get a Promiſe from the Duke to be at Venice, in the Carnival-time, under preſence of Diverſement: but indeed to treat more amply with the Duke of Bavaria, and ſome other Princes that were to meet him there.

Soon after, the Duke made public the Deſign of his Journey, at what time the Miniſter of France, who ſuſpected ſomething more than ordinary, uſed all the Arguments he could to prevent his going; but ſeeing he could not prevail, he reſolv'd to accompany him, which his Royal Highneſs could not refuſe, for fear of augmenting his Suſpicion. The Princes, being come to Venice, never met in public, under pretence they could not agree about giving and taking place; but they treated privately together, by means of a cunning Monk; and at that time there was an Alliance concluded upon, between the Emperor, the Duke of Savoy and Bavaria, and ſome other Princes, conformable to the Treaty of Ausburgh. After the Treaty was concluded, the Duke of Savoy return'd home (together with the French Miniſter, who never left him) well ſatisfy'd that he could do it privately at Venice, which he could not do at Turin. But this Satisfaction was not of long Continuance; for, upon the very Road, the French Miniſter upbraided him with treating with his Maſter's Enemies, which the Duke ſtoutly deny'd, till the Envoy pull'd the Copy of the Treaty out of his Pocket, and preſented it to his Royal Highneſs, who was then forc'd to acknowledge it.

I make no queſtion but that the Curioſity of the Reader is ſuch, that he would fain know, how the Embaſſador found, by his Spies, that the Monk already mention'd frequently went from one Prince to another, and ſuſpecting the Truth he got him to be ſounded, and found that he was not Proof againſt a conſiderable Preſent; nor did he offer the Monk leſs than 200,000 Livres, which were preſently paid down, upon the Delivery of a Copy of the Treaty.

Thus far my Memoirs extend. [State of Europe, for Auguſt, 1690.

A. D. 1690. of Orleans, his Father-in-law, to intercede for him with the King his Brother; and he even went so far, as to write to his Majesty with his own Hand, in the most submissive Terms, intimating, That the Troops his Majesty had demanded were at his Devotion; and that he was even ready to give the utmost Proof of his Resignation to his Majesty's Pleasure, by a surrender of the Places in question: Only he besought his Majesty, with all Humility, first to consider, what a Prince, who had the Honour to be so nearly related to him, had to hope from the Goodness and Generosity of so great a King; and whether, on cooler Thoughts, he might not be prevail'd upon to accept of some other Place in Piedmont, instead of the Citadel of Turin, that he might be left with the Dignity of a Sovereign in his own Capital; in which case, he should acknowledge himself everlastingly oblig'd. But all was without Effect. The King's Answer was as haughty and imperious, as the Duke's Letter was submissive and humble. His Majesty has thought fit (so the Dictate ran) to send a Power to the Sieur de Catinat, to take possession in his Name of the Citadel of Turin and Verue; with this only Qualification, "That it was not without a sensible Regret that his Majesty found himself oblig'd to send his Troops into the Territories of his Royal Highness; and that when he should no longer have any Room to doubt of his Royal Highness's Zeal for his Interests, he would restore his Friendship to him with as much Joy." The Duke, as it is easy to imagine, was more shock'd than ever, to find the Law thus given to him in his own Capital. He remonstrated, That in case he should comply with his Majesty's Commands, he saw no Prospect open'd to him, of his being reinstated in his good Graces, nor any Hope of having his Towns restor'd to him: And if, continu'd he, in the Fulness of his Heart, his Majesty has not wanted an unjust Pretence to get possession of them, will he ever want one to maintain it? Politicians have no Pity; and the Perplexities of the Duke serv'd only to heighten the Joy of Catinat: In vain, the Marquises of Ferrara and St. Thomas sollicited him on the Behalf of the Duke, to soften the Rigour of his Demands: In vain even the Chancellor of Savoy propos'd, by way of Medium, That the Citadel should be put into the Hands of the Pope, or the Switzers, on condition, that the King would maintain the Garrison, and under an Engagement, that, in case his Royal Highness took any one Step in opposition to the Interest of France, his Majesty's Troops should be admitted in their Room: He look'd upon all this as Matter of Amusement only, and would hear of nothing but an exact Conformity to the very Letter of his Orders.

The Duke has recourse to the Confederates.

It must, indeed, be acknowledg'd, that the Duke, not caring to depend wholly on the Mercy of France, had all this while been taking such Measures as should preserve him from standing in need of it: He had sent Expresses to the Emperor, the King of Spain, the King of England, the Pope, the Republics of Venice and Genoa, the Dukes of Tuscany and Parma, and, in general, all the Princes of Italy, except the Duke of Mantua, who had already enter'd into the Service of France, setting forth the State of his Case, and aggravating the Necessity of his submitting to a Power so superior to his own, that they might be so much the more eager to take part in his Deliverance, and contribute so much the more largely towards it. Nor was it more his Interest to be succour'd, than theirs to succour him: The Power of France was as much dreaded on that Side of the Alps as on this: And the Italian States were as much concern'd to keep out the Invader, as the Confederates to find him new Employment in Provence and Dauphiny: All, therefore, understood the Case of his Royal Highness to be their own, and espous'd it accordingly: Some engag'd to aid him with Men, some with Money (among whom were the Maritime Powers); and that he might even find his Account in Honour, as well as Interest, the whole Confederacy agreed to constitute him Captain-General of all their Forces in Italy.

Goes into Treaties with the Emperor and Spain.

But the Basis of his whole Procedure were the Treaties which his Royal Highness enter'd into with the Emperor and King of Spain; the Substance of which was, That none of the contracting Parties should negociate a separate Peace with the most Christian King, nor accept of any Peace, till the Places held by the French in the Milanese were recover'd out of their Hands, and restor'd to their right Owners: That whatever Acquisitions were made should be divided between Spain and the Duke: That the Emperor and the Confederates should, in particular, endeavour to procure the Recovery of Pignerol and Casal, either by Arms or Treaty; and, in case they should be either Way recover'd, the Latter should belong to his Catholic Majesty, and the Former revert to his Royal Highness: That his Imperial Majesty should renounce all his Pretensions to Montferrat, and should furnish the Duke with eight thousand of his choicest Troops, to continue in his Imperial Majesty's Pay, without any Claim of Winter-Quarters in Piedmont: That the Count de Fuensalida should march immediately to the Duke's Relief, with his whole Army of eight thousand Horse, between eight and nine thousand Foot, and twelve Pieces of Cannon; the whole Expence of which was to be defray'd by his Catholic Majesty: And that his Royal Highness should be comprehended in the Alliances with his Imperial Majesty, his Catholic Majesty, his Britannic Majesty, the States-General, and all their other Allies without Exception.

Having thus taken his Measures, he call'd his whole Council together, and, after enlarging on the haughty Treatment he had received from the most Christian King, and the unavoidable Necessity he lay under of declaring himself an Enemy, or becoming a Vassal, of France, signify'd, That he had made his Choice; and that he was resolv'd to maintain his Dignity and Independency, at the Expence of every other Consideration: His

A. D. 1690. His Miniſters were all of the ſame Mind; and, upon the Reſult, Orders were ſent to Mr. Catinat to quit the Dominions of his Royal Highneſs, with all his Forces, on pain of being treated as an Enemy: Mr. de Rebenac, and ſeveral French Gentlemen, were put under Arreſt, by way of Hoſtage for the Miniſters and other Subjects of Savoy, at that time reſiding in France. The whole Country was put in Arms, and authoriſ'd to oppoſe the Attempts of the French: An Act of Oblivion was ſet forth in favour of the poor Vaudois; ſuch as were abroad were invited home; ſuch as were already in Arms were encourag'd to graft the Quarrel of their Country upon their own; and ſuch as were in Priſon at Turin, whether Eccleſiaſtics or Seculars, were not only ſet free, but brought into the Duke's Preſence, who condeſcended to make a ſort of Apology to them for the Perſecution they had undergone, by placing it all to the Account of France, and the Neceſſity he was then under, of doing whatever his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty requir'd of him.

and declares againſt France.

A. D. 1690.

And now the Conduct of France took a different Turn, by which it became plain, that, how determin'd ſoever ſhe had appear'd to drive the Duke into the Toils, ſhe never expected that he would dare to make head againſt her, nor deſir'd to have him encreaſe the Number of her Enemies: For Mr. Catinat, on this ſudden Change in the Duke's Behaviour, diſpatch'd an Officer to let him know, That ſuch was the Goodneſs and Condeſcenſion of his Royal Maſter, that, to prevent the Calamities that a Rupture would inevitably bring upon his Royal Highneſs's Dominions, he was willing to accept the Offers which he had already made: The Duke anſwer'd drily, He did not remember the Offers which he had already made. The Envoy thought proper to recapitulate them, and his Highneſs reply'd, "The Time is paſt: Mr. Catinat has oblig'd me to take other Meaſures, from which I neither can nor will recede."

Conduct of the Pope at this Criſis.

Still the Diſpute between the Courts of Rome and Paris hung in ſuſpence: His Holineſs, not ſatisfy'd with the Abolition of the Franchiſes, would not hear of an Accommodation, unleſs the King would conſent, that the Clergy of France ſhould make a formal Acknowledgment of the Infallibility of the Chair, and as formally renounce the Propoſitions of the Aſſembly in 1682: In which caſe, he alledg'd, That his Majeſty ſhould enjoy the Regale as heretofore. His Majeſty, on the other hand, could not be prevail'd upon to do Violence to his Clergy which was requir'd of him, nor was indeed inclin'd that any ſuch Submiſſion ſhould be made. All this while, however, his Emiſſaries affected to be in ſearch of Expedients to bring Matters to an Iſſue: And as often as he had any Point to carry at Rome, or was incumber'd with any new Difficulty, he ſeem'd to be in a relenting Vein, and to be ready to make up with his Holineſs upon any Terms: But no ſooner was that Difficulty remov'd, or that Point obtain'd, than he kept the ſame Diſtance as before. But even the Pontiff himſelf had alſo his Managements: for after having diſmiſs'd the Cardinal of Furſtenburgh, and his Pretenſions, to gratify the Houſe of Auſtria, he took the Canons of Cologne, who had been ejected for adhering to the French Intereſt, under his Protection, and ſtickled warmly for their Reſtitution; and yet, in the End, not only dropt both them and their Complaints, but, when they importun'd him for ſuch Dignities in the Church, as ſhould be equivalent to thoſe they had loſt, reſerv'd them to the moſt Chriſtian King, in whoſe Service they had ſuffer'd, and who was ſufficiently able to make them amends. When alſo the Duke of Chaulnes would have indirectly diſſuaded him from renewing the Grants which the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy ſeverally enjoy'd, theo' the Favour of Innocent XI, of levying the Tenths of all the eccleſiaſtic Revenues in their Dominions, under the Pretence that the Latter, had forfeited all Title to ſuch a Favour, by the Countenance he had ſhewn to the Heretic-Vaudois; and the Former, by miſapplying a Fund which had been given him in ſupport of his War againſt the Infidels, to the Deſtruction of Catholic-Frenchmen, his Holineſs turn'd a deaf Ear, and continued to both of them the ſame Powers which they had deriv'd from his Predeceſſor. On the other hand, his Holineſs, as a Venetian, was for extinguiſhing the War on that Side of the Alps, that the Emperor might be at leiſure to co-operate with the Republic againſt the Turks with all his Forces: And this was really the great Scope of all his Endeavours: For this he endeavour'd, with all his Might, to patch up the Breach between France and Savoy, and continually teaz'd all the Catholic Princes of the Confederacy, with Plans of an Accommodation, and with Offers of acting himſelf as Mediator-General.

It is remarkable, that, in almoſt all theſe ſeveral Scenes, France is the foremoſt Figure on the Stage, and plays the moſt conſiderable Part; and that, wherever elſe we turn our Eyes, we ſhall find her doing the ſame, with equal Spirit and equal Succeſs. Thus, at the ſame Inſtant that the Count de Frainſalida, by Order of the Spaniſh Court, was intriguing at Turin to open a Way into Provence, that of France not only undertook to hold the Duke of Savoy in Check, but gave an Alarm to Spain itſelf, by ſtirring up a Revolt in Catalonia; and while, in every State, Kingdom, and Province of the Continent, they had ſo many Engines at work, and ſo many important Affairs depending, they did not forget, that one of the greateſt of all their Concerns was, to feed the Diſtractions of theſe Iſlands, nor omit to make their Efforts accordingly. Of their abdicated Friend and Confederate in Ireland, they thought it behov'd them to take particular Care. King William had given public Notice to all Europe, that he intended to command there himſelf; which imply'd, that the Service would be hot, and the Campaign deciſive. In order, therefore, to enable King James to ſtand his ground, againſt the formidable Power that they were ſure would appear againſt him, in the very Opening

A. D. 1690. ing of the Year, they made extraordinary Preparations at Brest, for sending him a very considerable Supply of Money, Ammunition, and Troops, to Ireland, under the Convoy of a formidable Fleet; and of these Preparations Advice was brought to England, by a Vessel from St. Malo with English Seamen, who had been exchang'd, so early as March the 2d; and that Advice was even acknowledg'd in the London-Gazette. Notwithstanding which, either so weak or so negligent was our Government, that they took no Precautions to defeat this Purpose of France; but left the Seas in a manner open to them. Bishop Burnet, who acknowledges, that our naval Affairs were now the chief thing to be minded, endeavours to account for this Neglect, by saying, That an unhappy Compliment to the Queen of Spain had like to have prov'd fatal to us. The Truth is, that his Catholic Majesty, having espous'd a Princess of the House of Neuburg, to avoid applying to the most Christian King for the Favour of a safe Conduct thro' his Dominions, chose to commit his Bride to the Mercy of the Winds and Waves, in the most stormy Season of the Year, and accepted of a British Squadron to convoy her, from Holland to the first Port they could reach in Spain. But this Squadron consisted, at first, but of seven Men of War and two Yachts; and though two complete Months were wasted in its Passage to and from Flushing, where her Majesty embark'd, that is to say, from the 24th of November to the 24th of January, when it came to Anchor at St. Helens, the Detachment of so small a Part of the Fleet did not hinder the Equipment of the rest, and there was still Time enough to put the whole Navy of England in sailing Order: It appears, however, that neither the Possibility, nor apparent Necessity, of doing so, in order to assert the Dominion of the Seas, against the known Designs of France, was properly regarded: For Admiral Russel, who had the Command in this Expedition of Ceremony, when he set sail the (w) last time for the Coast of Spain, which was on the 7th of March, had no more than thirty Men of War under his Command: And these, together with a small Squadron of six more, which were cruizing in St. George's Channel, under the Command of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, made up the chief, if not the whole, Strength which our Government had then at Sea, to answer the several Purposes, of cutting off the Communication between France and Ireland, of convoying the Queen of Spain, of protecting four or five hundred Merchant-Ships, and of blocking up the Toulon-Squadron: For Admiral Killigrew, with a Part of the Fleet, had Orders to proceed on to the Mediterranean, on that Service, as soon as her Catholic Majesty should be landed, while Russel return'd home with the rest.

[Num. 2537.] without any Interruption from England.

What was yet further remarkable, the French set sail from Brest with the Succours for Ireland, almost at the same time that Russel left England; and, in shaping their several Courses, the two Fleets were once within twenty Leagues of each other: For no mention is made of any Instructions given to our Admirals, in relation thereto: Nor was the Nature of their Commission (which was, in the first place, to provide for the Security of their Royal Charge) consistent with such an Adventure. The French were besides superior to them in Strength, having thirty-six Men of War, five Fireships, and upwards of five thousand Land-forces on board; and our Court had been fatally misled into an Opinion, that the Enemy could not provide Seamen enough to put such a Fleet to Sea.

A. D.

After the two Fleets had thus narrowly miss'd each other, that of England arriv'd at the Groyne; where having landed the Royal Bride, Killigrew proceeded on for Toulon, with his Division; and Russel, with only five English Ships and two Dutch, return'd to England; where he arriv'd on the 25th of April following.

The French, in the mean time, held on their Course to Ireland, and happily for Shovel, without meeting with him in their Passage. On the 11th, 12th, and 13th, they debark'd their Forces, Ammunition, &c. at Kingsale, Cork, and the Shores adjacent. On the 7th or 8th of the next Month they set sail on their Return for France, (having on board as many of the Irish Forces, for the Service of France, as they had brought of the French, for the Service of King James) and arriv'd at Brest on the 23d: So that by a Comparison of Dates, it yet further appears, that as Shovel might have fallen a Sacrifice to them, in their Way to Ireland, Russel was almost within reach of the same Fate, at their Return.

All this while, it is true, Preparations were making in all the Royal Docks and Yards, for setting forth such a Fleet, as, in conjunction with the Dutch, was thought sufficient not only to face, but chastise, the French; who had made no scruple to declare, That they would this Summer give the Law to Both. But these Preparations were made in almost as dilatory a Manner, as if they had no such formidable Enemy to deal with. The Dutch did not care to leave their own Ports, till they were assur'd that our Fleet was ready to join them; and we seem'd to be in no Disposition to forward that Readiness, till we had the like Assurance, that they were on the point of setting sail. It was also presum'd, that, tho' the French had recall'd all their Privateers, &c. (x), in order to make use of their Hands, they would not be able to man such a Fleet, as was necessary to make good their Boast, before the End of the Summer; as also, that Killigrew would return from the Straits, that Shovel might be spar'd from the Irish Service, and that all the several Convoys would come in, time enough to take their Share in a general Engagement, in case the Enemy

A. D. 1690. Enemy had the Boldneſs to give us the Challenge.

But, unluckily, Killigrew did not reach the Bay of Cadiz till the 8th of April, and had ſuffer'd ſo much in his Paſſage, that he was oblig'd to lye there till the 9th of May following, in order to refit; nor even then, when he receiv'd Advice that the Toulon Squadron had actually paſs'd by Alicant and Malaga, and were entering the Strait, tho' he ſet ſail at four next Morning, was he able to come up with them; for it being their Buſineſs to make the beſt of their way, they avoided an Engagement, with as much Induſtry as he fought it, and being all clean Ships, had ſo much the Advantage of him in ſailing, that, notwithſtanding his utmoſt Endeavours to overtake them, he was oblig'd to give over the Chace.

Thus, at leaſt, the Story is told on our Side of the Water: But, according to the French, Killigrew declin'd the Engagement, tho' they had but ſeven Ships, and he had twenty-three: And it muſt be own'd, that there was ſomething ſtrange enough in their being able to make their Eſcape from a Force ſo much ſuperior to them, without firing a Gun: For when the Enemy enter'd the Strait, Commodore Shelton, with three Engliſh Men of War, viz. the Burford, Oxford, and Greenwich, and three Dutch, lay at Gibraltar to receive them, and might either have held them in Play till Killigrew came up; or, at leaſt, furniſh'd him with ſuch Intelligence of their Motions, that he might not have loſt a Moment in his Queſt of them: Whereas, for want of ſuch requiſite Intelligence, he was ſo far miſled, as to ſtretch over to the Bay of Tetuan, while they were yet in the Strait; and when, upon his being diſappointed there, he return'd towards the Spaniſh Coaſt, it is allow'd, even in our own Accounts, that he came up within two Miles of the Enemy, who had then the Ocean open before them, tho' he had diſcover'd them firſt from his Top-maſt Head; which is a Circumſtance ſcarce reconcileable with what is above ſaid, of the French being ſo much the better Sailors. But what is moſt amazing of all, neceſſary as it was held to prevent the Toulon Squadron from joining the grand Fleet at Breſt, it does not appear that Killigrew was furniſh'd with any proviſional Inſtructions, in caſe they ſhould ſlip through his Hands; for, inſtead of holding on his Courſe to England, where he could not but foreſee that the Squadron under his Command would certainly be wanted, to make head againſt the ſame Enemy, he return'd to Cadiz, May 21; detach'd ſeveral of his Ships to take care of the Trade, agreeable to the Letter of his Orders; and did not ſet ſail for England with the Reſidue, viz. five Engliſh and ſix Dutch, till ſome Days after.

Of every Neglect and Miſcarriage of ours, the French never fail'd to take the Advantage: But before we proceed to the Sequel of the Summer's Operations at Sea, it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of the State of Scotland and Ireland, that we may have the whole Circuit of our Connections before us at once.

Scottiſh Affairs.

The ill Humour in the Scotiſh Parliament, A. D. 1690. which had produc'd the Remonſtrance above-inſerted, ſtill rag'd as violently as ever: The King not only look'd upon the Demands contain'd in it, as extravagant, but thought himſelf inſulted by the Publication of them, and had expreſs'd a Reſentment ſuitable to the Provocation. While, therefore, that ill Humour continued, it was not prudent to ſuffer them to meet again: And yet a Meeting could not long be delay'd: For ſuch were the Diſtractions of that Kingdom, that the new Eſtabliſhment could no otherwiſe be continued, than by the Continuance of the Army; and ſuch had been the Precaution of the Parliament, that they had provided as thriftily as poſſible for the Support of that Army, in order to ſecure to themſelves another Seſſion. Then, as to a Diſſolution, it was no otherwiſe to be thought of, than as the laſt Reſource, when all other Remedies fail'd: For the Majority of the Epiſcopal Party were avow'd Jacobites: And the tranſferring the Elections into their Hands would, in effect, have been little better than making a Transfer of the Kingdom back to King James.

As the only Medium, therefore, which the Criſis afforded, it was reſolv'd to make ſuch a Diſpenſation of the Power and Profits of the Government, among the Lords and others, who were ſuppos'd to have the greateſt Influence in their ſeveral Cabals, as might help to ſoften the eager Spirit of Oppoſition which poſſeſs'd them, and make way for an Abatement of thoſe Demands, which his Majeſty could neither grant nor refuſe, without the utmoſt Inconvenience to himſelf, either in one Kingdom or the other: For, by refuſing, he was ſure to make the Scots deſperate, and by granting he was equally ſure, that he ſhould never be free from the Clamours and Reproaches of the Engliſh.

According to this Plan, the great Seal was committed to the Cuſtody of the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Argyle, and the Earl of Sutherland; the Privy-Seal to the Earl of Forfar, the Earl of Kintore, and the Lord Carmichael; the Treaſury was divided among the Earl of Crawfurd, the Earl of Caſſils, the Earl of Tweedale, the Lord Ruthven, and the Maſter of Melvil; and the Clerk-Regiſter's Office, among the Lord Belhaven, and four more.

But ſtill the Paſture was too narrow and too poor for the Herd: Many even of thoſe who were admitted were unſatisfy'd with their Allotment; and no Arguments could induce the Excluded to ſit down contented, becauſe their Friends were provided for.

The Duke of Hamilton, in particular, thought abundantly more was due to his Rank, Intereſt, and Services, than a Share of the Great Seal, and ſhew'd himſelf almoſt as much diſoblig'd as ever; and as to the Earl of Argyle, we ſhall find him running all Lengths to make himſelf more conſider'd: But the Duke had his Meaſures to keep: For, as we have ſeen, he was an Enemy to the Preſbyterians, and moſt of all to the Lord Melvil, Lord Stair, and thoſe of their Cabal; and, on the other Hand, he conti-

A.D. 1690. nued a fast Friend to the new Establishment, which he had so greatly contributed to raise. At Court, therefore, however disagreeable he had render'd himself to the King by his perpetual Importunities, in relation to his Majesty's ancient Kingdom, he was consider'd as the fittest Person to represent the King's Person a second time, and either to balance or break the Fury of that Party: According to Burnet, the Offer was actually made him, on condition that he would cooperate with Lord Melvil, on the Footing of one common Interest: But he had his Reasons for rejecting it; perhaps foreseeing, that the Government would be forc'd to comply with the Majority, and that in such case he should be set aside as an unprofitable Servant.

However this may be, very early in the Year Lord Melvil was sent down to Edinburgh, to try every other Expedient that could be devis'd to facilitate an Accommodation. The Prelate last-quoted asserts, "He had full Instructions for the Settlement of Presbytery: For, continues his Lordship, he assur'd the King, That, without That, it would be impossible to carry any thing; only the King would not consent to the taking away the Rights of Patronage, and the Supremacy of the Crown."

The first Step to be taken was, to gain Time for these Practices: Accordingly, the Parliament was adjourn'd from the 1st of March to the 18th: And that Interval proving too short, on the 14th of that Month, Lord Melvil produc'd his Commission to preside in Parliament, as his Majesty's Representative, and also the King's Letter for another Adjournment to the 27th, which was yet farther prolong'd to the 15th of April. But as these repeated Adjournments serv'd yet farther to irritate the Malcontents, who were alike jealous of the Motive, fearful of the Success, and impatient to gratify their Resentment, public Notice was given, That the Parliament was then to sit for the Dispatch of Business, and all the Members were requir'd to give their Attendance as usual.

Lord Melvil the King's Commissioner.

But we are assur'd by Lord Belcarres, that so great were the Fears of Lord Melvil, and his Partizans, that they would rather have ventur'd on a Dissolution, and the Hazard of a new Election, than the suffering them to meet at all, if by the splitting of Offices, the giving Money to some, and the retaining others in dependence by Promises and Expectations, he had not made some Proselytes to his Measures; or if all the Jacobites had given their Attendance, as it seems, they were earnestly requir'd, by those who had the most Zeal and the least Conscience of the Party; among whom Paterson, Archbishop of Glasgow, is particularly mention'd by the Historian of his own Times.

Now this Attendance could not be given without taking the Oaths to the present Government; and in the former Session, to avoid doing so, they had, one and all, either left the House, or never made their Appearance there: Some of them had even the Rashness to appeal to the Sword, and nothing but their Fears withheld the rest from following their Example. The Highlanders were still in Arms: King James had still supply'd them with two Ship-load of Arms and Ammunition, some Money, and about forty Officers: There was a Correspondence between those in Arms, and those who remain'd peaceably at their Houses; and the great Object of their common Attention was, some favourable Opportunity to restore King James, and be aveng'd of their Enemies: This is acknowledg'd, in so many Words, by the Lord Belcarres; and farther, that those who, to qualify themselves to vote in Parliament, did take the Oaths to the new Government, (of whom himself was one) did it with his Royal Licence, and for no other End, than to be so much the more instrumental to his Service. Whence we are to conclude, That, in a Royalist of this Stamp, even the most solemn Perjury is no Sin; and that the Lord's-Anointed can dispense with all the moral Obligations, as well as the Laws of the Land.

The Jacobites take the Oaths with a Purpose to break them.

But, unfortunately, many even of these Royalists were so thoroughly shock'd at so dishonest a Proposal, that all the wicked Subtilties of the Arch-Prelate above-mention'd could not get the better of their Scruples: And hence it follow'd, that the abdicated King was serv'd only by the most Profligate of his Party, who were regarded with Horrour and Contempt by the rest.

A Coalition between them and the Malcontent Presbyterians.

But this is not the only extraordinary Procedure, at this time, to be trac'd among the Scots: For the Jacobites, on one hand, being too few of themselves to make any material Use of this occasional Conformity, and the Presbyterians, on the other, finding their Numbers every day diminishing under the Practices of the Court, a Coalition was set on foot: And such is the Force of a present Convenience, that these Opposites were induc'd to meet, and to enter into mutual Engagements; with a View to ruin their common Enemies, if not to assist and serve each other.

Sir James Montgomery was the Manager in chief of this delicate Affair: For, tho' the Earl of Argyle and Lord Ross, upon their Return from London, had made an Opening to the Jacobites, by exclaming against the Usage they had met with from King William, and expressing much Sorrow for the Lengths they had gone in his Service, no formal Treaty was negociated between the two Parties, till Sir James arriv'd, and the rest of his Coadjutor.

Montgomery was the Idol of the Presbyterians, and, agreeable to a Hint which has already been given, in refreshment of his own Disappointments, had enter'd into a Negociation with King James: Which, besides the two Lords just mention'd, had the Countenance of the Duke of Queensberry, the Marquis of Athole, the Earl of Arran, the Viscount Tarbat, &c.

It was but natural, therefore, that Montgomery should have the Ear of both Parties, and that the Affair of the Coalition should pass through his Hands: His known Zeal for Presbytery endear'd him to one Party, and

A. D. 1690. and his Undertakings for King James to the other. His Purpose and Endeavour, in the mean time, was, to deceive Both: For, in discovering those his Undertakings to the Jacobites, while he profess'd, That the Restoration of King James was the great Object he had in view, he took care to suppress the Stipulations he had made in favour of himself, and those of his Cabal; and, above all, for the Re-establishment of Presbytery, on which fundamental Condition he had engag'd to bring the Parliament to declare for that Prince, to continue their Sittings in his Name, &c. And, on the other hand, in working up the Presbyterians to his Purpose, he made no (x) mention at all either of his Offers to King James, or the real Nature and Tendency of his Engagements with the Jacobite Party; but contented himself, with assuring them, That he knew several of the late King's Friends, who would join in any Measures, or with any Persons, to ruin the Lords Melvil and Stair, and to obtain the several Points specify'd in the Clame of Right, and enforc'd in the Remonstrance: And with setting forth the absolute Necessity of embracing their Assistance, in order to force the King to fulfill the Conditions on which he had accepted the Government.

The Presbyterians listen'd, believ'd, and gave themselves up to his Conduct and Directions, in a full Persuation, That the Way he pointed out was as plain and direct as it seem'd to be; and that all he propos'd to himself was, the Honour and Satisfaction of being their Guide. But he, Montgomery, meant nothing less than to gratify the Expectations he had rais'd: For he had all imaginable Reason, at that very time, to believe, That the Government, however beset, would never make the Concessions requir'd in the Remonstrance; and his great Purpose was, to take advantage of the Flame which he was sure the Disappointment would not fail to kindle; to make good his Undertakings to King James, that is to say, to make his Partizans, all at once, open their Arms once more to that Prince, on his granting them the same Conditions, which King William refus'd."

According to Lord Belcarres, tho' Lord Melvil was at the Head of the Scotish Affairs, both as Secretary and Commissioner, the Lord Tarbat had a far greater Degree of his Majesty's Favour, as appear'd by the Trust he repos'd in him; which in a manner set him above the Commissioner himself: For he had a Power either to grant a Cessation of Arms to, or conclude a Peace with, the Highlanders; to dispose of twenty thousand Pounds Sterling, as he thought fit, for his Majesty's Service; to confer three Titles of Honour on whom he pleas'd; to make a Report of what pass'd in Parliament, and to adjourn and even dissolve it, whenever he found it necessary. And what were the Returns which he made for this almost unprecedented Instance of Confidence in the Faith of a Subject? We have already seen his Name in the List of Montgomery's Coadjutors; and we now find him acting a similar Part in the same Cause: For we are told by the Lord just quoted, That he took more Pains under-hand than any Man, to induce the Jacobites to take their Seats in Parliament, and to co-operate with the Presbyterians: That to some he avow'd, the Scope of his Endeavours was the Service of King James; that, to others, he affected to discourse in the Patriot-Strain, of having nothing at Heart, but the Good of the Nation: That to all he made no Scruple to declare, That the King was fully resolv'd not to grant any of the Points contended for: That the great End he aim'd at, was, to bring about a Dissolution, by the high Hand of an Opposition, which he thought was the best Way to secure himself against the Rage of his Enemies, and rather to expose them to the Resentments of the Court: And, That the Jacobites were more determin'd in their Conduct, by this Proceeding of his, than any other Consideration: For being already persuaded, that their new Allies would grant nothing to the King, unless he granted every thing to them, and then assur'd on the other hand by Lord Tarbat, that his Majesty was as little dispos'd to make Concessions as those who oppos'd him, they made no doubt but the Army would be disbanded for want of a Provision for their Subsistence; that the King and his Parliament would immediately part in Confusion; and that, what with the Use which might be made of the Highlanders already in Arms, and the Succours which might be deriv'd from Ireland, they would have it in their Power to make what Use they pleas'd of the general Confusion.

A. D. 1690.

With these Views, and after this Manner, the out-side Shew of a Coalition was at last brought to bear: And the very Possibility that it might be a real one struck both the Commissioner and his Adherents with the most dismal Apprehensions. That, however, they might know the worst of their Situation, they suffer'd the Parliament to meet on the Day appointed; and his Grace the new Commissioner open'd the Session with a Speech from the Throne, in which he enlarg'd on his Majesty's great Regret that he could not be present at their Meeting, according to their Desires and his own Inclinations; and yet more on what his Majesty had done to deliver them from the Yoke, under which he found them groaning. He then demanded such a Supply as might enable his Majesty to secure to them the Possession of the Religion and Liberty he had restor'd. And, for a Close, he exhorted them to lay aside all Animosities, and, instead of pursuing their separate Interests, that they would unanimously concur in their Endeavours to establish the Peace and Welfare of the Public. The Lord President Crawfurd

The Parliament open'd.

(x) Lord Belcarres is express, that not one Presbyterian, except the Earl of Argyle, the Lord Ross, and one Person more, who was a Commoner, were in the Secret of Montgomery's Treaty with King James.

A.D. 1690. furd, then took the Word, and, having compar'd the Affair of re-ſettling the Church to the re-building the Temple under Ezra and Nehemiah, illuſtrated and adorn'd every Period, with all the golden Sayings of the Prophets relative to that Occaſion, &c.

We are told by Lord Belcarres, that the ceremonial Part being thus diſpatch'd, it was thought proper to try the Temper of the Houſe, by bringing the Merits of an Election to a Hearing; and farther, that if the Court had been outvoted on that Queſtion, they would have adjourn'd the Parliament the next Day; as alſo, that, contrary to their own Expectations, they carry'd their Point on a Diviſion by ſix or ſeven Voices: That this was owing to the Non-Attendance of ſeveral, both of the Jacobite Party, and Malcontent-Preſbyterians; among whom was Montgomery himſelf: And, that hereupon many of the reſt made no Difficulty to break through their Engagements, and go over to the ſtrongeſt Side.

But his Lordſhip's State of the Matter is not exact in all Circumſtances; for ſuch were the Terrors of the Commiſſioner and his Partizans, on ſeeing the Duke of Queenſberry, the the Marquis of Athol, the Earl of Broadalbin, and other diſoblig'd Lords, take the Oaths and their Seats in the Houſe, that tho' they did carry their Point in the Election, and adjourn'd. they adjourn'd the Houſe that very Day to the 22d following: And, probably, it was in this Interval, that his Grace ſent an Expreſs to the King, with a Repreſentation of the Dangers threatning the State, by the Coalition, and requeſting, as the only Remedy, that he might be enabled to break it, by gratifying one Party at the Expence of the other. Biſhop Burnet ſays, That he ſent one to Ireland for fuller Inſtructions on the Points of the Supremacy and the Rights of Patrimony; and adds: "They were enlarg'd, but in ſuch general Words, that the King did not underſtand that his Inſtructions could warrant what Lord Melvil did; for he gave them both up: And the King was ſo offended with him for it, that he loſt all the Credit he had with him; tho' the King did not think fit to diſown him, or to call him to an Account for going beyond his Inſtructions."

The Reader will draw his own Concluſions from theſe ſtrange Words. Lord Belcarres affirms, That Lord Melvil having made ſuch a Repreſentation as that above-mention'd, was allow'd to paſs what Acts of Parliament he ſhould think fit, and eſtabliſh what Form of Church-Government the Majority lik'd beſt, in caſe the Dangers he ſet forth could be no otherwiſe avoided. Beſides, the King did not ſet out for Ireland till the fourth of June, whereas the Act for reſcinding the The Act for reſcinding the Supremacy paſs'd. King's Supremacy over the Church, and That for replacing the ſurviving Miniſters of thoſe who had been ejected in the Year 1661, and 1662, were touch'd with the Royal Scepter on the 26th of April.

The Truth is, that the Biſhop would fain purge his Majeſty from the Reproach of having given up Epiſcopacy: And even Lord Belcarres allows, that it was againſt his Inclination that he did ſo: But then, ſays he, it A.D. 1690. was becauſe he fear'd the Conſequences in England, and becauſe he thought it moſt for his Intereſt to keep both Parties in Dependence on him, by keeping that Matter in Suſpence. And in very Deed, as it was for his own Convenience that his Majeſty choſe to be on good Terms with the Tories of England, ſo it was for the ſame Convenience that he adopted Preſbytery in Scotland, which is all that need be prov'd to account for the general Conduct of Princes.

And how much ſoever Lord Melvil has ſuffer'd from the Imputations of his Countryman Burnet, it muſt be acknowledg'd, that he took the only Courſe that the Exigencies of the Times would admit of, to provide for the Security of the Government: For, as on the one hand, the Bulk of the Malcontent-Preſbyterians immediately diſcover'd a relenting Diſpoſition towards the Court, ſo, on the other, Montgomery and his Jacobite-Allies, ſunk into Deſpair; and found no other way either to keep themſelves in Countenance, or proceed with their Oppoſition, than to ſuggeſt, that all that was done was not enough, and to make new Demands from time to time, in hope that the Commiſſioner would find himſelf at the End of his Inſtructions; and conſequently, that the firſt Negative would deprive him of all the Merit of all his former Conceſſions.

But his Grace was reſolv'd not to do his The Articles repeal'd. Work by Halves; and, having procur'd a ſecond Adjournment from the 22d to th 25th, at the next Meeting, gave way to the bringing in a Bill for repealing that ſhameful Reſtraint on the Freedom of Parliament, the Articles, to which he gave the Royal Aſſent on the eighth of May.

Yet farther to confound the Jacobites and their Adherents, in this Interval, namely on the fifth, the Lord Commiſſioner receiv'd the agreeable News, that the Highlanders, under The Highlanders defeated by Levingſton. the Command of Colonel Buchan, Colonel Cannon, &c. having rendezvous'd at Strathſpey, with a Purpoſe to make a Deſcent into the Low Country, were ſurpriz'd by Sir Thomas Levingſton, a Dutchman, who had the Command of the King's Troops, and entirely defeated with great Slaughter on their Side, but without the Loſs of a ſingle Man on that of the Government.

According to the Gazette, their Number [No. 2556.] was about two thouſand, which, in a few Days would have been augmented to four thouſand; but, according to Lord Belcarres, they were but fourteen hundred; and the Deſign they had in View, was only to amuſe and haraſs the King's Troops, till the Seaſon was farther advanc'd, and they could take the Field with their whole Force, which was to be render'd yet more conſiderable by the Junction of their Friends in the Lowlands.

The ſame Lord alſo intimates, that, immediately before this Action, it had been debated among the Heads of the Clans, whether they ſhould not endeavour to make the beſt Capitulation they could for themſelves, ſeeing they were out of all Hopes of the Relief which had been ſo long promis'd them; and

A. D. 1690. and that the Negative had been resolv'd on, at the Instance, and by the Authority, of Sir E. Cameron of Lochiel, who insisted on waiting for King James's Orders; saying, That in his Royal Brother's Service he had been reduc'd to far greater Streights, without entertaining any such Thought: That, for his Part, he was resolv'd never to hearken to any Conditions without such a Warrant, and that he thought it a Scandal to Highlanders to think of laying down their Arms, as long as their Master was at the Head of an Army in Ireland, and had so many Friends in Britain, who pretended to be so much at his Devotion.

His Lordship adds, in another Place, That when the News of their Defeat came to Edinburgh, the Jacobites repented their not embracing the Offer of a Cessation which had been tender'd to them on the Behalf of the Government, by the Interposition of the Earl of Bute, who was to have had 5000 l. Sterling for his Share of the Job; so extremely desirous was the Prince of Orange, continues our noble Author, to have all settled, before he pass'd over to Ireland: That in their present Difficulties it was thought advileable to resume that Treaty if possible, in hope the Highlanders would, thereby, gain time at least, to put themselves in a Posture of Defence: That with this View the Earl of Bute made a Journey to England; and that the King being gone, before he arriv'd at London, the Highlanders were left to the Mercy of the Enemy, and might have been ruin'd, in case Levingston had pursu'd the Victory he had gain'd.

The Jacobites desire to treat for a Suspension, which they had before refus'd.

For what regarded their Parliamentary Proceedings, he also says, That never Men made a more miserable Figure in any Meeting than the Jacobites did in this, after they saw themselves abandon'd and out-voted in every thing: That they had nothing left to do, but to sit and hear Duke (y) Hamilton bawl and bluster, according to his usual Custom, and then acquiesce to all that was propos'd; and Sir James Montgomery, and Sir John Dalrymple, in the Heat of Opposition and Recrimination, abuse each other, in the foulest Terms imaginable; insomuch, that Rogue! Villain! Lyar! season'd almost every Period of their Altercations.

Still the great Affair of settling the Church was behind; for though the System of King and Bishop was dissolv'd, and the old Presbyters were restor'd to their several Cures, their divine Right of Vicegerency in Christ's Church, had not as yet receiv'd the Sanction of the Law. On the same Day, therefore, that the Act for repealing the Articles, was touch'd with the Royal Sceptre, did Montgomery rise up, and, in a formal Speech, set forth, That, to his Knowledge, those in Power had Instructions to satisfy the Nation in the Article of Religion: That it was a Reproach to the Parliament that they had not call'd upon the Ministers to fulfil these Instructions: That the Ministers themselves, against their own Principles, had delay'd the Affair to humour the Court, who had no mind to bring it to an Issue, in case it could be avoided: That he also knew they were divided among themselves as to the Mode of Government to be establish'd: That some of them were for a certain kind of Presbytery call'd Erastianism, like that of Holland; but that he could tell them, That no other Form could, or ought to be, establish'd in Scotland, but that of 1648; which was the Government in the World most suitable to the Word of God, and best able to correct the extravagant Power, and arbitrary Government of Kings, under which they had groan'd for so many Years.

Montgomery makes a Motion for the Settlement of the Church.

A. D. 1690.

This Speech, says Lord Belcarres, to us that knew his Secrets, seem'd a little extraordinary; but he excus'd himself, by saying, He was oblig'd to discourse in that manner, in order to keep up his Credit with his Party; and that it signify'd nothing, because he was assur'd, that Lord Melvil never durst pass a Bill upon that Model, even though it should be approv'd by the House.

The House, however, so far adopted his Motions, that a Committee was appointed to consider of a Bill for settling the Government of the Church; with Power to receive all the Schemes or Proposals that should be brought before them; and to make such a Report out of the whole as should seem to them most conducive to the Peace and Welfare of the State.

which is adopted by the House.

On the same Day, also, as if by way of Consideration to the Crown for the new establishment in Embrio, another Bill was order'd in, for giving a Supply to their Majesties; a third for vacating the Fines and Forfeitures, which had been impos'd in the two late Reigns; and a fourth for Freedom of Speech. After which, they again adjourn'd to the 14th.

and accompany'd with a Bill of Supply.

And it was in this Interval, according to Lord Belcarres, that Montgomery receiv'd his final Dispatches from King James (for it seems, several Messages and Answers had pass'd between them) in which were contain'd all the Grants, Instructions, Commissions, &c. which had been requir'd by him and his Co-adjutors, in Return for the Services which they had undertaken to perform.

Montgomery receives his final Dispatches from King James.

His Lordship adds, That they were all inclos'd in a large black Box, which was deliver'd into Montgomery's Hands by the Messenger, to whose Care it had been entrusted: That Montgomery open'd this Box first alone: That he then sent for the Lords, Argyle, Arran, and Ross, to whom he communicated the Contents; and among whom it was agreed, That several Particulars were not fit to be communicated to the Duke of Queensberry, and the Earls of Linlithgow, Broadalbin, Belcarres, and the other Jacobite Peers: That on this Consideration

(y) He and his Followers had no Design but the Ruin of the Lord Melvil and Stairs, and to get the Session fill'd with his own Creatures; having at that time many Law-Suits in hand, Belcarres, p. 127.

A.D. 1690. deration they made up another Box of such Papers as they thought fit to shew; and, in all Haste, desir'd a general Meeting at the Marquis of Athole's Lodging: That this being obtain'd, Montgomery, in a set Speech, expatiated on the Endeavours he had us'd for the King's Service, ever since he had quitted the Interest of the Prince of Orange, and on the Acceptance those Endeavours had found: Signify'd, That he had receiv'd a great Bundle of Papers; and that to shew the entire Trust he had in those present, and the full Persuasion he was in, that they were all engag'd in one and the same Pursuit, he would not open a single Paper, but with the general Concurrence and Participation; and desir'd another Meeting that Afternoon for that End.

His Lordship farther says, That the Earl of Arran excus'd himself, under a Pretence, that he was oblig'd to go out of Town; but, in Reality, because he thought himself cheated; for it had been agreed at London, that he should have a Commission to be General of the Forces, and no such Commission was come: That the Duke of Queensberry also excus'd himself: That those who attended, were only the Lords Athole, Linlithgow, Broadalbin, Ross, and himself: That when Montgomery brought in the Box, he again declar'd, as in the Presence of God Almighty, That except a Letter from the King to himself, he had brought the whole Packet; as also, that he was wholly ignorant of the Contents of it: That the Perfidy was nevertheless apparent to every body, because the Pack-thread had been visibly alter'd; and the Seal which had been clapp'd upon it was Montgomery's own: That upon examining the several Dispatches, they were amaz'd to find, That Montgomery had undertaken, by the Dint of Persuasion only, to bring the Parliament, and with them the Nation, back to their Duty; on a Supposition, that the Refusal of the Court to comply with the Claim of Right, would dispose the Majority of both to receive any Impression whatsoever: And equally exasperated, that an Undertaking so chimerical should meet with so much Consideration; that Earl of Argyle being made the King's Commissioner, and a Marquis, Lord Ross and Montgomery, Earls; and, in general, all Employments, both Civil and Military, being divided among those who had been the greatest Enemies to the King and his Cause: That Montgomery appear'd as much confounded as his Confederates were exasperated and amaz'd; for it being now undeniable, that Lord Melvil's unexpected Concessions had broke all his Measures, the Trusts and Honours he had bargain'd for, only serv'd to ruin him with his Party: That after this there was no longer any Trust or Harmony amongst them: And, finally, that Ross, Montgomery, &c. took the first Opportunity that offer'd, to make their own Peace, by betraying their Jacobite-Allies.

which creates a Breach among the Party.

Bishop Burnet also speaks of this Breach, but in a manner somewhat different from Lord Belcarres: For after he had observ'd, That the Jacobites, with all their wicked Arts, could not obtain a Majority in Parliament, he proceeds to say, "So, other things failing, they saw a Necessity of desiring a Force to be sent over from France: This appear'd so odious, and so destructive of their Country, that some of them refus'd to concur in it: Others were not pleas'd with the Answers King James had sent to the Propositions they had made him. He had, indeed, granted all that they had ask'd upon their own particular Interests, and had promis'd to settle Presbytery; but he rejected all those Demands that imported a Diminution of his Prerogative, in as firm a Manner, as if he had been already set upon the Throne again. They propos'd, finding his Answer so little to their Satisfaction, to send him a second Message. Upon this, the Earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Broadalbin, withdrew from them: Annandale came up to the Bath, pretending his ill Health; both Lord Argyle and Broadalbin went to Chester, pretending, as they said afterwards, that they intended to discover the whole Matter to the King."

A.D. 1690.

Now Lord Belcarres gives us to understand, That Montgomery had already receiv'd several Letters from King James's Queen, containing repeated Promises of Assistance of Men, Money, and Arms: So that the Performance of those Promises was all that remain'd to be solliciteds: As to the second Message, his Lordship intimates, That four had already pass'd: That, upon the Eclaircisement of all, but few of the Party would have any thing more to do with Montgomery; and that all which was afterwards agreed upon, among those few, was, to subscribe a blank Paper, which was to be fill'd up by the Messenger, on his Arrival in Ireland, with their Advice to his Majesty, according to the Instructions given him for that Purpose: And that, as to the Consequences of the Breach, Lord Ross was the first Person who thereupon put in for the Merit of betraying his Companions.

and occasions a Discovery by Lord Ross, Montgomery, &c.

Again; his Lordship yet farther suggests, That Ross had dropt some Hints of this Purpose of his, to the only Commoner besides Montgomery, who was in the Secret of the Party: That this Commoner gave an Intimation of it to Lord Belcarres himself: That he again communicated it to the rest: That Lord Linlithgow was sent by them to sound Ross, who deny'd, with deep Imprecations, that ever he had entertain'd any such Thought: That some believ'd him to be sincere, and others were for dispatching him out of the way, for fear he should be otherwise: That Ross did indeed lay aside his intended Journey to Chester, to avoid a Renewal of their Suspicions, but, nevertheless, reveal'd all he knew to a Presbyterian Minister: That he then apply'd to the Lord Commissioner for a Pass to London: That he told his Grace in general, that there were dangerous Practices on foot against the King and Government, in which he himself had taken too great a Share: That his Purpose was to make a full Discovery to the Queen: That he accordingly did so, on his Arrival at London:

That

A. D. 1690. That he laid the Blame of the whole Proceeding on Montgomery: That, however, when he was call'd upon by her Majesty to make the same Recital, in the Presence of the Lords Carmarthen and Nottingham, he deny'd all again; saying, That tho' he had gone so far, to preserve the King and her from future Danger, no Consideration should induce him to turn Evidence against his Friends: That upon this he was immediately committed to the Tower, where he lay for eight or ten Months: That tho' neither Threats nor Promises were spar'd, to bring him to a farther Confession, he had the Grace to keep his Word: That, in the mean time, the Minister, Ross had confided in at Edinburgh, had, according to the Custom of his Profession, made no Secret of the Story which had been told him: That this taking Air, Montgomery thought it high time to make some Provision for his own Security: That accordingly he made his Submission to Melvill, his mortal Enemy; and, to merit some Degree of Confidence and Favour, put into his Hands the Queen's Letters, containing her Assurances of Succours from France, and also the Instructions sent to the Earl of Argyle, when he should be Commissioner to the Parliament: That in return, or rather for Views of his own, Melvill furnish'd him also with a Pass to Court, in the Quality of a penitent Discoverer: That being arriv'd at London, he refus'd to make his Appearance before the Queen, till he had receiv'd Assurances, that, in case they did not agree, he should not be confin'd: That in his Confession he laid open most of the Transactions which had past between King James and him: That he also refus'd to be an Evidence, or even to advise how the Mischiefs apprehended from such a Correspondence might be prevented, unless he might have a free and full Pardon of all Crimes whatsoever, and a good Employment into the Bargain: That the Queen was willing to grant him both, and wrote in his Favour to his Majesty, who was then in Ireland: "But, continues his Lordship, some things had pass'd between the Prince of Orange and Sir James, in private, which made the Prince to have such an Abhorrence of him, that he would not hear of employing him, nor even grant him a Remission, except on the Condition of his being an Evidence; which not doing his Business, he absconded, and within a few Months after did all he could to justify himself to his Party, which took with not a few."

The Historian of his own Times passes in more haste over these Circumstances, but agrees, that, upon the Breach, Montgomery reconcil'd himself to Melvil, and discover'd the whole Negociation to him; and yet, in the very next Paragraph, represents the King as determin'd not to grant him a Pardon, unless he discover'd the Bottom of the Plot, and particularly how far any of the English were engag'd in it; and would have his Readers conclude, That Montgomery absconded only for their sakes.

But, if he discover'd the whole Negociation, he certainly discover'd the Bottom of the Plot; and if it should be admitted, that the Words us'd by Lord Belcarres, and above-quoted, That he discover'd most of the Transactions which had pass'd, do imply, that he had some Reserve, possibly the whole of that Reserve is to be found in the following Passage of the same noble Author's: "But in all their Discoveries, there was never a Word mention'd of their Patents, and the Remissions which were sent to Duke Hamilton, and others of their Friends."

A. D. 1690.

The Bishop farther says, "A Warrant was sent to the Bath for the Earl of Annandale, of which he had notice given him, and went up privately to London. Montgomery sent Ferguson to him, assuring him, that he had discover'd nothing, and desiring him to continue firm and secret; but when he had certain notice, that Montgomery had discover'd all the Negociation among the Scotch, he cast himself on the Queen's Mercy, asking no other Conditions, but that he might not be made an Evidence against others. He himself had not treated with any in England, so, as to them, he was only a second-hand Witness; only he inform'd against Nevil Payne, who had been sent down to Scotland, to manage Matters among them: He was taken there, but would confess nothing; upon the Earl of Annandale's Information, which he gave upon Oath, the Earl of Nottingham wrote to the Council of Scotland, that he had in his Hands a Deposition upon Oath, containing Matter of High-Treason against Payne; upon which it was pretended, that, according to the Law of Scotland, he might be put to the Torture; and that was executed with Rigour: He resisted a double Question, yet was still kept a Prisoner; and this was much cry'd out on, as barbarous and illegal."

No positive Proof of any Communication with England.

Thus the great Point he still labours, is, to prove a Communication with England; and tho' no such Proof arises, still we are to conclude, that there was such a Communication. It has been already hinted, that Lord Belcarres, in his whole Detail, mentions no one Circumstance to authorise such a Conclusion: He does, indeed, acknowledge, that the Conspiracy was first hatch'd at London; but then he expressly declares, that it took its Rise from the Disappointments and Discontents of the Scots; talks of Ferguson and Payne, as the chief Persons residing here who had any Concern in it; both of whom were Scots likewise; and is even so particular as to say, in Effect, that the Treaty was agitated between Montgomery and Payne only: For, after his Lordship has set forth, that Montgomery, by way of Inducement to the Earl of Argyle and Lord Ross, to co-operate with him, laid before them the Ingratitude of the Prince of Orange in not giving them Employments, and the great Offers made by King James's Friends, in case they return'd to their Duty, he makes use of these very Words: "He wanted not Encouragement to say so; for Mr. Payne had promis'd him all that his Ambition, Vanity, or Avarice, could suggest; Nor were there ever two better match'd than Mr. Payne, and Sir James Montgomery;

A. D. 1690. Montgomery; for Mr. Payne made him believe, that he could diſpoſe of Titles of Honour, Employments, and Money, as he pleas'd; and the Other ſo far impos'd upon him, as to make him believe he was able to turn the whole Nation with a Speech, to do whatſoever he propos'd."

It is, however, extremely probable, that Fergusſon had an Underſtanding with the Malcontents of England, and that he had engag'd for their Countenance when time ſhould ſerve; but then it is as probable, that he was reſtrain'd from truſting the Scots with the Secret of Names; and that upon the whole, there was no other Connection between the two Parties, than aroſe by his Means. Whence it follows, That Montgomery had nothing material to diſcover with reſpect to the Engliſh; and that all the Compliments paid to his Firmneſs on their Account, by (z) Burnet, ought to be plac'd to his Policy; for he could not but ſee, that, on one hand, no Value could be plac'd on any Revelation he ſhould make with reſpect to Payne and Fergusſon; and that on the other, he ſhould leſſen his own Character and Importance, by ſhewing, that he had march'd thus far under the Banners of a known Spy, and a profeſs'd Incendiary.

The mean Behaviour of Lord Annandale.

Laſtly; to what the ſame Prelate has ſaid with regard to the Earl of Annandale, Lord Belcarres adds, That he made his Eſcape from Bath, by the Means of one who had been the Mayor of that Place: That while he abſconded, which was for ſeveral Weeks, he was maintain'd by Fergusſon; and that when he turn'd Diſcoverer, he not only inform'd againſt his Friends, the Mayor, and Fergusſon, but alſo ſign'd a Confeſſion the moſt ſcandalous that any thing of the Name of Gentleman ever did: For he not only reveal'd all that had paſs'd in the general Conſults of the Party, but even in their private Converſations; particularly, all that had paſs'd with Payne at their firſt Meeting: And that to fill the Meaſure of his Baſeneſs, his own Servants, at his Country-houſe in Scotland, whither Payne had fled for Sanctuary, deliver'd him up to the Government, tho' certain that his Fortitude would be put to the terrible Trial above ſpecify'd.

Fergusſon was alſo taken into Cuſtody; but, either in regard to his former (a) Services, or for want of ſufficient Evidence againſt him, not proſecuted.

And now, according to the Hiſtorian of his own Times, Lord Melvil had a clear Majority in Parliament; for ſome withdrew, and others, to make their Peace, comply'd in all things. And yet, in the midſt of the Tranquility thus ſuddenly and effectually reſtor'd, did he venture to give the Royal Aſſent to the Bill for the Eſtabliſhment of Presbytery, as the national Church of Scotland; by which the Reſtor'd Miniſters (who were about ſixty in Number) were authoriz'd and impower'd to aſſociate with themſelves in the Government of that Church, ſuch as they ſhould deem duly qualify'd. (b) All other Matters took the ſame Direction. The Eſtates of ſuch as had been, or ſtill continu'd, in Arms againſt the Government, were forfeited. The Supply was made good by a Tax upon Chimnies, which was of the ſame nature with the Hearth-money, which had been aboliſh'd with ſo much Oſtentation in England: The Army was continu'd; and a Teſt was impos'd on all in Office, or capable of electing or being elected to ſerve in Parliament, declaring the King and Queen to be their rightful and lawful Sovereign, and renouncing, in the moſt explicit manner, the Pretenſions of King James.

A. D. 1690. Preſbytery eſtabliſh'd in Scotland.

State of Ireland.

During a great Part of this Interval, the Face of Affairs in Ireland continu'd pretty much the ſame: The Duke of Schomberg had ſuffer'd ſo much in his Winter-Quarters, that notwithſtanding the continual Reinforcements which he every Day received from Denmark, Scotland, and England, he did not find himſelf in a Condition to undertake any thing very conſiderable: And King James, on the other hand, gave his French Auxiliaries time enough to be ou very ill Terms with the Natives, before he thought of making uſe of them.

Both Sides contented themſelves with ſending out their Parties from time to time, to ſurprize and pillage each other: And on theſe Occaſions were held of Conſequence enough to be recorded in the London Gazette. Thus we find Colonel Wolſey's Letter, with the Detail of his defeating the Duke of Berwick and a Party of four thouſand Iriſh, at Carlow, inſerted verbatim. An Attempt to ſurprize Charlemont makes another ſubſequent Article, and the Valour of the Aſſailants is to be conſider'd as an Equivalent for the Repulſe they receiv'd. Even the very deſtroying of Magazines, the burning of Villages, and the plundering the poor Ruſtics

(z) "But when he ſaw he could not have his Pardon, but by making a full Diſcovery, he choſe rather to go beyond-ſea. So fatally did Ambition and Diſcontent hurry a Man to Ruin, who ſeem'd capable of greater things. His Art in managing ſuch a Deſign, and his Firmneſs in not diſcovering his Accomplices, ſav'd his Character, as much as it ruin'd his Fortune. He continued in perpetual Plots after this, to no Purpoſe: He was once taken, but made his Eſcape; and, at laſt, Spleen and Vexation put an end to a turbulent Life."

(a) Which had been rewarded by his Majeſty, as we are told by Mr. Tindal, with the Place of Houſekeeper to the Exciſe-Office, worth near five hundred Pounds per annum, with little Trouble.

(b) "Some furious Men, ſays the Biſhop, who had gone into very frantic Principles, and all thoſe who had been ſecretly ordain'd in the Preſbyterian Way, were preſently taken in: This was like to prove a fatal Error, at their firſt ſetting out: the old Men among them, what by reaſon of their Age, or their Experience of former Miſtakes, were diſpoſ'd to more moderate Councils; but the taking in ſuch a Number of violent Men put it out of their Power to purſue them; ſo theſe broke out into a moſt extravagant Way of proceeding againſt ſuch of the Epiſcopal Party, as had eſcap'd the Rage of the former Year. Accuſations were rak'd againſt them; ſome were charg'd for their Doctrine, as guilty of Arminianiſm; others were loaded with more ſcandalous Imputations: But theſe were only thrown out to defame them. And where they look'd for Proof, it was in a Way more becoming Inquiſitors, than Judges: So apt are all Parties, in their Turns of Power, to fall into thoſe very Exceſſes, of which they did formerly make ſuch tragical Complaints."

A. D. 1690. Ruſtics of their Cattle, are made political Articles to keep up the Spirits of the People. Sir Cloudſley Shovel's taking King James's only Frigate in King James's Sight, in the Bay of Dublin, makes a very pompous Paragraph; in the Cloſe of which, great Care is taken to ſet forth the remarkable Alacrity with which the Seamen perform'd this notable Service. And as to the Reduction of Charlemont upon Capitulation (the Garriſon being permitted to march out with all the Honours of War) and of the Caſtle of Ballingargy, on granting the Soldiers their Lives, they were treated of not only here, but in all the Courts of the Confederacy, as Acquiſitions that would contribute greatly to the Succeſs of the Campaign.

But whatever Uſe was made of theſe little Incidents without Doors, by way of Amuſement, in the Cabinet their intrinſic Value was known to a Scruple; and both from a true Senſe of it, and his own Impatience to be in Action elſewhere, his Majeſty reſolv'd to deſer his Departure no longer on any Conſideration whatſoever.

Scotland was now eaſy behind him; and England, he aſſur'd himſelf, would be the ſame, under the acceptable Dominion of the Queen, who was now become the Idol of the Tories. It is true, Informations had been given in upon Oath againſt ſeveral Perſons, for conſpiring together to raiſe a Rebellion, and forming themſelves into Regiments, Troops, and Companies, under Pretence of Commiſſions from King James: But as none of thoſe Perſons were of Quality or Conſequence, it was believ'd, that a Proclamation, ſpecifying their Names, ſetting forth their Crimes, and calling upon their Fellow-Subjects to apprehend them, would effectually put an end to their Practices. Then as to the Preparations of the French at Breſt, which were the only remaining Terror, it was preſum'd, that they were neither ſo forward, nor ſo formidable, but that the Engliſh and Dutch Fleets would both have time to join, and when join'd, would be able to aſſert the Dominion of the Sea, and provide for the Security of the Coaſt. That the Mouth of the Thames, more eſpecially, might be ſufficiently cover'd, the Downs was made the Place of general Rendezvous. And, laſtly, to induce his Majeſty to confide in the Love and Loyalty of his Seamen, Rear-Admiral Delaval procur'd an Addreſs to be ſign'd by all the Officers (which he preſented himſelf to the King at Whitehall, May 31, and for which, by way of Recompence, he receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood) acknowledging their Majeſties to be the undoubted, rightful King and Queen of England; ſolemnly renouncing all Allegiance and Obedience to the late King James; faithfully promiſing to aſſiſt and defend their Majeſties with their Lives, againſt the ſaid late King James and all his Adherents; and moſt humbly beſeeching their Majeſties graciouſly to accept of thoſe unfeigned Expreſſions of their Duty, together with their fervent Prayers for their Safety, and Succeſs over all their Enemies; which alone could create the Happineſs of all their Subjects, and, in particular, of them, their Majeſties moſt dutiful, and moſt loyal Subjects and Servants. A. D. 1690.

A Proclamation againſt certain Conſpirators.

The Navy Addreſs.

Still it ſeems there was one thing more to be done before his Majeſty could begin his Journey, and that was to have a Cloſet-Converſation with Biſhop Burnet; which his Lordſhip has thought of Importance enough to make a Part of the Hiſtory of England; for what Purpoſe need not be explan'd. Theſe are his Words, which, in his Margin, he is pleas'd to call, The King's Senſe of Affairs.

A Cloſet-Converſation between the King and Biſhop Burnet.

"The Day before he ſet out, he call'd me into his Cloſet: He ſeem'd to have a great Weight upon his Spirits, from the State of his Affairs, which was then very cloudy: He ſaid, for his own Part, he truſted in God, and would either go through with his Buſineſs, or periſh in it: He only pitied the poor Queen, repeating that twice with great Tenderneſs; and with'd, that thoſe who lov'd him, would wait much on her, and aſſiſt her. He lamented much the Factions and the Heats that were among us; and that the Biſhops and Clergy, inſtead of allaying them, did rather foment and inflame them. But he was pleas'd to make an Exception of my ſelf. He ſaid, the going to a Campaign was naturally no unpleaſant thing to him. He was ſure, he underſtood that better than how to govern England. He added, that, though he had no Doubt nor Miſtruſt of the Cauſe he went on, yet the going againſt King James, in Perſon, was hard upon him, ſince it would be a waſt Trouble both to himſelf and to the Queen, if he ſhould be either kill'd or taken Priſoner. He deſir'd my Prayers, and diſmiſs'd me, very deeply affected with all he had ſaid (c)."

His Majeſty ſets out for Ireland.

The next Morning at four o'Clock, his Majeſty ſet out, with Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormonde, the Earls of Oxford, Scarborough, Manchoſter, Mr. Boyle, and many other Perſons of Diſtinction

(c) The Biſhop adds the following Story:

"I had a particular Occaſion to know how tender he was of King James's Perſon, having learn'd an Inſtance of it from the firſt Hand. A Propoſition was made to the King, that a Third-Rate Ship, well mann'd by a faithful Crew, and commanded by one, who had been well with King James, but was ſuch a one as the King might truſt, ſhould ſail to Dublin, and declare for King James. The Perſon who told me this, offer'd to be the Man that ſhould carry the Meſſage to King James (for he was well known to him) to invite him to come on board, which he ſeem'd to be ſure he would accept of; and when he was aboard, they ſhould ſail away with him, and land him either in Spain or Italy, as the King ſhould deſire; and ſhould have twenty thouſand Pounds to give him, when he ſhould be ſet aſhore. The King thought it was a well formed Deſign, and likely enough to ſucceed; but would not hearken to it. He ſaid he would have no hand in Treachery; and King James would certainly carry ſome of his Guards, and of his Court aboard with him: and probably they would make ſome Oppoſition: And in the Struggle, ſome Accident might happen to King James's Perſon; in which he would have no hand. I acquainted the Queen with this, and I ſaw in her a great Tenderneſs for her Father's Perſon; and ſhe was much touch'd with the Anſwer the King had made."

tion in his Train. And upon this Occaſion a new Miſunderſtanding broke out in the Royal Family: For, we are told by the Ducheſs of Marlborough, that the King would not ſuffer his Royal Highneſs to go in the Coach with him; which, according to that great Lady, was ſuch an Affront as was never put upon a Perſon of that Rank before. "The Prince, however, continues her Grace, ſubmitted to the Indignity, it being too late to take any Meaſures to avoid it; nor, during the whole Campaign, did he fail in any Part of Duty or Reſpect, tho' the King never took more Notice of him than if he had been a Page of the Back Staire."

lands at Carrickfergus;

In ten Days from the time of his leaving London, his Majeſty landed at Carrickfergus; and the ſame Evening proceeded on to Belfaſt, where he was met by Duke Schomberg, the Prince of Wirtemberg, who commanded the Danes, General Kirk, &c.

His next Stage was to Liſburn, where the General had his Head-Quarters; and at Hilſborough he ſet forth an Order, forbidding the preſſing of Horſes, and the committing of any Violence on the Country People; which had a Tendency both to reſtore Diſcipline among his Troops, and to give the Iriſh a favourable Impreſſion of his Government. Some Sayings of his Majeſty's are next taken notice of by our Hiſtorians, namely, That he did not come there to let the Graſs grow under his Feet; and that the Country was worth the fighting for. At Loughbritland he took a general Review of his Army, which he found to conſiſt of thirty-ſix thouſand effective Men, Engliſh, Dutch, French, Danes, and Germans; for of ſo many ſeveral Nations was it compos'd; all in good Plight, ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times, and full of Heart and Zeal.

reviews his Army.

King James marches to the Boyne,

King James, on the other hand, continu'd all this while at Dublin, not only without any poſitive Intelligence of his Son-in-law's Landing, but without Apprehenſion of it; for, it ſeems, he had entertain'd a Conceit, that the Diſcontents in England and Scotland would have prevented his Journey. It was ſix Days before he was convinc'd of his Error by an Engliſh Captain, who had been taken Priſoner, by falling into Ambuſcade: And then, not another Moment was to be loſt in taking the neceſſary Precautions againſt him. Accordingly, having committed the Charge of Dublin to Colonel Luttrel, and the Body of Militia under his Command, he march'd out of that City at the Head of his French Auxiliaries, and join'd his own Iriſh, who, on King William's Approach, had abandon'd Ardee, and encamp'd on the South Side of the Boyne. Here ſeveral Councils of War were held; in which it was debated, Whether they ſhould make a Stand there, and put all to the Deciſion of a Battle, or whether they ſhould abandon that River, and conſequently, all the Country as far as Dublin? "All the Officers, ſays Burnet, both French and Iriſh, who diſagreed almoſt in all their Advices, yet agreed in this, that, tho' they had there a very advantageous Poſt to maintain, yet their Army being ſo much inferior, both in Number, and in every thing elſe, they would put too much to the Hazard, if they ſhould venture on a Battle. They therefore propos'd the ſtrengthening their Garriſons, and marching off to the Shannon with the Horſe, and a ſmall Body of Foot, till they ſhould ſee how Matters went at Sea: For the French King had ſent them Aſſurances, that he would not only ſet out a great Fleet, but that, as ſoon as the Squadron that lay in the Iriſh Seas, to guard the Tranſport Fleet, and to ſecure the King's Paſſage over, ſhould ſail into the Channel to join our grand Fleet, he would then ſend into the Iriſh Seas a Fleet of ſmall Frigates and Privateers, to deſtroy the King's Tranſports. This would have been fatal, if it had taken Effect; and the executing of it ſeem'd eaſy and certain. It would have ſhut up the King within Ireland, till a new Tranſport Fleet could have been brought thither; which would have been the Work of ſome Months: So that England might have been loſt, before he could have paſs'd the Seas with his Army. And the Deſtruction of his Tranſports muſt have ruin'd his Army; for his Stores, both of Bread and Ammunition, were ſtill on board; and they ſail'd along the Coaſt, as he advanc'd on his March. Nor was there, in all that Coaſt, a ſafe Port to cover and ſecure them." But all theſe Conſiderations, it ſeems, had no weight with King James, whoſe Family-Miſfortune it was, to be ever moſt poſitive when they were moſt in the Wrong. It was his Opinion, that they ought to defend their Poſt; for, he thought the abandoning Dublin would be deem'd an abandoning of his Cauſe: That this would teach his whole Party to do the ſame; and that nothing could be worſe, than to ſhew any Symptom of Weakneſs or Diſmay, when the Eyes of all Europe were upon him, and when he had ſo fair an Opportunity to make one great Effort for the Recovery of his Crown. "He ſpoke of this with ſo much ſeeming Pleaſure, ſays Burnet, that many about him apprehended, that he was weary of the Struggle, and even of Life, and long'd to ſee an End of it at any rate; and they were afraid that he would play the Hero a little too much. He had all the Advantages he could deſire: The River was deep, and roſe very high with the Tide: There was a Moraſs to be paſs'd after the paſſing the River, and then a Riſing Ground." He might have added, That the Bank of the River was in many Places ſteep and high; that the Ground on the other Side, was not only hilly, but intermix'd with many Hedges and Ditches, as alſo encumber'd with ſeveral Cottages: That King James had his Eye on all theſe Advantages, and that, in Reality, they ſerv'd to juſtify him in the Reſolution he had taken.

and againſt the Opinion of his Officers reſolves to give Battle to the Engliſh.

On the other hand, it muſt be admitted, that the ſame Circumſtance which induc'd one King to venture an Action, made the Attempt more difficult, and the Succeſs more precarious to the Other: And of this, Duke Schomberg was ſo ſenſible, that when the Latter, in a Council of War, held on the laſt of June, ſignify'd his Reſolution to paſs the River the next Day, he oppos'd it, tho' his Majeſty was not pleas'd to ſhew any Regard to his Opinion, either in that, or any other Inſtance.

The greateſt Part of that Day had been ſpent in marching from Ardee; and, then, the two Armies confronting each other, in reconnoitring and cannonading. And, upon this Occaſion, what has been ſo circumſtantially remember'd by the Hiſtorian of his own Times, ought not to be forgot; namely,

King William wounded.

"That with the firſt Firing, a Ball paſs'd along King William's Shoulder, tore off ſome of his Cloaths, and about a Hand-breadth of the Skin; out of which about a Spoonful of Blood came." The ſame unuſual Accident, as it is call'd by the ſame Prelate, is alſo recorded in the Gazette, and mention'd by almoſt all other (d) Authors; with this Difference, indeed, that they ſay, The Ball took his Majeſty at the Rebound from the Bank: And yet, in one of the Jacobite Pamphlets of this Reign, it is aſſerted, "That he was never within Reach of King James's Cannon, nor receiv'd any Hurt at all."

Remarks on the Confederacy, 4to, p. 22.

The Biſhop, moreover, adds, That upon the King's firſt alighting from his Horſe, after his Wound, a Deſerter had gone over to the Enemy with the News, which was carry'd (e) quickly into France, where it was taken for granted, that he could not out-live ſuch a Wound: "So, continues he, it ran over that Kingdom that he was dead; and upon it there were more public Rejoicings than had been uſual upon their greateſt Victories; which gave that Court afterwards a vaſt Confuſion, when they found that he was ſtill alive, and ſaw that they had rais'd in their own People a high Opinion of him by this inhuman Joy, when they believ'd him dead." But, particular as his Lordſhip is on this Topic, he paſſes over another, which [No. 249.] has the Authority of the London Gazette to ſupport it, that treats of this very Wound; namely, "That our Bombs (or rather Cannon) beat down ſeveral Tents, next adjoining to thoſe of the late King James and the Count de Lauzun." Which, contrary to what we have been taught above, ſeems to indicate, that as little Reſpect was paid to the Perſon of one Prince, as the other.

The Battle of the Boyne.

With reſpect to the Diſpoſition of the two Armies, we are told, that Duke Schomberg, when he found the King ſo reſolutely bent to fight the Enemy on the Morrow, at all Diſadvantages, adviſ'd his Majeſty, to ſend a Part of his Army over the River that very Night, at or near Slane-Bridge, which was about three Miles above, to facilitate and cover the Paſſage of the River: But the Dutch Generals being of a different Opinion, his was rejected. Upon which, finding himſelf of no Conſequence, he retir'd to his Tent; and upon receiving the Order of Battle, which was tranſmitted to him by the King's Order, expreſs'd his Diſguſt, by ſaying, That it was the Firſt which ever had been ſent to him. What this Order was, is not over-diſtinctly ſpecify'd; only we find, that the Paſſage of the River was to be forc'd at three Places at once; by the Right Wing at Slane-Bridge; by the Left at certain Fords between the Enemy's Camp and Drogheda; and by the Main Body, at a Place call'd Old-Bridge. A. D. 1690.

King James, or his Generals for him, on the other hand, ſuſpecting, that the warmeſt Work would be at the laſt of theſe Places, caus'd ſeveral little Works to be thrown up, both at the Ford, and round a Stone Houſe near it; under the Cover of which, as alſo of the Hedges and Cottages by the River-ſide, he poſted a large Body of his Foot, who were ſupported by a ſuitable Number of Horſe: And the reſt of his Forces were drawn up in ſeveral Bodies, in order to obſerve the Motions of the Engliſh, ſo as to be in Readineſs to diſpute every Paſs at which they ſhould attempt to get over. It is ſaid, that General Hamilton (the Perſon who undertook to bring over Tyrconnel by Treaty) adviſ'd King James, to have eight Regiments of Dragoons, ready poſted at Slane-Bridge, and another Party below Drogheda, but with little better Succeſs than Duke Schomberg adviſ'd King William; for he was pleas'd to think, that fifty Dragoons was ſufficient for the firſt of theſe Services, and could not be prevail'd upon to ſend more than one Regiment; and, for the laſt, we do not find, that he made any immediate Proviſion at all.

Thus, in the Morning, when King William's Right Wing, under the Command of the Generals, Douglas, Schomberg (Son of the Duke) Portland, and Overkirk, began to march towards Slane-Bridge, the Left of King James did the ſame. But when the Engliſh Left, where the King himſelf choſe to charge, having under him the Generals Kirk and Sydney, mov'd downwards towards Drogheda, the Iriſh Right kept their Ground at the Ford, as if they had nothing to apprehend elſewhere. It ſo happen'd, moreover, that before the ſingle Regiment of Iriſh Dragoons, poſted Over-night at Slane, could be reinforc'd, the Engliſh took the River, and, after a ſingle Diſcharge, drove them from their Poſt. But tho' this was the chief Oppoſition which they met with in their Paſſage, they had many unforeſeen Difficulties to ſurmount, when they were over. The Enemy, by this time, (d) In particular, the Author of the Impartial Hiſtory expreſſes himſelf in theſe very Words: "I have met with ſeveral that will not believe that the King was touch'd with a Cannon Bullet at all; and if ſo, that it was impoſſible it ſhould not kill him. But I was preſent when the thing happen'd, and, therefore, can affirm the Truth of it. p. 76.

(e) It was about Midnight that the Court (of France) receiv'd the News of King William's Death (on the Report of one of King James's Lackeys); yet tho' it is not uſual to make Bonfires for the Death of an Enemy before he is defeated in Battle, the Emiſſaries nevertheleſs immediately ran about the Streets, awaking up the People of the City, and crying out to them, Riſe and make Bonfires! So that in leſs than an Hour, all Paris was in a Blaze; and nothing was to be heard but Drums, Trumpets, and Hautboys. Afterwards, the Rabble made the Effigies of King William and Queen Mary, dragg'd them thro' the Dirt, and at laſt threw them into the Fire. The Bells rung in ſeveral Pariſhes; the great Guns roar'd from the Baſtile; neither was any thing omitted which is uſually done on ſolemn Occaſions. State of Europe for Auguſt, 1690. p. 31.

A. D. 1690. time, were drawn up in two Lines, and were ſo ſtrong in Foot, that the Engliſh, who had then only ſix Battalions, did not think proper to attack them, till they were reinforc'd by other Corps from the main Body. They had alſo the Corn Fields and Ditches, formerly ſpoken of, to paſs over, and beyond them a large Bog, which the Horſe were oblig'd to wheel round, and the Foot had Orders to march thro'. Theſe ſeveral Embarraſſments not only took up much time, but gave the Iriſh all the Advantages they could have deſir'd: And yet, they no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh take to the Bog, than, inſtead of charging them in it, they fac'd about, and retreated in Diſorder towards Duleek; poſſibly, in fear of being ſurrounded by Colonel Schomberg with the Horſe and Dragoons; who, having ſkirted the Bog, came up, nevertheleſs, time enough to fall in with the Rear of their Foot; among whom they did ſome Execution.

But the Tide was ſoon turn'd; for King James, apprehending, that the Streſs of the Battle would lye on his Left, had order'd a great Part of his Center to march that way; which oblig'd the Count to ſend to King William for Reinforcement, or at leaſt, to intreat his Majeſty to make a Diverſion, that he might not be overpower'd by the Enemy.

And now it was, that the Word was given for the main Body, which conſiſted of the Dutch Guards, the French Regiments, and ſome Battalions of Engliſh, to take the River; which they did accordingly, under the Cover of a continual Diſcharge of Cannon, and which, it ſeems, the Enemy were not in a Condition to return; for, by a ſtrange Fatality, they had rather choſe to provide for the Security of their Cannon, by ſending moſt of them away, than to make uſe of them for their own, when alone they could be of Uſe.

The River, we are told, was Waiſt-high; and when the Men were about half over, they were ſaluted with the whole Fire of all the Troops poſted behind the Hedges, Works, and in the Houſes along the oppoſite Shore: Notwithſtanding which but one Man fell, and one was wounded. A Lieutenant of Grenadiers was the firſt Man who landed; and two Files was the whole Force with which he began the Engagement, while the reſt were yet wading thro' the Stream. But Cowardice on the Enemy's Side, made way for what, perhaps, could not have been accompliſh'd by any Bravery on his; for the Iriſh, who were poſted behind the next Hedge, after one Diſcharge, turn'd their Backs; and by their Example, the reſt did the ſame. This gave time for a Succeſſion of Troops to land; but before they could form, they were briſkly charg'd by a Squadron of Iriſh, who came down full Speed; and being repuls'd, made off again as faſt. And now no leſs than ſeven Regiments of Iriſh Foot, and ſeveral Squadrons of Horſe, A. D. 1690. appear'd from behind certain little Hills, where they had till now been ſtation'd to ſhelter them from the Cannon, under the Command of Hamilton, who made a Diſpoſition with Part of them, to attack thoſe of the Dutch and French, who were already landed; and with the reſt, march'd down into the very River to diſpute the Paſſage with thoſe who were ſtill preſſing over. But theſe Efforts of his were, in a great meaſure, defeated by the Cowardice of his own Foot, who had ſuch a Panic upon them, that they could not be brought to execute his Orders, or make a Stand any where: His Horſe, on the contrary, tho' it does not appear that they were under any regular Command, charg'd deſperately every where; one Squadron in particular, almoſt broke Mr. la Calimot's Regiment of Foot; for about forty of them forc'd their way quite thro' them, and mortally wounded the (f) Colonel himſelf: Another Squadron held the Dutch Guards in play; a third defended the Shore againſt Hammer's Regiment; and, in general, wherever a Body of our Foot was drawing up, they had a Body of the Enemy's Horſe to oppoſe them.

It ſeems, that King William, relying, perhaps, too much on the Goodneſs of the Infantry, which compos'd his Center, had diſtributed all his Cavalry into his Wings, where he thought they would be of moſt Uſe, by out-flanking the Enemy, except a Squadron of Danes, who were driven out of the Field almoſt as ſoon as they came into it, and repaſs'd the River again, without once looking behind them. The Conſequence of this Over-fight, was, that the Foot being unſupported, had no time to cloſe their Ranks, but were expos'd both in Front and Flank at once; and, inſtead of attacking, found it no eaſy Matter to defend themſelves. Horſe! Horſe! was the Cry from Battalion to Battalion, which was even caught by the Country People, and propagated to the right Wing, where it being underſtood for Halt! one Error produc'd another, and thoſe who had Opportunity by the Fore-lock, for a while let it ſlip out of their Hands.

In this tumultuous Interval, when all Conduct ſeem'd to be at an End, Duke Schomberg thought it his Duty to paſs the River in Perſon; and, having put himſelf at the Head of the French Proteſtants, animated them to the Charge, by ſaying, Come on, Gentlemen! Behold your Perſecutors (pointing to their Papiſt Countrymen in the Iriſh Army.) But no ſooner were theſe Words out of his Mouth, than a Party of thoſe very Horſe who had before broke thro' la Calimot's Regiment, returning the ſame way, fell upon the Duke, and gave him two Wounds in the Head: And what was ſtill more fatal, his own Men, who had made way for theſe Deſperadoes, in a Belief that they were Engliſh who had been ſent to their Succour, now convinc'd

(f) To whoſe Honour it is remember'd, That, dying, as he was, he encourag'd thoſe who were croſſing the River, in theſe Words, A la Gloire, mes Enfans, a la Gloire! To Glory, my Boys, to Glory!

A.D. 1690. convinc'd of their Error, to repair it, fir'd both on him and them; and, in endeavouring to be his Avengers, became his Deſtroyers; for one of their Shot paſs'd thro' the Nape of his Neck, and kill'd him on the Spot.

Thoſe who were diſtreſs'd and diſorder'd before, it muſt be ſuppos'd, were confounded now: And ſuch evident Signs of their Diſtraction appear'd, that even the very Infantry of King James, who had ſo ſhamefully abandon'd their Poſts, were induc'd to rally, and return to the Charge, with a Face of Reſolution at leaſt.

By this time, King William, himſelf, accompany'd by the Prince of Denmark, who ſerv'd as a Voluntier, had paſs'd the River in a very difficult and unaccuſtom'd Place, with the Daniſh, Dutch and Iniſkillen Horſe, who form'd the Left, without Oppoſition; and, after having diſcharg'd himſelf from a Bog on the other Side, drew his Sword, and march'd in the Front towards the Enemy, now ready, both Horſe and Foot, to fall upon his Center: And ſuch an Effect had his very Appearance, that the Latter relaps'd immediately into their former Cowardice; and having made a ſudden Halt, as ſuddenly fac'd about, and retreated up Hill towards a little Village call'd Dunore, about Half a Mile from the Paſs at Old-Bridge: His Majeſty follow'd; and at the Village, the Iriſh once more fac'd about, and acquitted themſelves ſo bravely, that the Dutch and Daniſh Horſe, tho' headed by the King in Perſon, recoil'd; and his Majeſty, in a Heat, paſs'd on to the Iniſkilleners, and then to another Body of Dutch, who (g) all in turn gave way to the Fury of the Enemy: And if two Parties of Cunningham's and Levinſon's Dragoons, under the Command of a Lieutenant-Colonel and a Captain, had not diſmounted and lin'd the Hedges, as alſo an old Houſe that flank'd the Lane thro' which the Rout paſs'd, poſſibly this Counter-turn had been fatal: But the Execution done by them damping the Ardour of the Purſuers, the Fugitives had time to rally, and, returning to the Charge, in Half an Hour's time, drove the Iriſh before them, and became Victors in their Turn; Hamilton himſelf being wounded and taken Priſoner, together with ſeveral other Officers.

Here all our Hiſtorians agree to ſpeak of an Interlocutory, that paſs'd between that General and the King, to the following Effect: King. Do you think the Iriſh will fight any more! Hamilton. Upon my Honour I believe they will; for they have a good Body of Horſe ſtill. K. Your Honour! Your Honour! And this, which was accompany'd with a Look of Diſdain and Contempt, we are told, was all the Reproof which his Majeſty beſtow'd upon him, for having broke his Truſt in the Affair of the Treaty with Tyrconnel, ſo lately alluded to. All theſe Writers, however, A.D. 1690. agree in repreſenting Hamilton as a good Officer, and in diſtinguiſhing him above all others in the Duties and Services of the Day; whereas, the Jacobites ſtigmatiſe him by the Name of the Arch Traitor, and aſcribe the Loſs of the Field, to his deſerting his Poſt, and betraying his Maſter. [Remarkson the preſent Confederacy, 410 p. 22.]

It is to be lamented that thoſe who have deſcended to ſuch Minuteneſſes as theſe, ſhould be deficient in the main Circumſtances of their Story. What Part the Center had in turning the Fortune of the Day, after they had been ſo ſeaſonably reliev'd by the Approach of his Majeſty and the Horſe of the Left Wing, is no where explan'd. Again, tho' we are told by one Author, it would have been more for the Advantage of King James, to have poſted his French and Swiſs at the main Paſs, than his Iriſh Guards, who inſiſted on it as their Right to have the Poſt of Honour, we are not expreſly told where thoſe foreign Auxiliaries were poſted. And tho' we are told by another, "That they no way derogated from the good Opinion which was generally conceiv'd of their Valour, but ſtood to it till they ſaw themſelves abandon'd of the Iriſh; after which, they retreated in good Order," no particular Inſtances are given of the Merit which is thus applauded. [Impartial Hiſtory, p. 80.] [State of Europe, Vol. ii. p. 44.]

As to the Right Wing of the Engliſh, and the Left of the Iriſh, it could ſcarce be ſaid that they were engag'd at all: The Latter, as we have ſeen, retreated before Count Schomberg, on his firſt Appearance: And tho' when he halted, they did the ſame, no ſooner was he again in Motion, with a large Reinforcement of Horſe and Foot, than they again turn'd their Backs, and retreated with the utmoſt Precipitation. The Count, who had by this time receiv'd the News of his Father's Death, and who was now doubly animated with Glory and Revenge, did his utmoſt to overtake them: But ſo interſected was the Ground with Bogs and Ditches, that he found it impracticable: At Duleek there was, beſides, a Cut thro' the Meadows, ſoft at Bottom, and with high Banks on each Side, in which was one only Interval, broad enough for about ſix to paſs thro' at once. Of this the Iriſh had Poſſeſſion. And while the Count was yet floundering thro' the Bogs he was ſurrounded with, they drew up on the other Side, brought the few Field-Pieces they had to bear upon their Purſuers, and thereby held them at Bay till their Foot, and the greateſt Part of their Horſe, had got a full Mile before them. Nor when the Count did, at laſt, force the Paſs, and renew the Purſuit, was he able to ſnatch any farther Advantage; which, as before, is imputed to the Badneſs of the Ground. But ſurely that was not all; for even in this imperfect Account, we may diſcern the Traces of excellent Conduct on the Side of the Enemy. And hence we are authoriz'd

(g) But the Iniſkilleners, it is ſaid, by Miſtake; for thinking they were to obſerve the Motion of his Majeſty, who had condeſcended to lead them up, as he wheel'd, they wheel'd: And it is added, that they afterwards perform'd good Service.

A. D. 1690. authoris'd to conclude, that the French and Swiss Auxiliaries under the Count Lauzun, had the Poſt of Honour on this Occaſion, and cover'd the Rear of thoſe daſtardly Troops that were ſcarce worth ſaving.

After what manner the Center and Right of the Iriſh Army left the Field, is not ſpecify'd at all; only we may gather by Circumſtances, that the whole Torrent took the ſame Channel; for, of King James it is ſaid, that, during a great Part of the Action, he had his Station at the little old Church upon the Hill of Dunore; and that when he ſaw his Troops give way on all Sides, he was prevail'd upon to provide for his own Safety, by retiring thro' the Village of Duleek.

Of that Prince's taking any Part in the Action, or making any one Effort, to animate the Iriſh, or recover the Day, we find not the leaſt Mention in any Hiſtorian whatever. Burnet is expreſs, That he ſtay'd all the while with his Guards at a ſafe Diſtance, and never came into the Place of Danger or of Action: That he was the firſt that run for it; and that he reach'd Dublin before the Action was over. [V. ii. p. 51.]

On the other hand, tho' much is ſaid of King William's perſonal Bravery, very few Compliments are beſtow'd on his Conduct. "As for his Majeſty himſelf, ſays the Author of the Impartial Hiſtory, he drew up his Army, gave his general Orders to his Officers, and the beſt Orders wherever he was in Perſon: But the greateſt Captain that ever was, or will be, is not, nor can be, of himſelf ſufficient to redreſs all Diſorders, or lay hold on all Advantages in an Inſtant, where Armies are once engag'd. And farther, his Majeſty having committed a conſiderable Part of his Orders to the Care of his General, the Death of him muſt needs be a Diſadvantage to the whole Army."

This is, in Effect, an Acknowledgment, that the Conduct of the Day was far from being faultleſs: And that there was no Reſerve of Horſe to ſupport the Center, is taken notice of as an Error in the firſt Digeſtion of Things, even by this very Author. He alſo acknowledges, that it was Matter of Wonder to ſome, that the Advice of the Lords Oxford and Portland, to detach three thouſand Dragoons, with each a Foot-Soldier behind him to haraſs the Rear of the Enemy, and make the moſt of the Victory, was not follow'd: But then he ſuggeſts, that the Ground would not admit of an orderly Purſuit, and that any other would have been dangerous, and might have been fatal to the Purſuers. Burnet again, after pronouncing that the Horſe and Dragoons could not purſue becauſe of their Wearineſs, and becauſe the Camp was unfurniſh'd with the neceſſary Refreſhments, endeavours to turn this very Neglect into a Compliment, by ſaying, "The Army of the Iriſh was ſo entirely forſaken by their Officers, that the King thought they would have diſpers'd themſelves, and that the following them would have been a mere Butchery, which was a thing he always abhorr'd." And yet, forgetting all this, in his very next Page, he adds, "The Iriſh Army was forſaken by their Officers for two Days: If there had been a hot Purſuit, it would have put an End to the War in Ireland." A. D. 1690.

But it is manifeſt from the Order of this Retreat, that they were not forſaken by their Officers in the Field of Battle, conſequently when the Purſuit ſhould have been made, that Argument did not exiſt. Then as to the Loſs on their Side, according to the higheſt Liſt, it did not exceed fifteen hundred; whereas, their whole Number before the Battle amounted to more than twenty-five thouſand; and they had in their ſeveral Garriſons above fifteen thouſand more. As therefore it was ſcarce ſuppoſable then, that King James would not rally his ſcatter'd Troops, and reinforce them to the utmoſt of his Power; ſo it is inconceivable now, that King William, from the Succeſs of one Day, ſhould conclude the War was at an End.

The very Truth is, that King James's own Behaviour in, and after, the Battle, was more detrimental to his Cauſe, than the Loſs of it. As he had preſum'd too much before, he deſponded too ſoon afterwards. And this Deſpondency of his, appearing in his very Face, infected all about him. From the Field he poſted on to Dublin, where immediately aſſembling the Magiſtracy, he told them, "That his Army in England having made a total Defection againſt him, when he had the greateſt Occaſion for them, he retir'd to France, where he was kindly receiv'd by that King, and had all the Aſſurance imaginable to be re-eſtabliſh'd on his Throne: That in ſome time after, he came to this Kingdom of Ireland, and found all his Roman Catholic Subjects as well equipt and prepar'd to defend his Cauſe, as their Ability would bear: And tho' he had been often told, that when it came to the Touch, they would never bear the Brunt of the Battle, he could never credit the ſame till that Day, when having a good Army, and all Preparations fit to engage a foreign Invader, he found the fatal Truth of what he had been ſo often precaution'd: And tho' the Army did not deſert him, as they did in England, yet when it came to Trial, they baſely fled the Field, and left it a Spoil to his Enemies; nor could they be prevail'd upon to rally, tho' the Loſs in the whole Defeat was but inconſiderable; ſo that henceforward he never more determin'd to head an Iriſh Army, and did now reſolve to ſhift for himſelf, as they themſelves muſt do. That it had often been debated, in caſe ſuch a Revolution ſhould happen, Whether upon deſerting the City of Dublin, the ſame might not be fir'd? That he did therefore charge them, on their Allegiance, That they neither ſhould riſle it by Plunder, nor deſtroy it by Fire; which, in all Kingdoms would be judg'd very barbarous, and muſt be believ'd to be done by his Orders; and if done, there would be but little Mercy to be expected from an enrag'd Enemy; concluding, he was neceſſitated to yield to Force, but would never ceaſe to labour their Deliverance as long as he liv'd."

King James poſts to Dublin.

His Speech to the Magiſtrates of Dublin.

Perhaps, in the whole Compaſs of Hiſtory

A.D. 1690. tory, a more impolitic Speech than this is not to be met with. He condemns the Irish in a Body, rejects their Services, and, in Effect, makes a Transfer of their Allegiance to King William, as his own Act and Deed; tho' he acknowledges the Loss of the Day was but inconsiderable; tho' he was still in Possession of the Capital, as also of many other important Places; and tho' he had entertain'd such mighty Expectations from the Power and Success of France by Sea, which should have induc'd him to continue the Struggle to the last. In short, so low does it sink him in our Esteem, that it almost extinguishes our Compassion: And even the Charge he gives concerning the City of Dublin, which is the only meritorious Part of it, more incenses us against his Party, than it reconciles us to himself.

One Night he did venture to stay at Dublin, but the very next Morning he made all possible Haste to Waterford, attended by the Duke of Berwick, Marquis of Powis, and Tyrconnel; and causing all the Bridges to be broke down behind him, for fear the same Power which had been so anxious to send him out of England, should endeavour to detain him in Ireland. Here he went on board a Vessel call'd The Count de Lauzun, which lay (b) ready for his Reception; and having put to Sea, fell in with the French Squadron, which convoy'd him safe to France.

He embarks at Waterford, and sets sail for France.

What Orders he left for his Army, or whether he left any, has not been ascertain'd: All that we know is, That most of his Cavalry came into Dublin the Evening he left it, and most of the Infantry next Morning; That before the next Night they quitted it again, having first releas'd all the Prisoners, without committing any Outrages, and took the City-Militia, who were Papists to a Man, along with them: That they took their Rout to the Westward: That the principal Officers who accompany'd King James to Waterford, having seen him set sail, return'd to the Army, with a Resolution to continue the War as long as they had Means to support it, not so much for his Majesty's sake as their own; and that they were so little discourag'd by his Departure, that they declar'd, They were better without him than with him.

King William, on the other hand, had gain'd so much Reputation by his Bravery, even among his Enemies, that Sarsfield himself made no Difficulty to swear, That if the two Armies were to change Kings, the Irish would fight the Battle over again, and beat us into the Bargain.

But Bravery is only a Second-rate Virtue in a General, and one Master-stroke of Conduct in the Tent, is sometimes worth more than the noblest Effort of a whole Army. Except his General Schomberg, who was indeed an irreparable (i) Loss, his Majesty did not lose above four (k) hundred in the Engagement: So that his Strength, in Comparison with that of the Enemy, was much greater than before: And as well by their Ruin as by the Increase of his own Reputation, he was in a much better Capacity to make use of it. A.D. 1690.

The Value of a Victory is known by the Fruits: All the Night after the Battle, the English lay on their Arms, at Dulork, having no Tents to cover them, nor Refreshments of any kind. The next Morning a Party out of every Regiment were sent to bring up the Baggage; and Mr. Meloneere, with a thousand Horse and Dragoons, three hundred Foot, and eight Pieces of Cannon were sent to reduce Drogheda; the Governor of which Place surrender'd it, on being told, That in case he made any Resistance he should have no Quarter.

Athlone, Limerick, and Galkway, were the next Garrisons; and it became a Question, whether it was most adviseable to reduce these Places also, or to follow the Irish Army to Dublin. Those who were for the former Opinion urg'd, That the Terror of the late Defeat, and the Example of Drogheda, would make the Enterprize easy; more especially as that Army had, in a manner, abandon'd them; and when this was done, the Irish would be under a Necessity of fighting another pitch'd Battle, or submitting: And that as to Dublin, it was an open Place, and consequently would not refuse Admittance to the Conqueror. Those, who, on the contrary, were for pursuing the Irish, alledg'd, That neither the Condition nor Purpose of the Enemy was as yet known: That, possibly, they were then making their Disposition to face them again: That, in such Case, it might be fatal to divide the Army: That as the King had receiv'd Intelligence, that the French Armada was at Sea, and it was uncertain where the Storm would fall, it might be equally fatal to withdraw from the Coast: And lastly, that the taking Possession of the Capital of the Kingdom would be of more Credit and Importance to his Majesty's Service, than any other Successes whatsoever.

The last of these Opinions had the Royal Sanction, tho' it is said, the Places in question would (b) Which, according to the London Gazette, No. 2574. Sir Patrick Trant had been sent the Day before the Battle to provide.

(i) "This I am certain of, that we never knew the Value of him till we really lost him; which often falls out in such Cases: And since it was in our Quarrel that he lost his Life, we cannot too much honour his Memory; which will make a considerable Figure in History whilst the World lasts. He was certainly a Man of the best Education in the World, and knew Men and Things beyond most of his Time, being courteous and civil to every body, and yet had something always that look'd so great in him, that he commanded Respect from Men of all Qualities and Stations. Nor did we know any Fault that he had, except we might be jealous he sometimes was too obliging to the French. As to his Person, he was of a Middle Stature, well proportion'd, fair complexion'd, a very sound hardy Man of his Age, and fit an Horse the best of any Man. He lov'd constantly to be near in his Cloaths; and in his Conversation he was always pleasant: He was fourscore and two when he dy'd, and yet when he came to be unbowel'd, his Heart, Intrails, and Brain, were as fresh and found as if he had been but twenty: So that in probable he might have liv'd several Years, if Providence had not order'd it otherwise. Monsieur Gallimet, an honest worthy Gentleman, died soon after him of his Wounds, having follow'd that great Man in all his Fortunes." [Imp. Hist. p. 85, 86.

A. D. 1690. would certainly have yielded, if they had been inveſted, while the Terror of the late Victory hung over them.

It is, however, remarkable, that on the very Day after it was obtain'd, viz. July 2, the Army being encamp'd about a Mile from Dulcek, on what is call'd convenient Ground, a Party of the Enemy appear'd in Sight, and were ſuffer'd to go off without Moleſtation; tho' two Spies whom they had ſent into the Camp for Intelligence, were taken and hang'd on the Spot.

The next Day his Majeſty continu'd his March towards Dublin; and at a Place call'd Bally Brigham, where he halted that Night, receiv'd Advice of the Retreat of the Iriſh from that Capital, and the Flight of King James. Upon this a thouſand Horſe, under the Command of the Duke of Ormond, were diſpatch'd to take Poſſeſſion of it, who were follow'd by the Dutch Guards, with Orders to poſt themſelves in the Caſtle, which they did accordingly.

On the fifth, the whole Army encamp'd at Finglaſs, two Miles wide of Dublin, and the next Day, being Sunday, the King aſſiſted at Divine Service in the Cathedral Church of St. Patrick's at Dublin, but return'd to the Camp to Dinner, as ſoon as it was over. The next Day the Biſhops of Meath and Limerick, and moſt of the Proteſtant Clergy, came in a Body to pay their Reſpects to his Majeſty; upon which Occaſion, the firſt of thoſe Prelates, in a ſet Speech, gave him to underſtand, "That they came not to beg his Protection, for he had given ſufficient Demonſtrations of his Affection towards them, by venturing his Royal Perſon for their Deliverance, but they came to congratulate his Arrival, to pray for the Continuance of his good Succeſs, and to give his Majeſty all the Aſſurance poſſible of their Loyalty and Obedience, intreating his Majeſty not to think worſe of them for ſtaying in Ireland, and ſubmitting to a Power that it was impoſſible for them to reſiſt, ſince they had been as ſerviceable to the Church's Intereſt and his Majeſty's by ſtaying, as they could have been otherwiſe; with a great deal more to that Purpoſe. The King made Anſwer, that as he had, by the Bleſſing of God, ſucceeded ſo far, he doubted not, but by God's Aſſiſtance, to free them abſolutely, and that in a ſmall time, from Popiſh Tyranny, which was his Deſign in coming. Then the Biſhop of Limerick deſir'd his Majeſty to give them leave to appoint a Day of public Thankſgiving, and to compoſe a Form of Prayer upon that Occaſion; to which his Majeſty aſſented.

King William enters Dublin.

Upon the ſeventh his Majeſty ſet forth a Declaration, which, on many Accounts, deſerves to be inſerted intire:

Sets forth a Declaration.

WILLIAM, R.

"As it hath pleaſed Almighty God to bleſs our Arms in this Kingdom with a late Victory over our Enemies at the Boyne, and with the Poſſeſſion of our Capital City of Dublin, and with a general Diſperſion of all that did oppoſe us; we are now in ſo happy a Proſpect of our Affairs, and of extinguiſhing the Rebellion of this Kingdom, that we hold it reaſonable to think of Mercy, and to have Compaſſion upon thoſe whom we judge to have been SEDUCED. Wherefore we do hereby declare, We ſhall take into our Royal Protection, all poor Labourers, common Soldiers, Country Farmers, Plowmen, and Cottiers, whatſoever: As alſo, all Citizens, Tradeſmen, Townſmen, and Artificers, who either remain'd at home, or having fled from their Dwellings, ſhall, by the firſt of Auguſt next, repair to their uſual Places of Abode, ſurrendring up what Arms they have to ſuch Juſtices of the Peace as are or ſhall be appointed by us, not only to receive the ſame, but alſo to regiſter the Appearance of ſuch of the ſaid Perſons as ſhall come and ſubmit to our Authority. For our Royal Intention is, and we do hereby declare, That we will not only pardon all thoſe ſeduced People, as to their Lives and Liberties, who ſhall come in by the time aforeſaid, for all Violences they have committed by the Command of their Leaders during the time of the War: But we do alſo promiſe to ſecure them in their Goods, their Stocks of Cattle, and all their Chattels Perſonal whatſoever, willing and requiring them to come in; and where they were Tenants, there to preſerve the Harveſt of Graſs and Corn, for the Supply of the Winter. But foraſmuch as many of them have a legal Right to the Tenancy of ſeveral Lands, ſome holden from Proteſtants, and ſome held from Popiſh Proprietors, who have been concern'd in the Rebellion againſt us: Our WILL and PLEASURE is, that all thoſe who held from our good Proteſtant Subjects, do pay their Rents to their reſpective Landlords: And that the Tenants of all thoſe who have been concern'd in the Rebellion againſt us, do keep their Rents in their Hands, until they have Notice from the Commiſſioners of our Revenue, unto whom they are to account for the ſame. And as we do hereby ſtrictly forbid all Violence, Rapine and Moleſtation, to any who ſhall thus come in, and remain obedient to us; we do hereby charge and require, that they be not diſquieted in any ſort, without our particular Command. For the deſperate Leaders of this Rebellion, who have violated thoſe Laws, by which this Kingdom is united and inſeparably annex'd to the Imperial Crown of England; who have call'd in the French; who have authoriz'd all Violences and Depredations againſt the Proteſtants, and who rejected the gracious Pardon we offer'd them in our Proclamation of the 22d of February, 1688; as we are now, by God's great Favour, in a Condition to make them ſenſible of their Errors, ſo we are reſolv'd to leave them to the Event of War, unleſs by great and manifeſt Demonſtrations, we ſhall be convinc'd, that they deſerve our Mercy, which we ſhall never refuſe to thoſe that are truly penitent. Given at our Royal Camp at Finglaſs, near Dublin, the 7th of July, 1690, in the ſecond Year of our Reign."

A. D. 1690.

Two Days after this Declaration was publiſh'd in the Camp, that neither Officers nor Soldier might have the leaſt Pretence to diſobey,

A.D. 1690. obey. And yet so feeble was the King's Authority, or so licentious was the Spirit which had taken possession of his Army, that no Edict was ever less observ'd, or rather more notoriously violated.

reduc'd the Brass Money.

And on the tenth, the (l) Brass Money utter'd by King James, was, by Proclamation, reduc'd to near its intrinsic Value; that is to say, the large Half-Crown to one Penny Steel. the small one to three Farthings; the large Copper Shilling to a Half-penny; and the small one, and the Six-pence, to a Farthing each.

The Queen's Administration at home.

It is now high time to treat of the Queen's Administration. According to the Historian of his own Times, her Cabinet Council was compos'd of four Tories and four Whigs, on whose Advice she was chiefly to rely. And he farther suggests, that tho' the Numbers were thus equally balanc'd, the Latter were dissatisfy'd, because the Marquis of Carmarthen and the Earl of Nottingham, were most in Credit and Favour. But even the Numbers were not equally balanc'd, for they were nine in all, and the Tories had the Casting-Vote: The List stood thus: The Lord Steward, Devonshire, the Lord Chamberlain, Dorset, the Earl of Monmouth, and Mr. Edward Russel, Whigs; and the Lord President, Carmarthen, the Earl of Nottingham, Secretary of State, the Earl of Pembroke, first Lord of the Admiralty, Sir John Lowther, first Commissioner of the Treasury, and the Earl of Marlborough, Tories.

The great Object of their Cares was to supply the King in Ireland, to make Provision against the Efforts of the French Fleet, and to keep the Peace at home. Of the Proclamation to apprehend certain Persons accus'd upon Oath, of conspiring against the Government, Mention has been already made: And soon after, two other Proclamations were set forth to command all Papists and reputed Papists to depart from the Cities of London and Westminster, and for confining all Popish Recusants within five Miles of their respective Dwellings. As to the Naval Preparations of the French, Advice was again receiv'd from St. Malo's, by the Vessel employ'd in Exchange of Prisoners, that they were then, June the 2d, hard at Work at Brest in fitting out their Fleet; and the actual Truth was, that the said Fleet had actually put to Sea before that time, tho' they had been forc'd back by contrary Winds. Still the Disposition on our Side was not so forward as it ought to have been; for Lord Torrington did not hoist his Flag on board the Royal Sovereign at the Downs, till the 30th of May, nor set sail for St. Helen's till the 12th of June following: But as he had the good Fortune to arrive there on the 14th, and the same Wind which prov'd so favourable to him, equally retarded the French, he had been still time enough to have met them Mid-way, if his Strength would have justify'd him for doing so. Burnet is indeed extremely willing to burden him with all the Miscarriages of the Year, and in particular says, That he did not make the Haste that was necessary to join his own Squadron with that under Killigrew from Spain, and that under Shovel from Ireland; both which, that Author supposes, were waiting for him at Plymouth; whereas, neither of them arriv'd there till July; which was after the Action between the two Fleets was over: So that the Fact being misrepresented, it follows of course, that the Admiral is not liable to the Inference drawn from it. And, in Reality, had he insisted on waiting till those very necessary Reinforcements had come up, he had, perhaps, been more justifiable, than in obeying those rash Orders which oblig'd him to fight, before he was in a Condition to do so either with Honour or Safety. A.D. 1690.

The French Fleet discover'd off Plymouth.

The French Fleet was discover'd off Plymouth, June 20; and on the 23d, Lord Torrington put to Sea with what Force he had, and lay in wait for them at Dunose, at the Back of the Isle of the Wight, where he was join'd the next Day, by the Lion, Constant, and Warwick, and several Dutch Men of War; which is a new Proof, that the French were not expected so soon, and that yet more time was requisite to give them a proper Reception. Burnet acknowledges, that Torrington thought he was not strong enough, and that he signify'd as much to the Admiralty, together with his Opinion, That he ought to return to Portsmouth, till his Complement was complete. "Some, continues the Bishop, began to call his Courage in question, and imputed this to Fear: They thought this would too much exalt our Enemies, and discourage our Allies, if we left the French to triumph at Sea, and to be the Masters of our Coast and Trade: For our Merchants richest Ships were coming home; so that the leaving them to such a Superiority, would be both very unbecoming, and very mischievous to us. The Queen order'd Russel to advise both with the Navy-Board, and with all that understood Sea-Affairs: And, upon a View of the Strength of both Fleets, they were of Opinion, that tho' the French were superior in Number, yet our Fleet was so equal in Strength with them, that it was reasonable to send Orders to our Admiral to venture an Engagement: Yet the Orders were not so positive, but that a great deal was left to a Council of War."

Russel was indeed the only Seaman in the Cabinet, and, therefore, it is probable enough, that his Opinion was consulted by her Majesty, tho' not in the manner here set down: But then, it ought to be remember'd, that Russel himself aspir'd to the chief Command of the Fleet, and, therefore, no Advice was to be expected from him, that was likely to contribute to the Credit or Importance of the only

A. D. 1690. only Man who ſtood in his way. Then as to the Equality of the two Fleets in point of Strength, the Dutch Admiral, Evertſen, in in his Letter to the States after the Action, talks both of the ſuperior Number and Bigneſs of the French Ships, as a Reaſon why it was reſolv'd, not to engage them in open Sea. Beſides, it is notorious, That the French Fleet conſiſted of ſeventy-eight Men of War, and twenty-two Fire-Ships, carrying in all four thouſand ſeven hundred and two Pieces of Cannon; whereas, the Engliſh and Dutch together, had but fifty-ſix Men of War, which mounted, in all, but three thouſand four hundred and ſixty-two Guns. And as to the Orders not being ſo poſitive, &c. the ſame Officer is expreſs, That Torrington on the 29th receiv'd the Queen's Orders not to delay engaging. And all other Authors agree, That thoſe Orders were to fight the Enemy at all Events.

The Fleets had continu'd in Sight of each other for five Days together; during all which time, by the mere Dint of Seamanſhip, Torrington had made ſuch a Uſe of the Winds and Tides, that the French, with all their Superiority, durſt not attack him; and, poſſibly, if he had been permitted to continue on the Defenſive, they would have had no favourable Opportunity to force him to an Action at all.

But her Majeſty's Command putting an End to this cautious Procedure, on the 30th of June, Torrington, as ſoon as it was light, gave the Signal for the Line, and bore down upon the Enemy, who made the beſt Diſpoſition they could to receive him. The Signal of Battle was made about Eight; the Engagement began about Nine, and the Dutch Squadron, which made the Van of the United Fleets, fell in with the Van of the French, and put them into ſome Diſorder. About Half an Hour after, our Blue Squadron engag'd their Rear very warmly; but the Red, commanded by the Earl of Torrington, in Perſon, which made the Center of our Fleet, could not come up till about ten; and this occaſion'd a great Opening between them and the Dutch. The French, making uſe of this Advantage, ſurrounded the Latter, who defended themſelves very gallantly, tho' they ſuffer'd extremely from ſo unequal a Diſpute. The Admiral ſeeing their Diſtreſs, endeavour'd to relieve them (tho' with great Caution, according to the French Accounts) and while they dropt their Anchors (the only Method they had left to preſerve themſelves) he drove with his own Ship, and ſeveral others, between them and the Enemy; and in that Situation anchor'd about five in the Afternoon, when it grew calm; but perceiving how much the Dutch had ſuffer'd, and how little Probability there was of regaining any thing by renewing the Fight, he weigh'd about nine at Night, and retir'd Eaſtward with the Tide of Flood (m). A. D. 1

The Sea-Fight off Beachy.

The next Day it was reſolv'd in a Council of War, held in the Afternoon, to endeavour to preſerve the Fleet, by retreating, and rather to deſtroy the diſabled Ships, if they ſhould be preſſed by the Enemy, than to hazard another Engagement, by endeavouring to protect them. This Reſolution was executed with as much Succeſs as could be expected; which, however, was chiefly owing to want of Experience in the French Admirals; for by not anchoring when the Engliſh did, they were driven to a great Diſtance, and by purſuing in a Line of Battle, inſtead of leaving every Ship to do her utmoſt, they could never recover what they had loſt by their Miſtake. But notwithſtanding all this, they continu'd their Purſuit as far as Rye Bay, and forc'd one of our Men of War of ſeventy Guns, call'd the Anne, which had loſt all her Maſts, on Shore near Winchelſea; they ſent in two Ships to burn her, which the Captain prevented, by ſetting Fire to her himſelf. The Body of the French Fleet ſtood in and out of Bourne and Pemſey, in Suſſex, while about fourteen of their Ships anchor'd near the Shore. Some of theſe attempted to burn a Dutch Ship of ſixty-four Guns, which at low Water lay dry; but her Commander defended her ſo briſkly every high Water, that they were at length forc'd to deſiſt, and the Captain carry'd her ſafe into Holland.

Our Loſs in this unlucky Affair, if we except Reputation, was not ſo great as might have been expected; not above two Ships, two Sea-Captains, two Captains of Marines, and three hundred and fifty private Men. The Dutch were much more unfortunate, becauſe more thoroughly engag'd. Beſides three Ships ſunk in the Fight, they were oblig'd to ſet fire to three more that were ſtranded on the Coaſt of Suſſex; in all, ſix Ships of the Line. They loſt likewiſe abundance of gallant Officers, particularly their Rear-Admirals, Dick and Brackel, and Captain Nordel, with a great Number of inferior Officers and Seamen.

The French giving over the Chace, Torrington brought his Fleet, without any farther Interruption, into the Mouth of the Thames; and having made the neceſſary Proviſion for the farther Security of it, in caſe the French ſhould attempt to follow them, transferr'd the Command to Sir John Aſhby, and repair'd to London, which he found in as much Conſternation; as if the whole Fleet had been deſtroy'd, as if the French had been in a Condition to land twenty thouſand Men immediately; and as if the whole Jacobite-Faction were already in Arms, and on the Point of co-operating with them, to bring about another Revolution.

Even the Government itſelf partook of the (m) Theſe Particulars (ſays the Author of the Lives of the Admirals, from whom this Account is copy'd) are taken from a very authentic Pamphlet; the Title of which runs thus: The Account given by Sir John Aſhby, Vice-Admiral, and Rear-Admiral Rooke, to the Lords Commiſſioners, of the Engagement at Sea, between the Engliſh, Dutch and French Fleets, June 30, 1690: With a Journal of the Fleet, ſince their Departure from St. Helen's, to their Return to the Buoy in the Nore, and other material Paſſages relating to the ſaid Engagement. London, printed for Randal Taylor, 1691, 4to p. 32.

A.D. 1690. the Panic, and affected to be more dismay'd than perhaps they really were, that the supposed Dangers of the Times might justify extraordinary Measures of Prevention. Thus, while the French were Lords of the Channel, and a Descent was every Moment expected, it was given out, that the Jacobites and Non-jurors were of their Party: that there was a Concert actually between them; and that there was to be an Insurrection of the Latter, to facilitate the Efforts of the Former. Kennet, Burchet, Boyer, Tindal, and many other Writers, servilely following each other, and all adopting the Forgeries of a Party for the Truth of things, have handed down the Particulars of this Conspiracy in the following Words, without any one Caveat to their Readers, or seeming Doubt in themselves of any one of them. "It was agreed, say they, that while Part of the French Fleet should bear up the Thames, to countenance the Jacobites in London, who were grown very bold and numerous, by the flocking of a great many of that Party from all Parts of the Country thither, they should make an Insurrection in several Places at once. Certain Persons were to have taken upon them the Administration of Affairs, till the Return of King James, who was to leave the Command of his Army to his Generals, and hasten with all Speed into England. The other Part of the French Fleet having join'd their Gallies, was to have landed eight thousand Men at Torbay, with Arms for a greater Number; after which, the Gallies and Men of War were to sail in the Irish Sea, to hinder the Return of King William and his Forces. And the discontented Scotch were to have revolted at the same time in several Parts of that Kingdom."

The Jacobite Plot.

Reflections thereon.

Now, we have already seen, that all the Hopes of the Jacobites in Scotland were not only at an End, but that the Government was in the whole of the Secret: We have seen King James, after his Defeat at the Boyne, hasten back to France, as if all his Measures, without Exception, were broken to Pieces: We have also left the French in a Condition to do whatever they were prepar'd to do: And we shall find that the Use they made of their Victory, had no sort of Agreement with the formal Story above. Besides, even Bishop Burnet, who is outdone by no body in Credulity, has not thought fit to give it the least Countenance: On the contrary, he only says, The Militia was rais'd; suspected Persons were secur'd; the Cry of the Populace was so much in favour of the new Government, that the Jacobites all England over, kept out of their way, for fear of being torn to Pieces by them, &c. And even in the new Proclamation, set forth by the Queen, July 14, for the apprehending the Earls of Litchfield, Aylesbury and Castlemain; the Lords Montgomery, Preston and Belasys; Sir Edward Hales, Sir Robert Thorold, Sir Robert Hamilton, Sir Theophilus Oglethorp, Colonel Sackville, Lieutenant-Colonel Abercromby, Lieutenant-Colonel Richardson, Major Soaper; Captain Lloyd, Pen, Elliot, Langdale and Rutter: Tho' it is said, that they had abetted and adher'd to their Majesties Enemies in the present Invasion, it is not said, that the Informations against them were upon Oath; nor is any one Particular advanc'd to justify the Charge: And of this Defect of Proof, Advantage has been taken by Writers of a contrary Sentiment, to suggest, That the whole was a Strain of Policy in the Government, for the sake of uniting its Friends, and confounding its Enemies; for, say they, the Fight was within three Weeks after King William's Departure; the French were seen off the Coast a Week before the Engagement; no body knew better than his Majesty what a Length of Time was necessary to prepare for so vast an Enterprize; It was impossible he should be without Intelligence of those Preparations; or that he should leave the Queen expos'd to the Fury of such a Storm, if he knew it was ready to burst upon her: After Torrington was beaten, what could have hinder'd the French from landing where they had pleas'd, if they had intended to have done so? But, any thing will pass, when People are frighted out of their Wits, &c.

[Cavet, Part iii. p. 51.]

And it must be own'd, that this Strain of Policy had all the Effect that could have been desir'd; as also, that the Credulity of the People was indeed equal to their Fears: For it was universally suppos'd, that the French, tho' as yet on board their Ships, design'd forthwith to join their Confederates on Shore; and that it was as necessary to guard against the Treachery of the one, as the open Violence of the other. And on the Strength of these, and such like Conclusions, an Address was presented by Shadrach Vincent, Esq; from above ten thousand Cornish Tinners, in which, "they beg leave to throw themselves at their Majesties Feet, with all Assurances of Fidelity and Obedience, faithfully promising (notwithstanding the Artifice and ill Designs of Disaffected Men to withdraw them from their Loyalty) That, as they did, without Reserve, make that Protestation of unalterable Allegiance to their Majesties alone, owning them to be their lawful and rightful King and Queen, so, they were ready to give the utmost Proof of it, by opposing every Interest (on what Pretence soever founded) contrary to their Majesties; and particularly by disclaiming all Allegiance to the late King, or to the pretended Prince of Wales, &c." The Lieutenancy of Middlesex and Westminster, took their Turn next, who, perceiving by their Majesties late Letters and Proclamations, so they express themselves, That there were many mischievous and dangerous Practices, Consultations, and Contrivances of Papists and many others, disaffected to your Royal Persons and Government proceed thus, "And it being now most notorious, that the French King, by Confederacy with the late King and his Adherents, hath made a bold Invasion of your Majesties Dominion of the narrow Seas, designing to destroy your Royal Fleet, and, in Consequence, to bring the Protestants of this Kingdom under his Tyranny and cruel Yoke of Bondage: We hold

A. D. 1690. hold ourſelves bound in Duty to ſhew to your Majeſties, upon this Occaſion, our deep Senſe, Hatred, and Abhorrence of the vile Ingratitude of thoſe Papiſts and proſeſs'd Proteſtants, who, notwithſtanding your Majeſties pardoning and protecting them, have, by Conſpiracies with the late King's Adherents, or by their Murmurings againſt your Majeſties and the preſent Government, or by their Refuſal of the Oaths of Fidelity and Obedience to your Majeſties, encourag'd, aſſiſted, or abetted the late King, in his Clames and Pretences of any Right and Title to the Government of theſe Realms, or deſign'd or promoted any Diſturbance of the Peace of your Majeſties happy Government. And being ſatisfy'd in our Conſciences, that your Majeſties are of Right our lawful Sovereign Liege Lord and Lady, King and Queen of theſe Realms, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, as it hath been declar'd and enacted by Parliament; and that all the Subjects of theſe Realms are bound in Conſcience to God and Men, to pay your Majeſties entire Obedience, according to the Laws, and to ſupport, defend, and maintain your Royal Perſons in the Royal State and Dignity of theſe Kingdoms. We think it our preſent Duty in this Juncture of Affairs, when ſo many Endeavours are us'd to pervert your Subjects from their due Obedience, to declare, in the Preſence of Almighty God, our Fidelity and Stedfaſtneſs in our dutiful Obedience to your Majeſties, and our Reſolution to expoſe ourſelves, and all we have, to defend and ſupport your Majeſties in the Adminiſtration of the Government, againſt all that ſhall dare to oppoſe you under any Pretence whatſoever."

and a third from London. And laſtly, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Lieutenancy of London, waited on her Majeſty in a Body, and by the Mouth of their Recorder, gave her to underſtand, "That it was the unanimous Reſolution of the City to defend and preſerve their Majeſties, and their Government, with the Hazard of their Lives, and the utmoſt of their Power: That the ſeveral Regiments of the Militia of the City, conſiſting of about nine thouſand Men, were complete in their Numbers, well arm'd and appointed, and ready to be rais'd immediately, and to proceed in their Majeſties Service: That the Lieutenancy alſo had reſolv'd, that ſix Regiments of Auxiliaries ſhould be rais'd for the Service; and that the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, in Council aſſembled, had unanimouſly reſolv'd by the voluntary Contribution of themſelves and other Citizens, forthwith to ſet out a large Regiment of Horſe, and a thouſand Dragoons for their Majeſties Service, and to maintain them at their own Charge for a Month, or longer, if there ſhould be Occaſion. And they pray'd her Majeſty to nominate and appoint Officers to command them;" which the Queen promis'd to do; and moreover thank'd them for their Readineſs and Loyalty on this Occaſion.

In this manner, the ſeeming Danger of the Government, ſerv'd to procure it additional Strength; and the baſe Notion of a Conſpiracy, produc'd the moſt authentic Proofs, That the Body of the Nation was, at all Hazards, reſolv'd to maintain the Settlement they had made. Some Waverers, no doubt, there were, and ſome who were already ſufficiently diſpos'd to go any Lengths in their Endeavours to bring about a Change. But whatever Practices they had actually engag'd in, or whatever new Thoughts they had entertain'd, when the combin'd Fleet was defeated, and the French were Maſters of the Sea, the News of the Victory at the Boyne, which came moſt ſeaſonable to re-animate the Authority of the Queen's Adminiſtration, unhing'd all their Purpoſes, and left them in a more deſponding State than ever.

Remarks on her Majeſty's Conduct at this Criſis. As to her Majeſty's own Behaviour, at this remarkable Criſis, it has been highly extol'd by one Party, and as much decry'd by the other. "In all this time of Fear and Diſorder, ſays Burnet, the Queen ſhew'd an extraordinary Firmneſs; for tho' ſhe was full of diſmal Thoughts, yet ſhe put on her ordinary Chearfulneſs when ſhe appear'd in Public, and ſhew'd no indecent Concern." Again, "Her Behaviour was, in all Reſpects, heroical; ſhe apprehended the Greatneſs of our Danger, but ſhe committed herſelf to God, and reſolv'd to expoſe herſelf, if Occaſion ſhould require it; for ſhe told me, ſhe would give me leave to wait on her, if ſhe was forc'd to make a Campaign in England, while the King was in Ireland." Others bear witneſs, that ſhe forgot nothing that the moſt active Prudence could ſuggeſt, for putting the Nation in a State of Defence, for re-fitting and re-inforcing the Fleet, and alſo for pacifying the States General, who were highly incens'd at Torrington's Behaviour, and the Loſs which their Fleet had ſuſtain'd in the late Engagement. And it is under the laſt of theſe Heads, that her Majeſty has incurr'd the Cenſure of the Jacobites.

It is acknowledg'd in the London Gazette, No 2575, that Lord Dorſley, the Britiſh Envoy Extraordinary at the Hague, had given their Lordſhips ſuch Satisfaction, that they had come to a Reſolution to return her Majeſty their moſt hearty Thanks. And in the very next Paper, we are farther inform'd, that her Majeſty, not content with the Profeſſions made on her Behalf by Lord Dorſley, had ſent Mr. Harboard, as her own particular Envoy, to their High Mightineſſes; and that being accompany'd to his Audience by that Miniſter, he repreſented, That he was commanded by her Majeſty to let them know, how much her Majeſty was concern'd at the Misfortune that had befall'n their Squadron in the late Engagement, and at their not having been ſeconded as they ought to have been; which Matter her Majeſty had directed to be examin'd into, in order to recompenſe thoſe that had done their Duty, and to puniſh ſuch as ſhould be found to have deſerv'd it: That her Majeſty had given Orders for re-fitting the Dutch Ships that were diſabled, at her own Charge; and commanded that all poſſible Care ſhould be taken of the ſick and wounded Seamen; and that Rewards ſhould be given to the Widows

A. D. 1690. Widows of thoſe that were kill'd, behaving themſelves bravely in the Fight, to encourage others to do well for the future: That her Majeſty had order'd twelve great Ships to be forthwith fitted out, and that ſhe hop'd the States would likewiſe do their utmoſt to reinforce their Fleet in this Conjuncture. And laſtly, he acquainted them with the King's happy Succeſſes in Ireland.

In the former of theſe Gazettes, public Notice is alſo given, that ſuch of the Dutch Seamen as had quitted their diſabled Ships, ſhould receive Conduct-Money of the Commiſſioners of the Navy; and that the Sick and Wounded ſhould be taken due Care of, till they were perfectly recover'd, &c.

[Remarks on the preſent Confederacy. &c. p. 28.] This, according to the Jacobites, was Partiality with a Vengeance; and what was more becoming a Vicegerent for the States, than the Head of an independent Government. Our Men, ſay they, in Subſtance, were left to periſh in the Hands of Country Surgeons, who were not a degree above Country Farriers: Inſtead of Rewards, they could never obtain their Arrears; and, when diſabled, inſtead of being honourably maintain'd by the Government, in whoſe Cauſe they had ſuffer'd, they were left adrift on the public Charity. There was indeed a ſort of Poſtſcript annex'd to the Order in relation to the Dutch, ſignifying, That the like Care ſhould alſo be taken of the Engliſh; but we are told, the Dutch had the ſame Preference in our Hoſpitals, &c. as they had at Court: And it muſt be own'd, That the formal Acknowledgment made by Mr. Harboard, That the Dutch had not been ſeconded as they ought to have been, was ſuch a Sacrifice of the Grandeur, Dignity, and Glory of the Nation, as could not be eaſily digeſted, nor ought to have been eaſily forgiven.

But, as if all this was not Satisfaction enough, the Accuſations prefer'd by Evertzeen, and the reſt of the Dutch Officers, againſt Lord Torrington, were not only countenanc'd, but publicly authoriz'd by Lord Nottingham, then the only Secretary of State; for, in a Letter to Lord Durſley, he aſcribes the Miſcarriage of the Day expreſly to the Treachery of that Admiral; which Letter was tranſlated into Dutch by Lord Durſley's Conſent, and inſerted in the Dutch Courant, to pacify the Clamours of the Dutch Mob. The Lords Devonſhire and Pembroke were alſo appointed to go from Ship to Ship to examine all Circumſtances to the Bottom: And in the mean while Torrington was depriv'd of his Commiſſion, and ſent to the Tower.

Torrington in Diſgrace.

A. D. 1690. At this Expence, the Union of the two States continu'd on as firm a Footing as before; and to keep pace with the Augmentation promis'd by the Queen, their High and Mighty Lordſhips order'd thirteen capital Ships, and ſix Frigats, to be immediately fitted out, and impos'd an Embargo on all Merchant Ships; which was to continue till they were all mann'd and ready to ſail.

The French Fleet, in the mean while, which was become ſo terrible by being victorious, inſtead of adventuring into the Thames, gave over the Chace at Dungeneſs; and on the eighth of July, made ſail for their own Coaſts. After which, no more was heard of them till the 21ſt, when they were diſcover'd to the South-Eaſt of Portland: And the next Day they came to Anchor in Torbay. This renew'd the Panic, which had been for ſome time ſuſpended: The Militia ſwarm'd along the Coaſt: A Camp was form'd in the Neighbourhood of Torbay: On the 25th the Lord Lanſdown came thither, to take upon him the chief Command: And, on the Morrow, the Enemy, who had till then continu'd quiet in the Bay, made uſe of their Galleys to cannonade a ſmall Town of about forty Houſes, call'd Tingmouth; and, finding no Reſiſtance (for the Militia were too remote to be of immediate Service) landed about a thouſand Men, who ſet fire to the Place, as alſo to a few coaſting Veſſels which belong'd to it: After which Exploit they return'd to their Ships. And having thus, as they thought, provided ſufficiently for their Reputation, the ſame Evening the whole Fleet ſet ſail; but the Wind proving contrary, they return'd again next Morning, and continu'd there till the fourth of Auguſt following, when they left it for good and all, and return'd to Breſt.

The French burn Tingmouth.

and return to Breſt.

After this manner the Cloud paſs'd away, which had hover'd ſo long on our Coaſt, and from which ſuch a Deluge of Miſchiefs was expected. And to keep themſelves in Countenance for having boaſted ſo much of a Victory, which had produc'd ſo little Fruit, the French Miniſtry ſet forth in the Paris Gazette a pompous (n) Account of the Deſcent they had made, and the Damages they had done us, which, when the Truth came to be known, only ſerv'd to make them yet more ridiculous all over Europe.

But tho' we have done with the Invaſion, we

(n) To this Effect: "The Count de Chateaumorant, Nephew to the Count de Tourville, arriv'd at Verſailles the 10th Inſtant, and brought the King an Account, That the Count de Tourville arriv'd the fourth Inſtant on the Coaſt of England near Torbay: That being inform'd there were ſeveral Engliſh Ships in the Bay of Tingmouth, he reſolv'd to burn them; and accordingly made a Detachment of fifteen hundred and ſeventy Men, under the Command of the Count d'Eſtree. The Chaloups and Saiques of the Galleys were commanded for this Deſcent. They anchor'd the fourth at Night, within half Cannon-ſhot of the Town. At break of Day there appear'd on the Shore about a hundred and fifty Horſe, and two hundred Foot, who came out of an Intrenchment, in which there were three Pieces of Cannon, but they retir'd upon the firſt Shot from our Galleys, and abandon'd their Battery, as ſoon as a hundred and fifty Grenadiers, commanded by the Sieur de Peintis, had made themſelves Maſters of ſome Houſes, and of a Church. The reſt of the Troops being landed, they poſſeſſed themſelves of the Enemies Intrenchments, their Cannon, and three Flags; after which, a Detachment was ſent to burn twelve Ships that were in the Bay, which was executed without any Reſiſtance. One of them was a new Ship of forty-four Pieces of Cannon, two of thirty, and one of twenty-four, fitted out for the War. The other eight were Merchant-Ships richly laden; and they were all quite burn'd: Which being done, the Troops return'd on board again in good Order, and without the Loſs of a Man."

A. D. 1690.

we have not done with the Uſe that was made of it; for while the Fears of the People were yet upon them, a Pamphlet was ſet forth, from what Quarter need not be explan'd, under the Title of, A modeſt Enquiry into the Cauſes of the preſent Diſaſters, and who they are that brought the French Fleet into the Channel DESCRIB'D; in which the Notion of a Jacobite Plot is not only adopted, but carry'd farther into Uſe and Application than had ever been thought of before: For whereas the Government, in all their Notices to the Public on that Head, had conſin'd themſelves to Generals, and never once ſurmis'd, that any of the Clergy were concern'd in it, the Author of this Piece deſcends to Particulars, and charges them expreſly with being the principal Actors in it. According to him, their writing againſt the new (o) Oaths to their Majeſties, enjoin'd by Parliament, and their buzzing into the Ears of their poor, ignorant Votaries, the Unlawfulneſs of thoſe Oaths; and the Continuance of King James's Right to the Crown, was the firſt Step they took towards the Point they had in view: A ſecond Step was, the Diſtinction they had found out of a King de facto, and a King de jure, by way of Salvo to thoſe who could neither digeſt the new Government, nor part with their Preferments. Proceeding to the third, he ſuggeſts, That the Plot was yet lame, becauſe the Machines which mov'd it, were debarr'd the Uſe of their Pulpits: But that a Flaw having been diſcover'd in the late Act relating to the Nonjuring Clergy, by which it was underſtood, that thoſe who only preach'd, without having any Cure of Souls, were exempted from the Penalties of it, Dr. Sherlock broke thro' the Gap (p) firſt, and, under the Countenance of the whole Party, enlarg'd on the Bleſſing of free Preaching, in ſpite of the Act of Parliament; and was follow'd by the moſt eminent of his Brethren, who, continues he, made it their Buſineſs to trumpet up the People to a Diſſatisfaction with the Government. He farther ſays, That all theſe Steps of the Plot were back'd with the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience, a Pamphlet which was handed about in triumph among the Party, and in which were muſter'd a great many Expreſſions of Engliſh Divines, both ancient and modern, in order to condemn the Doctrine of Reſiſtance, altho' moſt of the Citations were wide of the Queſtion, and referr'd only to Obedience to Magiſtracy in general, and the Unlawfulneſs of private Perſons riſing up againſt the Government upon every frivolous Pretence: That the next Engine of the Plot, was the happy Reſult of a kind of Oeconomic Council of the whole Party, namely, the laying aſide the old Liturgy of the Church of England, and the framing a new one for the Meridian of King James's tottering Fortune. That in this new Liturgy they prayed thus: Reſtore us again the Public Worſhip of thy Name, the reverend Adminiſtration of thy Sacraments: Raiſe up the former Government both in Church and State, that we may be no longer without King, without Prieſt, and without God in the World: That when they came to pray for King James, the Jacobite Club exhauſted all their Rhetoric and Zeal in the following Words: Protect and defend thy Servant our Sovereign Lord the King; ſtrengthen his Hands, and the Hands of all that are put in Authority under him, with Judgment and Juſtice to cut off all ſuch Workers of Iniquity as turn Religion to Rebellion, and Faith into Faction; that they may never prevail againſt us, or triumph in the Ruin of thy Church among us. To this end, defend the King, bind up his Soul in the Bundle of Life, and let no Weapon form'd againſt him proſper. Be unto him a Helmet of Salvation, and a ſtrong Tower of Defence againſt the Face of his Enemies. Let his Reign be proſperous, and his Days many. Make him glad, according to the Days wherein thou haſt afflicted him, and for the Years wherein thou haſt made him ſuffer Adverſity. Give him the Necks of his Enemies, and alſo every Day more and more the Hearts of his Subjects. As for thoſe that are implacable, cloath them with Shame, but upon himſelf and his Poſterity (that is, the Prince of Wales) let the Crown flouriſh. That the General Council having compos'd this new Liturgy, above ten thouſand of them were printed and diſpers'd up and down among the Party, which they uſed in their Cabals, laying aſide a great Part, and ſometimes all, the old Liturgy: That there were many of the Holy Club detach'd up and down, to perſuade Money'd-People, who wiſh'd well to the Cauſe, to contribute for the Subſiſtence of King James's caſhier'd Officers: That, taking Advantage of King William's declar'd Purpoſe to command in Ireland in Perſon, and preſuming that the Kingdom would, for that Reaſon, be left bare of Troops, and expos'd both by Sea and Land, it was concluded to preſent a Memorial in the Name of the loyal and diſtreſs'd Subjects of England (for ſo they nam'd themſelves) to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; humbly inviting him, out of his unparallel'd Goodneſs, and for the Affection he always bore to oppreſs'd Virtue, that he would aſſiſt them in reſtoring their lawful King, his ancient Ally and Confederate, to his Throne; and in breaking the Yoke of Uſurpation, under which theſe three Nations were at this time ſo heavily groaning, &c. (q) That there had been

A. D. 1690.

The ſuſpended Biſhops accus'd of being concern'd in the Plot.

(o) The Controverſy on this Subject is voluminous beyond Imagination.

(p) And was alſo the firſt to take the Oaths, as ſoon as the News was confirm'd that King James had left Ireland, which he look'd upon as ſuch an Abdication as authoriz'd every Man to ſeek Protection elſewhere.

(q) The Heads of this Memorial were twelve in all; ſeven of which are recited by this Author as follow:

1. "The Prince of Orange, the Uſurper, is juſt now on his Journey to Ireland; and being once arriv'd in that Kingdom, if a Part of your Majeſty's Fleet were able to block up St. George's Channel, the Uſurper's Army would certainly be

A. D. 1690. been two or three Memorials preſented to the French King before this, over and above a conſtant Correſpondence betwixt the French Miniſter of State, Monſieur de Croiſſy, and them: And that the Clergy, who were the great Contrivers and Managers of this, and who, by their Profeſſion are, for the moſt part, extraordinary credulous of any thing they incline to, did really believe, that immediately upon the appearing of the French Fleet, and the burning of ours (which they thought as ſure) there would certainly be a general Inſurrection through a great many Places of the Kingdom, in order to join them at their landing, and to declare for King James.

The whole of this extraordinary Piece is to be found in the State Tracts: but the moſt extraordinary Part of it is that which follows: "We read of one of the Nations of Aſia, that when any ſignal Misfortune befals their State, they immediately thereupon offer up to their angry Deities ſome of their Prieſts, as a Sacrifice to atone their Wrath; becauſe, ſay they, Thoſe Prieſts ought to have taught us how to have pleaſed the Gods ſo as not to provoke them to inflict ſuch Judgments upon us. The Truth is, it is a wonder the Engliſh Nation, upon the Affront that has befaln them, in being forc'd to turn their Backs to the French at Sea, have not in their Fury De-Witted ſome of thoſe Men who have brought all this upon us, both by inviting the French, and by the Intrigues they have manag'd at home: And I muſt tell them, that the Crimes of the two unhappy Brothers in Holland, which gave Uſe to that Word, were not fully ſo great as thoſe of ſome of them; and yet their Puniſhment has been one of the ſevereſt that any Criminals ever met with in this Age."

It is obvious, that a greater Advantage could not have been given to an Enemy, than is given in this unchriſtian Paragraph: And what Uſe was made of it, appears by the Paper, which was ſet forth in anſwer to it by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of Norwich, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough, both in their own, and in the Name of their abſent Brother the Biſhop of Glouceſter: For therein they ſolemnly, and in the Preſence of God, proteſt and declare, "1. That theſe Accuſations caſt upon them, were all of them malicious Calumnies, and diabolical Inventions. 2. That A. D. 1690. they knew not who was the Author of the new Liturgy, nor had any hand in it, neither did they uſe it at any time. 3. That they never held any Correſpondence, directly or indirectly, with Monſieur de Croiſſy, or with any other Miniſter or Agent of France; and if any ſuch Memorial had been preſented to the French King, they never knew any thing of it; and that they did utterly renounce both that, and all other Invitations, ſuggeſted to be made by them, in order to any Invaſion of this Kingdom by the French. 4. That they utterly deny'd and diſown'd all Plots charg'd upon them, as contriv'd or carry'd on in their Meetings at Lambeth; the Intent thereof being to adviſe how, in their preſent Difficulties, they might beſt keep their Conſciences void of Offence towards God, and towards Man. 5. That they were ſo far from being the Authors or Abettors of England's Miſeries, that they did, and ſhould, to their dying Hour, heartily and inceſſantly pray for the Peace, Proſperity and Glory of England; and ſhould always, by God's Grace, make it their daily Practice to ſtudy to be quiet, to bear their Croſs patiently, and to ſeek the Good of their Native Country. They concluded, That, as the Lord had taught them to return Good for Evil, the unknown Author of the Pamphlet having endeavour'd to raiſe in the whole Engliſh Nation ſuch a Fury, as might end in De-Witting them, (a bloody Word, but too well underſtood) They recommended him to the Divine Mercy, humbly beſeeching God to forgive him. And that as they had, not long ſince, either actually, or in full Preparation of Mind, hazarded all they had in the World in oppoſing Popery and Arbitrary Power in England; ſo they ſhould, by God's Grace, with greater Zeal, again ſacrifice all they had, and their very Lives too, if God ſhould be pleas'd to call them thereto, to prevent Popery, and the Arbitrary Power of France, from coming upon them, and prevailing over them; the Perſecution of their Proteſtant Brethren there, being freſh in their Memories."

The Controverſy did not, however, end here, for the very next Day after the Biſhop's Paper was publiſh'd, there came forth a ſort of Anſwer to it, under the Title of, A Midnight Touch at an unlicens'd Pamphlet, call'd be ſtarv'd, being that all their Proviſions come by Sea from Scotland and England; and that Part of the Country they are Maſters of, is already harraſs'd and ruin'd by both Armies, both the laſt Year and this.

2. The Uſurper has partly ſent before, and partly takes along with himſelf, the whole almoſt, and the better diſciplin'd Part of the Army; and leaves behind him but a very few of the Engliſh Regiments, who ſerve more out of Neceſſity and Fear, than out of any Love to him or to the Intereſt.

3. The Forces he leaves behind are ſo very few, that they are ſcarce capable to keep Guards in the Tower, Savoy, Somerſet-houſe, and at Whitehall altogether; and the three Regiments that are ſent for out of Holland, will not be yet ready for ſome Weeks to embark; neither is it thought they will ſtir a Foot, becauſe of want of Pay. Like as both Officers and Soldiers are not intirely devoted to the Uſurper's Intereſt, the moſt of them being in the Service of our lawful King, before he was neceſſitated to leave us.

4. Moſt of our Fleet are at ſo great Diſtance one from another, that they cannot this Year make any conſiderable Body, there being the beſt and ableſt Seamen and Ships with Killigrew in the Streights, and with Shovel in George's Channel, amounting together to no more than nineteen Ships of War.

5. There are likewiſe employ'd for Convoys, and about the Weſtern Coaſts of Scotland, to the Number of five or ſix Ships, all ſeparately.

6. The Dutch Squadron is in no Appearance to be here, to join ours of a ſudden, both becauſe they are not yet in a Readineſs, and that the Admirals of Holland make Scruple, and are highly diſcontented to ſerve under our Engliſh Admiral. Moreover, tho' they were join'd us, they will make up at the moſt, but twenty Sail of Ships, and them none of the beſt, conſidering their raſheſt and beſt mann'd Ships are out upon Convoys.

7. Our own Fleet is ill mann'd, and the Soldiers and Seamen extremely diſcontented for want of their Pay; ſeveral of the Officers were thoſe that belong'd to our King before he went away."

A.D. 1690. call'd, &c. which, like the firſt, had been much better let alone; for, while it overflows with Rancour, it is deficient in Argument: (r) And in Return for the execrable Uſe which had been made of the Word De-Witting in both, the Jacobites thought themſelves authoris'd to ſuggeſt, that they were Court-Productions, and that thoſe who now adopted the Term, had alſo excited the very Murder from whence it had its Original.

Foreign Affairs.

We muſt now return to the Continent, and the Operations of the War; and at our very Entrance on that diſtracted Scene, we find it acknowledg'd, by one of the moſt ſanguine Partizans of the Confederates, "That till now France was not believ'd to be ſo potent as ſhe was found." Of her Forces in Savoy, Catalonia, Ireland, and on board her Fleets, Mention has already been made; but it appears, that ſcarce a third Part of her Strength was employ'd in thoſe ſeveral Services: Her greateſt Efforts were to be made in Germany and Flanders, and her Preparations and Diſpoſitions were every way equal to the Purpoſes ſhe had to anſwer: At Landau ſhe aſſembled an Army of forty thouſand Men, which the Dauphin was to command in Perſon: Marſhal de Boufflers was at the Head of another on the Moſelle: A third was under Mr. de Humieres in the Neighbourhood of Courtray: Mr. de Luxemburgh had the Command of a fourth, which rendezvous'd between St. Amand and Mortagne. And there were, moreover, ſeveral flying Camps in different Parts, to make Incurſions, levy Contributions, and in general, prevent all Inſults, and improve all Advantages. But then theſe Preparations were not ſo forward as they were great: It was the third of May, N.S. before Mr. de Luxemburgh arriv'd at Valenciennes; and it was the ſecond of June before the Dauphin arriv'd at Landau; and it was yet a great while longer, before they were in a Condition to face the Enemy.

On the other hand, indeed, the Confederates, or at leaſt the Germans, were much backwarder; for as it was the great Object of the Congreſs to form ſuch a Connection between the Operations in Germany and Flanders, that the ſeveral Armies employ'd in each, might be made aſſiſtant to each other; ſo the thwarting Intereſts of the German Princes made this Attempt ſo difficult, and their Reſolutions ſo ſlow, that the Summer was far advanc'd before their Troops were put into Motion. The Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh were ſtill diſguſted on account of Saxe Lawenburgh. It was long a Doubt whether the Former would act at all; and we ſhall find that the Latter, whoſe Poſt was to be between the Meuſe and the Moſelle, ſuffer'd the only Opportunity he had of being uſeful, to ſlip out of his Hands. Nor was this all; for when the Elector of Bavaria ſhould have been at the Head of the Imperial Army in the Field, he was forc'd to poſt to Vienna, and aſſiſt at ſeveral Councils of War, to remove the ſeveral Obſtructions which ſtill retarded the Opening of the Campaign. It was the thirtieth of May, N.S. when he arriv'd at that Capital, and it was the 20th of June before he took upon him the Command of the Army, which was then encamp'd at Sintzheim; after which he diſpatch'd Count Stirum to the Elector of Saxony, with the laſt Expedients of the Imperial Court, to induce him to quicken the March of his Troops. And (notwithſtanding thoſe Expedients had ſo good an Effect, that the Deputy of Saxony declar'd to the Diet, That his Maſter, in Conſideration of the preſent Juncture of Affairs, would wave his Pretenſions to Saxe Lawenburgh, with a Salvo to his Right, till the Campaign was over) it was almoſt the Middle of Auguſt, before the two Armies were in a Condition to join.

A.D. 16[illegible]

In Flanders, it muſt be own'd, the Buſineſs of the War was carry'd on with rather more

(r) As may be ſeen by the thing itſelf, which is here inſerted as follows:

"We do juſtly term and eſteem him who abdicated the Throne, no other than the late King; yet we find in the Paper, this Day publiſh'd, five Clergymen, in Defiance of an Act of Parliament, calling themſelves W. Cant. W. Norwich. F. Ely. T. Bath and Wells. T. Peterborough. It would have given great Offence, if there had been added, Richard Baxter, Rector of Kedermingſter: Yet a good Lawyer affirmed in a Coffee-houſe but two hours ſince, that he hath as good a Title to Kedermingſter as the other five have to the Names which they aſſume to themſelves, and preſume to write, and that they ought only to have ſubſcrib'd William Sancroft, William Lloyd, Francis Turner, Thomas Ken, and Thomas White, LATE Biſhops, if they pleaſed.

It is as certain that there is a third Plot, as that there is a new Liturgy; and that there is a Lambeth Club, the Paper now publiſh'd confeſſes; but whether holy or not, I know not; and for aught I know the inſerting that Epithet, Holy, both to theirs and the Jacobite, or Devil-Tavern-Club, may be a good Reaſon for it's abuſive.

It ſeems by their Paper, that they are put under a Neceſſity of holding Meetings, or Conventicles, at Lambeth, in their preſent Difficulties; to adviſe how to keep good Conſciences; which looks as tho' it were no eaſy thing to them to do it.

Indeed, they tell us, that they heartily and inceſſantly pray for the Peace, Proſperity, and Glory of England (which is well, tho' as to the Words we find them not in their Liturgy) and methinks we want the Addition of theſe Words, Under the auſpicious Government of our dread Sovereign Lord and Lady, King William and Queen Mary.

We are not to ſeek for their Meaning, when they talk of bearing their Croſs; but their preſſing of ſeeking the Good of their native Country, is ſo ambiguous and uncertain, that for aught I know, ſhould Mareſchal de Humieres come (which God forbid) W. C. (that is William Canterbury) would call for the Keys, which he deliver'd to my L. L. (Lord Lucas) and put them into his Hands; and then conclude that he had done the Church and his Country a great Piece of Service.

I do think that it was not ſo much for the ſake of Wit or Honeſty, as for the well underſtood Word, as they call it, De-Witting, that their Vindication was publiſh'd; and therefore, I declare, that, rather than ſee the Throne of our rightful and lawful King and Queen, who now poſſeſs it, overthrown, I ſhall rejoice to ſee all who refuſe to pray and fight for its Support, De-Witted.

Their late Reverences declare themſelves ready to ſacrifice their All to prevent Popery, and the arbitrary Power of France from prevailing over them; for they have the Perſecution of the French Proteſtants freſh in their Memories.

It were to be wiſh'd, that theſe non-reſiſting and non-aſſiſting Gentlemen, would now, in their Difficulties, and whilſt under the Croſs, when they tell us that they remember the Perſecution of the French Proteſtants, acknowledge the Error and Wickedneſs of their Perſecuting thoſe of England; for, till they do ſo, there are a conſcientious ſort of People amongſt us, who will conclude, that tho' ſome of our Clergy-men would not have the arbitrary Power of France to prevail over them; yet they do wiſh and hope, by that Power to prevail over, and yet again to trample upon, Engliſh Proteſtants.

When Mr. Randal Taylor emits his next Paper, which is to declare the Abſent Brother of Gloceſter's Concurrence, I ſhall endeavour to read it at a more ſeaſonable Hour, and to find a little more Leiſure than I now have, to ſpeak to this Point. A. D. 1690. more Expedition; for the Arrival of the Duke of Luxemburgh was no ſooner known, than the Marquis de Guſtanaga aſſembled the Forces of Spain, in the Neighbourhood of Ghent, and the Prince of Waldeck thoſe of the States at Boneffe: And while thoſe two Generals made the neceſſary Diſpoſitions to obſerve the Motions of the Enemy on that Side, it was underſtood, that the Forces of Brandenburgh ſhould have held Mr. de Bouffliers in cheque on the Moſelle; and on the right Obſervance of this Concert, the Fate of the Campaign, in a great meaſure, if not wholly, depended.

But his Electoral Highneſs, it ſeems, was more intent on Matters of Amuſement than of War: He had been at Koningſburg to receive the Homage of the States of Pruſſia; and upon his Return to Berlin, which was not till the 10th of June, he was ſolemnly inveſted with the Order of the Garter, by the Hands of Mr. Johnſton the Britiſh Envoy: During the Reſidue of the Month, his Troops did indeed move towards Schlyderdal, which was the Place of their Rendezvous; but they did not begin their March towards the Meuſe, till the ſixth of July following.

The Battle of Fleurus. The Duke of Luxemburgh, in the mean while, who had the chief Command in Flanders, and who was reſolv'd to ſhew, that he deſerv'd the Preference which had been given him, at the Expence of Mr. de Humieres, was all Vigilance; and wiſely reſolv'd to make his Puſh, before the Confederate Army was fully form'd, and the proper Meaſures could be taken to prevent him; after what manner is now to be explan'd.

Prince Waldeck, having receiv'd a large Reinforcement of Spaniſh Horſe, remov'd to Harlemont, near the River Picton, with a Reſolution to continue there, till he receiv'd Advice, that the Brandenburghers had taken the Field, and were ready to co-operate, agreeable to the Concert above ſpoken of: But being inform'd, that the Duke of Luxemburgh was making a Diſpoſition to paſs the Sambre at Fremont, in order to lay the Country under Contribution; and believing, that his whole Force did not exceed twenty thouſand Men, he decamp'd on the 29th of June; and having paſs'd the Picton that Night, with all his Horſe, and order'd his Foot to follow as faſt as they could, he the next Day detach'd Count Berlo with fifteen hundred Horſe, to obſerve the Motions of the Enemy; he alſo appointed Count Flodrop with another Body of Cavalry to ſuſtain theſe; and Count Webbenum with a third, to ſecure a narrow Lane, thro' which the two former were to paſs, in their way to the Enemy. But when Berlo was advanc'd to Fleurus, he found that a good Part of the French Army had already paſs'd the Sambre, and poſted themſelves ſo, as to have the Village behind them. Of this he had ſcarce time to inform Prince Waldeck, who was now between Mellin and Fleurus, before he was attack'd by an advanc'd Party of the Enemy, and ſaw himſelf in danger of being ſurrounded: This induc'd him to ſend for a Reinforcement of Foot; but none was ſent: On the contrary, he had Orders to retreat, and loſt his Life in endeavouring to obey them; for he was by this time beſet almoſt on all Sides; and Flodrop was alſo too much diſtreſs'd, to give him Aſſiſtance. In ſhort, both theſe Parties were driven out of the Field; nor had any Number of either recover'd the Army, if Webbenum had not made good his Poſt, and thereby cover'd their Retreat. A. D. 1690.

This was a bloody Prologue; and a general Action as bloody, was expected to follow immediately. Prince Waldeck made his Diſpoſitions accordingly; and his Army continu'd in Battalia all Night: But the Duke of Luxemburgh had his Reaſons for delaying it; and Prince Waldeck, it ſeems, after the Shock he had already receiv'd, was not inclinable to venture any farther, unleſs compell'd to it. He was yet farther embarraſs'd in the Morning by two contrary Pieces of Intelligence; for by a Deſerter he was inform'd, that the Duke of Luxemburgh was reſolv'd to fight; but two Spies, who made it their Buſineſs to betray both Armies, reported preſently after, that he was re-paſſing the Sambre. Till eight he continu'd in this Uncertainty; and by that time the French had taken their Meaſures ſo, that he found himſelf under a Neceſſity of engaging. The Dutch Army, according to their own Accounts, conſiſted only of about twenty-five thouſand Men; but before the Battle, it was given out to be upwards of thirty thouſand. The French Army, on the contrary, they tell us, was above forty thouſand ſtrong; whereas, it was repreſented ſome Days before, to be ſcarce half that Number. Luxemburgh had indeed made large Draughts from the French Frontier-Towns, and was beſides reinforc'd by eighteen Battalions of Foot, and forty-five Squadrons of Horſe from Bouffler's Army, and alſo with the flying Camp of the Count de Gournay. It is, therefore, certain, that the Latter were the moſt numerous; and the Ground enabled them to make the beſt of their Advantage. According to the Marquis de Feuquieres, Prince Waldeck had drawn up his Troops on a Tract of Land, which roſe a little to his Right, and formed a Slope on the other Side, which was unobſerv'd by the Extremity of the Right Wing, and continu'd in an eaſy Declivity to the Level, on which the Duke of Luxemburgh was marching to his Enemy. When the Front of the French Army arriv'd at the Place, where this Elevation was high enough to conceal the Left Wing of their Horſe from the Prince of Waldeck in the Continuation of their March, the Duke improv'd the important Moment with a ſurprizing Capacity, and order'd Monſieur de Gournay, a very expert Officer of the Horſe, to take the Advantage of the oppoſite Side, which prevented the Enemy from diſcovering the Motion he was to purſue, and to pour all the Left of his Horſe upon the Enemy's Right Flank; with a Particular Caution to order his March ſo, that the Right of his Left might rejoin the Left of

A. D. 1690. the Foot, at the Inſtant they were preparing to charge the Front of the Enemy's Foot. This Motion, which would have prov'd ſo hazardous, had the Enemy diſcover'd it, but which decided the Battle in Favour of the French, was executed with a Capacity equal to the Judgment that form'd it. All the Left Wing of the French Horſe was diſpos'd into a kind of rectangular Form on the Flank of the Enemy's Right Wing, though they extended to the French Line of Foot. And thus the Dutch ſaw themſelves aſſaulted in Flank by a Front equal to that which they poſſeſs'd. When they therefore found their Right charged in Flank, at the ſame time that their Center and Left were attack'd by the Center and Right of the French Army, it was impoſſible for the Prince of Waldeck to remedy the Diſorder on his Right; which was ſoon communicated to the Centre and Left, and ended in their precipitate Retreat from the Field of Battle, with the Loſs of all their Artillery, and the greateſt Part of their Foot; becauſe the Prince had poſted too large a Body of Infantry in the Village of Ligni, and could not draw them out, after they were abandon'd by the Horſe.

Other Authors mention this Circumſtance, but make a very different uſe of it; for they ſay, the Enemy, without being perceiv'd, ſlipp'd ſeveral Troops behind a riſing Ground and a ſmall Wood near the Sambre, who poſted themſelves behind the ſecond Line of the Left Wing, which conſtrain'd that Line to face about, and turn their Backs to the firſt, whereby being very much weaken'd, ſome Battalions of the Right Wing were ſent to ſecure the Flank, and aſſiſt them to maintain their Ground. They alſo add, That the Duke of Luxemburgh no ſooner obſerv'd that Motion, but he ſaid to the Duke de Maine, who was then next him, See what the Enemy are doing, I foretell they will be beaten. That he then order'd the Left Wing to be attack'd at the ſame time in the Front, Rear, and Flank: That the firſt Line being already weaken'd to reinforce the ſecond, it was ſoon forc'd to give Ground: That Prince Waldeck obſerving the Left Wing in a ſtaggering Condition, and that the Horſe had, for the moſt Part, given Ground, ſent to their Relief the Horſe of the ſecond Line of the Right Wing, from whence the Foot had already been drawn for the ſame Purpoſe: That while this was doing on that Side, the firſt Line of the Right Wing was alſo engag'd with the Enemy, and had bravely repuls'd and routed them ſeveral times, being ſupported by the Spaniſh Horſe, who made themſelves Maſters of ten Pieces of the Enemy's Cannon, and kept them a conſiderable time; but that the French having three Lines on that Side alſo (as they had every where elſe, whereas the Dutch had but two) and being continually ſupply'd with freſh Men, the Dutch Cavalry was diſpers'd and broke, to that degree, that A. D. 1690. the whole Body could never be rally'd again: That indeed Count Ekdrop made a Shift to gather about one thouſand two hundred Horſe after an Hour's riding from the Field of Battle, and brought them on again; but then it was too late, for the Infantry was retreated: That as for the Dutch Foot, never did any Troops perform greater Wonders; for after they were forſaken by the Horſe, they alone ſuſtain'd the Charges of the French Cavalry and Infantry; and being attack'd in Front, Flank, and Rear, all at once, yet they remain'd firm, unbroken and impenetrable: That they let the Enemy's Horſe approach within Piſtol-ſhot of them, and made their Diſcharge with ſuch an unconcern'd and ſteddy Aim, that the whole Squadron together ſeem'd to ſink under the Ground, hardly thirty of the whole Number getting off: And this Courſe they ſo accuſtom'd themſelves to obſerve, that at length they laugh'd at their Enemies, and challeng'd them to advance: That the French, on the other Side, were ſo diſmay'd with the Execution done on them, that they fled as ſoon as the Dutch began to preſent their Muſkets; nor durſt they any more come near them, but ſuffer'd them to retreat in good order, without offering to purſue them: And this unparallel'd Firmneſs and Bravery of theirs, made the Duke of Luxemburgh ſay in their Praiſe, That they had out-done the Spaniſh Infantry at the Battle of Rocroy; where the Spaniards perform'd Wonders: Adding withal, That Prince Waldeck ought ever to remember the French Horſe, and himſelf never to forget the Dutch Infantry.

All agree that the Action was obſtinate and bloody; that the Loſs was pretty near (1) equal on both Sides; and that if the French had the Honour of the Field, it was a barren one; for it was accompany'd with no material Advantage. Biſhop Burnet goes yet farther ſtill, and ſays, They loſt more than they got by the Day. He would have us believe, That the Preſervation of England was owing to this Battle: For, ſays he, they ſuffer'd ſo much in it, that they were forc'd to lye on the Defenſive, and were not able to ſpare ſo many Men as were neceſſary for an Invaſion: But, unluckily, the French Fleet were in the Channel before this Battle was fought: The Duke of Luxemburgh was under no neceſſity of engaging; and if any ſuch great Deſign had been really in Agitation, as the invading England, — it ſomewhat extraordinary, that they ſhould drain their Garriſons for the ſake of fighting in Flanders, inſtead of having an Army in their own Ports ready to be waited over, as ſoon as their Victory at Sea ſhould have given them ſo fair an Opportunity to make uſe of it.

To proceed: It was now the great Endeavour of Prince Waldeck, and the High and Mighty Lords, his Maſters, to reinforce their Army with all poſſible Expedition, and

(1) That of Holland is generally computed at about five thouſand; but, according to the London Gazette, it was ſeven thouſand, reckoning the Priſoners, as well as the Slain.

A. D. 1690. and to re-animate those who had suffer'd so much, and perform'd so well. At Ham, the Grand Pensioner, Heinsius, and the rest of the States Deputies, took a Review of the Army; and, in Acknowledgment of the distinguish'd Bravery of the Foot, order'd a Sum of Money to be distributed among them, after the Proportion of three Franks a Man. They afterwards assisted at a general Council of War, which was held in the Dutch Camp, together with the Marquis de Gastanaga, Prince Waldeck, and all the Spanish and Dutch Commanders; in which, as it appears by the Event, it was resolv'd, to collect the whole Force of the Confederates on that Side together, in order to prevent the farther Designs of the Enemy, and in hope to redeem the Glory of the Campaign. The Dutch Regiments, which had suffer'd most in the late Action, were reliev'd by others, drawn out of the Garrisons: Four Regiments which were in Flanders, and five of English, which could not come up time enough to Fleurus, were also order'd to join Prince Waldeck with all possible Expedition; and he was yet farther strengthened by a large Body of Forces, which the States had hir'd of the Prince of Liege. The Marquis of Gastanaga, moreover, assembled a Body of Forces at Dendermond, which were soon after join'd by the Troops of Hanover, in the Pay of Spain: And lastly, the Elector of Brandenburgh, who had pass'd the Meuse on a Bridge of Boats, between Viset and Nevagne, on the 22d of July, N. S. join'd Prince Waldeck at Waveren, on the second of August following.

The Elector of Brandenburg joins the Allies at Waveren.

It was now computed, that the two Armies thus united, consisted of forty-five thousand effective Men; and that the Spaniards and Hanoverians, who form'd a separate Corps, were about sixteen thousand more. Great things were now expected: The Duke of Luxemburgh, finding himself unable to withstand so great a Force, retreated towards Maubeuge, and posted his Troops to the best Advantage behind the River Hayne. Mr. de Boufflers, who had been detach'd with the flying Camp under his Command towards the Moselle, was recall'd, and the French Garrisons were, in a manner, drain'd on all Sides round, for the sake of augmenting the Army. The Confederates gave out from Day to Day, that they would force the French Camp; and that they were not so good as their Word, was imputed to the heavy Rains which fell about this time. But, according to Bishop Burnet, the States sent positive Orders to Prince Waldeck not to hazard another Engagement till the Fleet should be again at Sea: And when those Orders were superseded, the Elector had alter'd his Mind, and was become as positive not to expose his Army.

When, therefore, the French were convinc'd, that they had nothing to apprehend from the Superiority of the Allies on this Side, they again posted Mr. de Boufflers to the Moselle: And soon after the Entrance of October, both Armies broke up and pass'd into their Winter Quarters, without any one Attempt on either Side worth the Remembrance of History. A. D. 1690.

Proceedings of the Upper-Rhine.

In this Interval the Imperial Army, under the Elector of Bavaria, had taken Post at Bruschal, near Philipsburg; and the Dauphin, at the Head of the French, directed his March towards Mentz. These two Princes were nearly ally'd; his Royal Highness of France having marry'd the Elector's Sister. But the Tye was broke by the Death of the Lady, who expir'd at Versailles, April 20, N. S. and all the Concern they ought to have had for each other, was now swallow'd up in the superior Considerations of Glory and Greatness.

It is reasonable to suppose, that the Scheme first form'd by the Imperialists, was to attack the strong Fortress of Hunningben, and thereby open a Way into France: His Electoral Highness of Bavaria caus'd several Pieces of battering Cannon to be brought to his Camp from Mentz and Frankfort; and after having conferr'd at Eppinglen with the Elector of Saxony and Veldt Marshal Caprara, decamp'd July 28 from Bruschal, and march'd on to Durlach. General Souches, in the mean time (who commanded a small Army of Imperialists at Schopbeim, as the Marquis d'Uxelles did also on the French Side, in the Neighbourhood of Hunningben) pass'd the Rhine at Basle, accompany'd by some of his Officers, and took a Survey of the Fortifications of that Place: And all these several Motions, it is certain, gave such a Jealousy to the French, that they call'd upon the Swiss-Cantons to secure the Passage of August; menacing withal, that, in case they any longer neglected it, they would themselves take Possession of them. They also commanded the Inhabitants of Durlach, and the adjacent Country, to carry all their Corn and Provisions to Brisac, Friburg, and Hunningben, that the Imperialists might not have the Benefit of them: And lastly, as the Elector of Bavaria coasted one Side of the Rhine in Prosecution of this Enterprize, the Dauphin did the same on the other, to be in Readiness to prevent it.

But the Enterprize fell of itself; for after Mr. de Souches's Return, a general Conference was held at Knightlingben, in August; at which assisted the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Wirtemberg, the Veldt Marshals Caprara, Dunewaldt, and Chauvet, the Count de Lippe; and several other General Officers; and in which the whole Plan of Operations was totally chang'd: For it was resolv'd, That the Elector of Saxony, with all his own Forces, and eight thousand Imperialists, should continue on the Upper-Rhine to cover the Palatinate, while the Elector of Bavaria, with his own Troops, those of Hesse, Lunenburgh, and the rest of the Imperialists, made the best of his way back towards Mentz or Coblentz, in order to pass the Rhine at one of those Places. Accordingly, the Elector of Saxony took Post at Bretten, near Philipsburgh: The Hessians and Lunenburghers, who were not as yet

A. D. 1690. yet come up, pass'd the Maine at Francfort, Hochst, &c. and were follow'd by the Imperialists, who pass'd the Neckar on the 18th, and encamp'd the same Day at Hendesheim, within an Hour of Heydelberg.

This new Motion of the Imperialists, made the French as uneasy for Montroyal, as they had been before for Hunningben; and to give an immediate Diversion, the Dauphin having reinforc'd his Army with the Garrisons of Brisac, Strasburgh, Friburgh, &c. pass'd the Rhine at Fort-Lewis, took up his Quarters at Stollhoven, and gave out, That he would fall upon the Saxons at Bretten. The Saxons, hereupon, call'd upon the Elector of Bavaria to return to their Assistance, which he did forthwith, with all the Troops under his own immediate Command: For as to the Hessians and Lunenburghers, they had Orders to proceed to the Moselle, to join the Forces of Munster, Newburgh, and Liege.

On the 25th, the two Armies under the two Electors, join'd in the Neighbourhood of Bruschal; and the next Day, having first sent all their heavy Baggage to Heydelburg and Hailbron, march'd to Etlingen, with a Resolution to offer the Enemy Battle, who were, by this time, encamp'd at Rastadt, behind the River Murg: But the Dauphin had pass'd the Rhine to amuse, not to fight; and, therefore, on the Approach of the Enemy, he retreated again towards Fort-Lewis; and, after several other Removes, in the Course of which the Confederates were generally close at his Heels, conducted his Army into the Plains of Newenburgh; where, having seen them strongly encamp'd, and provided for their farther Security, by throwing a Bridge near that Place over the Rhine, he sent a large Detachment to reinforce Mr. de Boufflers on the Moselle, transferr'd the chief Command to the Marshal de Lorge; and, October the first, set out on his Return to Paris; soon after which, both Armies went into their Winter-Quarters.

The Swiss-Cantons uneasy.

All this while the Switzers were in the most uneasy Situation imaginable; for, the nearer the two Armies approach'd their Territories, and the more they were alarm'd by the Progress of the War in Savoy, the more difficult they found it to avoid taking a Part in it. Hitherto the French had paid the fifteen hundred Men which guarded the Passes of Augst; but now they declar'd they would do so no longer: They had also requir'd Winter-Quarters for their Troops in the Bishopric of Bale, and in the Forest-Towns: They had form'd a Design, at least it was so apprehended, of seizing Geneva; and under the Pretence of adding a new Redoubt to the Fortress of Hunningben, they resolv'd to have it in their Power to bombard the Town, and ruin the Bridge of Bale, whenever they pleas'd. On the other hand, the Imperialists had offer'd to pay the Troops in question, had made a Merit of providing for the Security of the Forest-Towns; and had protested, in the strongest Terms, against the Addition of any Works of any kind whatever to the Fortress of Hunningben: In all these Remonstrances, and all the Uses they could make of them, they were supported in the warmest manner by the Ministers of England, Spain, and Holland, (t) and, in general, of the whole Confederacy; yet such was the artful Deportment of France towards the Cantons, and so successful were her Applications, that in the Diet, which was held at Baden during this Conjuncture, they contented themselves with resolving, to adhere to their Neutrality, to defray the Expence of maintaining the Pass of Augst, out of their own Purse, to defend the Bishopric of Bale, and the Forest-Towns, and not to consent to the raising any new Works at Hunningben, under any Pretence whatsoever. A. D. 1690. yet persist in their Resolutions to observe a Neutrality.

Two Branches of the War remain still to be discours'd of, namely, That between the Emperor, Poland, and Venice, on the one Part, and the Turks on the other; and That between France and Savoy. Of the Resolution of the Turks to try the Fate of another Campaign, rather than submit to the Prescriptions of the Imperial Court, Notice hath been already taken, but not of the Circumstances which gave rise to it. In the Seraglio, ill Fortune passes for Guilt; the Grand Vizier was unfortunate, and, for that Reason, was disgrac'd and strangled, with the usual Concomitant of having his Estate confiscated, &c. Cupergli Ogli was made Prime Vizier in his stead, and enter'd on his Ministry with a Declaration, which had the Sanction of the whole Divan, That the War should be continu'd till the Emperor would agree to more reasonable Terms of Peace. In this it is suggested, that the French Embassador Count Tekeli were his Prompters; as also, that the Latter was hinder'd from making his Submission to the Emperor by the Intrigues of the Former; and, it is certain, that he (the Vizier) immediately apply'd himself Progress of the War with the Turks. A new Grand Vizier.

(t) The Latter of these was so extremely bitter in his Representation to the Diet, of the ambitious Designs of France, that it drew from Mr. Amiot, the French Minister, the following no less bitter Answer:

"Magnificent Lords,

"Those excessive outrageous Declarations, or rather that infamous Libel, which was read in your Assembly, contains things so unworthy, not only of a public Minister, but also of any Person pretending to Birth and Education, that they deserve not the Trouble of an Answer. And I am apt to persuade myself, that your Lordships were offended at them. This Declaration is nothing else, to speak properly, but a Recital of a Rabble of Cheats, and Tricks; by Means of which, the Enemies of the King my Master endeavour to insinuate Stories disadvantageous to his Interest; which is the more full of Sting and Hatred, because it proceeds from a Commonwealth, which ought at all times to give that Respect to great Kings, which is due to them; more especially to him by whose Protection it established its free Sovereignty. Nevertheless, it is somewhat a strange thing, that a People who have kindled the Flames of War, by deposing from his Throne a Christian and Lawful Sovereign; and by furnishing his Son-in-law with Means to effect it, dare still presume to talk of unjust Enterprizes, and Overturnings of States. In short, if Men would but once reflect upon the manner of carrying on the War on either Side, there is no more for the giving a true Judgment, than to hear the Complaints of the Inhabitants of Swabia, Flanders, and Piedmont, who cannot forbear from crying loudly out, That they suffer incomparably much more from the Germans their Friends, than the French their Enemies." [State of Europe, vol. II.

A.D. 1690. to rectify all Disorders, to replenish his Master's Coffers, to recruit his Armies, and to re-animate the Janizaries and Spahies, by paying them their Arrears, and providing sufficient Funds for their punctual Payment for the time to come. But, notwithstanding all his Efforts, so enfeebled was the Empire without, and so distracted within, that many Months elaps'd before he could bring his Purposes to bear; for the greater they were, the more time was requisite for suitable Preparations: And while he was thus embarrass'd with the Duties of his new Office, he had besides the Mortification to hear, that Canissa, an exceeding strong Town in Lower Hungary, was surrender'd to the Imperialists by Capitulation, after a Blockade of almost two Years; the Garrison being reduc'd to the last Extremities, before he could make any Provision for its Relief. At length, however, having surmounted all his Difficulties, he took the Field in Person (tho' a Man of the Law, not of the Sword) at the Head of thirty thousand Foot and ten thousand Horse, and invested Nissa, while the Serasquier, with ten thousand more, did the same by Widin; and Count Tekeli, with a mix'd Army of Turks, Tartars, and Hungarian Malcontents, amounting in all to about sixteen thousand, prepar'd to take Possession of Transilvania, which had been given to him by the Grand Signior, on the Death of Prince Abaffi.

who takes the Field in Person.

The Court of Vienna, in the mean time, partly alarm'd with these spirited Proceedings of the Vizier, and partly molify'd by the Sollicitations of the Maritime Powers (who were as anxious for a Peace between the Emperor and the Turks, as the Venetians and Poles for a Peace between the Emperor and France) seem'd inclinable to abate their Stiffness, and to give way to an Accommodation, on more tolerable Terms than they had formerly insisted upon: But now these Relentings came too late; the Turks had made their Dispositions, and were resolv'd to have the Benefit of them. Nothing remain'd therefore, but to prosecute the Dispute by the Edge of the Sword; and yet so tardy were the Imperial Ministers in their Preparations, and so unequal were those Preparations to the Service of the Year, that it was with the utmost Difficulty Prince Lewis of Baden was prevail'd upon to resume his Command: It was the ninth of August before he took his Leave of the Emperor: It was the 26th before he arriv'd at Jagodina, the Place appointed for the Rendezvous of the Imperial Army: And, late as it then was in the Year, he found the Condition of it even worse, if possible, than his Fears had suggested. On the very next Day after his Arrival he receiv'd Advice, that Tekeli had entirely defeated the Germans and Transilvanians, near Cronstadt, in Transilvania, and had that Province in a manner at his Mercy. Surrounded thus with Difficulties and Perplexities, he call'd a Council of War, laid the general State of Things before them; and, upon the Issue, came to a Resolution to march immediately against Tekeli, as being the Enemy he was best able to deal with. Accordingly, he decamp'd the same Day; and, in his March, threw four Regiments, under the Command of Count d'Aspremont, into Belgrade, and made such other Regulations, and Provisions, as he thought would contribute most to the Preservation of Hungary.

Tekeli defeats the Imperialists in Transilvania.

A.D. 1690. The Prince of Baden goes against him.

Nissa and Widin being thus abandon'd, were oblig'd to surrender upon Articles; and Semandria had a worse Fate; for the Garrison, which consisted of five hundred Germans, and four hundred Militia, having had the Presumption to withstand the whole Ottoman Army for four Days together, were all, except Officers, put to the Sword. The Vizier then set down before Belgrade, October the first, in which was a strong Garrison of six thousand old Soldiers, well provided with Ammunition and Necessaries of all sorts: Only, the Imperialists presuming too much on the Superiority of their Arms, and the Continuance of their good Fortune, had suffer'd the Breaches to lye open, which had been made by the Elector of Bavaria, when he reduc'd the Place three Years before; and had now but just time to secure them with a double Row of Pallisadoes. They had also left the Ruins of a Suburb standing; and, under the Cover of these, the Vizier made his Approaches on the second Day within Musquet-shot of the Walls. These were fatal Oversights; and they had an Enemy to deal with, who both discern'd and improv'd all Advantages: His Assaults were also as furious as they were well directed; and if he was repuls'd or dislodg'd one Day, he was sure not only to retrieve all, but to make some new Acquisition, the next. Thus, having been driven by the Besieged from the very Foot of the Pallisadoes on the fifth, the Turks regain'd their Post on the sixth; and also, by the Help of their Galleys, &c. cut off all Communication between the Garrison and the Save and Danube. Never was a Siege carry'd on with more Vigour, and never was so strong a Place so soon reduc'd to Extremities. On the eighth, the Duke de Croy, who had been sent Post from Vienna to take upon him the chief Command, threw himself into the Place; and the same Day an Officer was posted back, to make a Representation of its Condition, and to beseech immediate Assistance: But this Resolution was scarce taken, before a Bomb fell upon a great Tower, where their Magazines of Powder were lodg'd, blew it up into the Air, destroyed almost seventeen hundred of the Garrison, who were going upon Duty, overthrew the Walls and Ramparts, fill'd the Ditch, and open'd so large a Breach, that the Enemy, who were on the Point of making a general Assault, enter'd by whole Squadrons, and cut to Pieces all they met. At the same time, the Fire spread from Magazine to Magazine, which were eleven in all; and in the midst of the Confusion created by such a Concurrence of Calamities, the Residue of the Garrison, and among them Messieurs de Croy and d'Aspremont, made their Escapes as well as they could, over the Danube and Save, to Peterwaradin, leaving the Enemy in Possession of all that the Flames had spar'd.

Nissa and Widin reduc'd, Semandria, as also Belgrade by Storm.

A. D. 1690. In this Interval, and while the Prince of Baden was on his March towards Tranſilvania, Tekeli had ſent Circular Letters to the States of that Province, directing them to meet him at Alba Julia, accompany'd with ſeveral Menaces againſt all ſuch as ſhould preſume to diſobey him; which had ſuch an Effect on many of them, that they not only comply'd, but proceeded to elect and do him Homage as their Prince. He found Means alſo, in his preſent Exaltation, to draw a Reinforcement of ſeveral thouſand Men from Valachia and Moldavia. But his Reign was of ſhort Continuance, and his Allies were ſoon oblig'd to deſert him, and return to the Defence of their own Country againſt the Poles, who, having repuls'd the Tartars, fell into Moldavia, reduc'd the Capital of that Province, and left in it a Garriſon of eight hundred Men. They alſo gave out, that they would paſs on into Valachia; but afterwards excus'd themſelves on account of the Advance of the Seaſon, repaſs'd the Nieſter, and ſeparated into their Winter-Quarters.

Tekeli obliges the Tranſilvanian States to elect him Prince.

Tekeli being thus depriv'd of his Auxiliaries, was no longer in a Condition to defend his new-acquir'd Principality againſt Prince Lewis, at the Hazard of a Battle, and therefore, on his Approach, he caus'd the Suburbs of Hermanſtadt to be burn'd, ſent his Baggage, under a Guard of ſix thouſand Men, to a Place of Security among the Mountains, and retir'd with the reſt of his Forces into Valachia. The States hereupon thought it adviſeable to take a new Oath of Fidelity to the Emperor, on Condition that they had the Benefit of his Protection againſt their Enemies.

This ſeem'd but a reaſonable Stipulation on the Behalf of the Country; but, under the Pretence of granting Protection, they took Poſſeſſion: Part of them were canton'd at Cronſtadt, and Part at Clauſenburg; and all ſuch as had held Correſpondence with Tekeli, were proceeded againſt as Traitors and public Enemies: But they were not ſuffer'd to carry on theſe Proſecutions long, without Interruption; for while Tekeli endeavour'd to make an Incurſion on one Side of the Province, a ſtrong Party of Turks did the ſame on the other.

This drew the Imperialiſts again into the Field; Prince Lewis himſelf undertook the Latter, and wholly diſpers'd them; but Prince Auguſtus of Hanover who was ſent againſt the Former, having ventur'd into a Paſs ſo narrow, that two Men could ſcarce march abreaſt, was kill'd at the firſt Volley; and his Detachment was glad to make the beſt Retreat they could. Tekeli did not, however, proſecute this Advantage; for, having receiv'd Advice of what had befallen the Turks, and fearing his Retreat might be cut off by the Snows which frequently choak up the Paſſes of the Mountains, he return'd with all ſpeed into Valachia; and Prince Lewis made the beſt of his way to Vienna.

and is himſelf oblig'd to quit the Country.

To conclude on this Head, the Preſervation of Tranſilvania, however magnify'd on this Side of Europe, afforded the Imperial Court but a poor Conſolation for their Loſſes in Hungary: And, on the other hand, A. D. 1690. the Acquiſitions of the Turks abundantly recompens'd all the Misfortunes of the preceding Year: For, over and above the Places already mention'd, they reduc'd Orſoway, a fortify'd Iſland oppoſite to Belgrade; and Lippa: They broke up the ſeveral Blockades of Themeſwaer and Great Waradin; and by filling all the ſtrong Towns in Upper Hungary beyond the Tibiſcus, with Troops, they put a large Extent of Territory under Contribution, and were in a Condition to take the Field much earlier, and to more Advantage, than for ſeveral Years before.

The new Vizier, as he deſerv'd, had the Honour of all; and ſo tranſported were the Turks with the Senſe of his Merits and Services, and the Fulneſs of their own Acknowledgments, that they ſwore by his Name, call'd him the Deliverer and Reſtorer of the Ottoman Empire, the Favourite of their Prophet, the Champion of their Religion, &c. No Blemiſh or Reproach would ſtick upon him; for tho' a Party which he ſent to reduce Eſſeck rais'd the Siege in a Panic, before any Enemy was in Sight, or even within Reach of them, not a Man was heard to raiſe a Murmur on that Account, or to draw any Inference from it, in Diminution of the Glory of the Campaign. And as to the Succeſſes of the Venetians, both at Sea and in the Morea, as they were not obtain'd againſt him perſonally, they were ſo far from being made Objections to his Adminiſtration, that they only ſerv'd as a Foil to ſet it off with the greater Luſtre.

The War in Savoy.

As to the Duke of Savoy, we left him in the midſt of his new Engagements, and on the Point of entering the Liſts among the reſt of the Confederates, againſt the common Enemy. The War was declar'd in Form, June the third, N. S. and to avoid a Detail of inſignificant Motions and Skirmiſhes, on the 18th of Auguſt following, the two Armies came to an Action near Staffarda. Mr. Catinat had form'd a Deſign to make himſelf Maſter of Saluces, in hope of finding there a plentiful Supply of Proviſions for his Army: The Po lay between him and the Place; and no ſooner had his Van paſs'd that River, than the Duke of Savoy, who had made a forc'd March to come up with him, appear'd in Sight, and prepar'd to fall upon his Rear. This induc'd Catinat to alter his Meaſures, to recall his Van, and to make a Diſpoſition to give his Royal Highneſs a proper Reception. While this was doing, Night came on; both Armies encamp'd almoſt within Cannon-ſhot of each other; and the next Morning, as if by Agreement, drew out in Battle-Array, and challeng'd each other to engage. That of the Duke, tho' he had never commanded before, was ſkilfully enough diſpos'd; his Right being cover'd with the little River of Staffarda, and his Left with Hedges and Marſhes. Unluckily, Mr. Catinat having caus'd the Latter to be ſounded, found them hard at Bottom; and while he amus'd the Savoyards with a warm Cannonading in Front, caus'd them to be as warmly attack'd in Flank by a ſtrong

The Battle of Staffarda.

A. D. 1690. Party of Foot, from the very Quarter where they thought themſelves moſt ſecure. Surprize is generally fatal upon theſe Occaſions; they were not prepar'd for this double Onſet; and giving way, the French redoubled their Efforts, and completed their Victory on that Side. The Duke's Right Wing, in the mean while, maintain'd their Ground, from eleven in the Morning, till three in the Afternoon; but, being at length overpower'd, were oblig'd to follow the Left, and almoſt in the ſame Confuſion; leaving the Field of Battle cover'd with three thouſand of their Dead, and the Enemy in Poſſeſſion of ſeveral Colours, ſeveral Pieces of Cannon, and a great Number of Priſoners.

The Duke retir'd with the Relics of his Army to Carmagnole; and while he endeavour'd to repair his Loſs, and ſolicited his new Allies to contribute their ſeveral Quotas towards it, Mr. Catinat purſu'd his former Deſign of reducing Saluces; which he ſoon effected; together with the whole Marquiſate of that Name. Nor was this all; for Suſa being conſiderable for its Situation, in regard that it commanded the Paſſes out of the Dauphinate into Piedmont, he ſet down before it in the Beginning of November; and in a few Hours made himſelf Maſter both of the Town and Caſtle; which ſo incens'd his Royal Highneſs, that when the Governor, and ſome of the principal Officers arriv'd at Turin, he caus'd them to be thrown into Priſon, and threaten'd to proceed againſt them, capitally, for having betray'd their Truſt.

Saluces and Suſa reduc'd by Catinat;

In this Interval alſo, that the Duke might ſo much the more ſenſibly feel the Weight of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Reſentment, Mr. St. Ruth, with another Body of French Troops, fell into Savoy, and entirely reduc'd that Duchy, and all its Dependencies, except the Fortreſs of Montmelian; inſomuch, that a free Communication was open'd between the two Provinces; and the two Commanders had it in their Power to aſſiſt each other, as Occaſion offer'd, or Need requir'd: And this Conqueſt was ſo abſolute, that St. Ruth oblig'd the Inhabitants to take an Oath of Allegiance to the King his Maſter; and in his Name took upon him the Government of the Duchy, as if it was to remain for ever annex'd to the Gallic Empire.

Sequel of King William's Exploits in Ireland.

We muſt now return to King William in Ireland, who, triumphant as he was, had, in this Interval, been ſufficiently humbled by the ill News which he had receiv'd from almoſt every Quarter beſides; more particularly, from England, where his new acquir'd Sovereignty, for a while, was repreſented to be in Danger; tho' ſuch was his Equanimity, according to Burnet, that he look'd on good and bad Fortune with the ſame ſerene Face, and the ſame compos'd Heart: But then he alſo tells us, that he receiv'd the News of the Battle of Fleurus the Day after the Victory of the Boyne, and that of the Misfortune at Sea the Day he made his Entrance into Dublin: And hence it may be argu'd, that the Accidents of his Life ſet the Balance of his Mind, that he was plac'd between the Extremes of Good and Evil; and that each in turn corrected the Extravagance apt to ariſe from the other. The Biſhop, however, is not altogether ſo accurate as he is circumſtantial; for, as we have ſeen, he enter'd Dublin on the fifth of July, and he did not receive the bad News from England till the eighth or ninth; and we ſhall meet with an Eſcape now and then, which ſhew'd that his Majeſty was not quite ſo much a Philoſopher as a Hero. [Impartial Hiſtory, p. 99.]

A. D. 1690.

His Lordſhip moreover adds, That the Queen and Council preſs'd the King to come over with all poſſible Haſte; becauſe England was in ſo much more Danger, and of ſo much more Importance than Ireland, &c. And that his Majeſty did not immediately ſet out, he endeavours to account for as follows: "He, the King, had taken all the Earl of Tyrconnel's Papers in the Camp; and he found all King James's Papers left behind him in Dublin. By theſe he underſtood the Deſign the French had of burning his Tranſport-Fleet; which was, therefore, firſt to be taken care of: And ſince the French were now Maſters at Sea, he ſaw nothing that could hinder the Execution of their Deſign." It is happy that his Lordſhip afterwards mentions the Reduction of Waterford, as the only Means to provide againſt this Deſign of the French, or otherwiſe we muſt have concluded from this Paſſage, That the King's firſt Care was to attempt what he knew to be impoſſible: But then, we are no where elſe inform'd, that the Iriſh Camp fell into his Majeſty's Hands: On the contrary, it is ſaid, That they ſent off their Cannon and Baggage before the Fight began. And that King James ſhould leave his Papers behind him at Dublin, eſpecially as they contain'd ſuch a Secret as we are (u) told they did, when

(u) In theſe Words: "Among the Earl of Tyrconnel's Papers, there was one Letter writ to Queen Mary at St. Germains, the Night BEFORE the Battle; but it was not ſent. In it, he ſaid, he LOOK'D ON ALL AS LOST: and ended it thus: I have now no hope in any thing but in Jones's Buſineſs. The Marquis of Caermarthen told me, That ſome Weeks before the King went to Ireland, he had receiv'd an Advertiſement, that one named Jones, an Iriſhman, who had ſerv'd ſo long in France and Holland, that he ſpoke both Languages well, was to be ſent over to murder the King. And Sir Robert Southwell told me, that he, as Secretary of State for Ireland, had look'd into all Tyrconnel's Papers, and the Copies of the Letters he wrote to Queen Mary, which he had ſtill in his Poſſeſſion; and he gave me the Copies of two of them. In one of theſe he writes, that Jones was come; that his Propoſition was more probable, and liker to ſucceed, than any yet made: his Demands were high; but he added, If any thing can be high for ſuch a Service. In another he writes, that Jones had been with the King, who did not like the thing at firſt; but he added, We have now ſo ſatisfy'd him both in Conſcience and Honour, that every thing is done that Jones deſires. Southwell further told me, that Dongle, the Attorney-General, had furniſh'd him with Money, and a Poignard of a particular Compoſition; and that they fought long for a Bible bound without a Common-Prayer-Book, which he was to carry in his Pocket, that ſo he might paſs, if ſeiz'd on, for a Diſſenter. Some Perſons of great quality waited on him to the Boat that was to carry him over. He was for ſome time delay'd in Dublin, and the King had paſs'd over to Ireland before he could reach him. We could never hear of him more. So it is likely he went away with his Money. A Paper was drawn of all this Matter, and deſign'd to be publiſh'd; but, upon ſecond Thoughts, the King and Queen had that Tenderneſs for King James, that

A. D. 1690. when he had so much time to carry them off, or destroy them, and when he knew they would fall into his Enemy's Hands, requires no ordinary Degree of Faith to believe: As also, that the French Frigates, which carry'd off King James, were the very Ships appointed to burn the Transports; and that the Commander of them, instead of fulfilling his Orders, in a Matter of such Importance, and so easy to be effected, should take that Prince's Word, That all was lost, and immediately return with him into France. Yet thus the Story is told by the Historian of his own Times; and we are oblig'd to follow what we cannot circumstantially disprove.

It is certain, however, that the Author of the Impartial History, which has the Licenser's Stamp to authorise it, who says in his Title-Page, That he was an Eye-witness of the principal Facts he treats of, and who betrays no want of Intelligence of any kind, mentions none of these curious Particulars. Satisfy'd with copying what he saw, he tells us in a plain, unaffected manner, That after his Majesty had receiv'd the News from England, he divided his Forces; that he sent Lieutenant-General Douglas, with five Regiments of Horse and Dragoons, and ten Regiments of Foot, to reduce Athlone; and that he himself, with the rest of the Army, march'd Westward, to do the same by Waterford; having first sign'd a Commission for seizing the Goods and Estates of Rebels and Absentees, for the Use of the Government; which was very much abus'd: That Douglas fail'd in his Expedition: That the King, on his March, having seen a Soldier rob a poor Woman, was so enrag'd, that he beat him with his Cane, and gave Orders, that several other Delinquents of the same Class should be executed on the Monday following: That on the 22d of July, he summon'd the Governor and Garrison of Waterford to surrender: That they did so, on the same Terms that were granted to those of Drogheda: That the Garrison march'd out on the 25th: That the same Day, the King held a Council, in which he declar'd his Purpose to return to England; which, says our Author, occasion'd various Conjectures, and some Apprehensions, that the Affairs in England were in no pleasing Posture: That on the 27th, he accordingly set out for Dublin, having left Count Solmes, a Dutchman, Commander in Chief: That the same Evening he receiv'd fresh Dispatches from England at Carlow: That hereupon he shew'd some Irresolution whether he should proceed, or return to his Camp: That on the Morrow he did proceed to Chapel-Izard, where he spent three Days in hearing Petitions; some of which, says our Author again, related to the Violation of Protections, and the Outrages committed by General Douglas's Division: and others about the Abuses and Inconveniencies of the late Commission: That his Majesty here also gave Orders for the shipping two Regiments of Foot, one of Horse, one of Dragoons, and one Troop of Guards, for England: That on the first of August, he publish'd a second Declaration, not only confirming and strengthening the Former, but moreover adding, That if any Foreigners in the late King's Service, would lay down their Arms, and surrender themselves, they should be furnished with Passes to return to their own Country: As also, a Proclamation, requiring all Papists to deliver up their Arms, on pain of being esteem'd Rebels and Traitors, and abandon'd to the Discretion of the Soldiers: That about this time the Commissioners of the Great Seal of Ireland, receiv'd their Instructions, and began to act: That his Majesty, having receiv'd yet other Advices from England, importing, That Lord Torrington, and all other suspected Persons, were secur'd; That several wicked Designs were discover'd, and prevented: That the Loss at Sea was not so great as was at first apprehended; and that the French Fleet, after burning one little Village, was gone back to Brest, resolv'd to return to the Army: That on the second of August, he did return accordingly: And that on the ninth he came before Limerick; having on the same Day, been rejoin'd by General Douglas from Athlone.

but alters his Mind, and besieges Limerick.

It was to this Place, and the Neighbourhood of it, that the far greatest Part of the Irish Army, with all their French Auxiliaries and principal Officers, were retir'd, after the Battle of the Boyne: And, according to the Account of a Cornet, who deserted from the Enemy, the Garrison consisted of no less than fourteen Regiments of Foot, three of Horse, and two of Dragoons; besides which, Lord Tyrconnel, with the Residue of the Horse, and a Party of Foot, lay encamp'd about six or eight Miles off; and the French at Galway. The Town is situated on the Shannon, a broad, deep River, and was, in a manner, divided into three Parts; for Part stands on the Munster-Side of the River, which is called the Irish Town; Part on the Island, in the midst of the River; and a large Fort, which stood on the Clare-Side, and which was now enlarg'd with several Outworks, made what might be call'd a third Part. All three were connected by Bridges: And as the King made his Attack only on one Side, and never once thought, as far as it appears, of breaking down those Bridges, the Besieged had it in their Power to admit what Succours they pleas'd, either of Men or Provisions, on the other. They had it also in their Power to have very much distress'd the King's Army in their Approaches; for the only Pass to the Town on that Side, which they stopt the publishing to the World so shameful a Practice. The King said, upon this, to my self, that God had preserved him out of many Dangers; and he trusted he would still preserve him. He was sure he was not capable of retaliating in that way. The Escape of a Cannon Ball, that touch'd him, was so signal, that it swallow'd up lesser ones: Yet, in the Battle at the Boyne, a Musket Ball struck the Heel of his Boot, and recoiling, kill'd a Horse near him. And one of his own Men, misliking him for an Enemy, came up to shoot him; but he gently put by his Pistol, and only said, Do not you know your Friend?" [Burnet, ubi p. ii. 55, 56.

A.D. 1690. which lay between two Bogs, was not above an hundred and fifty Yards broad, was encumber'd with Hedges, an Orchard, a Stone Wall, the Ruins of a large Houſe, which the Iriſh had burnt the Day before, and was commanded by a Fort call'd Ireton's Fort, which ſtood on a Riſing Ground, and overlook'd the Paſs on one Side, and the Town on the other: But all the Uſe they made of theſe ſingular Advantages, was, to line the Hedges, &c. with Bodies of Foot, and that not ſo much to maintain the Poſt, as to ſell it as dearly as they could to the Enemy, who, on the other hand, advanc'd with as much Caution as Reſolution; for under the Cover of the Van-Guard, the Pioneers had Orders to fell the Hedges, and clear the Paſs from Side to Side; and cloſe behind appear'd the whole Army, drawn up in ſuch Order, as ſuited beſt with the Ground, and the Service of the Day.

The Pioneers, accordingly, clear'd the Way as they went; and ſtill, as one Hedge was fell'd, the Iriſh poſted behind it, after one Diſcharge, fled to the next; and, in leſs than Half an Hour, were all driven into their Entrenchments under the Cannon of the Town: There were alſo ſeveral Companies in Ireton's Fort, who behav'd yet worſe than theſe; for, on the very Approach of the Engliſh, they retreated as faſt as they could, without firing a Gun.

This ſeem'd to be a fortunate Beginning, and what promis'd an Event as fortunate; but Succeſſes ſo eaſily obtain'd, are too apt to create Security: The Beſiegers encamp'd within Cannon-ſhot of the Walls, and yet drew no Lines of Circumvallation, and the next Day ſummon'd the Town to ſurrender, tho' they had no battering Cannon to force an Entrance. Mr. Boiſleau, a Frenchman, had the Command, as Governor; and his Anſwer, in Subſtance, was, That he thought the beſt way to gain the Prince of Orange's good Opinion, was to defend his Poſt; which was no ſooner deliver'd, than the Iriſh began to cannonade the King's Forces; and they return'd the Compliment, by pelting the Town with a few inſignificant Field-Pieces.

His Majeſty had, however, a ſmall Train upon the Road, conſiſting of ſix Twenty-four-pounders, and two Eighteen Pounders, which, together with a large Quantity of Ammunition, Proviſions, &c. were under the ſlender Guard of two Troops of Horſe: Of this Incident the Enemy were appriz'd on the ſecond Day of the Siege, by a Runaway-French Gunner; as alſo in what Part of the Camp the King's Tent ſtood, with every other Circumſtance of Moment, which had fallen within his Knowledge; and immediately reſolv'd to make the beſt uſe they could of ſuch important Intelligence. Accordingly, all that Day and the next, they ſo warmly plied their Guns againſt the Royal Quarter, that ſeveral Men, and two of the Prince of Denmark's Horſes were kill'd, and his Majeſty thought it adviſeable to remove to a ſecurer Place. Colonel Sarſfield, alſo in the Night, paſs'd the Shannon at Killaloe, with a Body of Iriſh Horſe, and made the beſt of his way to intercept the Train, &c. as knowing, that the Fate of the Siege depended upon it. Of this one Manus O' Brian, a ſubſtantial Country Gentleman, brought Intelligence to the King's Camp the next Morning, but met with ſo little Countenance at firſt, that he was ſcarce heard; and, inſtead of entering into the Particulars of his Information, one of the General Officers conſulted him, about a Booty of Cattle, which lay in a certain Place. At length, however, having found his way to the King, a Party of five hundred Horſe, to prevent the worſt, were order'd out to meet the Train: But either ſo imperfectly were theſe Orders given, or ſo unwillingly were they obeyed, that it was one or two o'Clock in the Morning before they began to march; and they had ſcarce been an Hour upon the Road, before they ſaw a great Light in the Air, which was follow'd by a Noiſe, reſembling Thunder, accompany'd with an Earthquake. No Doubt was then any longer made of O'Brian's Intelligence, or Sarſfield's Succeſs: And theſe Concluſions of theirs were verify'd by the Fact: For the Train having, that very Night, reach'd an old ruinous Caſtle, call'd Ballenedy, not ſeven Miles from the Rear of his Majeſty's Camp; and the Guard having turn'd moſt part of their Horſes to Graſs, and laid themſelves down to ſleep, in the Belief that they were now out of the Reach of Danger, Sarſfield, who had lurk'd among the Mountains all Day, fell in amongſt them with his Party, cut many of them to Pieces, diſpers'd the reſt, carry'd off as many of their Horſes as they could catch, endeavoured to ſplit the Guns, and finally blew up the whole Convoy; after which they had alſo the good Luck to repaſs the River, and recover Limerick, without any material Loſs or Interruption.

A.D. 1690. Sarſfield intercepts the Kings Artillery.

It happen'd, however, that two of the Guns receiv'd no Damage; and with theſe, together with two more, and a Mortar-piece, which were brought from Waterford, it was reſolv'd to proſecute the Siege: All the Particulars of which are minutely ſet down by our Impartial Hiſtorian, and as minutely copy'd by our Cotemporary Mr. Tindal.

It is, however, ſufficient for us to remember, that, after the Town had been batter'd for ſeveral Days together, and plied for as many Nights with Fire-balls, Bombs and Carcaſſes, a Breach was made of about twelve Yards in Breadth; and the King gave Orders for a Storm; which was attempted accordingly on the 27th in the Afternoon by the choiceſt Troops of the Army, but without the deſir'd Succeſs; for tho' they carry'd the Counterſcarp, and Lord Dregheda actually enter'd the Breach, for want of being properly ſupported, they were driven out again; and the Iriſh recovering their Spirit with this unexpected Turn, and led on by their very Women, who were all Amazons on this Occaſion, return'd to the Breach, and defended it for three Hours together with ſo much Vigour and Reſolution, that his Majeſty, who was all the time a Spectator tor of the Action, caus'd a Retreat to be sounded, having seen five hundred of his best Men kill'd on the Spot, and about a thousand more wounded.

Our Author adds, That he return'd to his Camp, very much concern'd; the Jacobites, that he suffer'd himself to be very ridiculously transported; and Bishop Burnet, on the Authority of Dr. Hutton, his Majesty's Physician, continues positive, That he preserv'd the same Calm, without the least Depression, Disorder, or Peevishness.

The next Day after this Misadventure, he sent a Drummer to demand a Truce for the Burial of the Dead; but the Irish refus'd it: And when the Soldiers were on fire to make a new Effort, in hope of better Success, or, at least, of being aveng'd for their late Disappointment, Orders were given to disarm the Batteries, and raise the Siege: For the Rains already began to fall; and it was concluded, That if they prosecuted the Undertaking any farther, they must either go thro' with it, or leave their Cannon behind them. As it was, they were forc'd to blow up a great Quantity of Hand-granades, Bombs, &c. because of the Impossibility of carrying them off. August the 30th, the Army began to march, the Regiments that had suffer'd most having the Van, and the Horse bringing up the Rear; and were accompany'd by all the Protestants of the neighbouring Country, with all their Cattle and Moveables, whose Condition was truly deplorable; for, if they staid, they were sure to be given up to the Discretion of the Irish; and they were as sure to be plunder'd if they follow'd their Protectors and Deliverers. Even Bishop Burnet confesses, That the King's Army study'd more their own Ease, than the Protection of the Inhabitants: That many of them were suspected of robbing, though the Irish Rapparees bore the Blame of all: That between both, the poor Inhabitants had a sad time, their Cattle and Stock, being almost quite destroy'd in many Places. And again, in another Place, That they were almost as heavy to the Country as the Rapparees: That there being great Arrears due to them, the King had not left them under the Civil Government, when he left that Kingdom, for fear of Mutinies: That, on the other hand, the Subalterns finding they were only answerable to their superior Officers, took great Liberties: That the Danes were cruel Friends, and thought they were Masters: That the English were not much better: And that the Dutch were the least complain'd of. And to all this, the Impartial Historian adds, in Effect, That King William's Protections were as often violated as King James's: That those who put their Trust in his Declaration, had no Benefit from it; and that when the Army went into Winter-Quarters, and several Justices and Deputy Lieutenants made a formal Proposal, That if the Soldiers would be quiet, and not take upon them to be their own Purveyors, the Country would supply them with all Necessaries, some of the Colonels, instead of embracing it, order'd the poor People to bring in their Corn to certain Miserable Condition of the Country.

Places, by them specified, which they made Merchandize of, and in the mean time allow'd their Men to commit what Excesses they pleas'd: Whence it follow'd, that both English and Irish were stript on all hands; and the very Rapparees themselves were plunder'd in the Day of what they had pilfer'd in the Night.

A. D. 1690.

On the very Day that the Siege was rais'd, his Majesty posted on to Waterford, accompany'd with the Prince of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, &c. and set sail with a fair Wind for England.

The King sets sail for England.

The Army his Majesty left, as before, under the Comand of Count Solmes; and after him under Ginkle, another of his Country-men; and the Civil Government under Lord Sydney, and Thomas Cominghsby, Esq; as Lords Justices; the two first of whom, immediately after the King's Departure, repair'd to the Camp at Cullen, to assist in the Disposition of the Army. This, we are told, took up two Days; and, in that Interval, the Soldiers had once more the Pleasure of being made acquainted with Money, which had been very scarce during the whole Campaign, tho' their Wants were no Obstruction to their Duties.

having left the Army under Count Solmes, and the Government under Lords Justices.

The new Lords Justices then repair'd to Dublin, took the Oaths, and concerted the necessary Measures for re-establishing a Protestant Civil Government: In order to which, they first took care to put the Lieutenancy into safe Hands; they then invited and encourag'd all Persons to supply the Markets of Dublin with Provisions, &c. by forbidding all Officers and Soldiers to press their Horses, or give them any other Molestation. They also order'd all Papists to remain in their respective Parishes, from whence they were not to remove above three Miles; nor at all, except to Market. Those who lived near the Frontier, were oblig'd to withdraw ten Miles from thence, to prevent their holding any Correspondence with the Enemy; and for the same Reason, all the Wives, Children, and Dependants of any of the Irish in King James's Army, or of those who had been kill'd or taken in that Service, were commanded to pass the Shannon by such a Day, on pain of being proceeded against as Spies. By another Proclamation, all Masters of Ships, Seamen, &c. were forbid to transport any Officer, Soldier, or any other Person whatever, except known Merchants, and Persons of known Quality, not belonging to the Army, without a Pass from the Lords Justices, or the General of the Army; which was done to prevent Desertion. Lastly, Protections were promis'd to all Ships and Mariners that should be employ'd in transporting Coals from any Port of England and Wales to Dublin; and all clandestine Sales of Goods, Provisions, &c. were forbid, because of the Abuses daily committed by the Soldiery, who took away the Properties of some, and sold them at any Under-Value to others.

Regulations of the new Lords Justices.

All this while the Earl of Marlborough, who had till now lain idle in England, for what Reason is no where satisfactorily explain'd, Lord Marlborough's Expedition to Cork.

A. D. 1690. plan'd, was forming a Project to raiſe his own Character and Importance, without being over-ſhadow'd by the King's perſonal Interpoſition, or rival'd in it by his Majeſty's more favour'd Dutch Commanders: And this was to reduce the Towns of Cork and Kingſale; Places of great Conſequence, both on Account of their Strength, and their convenient Situation for receiving Succours from France. There was now no Danger of the French Fleet; That of the Engliſh and Dutch, completely refitted, and greatly reinforc'd, was ready to put to Sea; all was quiet at Home, and a Body of five thouſand Men could well be ſpar'd for ſuch an Expedition, without any Danger of expoſing the Nation to a new Inſult. Of all theſe Conſiderations, Lord Marlborough did not fail to make his own uſe; and was ſo well ſupported in the Privy-Council, that his Project was adopted, and all things were made ready for putting it in Execution. According to ſome Accounts, the King himſelf was preſent when the Affair was debated in the Cabinet; but according to others, his Majeſty was yet in Ireland, and was prevail'd upon to give it his Approbation there: And this, it is reaſonable to think, is the Truth; For his Majeſty landed at Briſtol, September the 6th; and on the 21ſt following, Lord Marlborough came to an Anchor in Cork-Road; which would have been impoſſible, if the Expedition had not been pre-concerted. It is, beſides, certain, that his Lordſhip was ſome time detain'd by contrary Winds; ſo long, ſays Biſhop Burnet, that he did not arrive at Cork till October: But tho' this latter Circumſtance is falſe, the former is true: which is a farther Proof, that the Troops were on the Point of embarking, if they were not already embark'd, when the King came over; and, probably, the obtaining his Majeſty's Conſent was the moſt difficult Part of the whole Undertaking; for, over and above the Diſpleaſure which the Earl had incurr'd, by taking ſo warm a Part in all the Princeſs of Denmark's Concerns, the King choſe to be ſerv'd by his own Countrymen; and they, who did not care that he ſhould be ſerv'd by any body elſe, made no Difficulty to diſparage the Deſign, by urging, That Cork alone could not be reduc'd in leſs than ſix Weeks, which was much longer than the Seaſon would allow.

His Conteſt with the Duke of Wirtemburgh.

However this may be, the Earl made a ſhift to carry his Point; but not without ſome Mixture of Mortification: He found himſelf colleagu'd with the Duke of Wirtemburgh, who, upon joining him under the Walls of Cork with four thouſand Danes, had the Raſhneſs to inſiſt on the chief Command, becauſe he was a Prince: And tho' the Earl pleaded the Priority of his Commiſſion as Lieutenant-General, and that he commanded the Troops of his own Nation, who were Principals in the Quarrel, whereas, the Duke commanded Auxiliaries, or rather Mercenaries only, nothing leſs would ſatisfy his Highneſs than an Equality of Place and Power; which the Earl was forc'd to give way to, that the Continuance of ſuch a Broil might not be fatal to the Service.

A. D. 1690.

On the twenty-third the Troops from England landed without Oppoſition, a Party of Seamen having prepar'd their way, by ſtorming a Fort of eight Guns which commanded both the Harbour and Shore: And on the 28th following, a Breach having been made, and the Army making their (x) Approaches under the Fire of their Batteries, and that of two Bomb-Veſſels, in order to a Storm, the Garriſon, which conſiſted of no leſs than four thouſand Men, beat a Parley, and ſurrender'd the Place, on Condition of being made Priſoners of War, and that the General would uſe his Endeavours to obtain his Majeſty's Clemency towards them.

His Succeſs.

Half his Undertaking being thus happily accompliſh'd, on the very next Day his Lordſhip diſpatch'd Brigadier Villiers with five hundred Horſe, to ſummon Kingſale, who met with the moſt unfavourable Reception imaginable; for the Governor threatened to hang his Trumpet for bringing ſuch a Meſſage; after which, he ſet fire to the old Town, and withdrew his Garriſon into the old and new Forts. But this Appearance of Reſolution did not deter his Lordſhip from proceeding: On the contrary, perceiving that the Weather grew bad, and his Troops began to ſicken; and concluding from thence, that all depended on Expedition, on the 30th he caus'd a Body of Foot to advance; and on the firſt of October, he came before the Place himſelf with the reſt of his Army. On the ſecond, Major General Tettau carry'd the old Fort by Storm; on the third, his Lordſhip ſummon'd the new Fort to ſurrender; and the Governor anſwering, It will be time enough to talk of that a Month hence, made his Diſpoſitions for two Regular Attacks, viz. by the Engliſh on the Right, and the Danes on the left. On the fifth, the Trenches were open'd, and in ten Days more, the Beſiegers being Maſters of the Counterſcarp, and preparing for a general Aſſault, the Enemy beat a Parley, and agreed to deliver up the Place the next Morning, which they did accordingly, and were conducted, together with their Arms and Baggage to Limerick; having left behind them a very conſiderable Magazine, and Proviſions ſufficient to ſubſiſt a thouſand Men for a whole Year.

Thus the Earl had the Happineſs and Honour of fulfilling his Engagements, and thereby of making a very conſiderable Step towards the Reduction of Ireland. What Acknowledgments he receiv'd from his Majeſty at his Return to Court, we do not find ſpecify'd; but it is certain, he could not have made his Court to the People more effectually, than by ſhewing, they had a General of their own; at a time, when all the (x) In which the Duke of Grafton, who had the Command of the Squadron of Ships left to cover the Siege, was mortally wounded.

A. D. 1690. the principal Military Truſts and Honours were conferr'd on Foreigners.

The reſt of the Year was more remarkable for the Sufferings of the Country, than the Succeſſes of either Party; for which ſoever prevail'd, the Inhabitants were ſtill plunder'd, and both were to be follow'd by the ſame Track of Ruin and Devaſtation.

Of the Britiſh Colonies in America, we have hitherto been wholly ſilent, becauſe they offer'd nothing material to be treated of. With regard to the Revolution, they had follow'd implicitly the Example of England; 'For, ſaid one of their Governors, if the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, are King and Queen at Whitehall, it is fit they ſhould be ſo here.' But by this time the Storm, which ſhook the whole Continent of Europe, alſo reach'd them; and it becomes neceſſary to mention the Effects.

Towards the Cloſe of the preceding Year, a Squadron of Men of War, conſiſting of one Third Rate, ſeven Fourth Rates, and one Fifth Rate, accompany'd with two Fire-Ships and a Bomb-Ketch, and having on board a Regiment of Foot, had been order'd to ſet ſail as ſoon as poſſible to Barbadoes and the Leeward-Iſlands, under the Command of Captain Lawrence Wright; with Inſtructions to provide for the Security of the ſaid Iſlands, to aſſiſt the Dutch, and annoy the French: In all which Undertaking, he was to take the Advice of Councils of War, and alſo of Colonel Codrington, Captain-General of the Leeward-Iſlands, and the Governor and Council of Barbadoes.

It ſo happen'd, however, that he did not ſet ſail till March, 1689-90, and then it was in Company of Admiral Ruſſel, and as Part of the Fleet appointed for the Convoy of the Queen of Spain: Whence it alſo happen'd, that he did not reach Nevis till the eighth of May following. But immediately after the News of the Declaration of War againſt France had reach'd America, the French, who held one Part of the Iſland of St. Chriſtophers, had maſter'd the Engliſh, who till then had been in Poſſeſſion of the other: This terribly alarm'd the Inhabitants of the adjacent Iſlands, who dreaded nothing more than any Acceſs of Power to ſuch encroaching Neighbours; and, therefore, partly on a Principle of Self-preſervation, and partly with a View of making Acquiſitions in their Turn, the ſaid Inhabitants, with Colonel Codrington their Governor at their Head, made all the Preparations in their Power to reduce that Iſland again. This was the State of Things when Wright arriv'd; and in about ſix Weeks afterwards, Codrington, and he, as Commanders in Chief, with their whole united Strength, ſet ſail for St. Chriſtophers; where, having landed two ſeveral Bodies of Men, they attack'd the French, in Front and Rear at once, forc'd them out of their Entrenchments, and the ſame Morning beat them a ſecond time out of a Paſs between two Hills, where they had rally'd, and which they had undertaken to defend. The two Commanders then puſh'd on to reduce the Town of Backſtar, but found the Enemy had abandon'd it, and ſet it on fire. Their next Attempt was upon the Engliſh Fort; which the Garriſon defended for ſome Days, but ſurrender'd at laſt upon Capitulation, and made their Retreat to the Mountains; whither the reſt of the Inhabitants had fled for Sanctuary before. And now no Enemy appearing, and all the valuable Part of the Iſland being reduc'd, a Regiment was detach'd to reduce the little Iſland of St. Euſtatia likewiſe; which being accompliſh'd, and the Hurricane Seaſon being at hand, the Forces were re-imbark'd, and the whole Fleet ſet ſail for Barbadoes.

A. D. 1690.

St. Chriſtophers recover'd from the French.

This Year, alſo, the Inhabitants of New-England became Adventurers in the Trade of War, at their own Expence, and with a Fleet, Army, and General of their own: The French had made a Settlement in Nova Scotia, call'd Fort-Royal, and began to open a Commerce, which the New-Englanders rightly conjectur'd, would ſoon interfere with their own; while, therefore, the Colony was yet in its Infancy, they reſolv'd to deſtroy it; and accordingly made a Proviſion of four Ships, and between ſeven and eight hundred Men for that Service. Their General was one Sir William Phipps; and, whatever his Conduct was, ſuch was his Succeſs, that he carry'd his Point, oblig'd the Planters and other Inhabitants to take the Oath of Allegiance to their Majeſties, and brought away the Garriſon Priſoners of War.

New and Fort-Royal in Nova-Scotia reduc'd by the New-Englanders.

Having now before us a general Sketch of all the Military Operations of the Year, it is time to reſume thoſe of the State; and firſt, with reſpect to his Majeſty, Biſhop Burnet aſſures us, "That he was ſo little weary'd with the Campaign, that he intended to have gone over to his Army in Flanders: But, continues his Lordſhip, it was too late; for they were going into Winter-Quarters." The King, as we have ſeen, landed at Briſtol, September the ſixth; and the Army in Flanders did not break up till above a Month afterwards: If, therefore, his Majeſty left the Campaign unfiniſh'd in Ireland with any ſuch Intention, it muſt be preſum'd, it was not merely the Advance of the Seaſon that hinder'd him: But it is plain, he had no ſuch Intention; and that this Surmiſe of the Biſhop's, tho' adopted by Mr. Tindal, is no more than a Strain of Fancy, to embelliſh the Character of his Hero; for in the very firſt Council that was held after the King's Return to Kenſington, which was on the 10th, it was reſolv'd to iſſue a Proclamation, requiring the Attendance of the Members of both Houſes of Parliament, on the ſecond Day of October: This Proclamation was made public the next Day; after which it became the chief Buſineſs of the Cabinet to make the neceſſary Preparations for opening the Seſſion; and at the time appointed, the Seſſion was open'd accordingly by his Majeſty, with the following Speech from the Throne:

The Parliament ſummon'd to meet.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Since I laſt met you, I have uſed my beſt Endeavours to reduce Ireland into ſuch a Condition this Year, that it may be no longer

The King's Speech to both Houſes.

A. D. 1690. longer a Charge to England: And it has pleas'd God to bleſs my Endeavours with ſuch Succeſs, that I doubt not but I ſhould have been fully poſſeſt of that Kingdom by this time, had I been enabled to have gone into the Field as ſoon as I ſhould have done, and as is more eſpecially neceſſary in Ireland, where the Rains are ſo great, and begin ſo early.

I think myſelf oblig'd to take notice, how well the Army there have behav'd themſelves on all Occaſions, and borne as great Hardſhips with little Pay, and with ſo much Patience and Willingneſs, as could not but proceed from an affectionate Duty to my Service, and a Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion.

I have already made it evident how much I have preferr'd the Satisfaction of my Subjects before the moſt ſolid Advantages of the Crown, by parting with ſo conſiderable a Branch of its Inheritance; and it is no leſs apparent, that I have aſked no Revenue for myſelf, but what I have already ſubjected to be charg'd to the Uſes of the War.

I did, at my Departure give Order for all public Accounts to be made ready for me againſt my Return, and I have commanded them to be laid before the Houſe of Commons; by which they will ſee, that the real Want of what was neceſſary beyond the Funds given, and the not getting in due time that for which Funds were aſſign'd, have been the principal Cauſes why the Army was in ſo much Arrear of their Pay, and the Stores, both for the Navy and the Ordinance, not ſupply'd as they ought to be.

Now, as I have neither ſpar'd my Perſon nor my Pains to do you all the Good I could, ſo, I doubt not, but if you will as chearfully do your Parts, it is in your Power to make both me and yourſelves happy, and the Nation great. And, on the other hand, it is too plain by what the French had let you ſee ſo lately, that if the preſent War be not proſecuted with Vigour, no Nation in the World is expoſed to greater Danger.

I hope, therefore, there will need no more upon that Subject, than to lay before you, Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, the State of what will be neceſſary for the Support of the Fleet and Armies, which cannot poſſibly admit of being leſſen'd in the Year enſuing; and to recommend to your Care the clearing of my Revenue, ſo as to enable me to ſubſiſt, and to maintain the Charge of the Civil Liſt, the Revenue being ſo engag'd, that it muſt be wholly apply'd, after the firſt of November, to pay off the Debts already charg'd upon it; and therefore a preſent Conſideration muſt be had of the Arrears of the Army, which ſhall be laid before you; and for all which, I muſt deſire a ſufficient and timely Supply. It is farther neceſſary to inform you, That the whole Support of the Confederacy abroad, will abſolutely depend upon the Speed and Vigour of their Proceedings in this Seſſion.

And here I muſt take Notice, with great Satisfaction, of the Readineſs which my Subjects of all Degrees have ſhewn, both in this City, and in their ſeveral Counties, by giving their Aſſiſtances ſo chearfully as they did in my Abſence, while the French Fleet was upon our Coaſts. And, beſides this ſo convincing a Mark of the good Inclinations of my People, I have found through all the Countries where I paſs'd, both at my going into Ireland, and in my Return from thence, ſuch Demonſtrations of their Affections, that I have not the leaſt Doubt but I ſhall find the ſame from their Repreſentatives in Parliament. A. D. 1690.

I cannot conclude without taking notice alſo, how much the Honour of the Nation has been expos'd by the ill Conduct of my Fleet, in the laſt Summer's Engagement againſt the French: And I think myſelf ſo much concern'd to ſee it vindicated, that I cannot reſt ſatisfy'd till an Example has been made of ſuch as ſhall be found faulty upon their Examination and Trial, which was not practicable while the whole Fleet was abroad, but is now put into the proper way of being done as ſoon as may be.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I look upon the well-being of this Kingdom to depend upon the Reſult of your Counſels and Determinations at this time; and the Benefit will be double by the Speed of your Reſolutions; inſomuch, that I hope you will agree with me in this Concluſion, That whoever goes about to obſtruct or divert your Application to theſe Matters, preferably to all others, can neither be my Friend nor the Kingdom's."

A certain paſſionate Admirer of King William, giving an Abridgment of this Speech, ſays of him in Rapture, "His Memory muſt remain ſacred to the laſt Man on this Earth, who, for Engliſh Liberty, and the Proteſtant Religion, goes bravely into Battle! —— May our Gratitude be as laſting as his Merit, and as firmly fix'd as his Mind was! —— His greateſt Enemies muſt admire and love his Virtues!" But ſurely theſe Overflowings of Admiration are not fully warranted by the Piece they ſtand connected with; for the whole Drift of it is manifeſtly to obtain a large and ſpeedy Supply for the Relief of the Civil Liſt, the Payment of the Army, and the Support of the Confederacy: And it can ſcarce be allow'd, that there is any ſuperlative Degree of Merit in ſeeking the Gratification of our own particular Intereſt. His Majeſty would, beſides, have ſhewn rather more Magnanimity in paſſing his own Merits and Services over in Silence: And not to inſiſt on the artificial Uſe which he was pleas'd to make of the late Terrors brought upon the Nation by the French Fleet, and the Reception he met with from his People on his Return from Ireland, the Cloſe of his laſt Paragraph is ſcarce reconcileable with the Privilege of Parliament, ſince it has a manifeſt Tendency to circumſcribe the Freedom of Debate, and to make the Buſineſs of the Seſſion ſubſervient to the Direction of the Crown. [Crookſhanks in Anſwer to Hatchinſon, p. 26.]

The two Houſes were not, however, in a Diſpoſition to ſtart Objections, but, on the contrary, to take whatever Bias ſhould be given them. Thus, after the Example of

A.D. 1690. the City of London, the East-India Company, &c. who had already waited on his Majesty with their Compliments of Congratulation, they immediately apply'd themselves to draw up Addresses of the like nature, accompany'd with all the Assurances that could possibly be given of their sincere Intentions to support the Government to the utmost of their Power.

The Lords Address to the King and the Queen;

The Lords came first; but, instead of making a joint Compliment to their joint Sovereigns, made their Approaches to the Conqueror one Day, and to the Saviour the next; either that both might have their distinct Share of Acknowledgment, or that his Majesty might not have the least Occasion to surmise, that they thought he had an Equal. To the King they said, "Being extremely sensible of the great Benefit and Advantage that his Majesty's late Expedition into Ireland had procur'd to his Subjects in general; as likewise, that the Success of his Majesty's Arms in that Kingdom was due, next to the Providence and Blessing of God, to his Majesty's Personal Valour and Conduct, they look'd upon it as their Duty to present their humble and hearty Thanks to his Majesty for all those signal Evidences he had given of his extraordinary Affection for his People, which had carry'd his Majesty in so many Occasions to venture a Life that was so dear to them, and to despise all Hazards to procure the Settlement of his Kingdoms, the Peace and Quiet of his Subjects, and the Establishment of their Religion. And as it was not possible but so much Bravery of Mind, such an undaunted Courage, and a Heart so exalted above any Apprehensions in the midst of all Dangers, must gain his Majesty the Admiration and Reverence of all the World, and even of his Enemies themselves, who had felt the Effects of so great Virtues, so they did not doubt but that such extraordinary Qualities must unite the Hearts of all his People in such a Tenderness, as well as Duty, for his Royal Person, as was necessary for the finishing what his Majesty had so gloriously begun."

But in their Application to the Queen, they contented themselves with acknowledging the great Advantage the Nation had receiv'd by the eminent Resolution, as well as Prudence, her Majesty had shewn in the Absence of the King, and in such Circumstances of Difficulty as would have discompos'd a Mind that had not been rais'd above them, as her Majesty had approv'd hers to be, by this undeniable Evidence; and with declaring, that her Majesty, having preferv'd the Quiet and Peace, by her prudent Administration against the Dangers threaten'd by a powerful Enemy, the Remembrance of such extraordinary Virtue must ever dwell in their Minds, and engage them in Justice, upon all Occasions, to express their Gratitude, as became her Majesty's most dutiful Subjects.".

and those of the Commons.

It is remarkable, that the Lords were five Days in preparing and presenting these Court-Offerings, and that the Commons, for what Reason is not specify'd, demurr'd yet two Days longer. The Lords made their Appearance at Court on the fifth and seventh, and the Commons on the ninth; for though they follow'd the Precedent set by their Lordships of two separate Addresses, they chose to present them both on the same Day. As to the Sentiments contain'd in them, They represented to the King their grateful Sense of that unparalell'd Goodness and tender Affection to his People, which, for the rescuing his Kingdom of Ireland from a tyrannous and foreign Yoke, and easing his Subjects of this Kingdom of the excessive Charge of a lingring War, had induced his Majesty to undertake a hazardous Voyage, and too freely to expose to all the Dangers of War that invaluable Life, upon which the whole Protestant Interest, and the common Liberty of Europe did so much depend: That, next to God, it was to his Conduct and Example, that they must ascribe the Success of the Expedition, and to which they must owe their Hopes of the speedy and entire Reduction of that Kingdom, and of seeing themselves in a Condition to make his Enemies sensible of the Strength and Power of England, under a King who knew and pursued its Interest. They also, from the Bottom of their Hearts, congratulated his Majesty's Success, and his Return to his People, who were unanimously persuaded, that their Peace, Security, and Happiness, were bound up in his Safety; and they did, in the Name of all the Commons of England, assure his Majesty, That they would be ever ready to assist him to the utmost of their Power; and as the best and truest way of expressing their Gratitude, would endeavour effectually to support his Government against all his Enemies."

A.D. 1690.

And to the Queen, They set forth the deep Sense they had of that Goodness, Wisdom, and Courage which her Majesty had manifested in the greatest Difficulties, and most pressing Dangers, during his Majesty's Absence; at a time when a powerful Enemy was upon the Coast, when the Nation was weaken'd in that Part which was its proper Strength, and depriv'd of the Security of his Majesty's Presence. They also declar'd, that the Resolution which her Majesty had shewn in her Administration, had given Life to her Subjects, and made them exert a Strength and Force unknown to the former Reigns: That her Zeal for the Public, encourag'd them to shew such Chearfulness in their Duty, as had disappointed the Hopes and Designs of all the open and secret Enemies of the Government; and that the grateful Remembrance of this, which renew'd the Memory of the most happy times, would for ever remain in the Hearts of her People, and could never fail to be express'd in all Instances of Loyalty and Obedience from themselves, and all the Commons of England."

His Majesty's Answer was in these Words: "All Addresses from the House of Commons are agreeable to me, especially such as express such a Respect and Affection for my Person, as this does. I shall always pursue the Good and the Interest of the Nation." And the Queen, in her Turn, tho' abun-

This Matter of Ceremony being thus at laſt diſpatch'd, the Commons, the ſame Day, proceeded to the great Buſineſs which had been ſo earneſtly recommended to them from the Throne. All the neceſſary Accounts and Eſtimates, or all that were thought of, lay already before them: For the Army, which was to conſiſt of ſixty-nine thouſand ſix hundred and thirty-ſix Men, was demanded 1,910,560*l.* 7*s.* For the Navy, 1,791,695*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* And for the Ordnance 418,591*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* Since November the 5th, 1688, the Iſſues had exceeded the Product of the Standing Revenue, and all the additional Grants, above two Millions, which Sum had been advanc'd to the Government by way of Loan, and which ſtill remain'd a Debt upon the Nation, at a very exorbitant Intereſt. To theſe Deficiencies, and the Difficulties ariſing from them, the King had plac'd all the Miſcarriages and Misfortunes of the Year: And from thence his Miniſters did not fail to infer the Neceſſity of providing more largely and liberally for the Public Service for the future. Thoſe Members, on the other hand, who had no other Concern in the Public Money than the giving it away, did not care to ſuppoſe, that Thrift on their Side, had been ſo injurious to the King's Affairs, as the Miſmanagement of his Officers. As, therefore, they were call'd upon for ſuch an unprecedented Aid as upwards of four Millions, they choſe to accompany their Grant with a Bill to authoriſe certain of their own Members to examine and ſtate the public Accounts: And this being agreed to, they reſolv'd, "That a Supply ſhould be given their Majeſties, for the entire reducing of Ireland, the ſecuring the Peace of this Kingdom, and the carrying on a vigorous War againſt France. The next Day, they gave the Sum demanded for the Navy, and on the 14th 2,294,560*l.* for the Army and Ordnance.

[MSS of L. Halifax. vol. I.]

The next great Object was Ways and Means to raiſe this mighty Sum; and under this Head it was reſolv'd, 1. That the Sum of 137,641*l.* ſhould be levied by the Month, for one Year, upon all Lands. 2. That an additional Duty be laid on all wrought and raw Silks, and all foreign Linnens. 3. That a Duty of Six-pence per Gallon be laid upon all Low-Wines, and Spirits of the firſt Extraction. 4. That an additional Duty of ten per cent. be laid upon all foreign Timber and Wood; and the like Duty, above what was already charg'd, upon all wrought Silks, Calicoes, Indian Linnens, &c. 5. That ſeveral Duties be laid upon foreign Seed-Oyl, Hops, Pepper, and all Grocery-Ware, except Sugar and Tobacco. 6. That the Exciſe upon all Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, be doubled: And 7. That an additional Duty be laid upon foreign Iron, Yarn of Flax or Hemp, and all Manufactures of Glaſs. A. D. 1690.

Thus far the Stream of the Seſſion ran as ſmoothly as the Courtiers themſelves could wiſh; and Biſhop Burnet, in his Hiſtory, would have us believe, it had done ſo, becauſe the Adminiſtration was ſo juſt and ſo gentle, that there were no Grievances to enflame the Houſe; by which the moſt promiſing Beginnings of ſome Seſſions in former Reigns, had often miſcarry'd: But almoſt in the ſame Breath, he adds, That many Complaints were made of the illegal Commitments of ſuſpected Perſons for High Treaſon, though nothing was ſworn againſt them: (y) And in an original Letter of his to Mr. Johnſton, then Reſident as the King's Miniſter at Berlin, he aſcribes this happy Progreſs of his Majeſty's Buſineſs to another Cauſe. "All that I know, ſays he, ſay plainly, They dare not go back into their Countries, if they do not give Money liberally." And again, "In a word, the French Fleet, by lying ſo long on our Coaſt, as it then did us no harm, ſo now produces ſuch Effects, as if we had brought them thither; ſince it has both united and animated the Nation, to a Degree beyond any thing that the moſt ſanguine could ever have promiſ'd themſelves. And the King's Behaviour in Ireland, as well as King James's Meanneſs, has made ſo wonderful a Change in all Mens Minds, with relation to them both, that we ſeem not to be the ſame People that we were a Year ago; and the Nation ſeems reſolv'd to ſupport the King in the War to the utmoſt to which it can poſſibly ſtretch itſelf."

Proceedings on a Bill to apply the Forfeitures in Ireland to the uſe of the Public.

But to whatever Cauſe this ſudden Ductility was owing (for we ought not to loſe Sight of what the ſame Author has formerly told us, concerning Sir John Trevor the Speaker, and his undertaking to manage his Party, provided he might be furniſh'd with Money to purchaſe Votes) it did not continue to the End of the Seſſion without Interruption: For all the ſeveral Ways and Means above ſpecify'd, not proving ſufficient to anſwer the Grants, it was propos'd, "That the Sum of one Million ſhould be rais'd upon the Credit, or by the Sale of the forfeited Eſtates in Ireland; and that an Addreſs ſhould be preſented to his Majeſty, that he would be pleas'd to command the Commiſſioners in Ireland to make a Return of the Names of the Perſons in Rebellion in that Kingdom, and of their Eſtates, and the Value thereof, and that the ſame might to be tranſmitted to the Houſe of Commons." Now every Step in this Affair, it ſeems, went

(y) "But, continues his Lordſhip, the Danger was ſo apparent, and the public Safety was ſo much concern'd in thoſe Imprisonments, that the Houſe of Commons made a Precedent for ſecuring a Miniſtry that ſhould do the like upon the like Neceſſity, and yet maintain'd the Habeas-Corpus-Act; they indemnify'd the Miniſtry for all that had been done contrary to that Act."

It ought to be added, that the Indemnity thus looſely diſcours'd of by his Lordſhip, was granted by a ſpecial Act of Parliament, which had it riſe in the Houſe of Lords, and extended not only to the ſeizing and impriſoning ſuſpected Perſons, but to the ſeizing Horſes and Arms, and the raiſing and maintaining the Militia, &c.

A. D. 1690. went against the Grain of the Court: These Estates had been already destin'd to other Purposes; that is to say, to gratify Favourites; who could not bear to have the Prey wrested out of their Hands, for the sake of the Public. Such Managements were therefore used, that the said Address was rejected on the Report: When also it was farther resolv'd, that a Bill should be brought in for attainting such Persons as had been in Rebellion either in England or Ireland; as also for confiscating their Estates, and applying the same towards the Charge of the War, it was full six Weeks before any Progress was made in it; and then it was under the following Temperament; that a Clause should be added for reserving a Proportion of the Forfeitures to his Majesty's Disposal: According to the Historian of his own Time, this Proportion was afterwards fixed at a third, with this farther Indulgence, That his Majesty should be at Liberty to grant such Articles and Capitulations to those that were in Arms, as he should think fit: But the Truth is, that the House, having alter'd their Minds again, rejected these Clauses; and, after many other Amendments, sent the Bill up to the Lords on the 23d of December. The said Historian moreover says, That while it was depending before the Commons, many Petitions were offer'd from the Creditors of some, and the Heirs of others, who had continu'd faithful to the Government, and who desir'd Provisoes for their Security: He might have added, from such also as had no other Merit to plead, but that of being new Converts, among whom was the Lord Dover, who had made his Submission at Waterford. And, whereas he suggests yet farther, That the Commons rejected them all, because they saw no End of such Petitions; and that in so doing, they too much imitated King James's Mock-Parliament; the true Reason was, because they knew the Court was at the Bottom of all of them, and espous'd them only to furnish a Handle for setting aside the Bill. His Lordship, indeed, lays on another Gloss, such as it is, in the following Words: "But when this Bill was brought up to the Lords, they thought they were in Justice bound to hear all Petitions. Upon this the Bill was like to be clogg'd with many Provisoes, and the Matter must have held long; so, the King to stop this, sent a Message to the Commons." Now, not to insist on the Absurdity of stopping a Proceeding in the House of Lords, by a Message to the Commons, it was just in the Lords to receive all Petitions, how is the King to be vindicated for putting a Stop to the Course of that Justice? Or how exempted from the Brand which this very Prelate has before fix'd on the House of Commons? But the plain English of all is, That the Bill was wilfully delay'd; and knowing it was so, the Commons sent several Messages to put the Lords in Mind of it, without any Effect; which is all that need be said concerning it, till we come to the Close of the Session. A. D. 1690.

In this Interval, the Bill of Aid, by an Assessment upon Lands, having pass'd both Houses, receiv'd the Royal Assent, November the 10th. And it ought not to be forgot, that the Preamble sets forth the deep Sense of both Houses, of the abundant Care, Wisdom, and Resolution with which their Majesties had defended these Kingdoms, against the Opposition of open and secret Enemies, and their Resolution effectually to support their Government, and to assist them for the entire reducing Ireland, &c. according to the Words of the Original Vote of granting a Supply: As also, that the Act itself contain'd a Clause of Loan for any Sum, at an Interest of seven per cent. and another of Appropriation for Seamens Wages.

and against the Earl of Torrington.

The Clause of Indignation in his Majesty's Speech against those who had expos'd the Honour of the Nation by their ill Conduct of the Fleet last Summer, came also under Consideration, during the same Interval; when it appear'd, that Lord Torrington was to be made the Victim of Propitiation, and that a Law was even to be made on purpose, to place him within the Reach of his Enemies. "The Form of his Commitment, says Bishop Burnet, was judg'd to be illegal; and the Martial Law, to which, by the Statute, all in the Fleet were subject, being lodg'd in the Lord-High-Admiral, it was doubted, whether the Admiral, being now in Commission, that Power was lodg'd with the Commissioners. 'Tis (a) Judges were of Opinion that it was; yet since the Power of Life

(a) It is, I think, demonstrable from the last Clause of the Protest, which was enter'd in the Lords Journals, on the Conclusion of this Debate, and which is here inserted for the sake of the many important things contain'd in it, that the Bishop has not the least Authority for this Assertion.

Die Jovis 15° Octobris, 1690. Hodie 3ª vice lecta est Bills, An Act concerning the Commissioners of the Admiralty.

The Question being put, Whether this Bill shall pass into a Law?

It was resolv'd in the Affirmative, Contents 27, not Contents 25

Leave having been given to any Lords to enter their Dissents, if the Question was carry'd in the Affirmative, these Lords following do enter their Dissents in these Reasons:

1. Because this Bill gives a Power to Commissioners of the Admiralty to execute a Jurisdiction, which by the Act of 13 Car. II. entitled, An Act for establishing Articles and Orders for the regulating and better Government of his Majesty's Navys, Ships of War, and Forces by Sea, we conceive they had not; whereby the Earl of Torrington may come to be tried for his Life, for Facts committed several Months before this Power was given or elapsed. We think it reasonable, that every Man should be tried by that Law that was known to be in Force when the Crime was committed.

2. It is by virtue of the said Act of 13 Car. II. that the Earl of Torrington was judg'd by this House not to have the Privilege of a Peer of this Realm for any Offences committed against the said Act: And there is no other Law, as we conceive, by which the said Earl could have been debarr'd from enjoying the Privilege of a Peer of this Realm; which Act making no Mention of Commissioners of the Admiralty, but of a Lord High-Admiral only, by whose Authority all the Powers given by that Act are to be exercised, and without whose Consent singly, no Sentence of Death can be executed, we think it of dangerous Consequence to expound a Law of this capital Nature otherwise than the literal Words do import; and, as we conceive it without Precedent to pass even explanatory Laws, much less such as have Retrospect in them, in Cases of Life and Death, so we think it now all necessary to make such a Precedent at this time, there being

A. D. 1690. Life and Death was too ſacred a thing to paſs only by a Conſtruction of Law, it was thought the ſafeſt Courſe to paſs an Act, declaring, That the Powers of a Lord-High-Admiral did reſt in the Commiſſioners. The ſecret Enemies of the Government [meaning all thoſe who took the Liberty to oppoſe the Adminiſtration] mov'd, that the Earl of Torrington ſhould be impeach'd in Parliament; Proceedings in that way being always ſlow, Incidents were alſo apt to fall in that might create Diſputes between the two Houſes, which did ſometimes end in a Rupture. But the King was apprehenſive of that, and, therefore, tho' he was much incens'd againſt that Lord, and had reaſon to believe that a Council of War would treat him very favourably, yet he choſe rather to let it go ſo, than to diſorder his Affairs." A Law was accordingly made, tho' Lord Torrington, at his own Requeſt, was heard before the Commons, while it was depending, declaring and enacting, That all and ſingular Authorities, Juriſdictions, and Powers, which, by Act of Parliament or otherwiſe, were veſted in the Lord-High-Admiral, appertain'd to, and ſhould be uſed and executed by, the Commiſſioners; with a Proviſo, that all Officers ſitting as Judges in Trials by Court-Martial, under their Authority, ſhould be upon their Oaths to deal uprightly between the King and the Priſoner. This Act receiv'd the Royal Aſſent, November the 5th: And, to diſpatch the whole of this Affair at once, tho' the Earl was then indiſpos'd in the Tower, the Commiſſioners, immediately after they had receiv'd this Confirmation of their Power, directed a Court to be held for his Trial; which met for the firſt time on board the Kent Frigate at Sheerneſs, on December the 10th following. The Charge againſt him, in Subſtance, was, That in the late Engagement off of Beachy Head, he had, through Treachery or Cowardice, miſbehav'd in his Office, drawn Diſhonour on the Engliſh Nation, and ſacrific'd our good Allies the Dutch: And, after the Eagerneſs which had been ſhewn to bring him to a Trial, the Imputations which had been faſten'd upon him by Lord Nottingham, in his Letter to Lord Durſley, and the Pains which had been taken to find Evidence againſt him, no Doubt was made, but every Tittle would be inconteſtably prov'd upon him: Notwithſtanding which, upon the Hearing, ſo ſlender did the Grounds appear upon which the Court had proceeded, ſo manifeſt the Rancour which had actuated the Proſecution, and ſo ſtrong was the Defence made by the Priſoner, that he was unanimouſly acquitted: For, in the firſt Place, of the Treachery ſuggeſted, not the ſmalleſt Circumſtance appear'd; and, ſecondly, that which his Accuſers call'd Cowardice, he prov'd to be Diſcretion: He prov'd, that all the Admirals of the Fleet were againſt engaging as well as himſelf, for the ſame Reaſon; namely, becauſe of the great Superiority of the Enemy; and that they engag'd at laſt in Conſequence of the Queen's poſitive Orders: He inſinuated, that the Adviſer of thoſe Orders was then become anſwerable for the Miſcarriage: He aſſerted, That the Dutch were deſtroy'd by their own Raſhneſs: And he concluded with ſaying, That as his Conduct had ſav'd the Engliſh Fleet, he hop'd an Engliſh Court-Martial would not ſacrifice him to Dutch Reſentment: And yet Biſhop Burnet is pleas'd to pronounce, That the ſaid Court (tho' compos'd of ſuch as were known to be leaſt attach'd to the Earl and his Intereſt) behav'd with ſo groſs a Partiality, that it reflected on the Juſtice of the Nation; adding, "So that if it had not been for the great Intereſt which the King had in the States, it might have occaſion'd a Breach in the Alliance between them and us."

who is unanimouſly acquitted.

A. D. 1690.

To conclude on this Head, all Authors agree, that the King was as thoroughly provok'd at the Manifeſtation of his Innocence, as before at the Perſuaſion of his Guilt; and that, forgetful of the Benefit he had formerly receiv'd from his Services, he not only depriv'd him of his Command, but never would ſuffer him to come any more into his Preſence.

By this time another Bill of Supply, namely, that for doubling the Duty of Exciſe upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, during the Space of one Year, having gone thro' the Forms of both Houſes, his Majeſty gave the Royal Aſſent to it on the 29th of November; and alſo made a Speech from the Throne, to the following Effect: "That he took this Occaſion to aſſure them, that he was extremely ſenſible of the Zeal and Cheerfulneſs in all their Proceedings, as alſo of the Readineſs which the Commons had ſhewn in granting ſuch large Supplies towards the preſſing Occaſions of the Navy and Army; and that he ſhould not be wanting on his Part to ſee them carefully applied to thoſe Uſes for which they intended them."

Royal Aſſent given to the Act for doubling the Exciſe. The King's Speech on that Occaſion.

He moreover obſerv'd to them, "That as the Poſture of Affairs Abroad did neceſſarily require his Preſence at the Hague, before the End of the Year, ſo it was neceſſary for him to deſire them, to loſe no time, in diſpatching and perfecting of ſuch farther Supplies as were ſtill neceſſary for the Navy and Army; and not for them only, but it was high time alſo, to put them in mind of making ſome Proviſion for the Expence of the Civil an undoubted legal way already eſtabliſh'd to bring this Earl to a Trial by a Lord-High-Admiral.

3. The Judges having unanimouſly declar'd, That the Law Marine was no where particularized in their Books, adequate the Power or Juriſdiction of the Lord-High-Admiral may be aſſertain'd, ſo that the Practice is all that we know of it, we conceive it unprecedented, and of dangerous Conſequence, that the Juriſdiction exercised by the Lord-Admiral ſhould, by a Law, be declared to be in the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, whereby an unknown, and therefore unlimited, Power, may be eſtabliſh'd in them.

But the Commons the Day before had reſolv'd, 1. That the ſeveral Duties laid upon Goods imported, and to be imported, ſhould be granted to their Majeſties for the Term of five Years, to commence from the 10th of November, and no longer. 2. That the Duties impos'd by an Act made in the firſt Year of the Reign of the late King James, entitled, An Act for granting his Majeſty an Impoſition on all Wines and Vinegars imported the twenty-fourth Day of June, 1685, and the twenty-fourth Day of June, 1693: As alſo thoſe impos'd by another Act made in the ſame Year, entitled, An Act for granting an Aid to his Majeſty, by an Impoſition on all French Linnen, and on all Eaſt-India Linnen, and ſeveral other Manufactures of India, and on all French wrought Silks and Stuffs, and on all other wrought Silks, and on all Brandies imported after the firſt Day of July, 1685, and before the firſt of July, 1690, ſhould be continu'd till the 24th Day of June, 1696. 3. That the Duties impos'd upon Tobacco, by an Act made in the firſt Year of King James II. entitled, An Act for granting to his Majeſty an Impoſition upon all Tobacco and Sugar imported after the firſt Day of July, 1685, and before the firſt Day of July, 1690, be continu'd until the 24th Day of June, and no longer. And they had moreover order'd, at the ſame time, that a Bill or Bills ſhould be brought in for granting to their Majeſties the ſeveral Duties or Impoſitions upon the ſeveral Heads reſolv'd upon by that Houſe.

Two other Bills paſſed, and another Speech made.

Two Bills were accordingly prepar'd on theſe Reſolutions, and paſs'd through both Houſes, with ſuch Expedition, that on the 20th of December they receiv'd the Royal Aſſent, together with the Mutiny-Bill; when his Majeſty again ſignify'd to both Houſes, "How ſenſible he was of their good Affections to him, and of their ſincere Endeavours to promote the true Intereſt of their Country, in continuing to provide farther Supplies towards defraying the Charges of the War, which he would take care to ſee diligently and ſtrictly apply'd to the Uſes for which they gave them." He alſo ſaid, "That he had lately acquainted them, that the Poſture of Affairs abroad would not admit of deferring his Journey to the Hague much beyond that time; and that he put them in mind of it now, in hopes that that Conſideration would prevail with them to uſe all poſſible Diſpatch in what ſtill remain'd to be done for the more vigorous Proſecution of the War. And he concluded with mentioning to the Houſe of Commons, "That if ſome annual Proviſion could be made for the augmenting of the Navy, and building of ſome new Ships of War, it would be a very neceſſary Care at this time, both for the Honour and Safety of the Nation."

Still the Proceedings of the Commons had, in ſome meaſure, the ſtart of his Majeſty's Demands. Being ſenſible, that the Proviſions they had made would not anſwer the Sums they had voted, they had, on the 19th, reſolv'd, That the Remainder of a Sum, not exceeding 4,086,255*l.* for the Supplies to be granted to their Majeſties, be rais'd by doubling the Additional Duties of Exciſe upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, mention'd in an Act of the firſt Year of their Majeſties Reign, entitled, An Act for an additional Duty of Exciſe upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors; to begin from the time that the Act for doubling the Duty of Exciſe upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, during the Space of one Year, did expire. And now, taking his Majeſty's Speech into Conſideration, particularly the latter Part of it, they unanimouſly reſolv'd, firſt, That a Supply be given to their Majeſties for the building of Ships of War, not exceeding the Sum of 570000*l.* And, ſecondly, That the ſaid Supply ſo to be given to their Majeſties, be for the building of ſeventeen Third-Rate Ships of ſixty Guns a-piece, to be added to the Ships in the Eſtimate, already provided to be built. They moreover reſolv'd three Days after, That this Supply ſhould be rais'd by the additional Duties upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors; and order'd that an enacting Clauſe ſhould be prepar'd in Purſuance of the ſaid Reſolution." They alſo provided in this Bill, that the Impoſitions on Wines, Vinegar, and Tobacco, ſhould be made a Fund of Credit; that the Surpluſſes of the Grants they had made, after the current Service was provided for, ſhould be applicable to the Payment of the Debts contracted by the War; and that it ſhould be lawful for their Majeſties to make uſe of 500000*l.* out of the ſaid Grants; on Condition, that the ſame ſhould be repaid out of the Monies ariſing by their Majeſties Revenue. Laſtly, they clos'd the grand Affair of Ways and Means, by a Bill for encouraging the home Diſtillery, and for laying ſeveral Duties on low Wines and Spirits of the firſt Extraction. And upon the whole, Biſhop Burnet pronounces, "That though they conſented to the Funds propos'd, which, continues he, were thought equal to that which was demanded, they prov'd afterwards to be defective;" whereas it appears, both by Lord Halifax's Books, and by an Account deliver'd by the Treaſury to the Houſe of Commons in 1697, that the ſaid Funds produc'd a Surplus of 77,581*l.* 3*s.* 4½*d.*

A. D. 1696. Further Proceedings on Ways and Means.

It is fit in this Place to mention what that notable Prelate has forgot, namely, That all theſe Proviſions for enabling the King to proſecute his Deſigns on the Continent with Vigour, were made under the Direction of that able Undertaker Lord Godolphin; who had not only been again brought into the Treaſury, but plac'd at the Head of it: And that Sir John Somers, the Sollicitor-General, drew the Bills, and carry'd them thro' all the Forms of the Houſe: That Lord Sydney was made Secretary of State, for that Province which had been kept ſo long vacant, on the Reſignation of Lord Shrewſbury; and that Lord Godolphin at the Head of the Treaſury.

A. D. 1698. that Sir Charles Porter was made one of the Lords Juſtices of Ireland in his Room, as alſo Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom.

But though we are come to a Cloſe of the King's Buſineſs, we cannot as yet cloſe the Seſſion: The Tories of the City had not reap'd the Fruits they expected from the Act to reverſe the Proceedings againſt the Charter; and the Whigs, or rather the Occaſional Conformiſts among the Diſſenters, had not only made a ſhift to keep their general hold of the Magiſtracy, but even to continue their own Mayor, Pilkington, and their own Chamberlain, Robinſon. Full of Reſentment, therefore, for this Diſappointment, and as full of Confidence, that with a Parliament after their own Hearts, which had alſo gone ſuch Lengths to merit the Favour of the Court, they might obtain what farther Explanations they pleas'd; they, the ſaid Tories, drew up and preſented the following Petition to the Houſe of Commons:

Petition of the City Common-Council Men to the Commons.

"The Humble Petition of the Members of the Common-Council of the City of London, hereunto ſubſcribing, Sheweth,

"That your Petitioners humbly conceiv'd and hop'd, That the late Act of Parliament for reverſing the Judgment in the Quo Warranto againſt the ſaid City, would have reſtor'd the City to its ancient Rights and Priviledges; but the Contrary happening, your Petitioners beg leave to repreſent to this honourable Houſe,

That notwithſtanding the ſaid Act, ſeveral Aldermen of the ſaid City, made or elected by virtue of Commiſſions or Charters from the late King James under his Great Seal, act ſtill as Aldermen by that Authority, under Pretence, That by ſome doubtful Expreſſions in the ſaid Act, they are continu'd, as well as Miniſterial Officers.

That by colour of their aſſum'd Authority and illegal Proceedings, Sir Thomas Pilkington was by them, on the Day of Election appointed by the ſaid Act, declar'd and made Mayor, tho' not duly return'd by the Common Hall, according to the Uſage of the City.

That by the Contrivance of the ſaid Mayor and Aldermen, Mr. Leonard Robinſon is impos'd on your Petitioners as Chamberlain of the City, notwithſtanding another Perſon was duly elected into that Office, and declar'd ſo to be by the Sheriffs; and the Hall thereupon diſſolv'd.

That divers Members of our Common-Council are illegally excluded, and others, duly elected, are refus'd their Admittances. A. D. 1699.

That the Place of Town-Clerk having been vacant three Months and upwards (an Office of great Truſt in the City), and only elegible by, and in, Common-Council, the ſaid Mayor and Aldermen have, of their own Authority, appointed ſeveral Perſons to the Execution thereof, without the Conſent of the Common-Council, againſt the conſtant known Rights of your Petitioners.

That your Petitioners have not been ſuffer'd to meet and conſult about the neceſſary Affairs of the City, according to their ancient Rights and Cuſtoms.

That a Common-Council being ſummon'd and aſſembled about the third Day of October, many Debates ariſing concerning the Premiſes, and ſeveral Motions being made, and the Majority of the Common-Council agreeing, That for ſettling the Rights of the City, an humble Addreſs ſhould be made to this honourable Houſe to explain the ſaid Act: And thereupon the Queſtion being deſir'd to be put, the ſaid Mayor refus'd it; and to prevent any ſuch Application, immediately diſſolv'd the Court, and went away.

Wherefore your Petitioners having, by theſe evil Practices, all their ancient Rights and Priviledges invaded, and neither Mayor, Court of Aldermen, Sheriffs, Chamberlain, Common-Council, or Town-Clerk, as of Right they ought to have; and being elſewhere without Remedy, humbly pray ſuch Relief in the Premiſes, as ſhall conſiſt with the Wiſdom and Juſtice of this honourable Houſe,

And your Petitioners, as in Duty bound, ſhall ever pray, &c. (a)

Theſe were the Allegations on the one Side, and on the other, Pilkington, and his Allies, undertook to prove, That they were all either falſe or frivolous: That his own Election, and that of Robinſon, were fair and unexceptionable: That even thoſe who had demanded a Scrutiny had withdrawn that Demand, and declar'd themſelves ſatisfy'd with the Election: That the Ring-leaders of the Faction clam'd Privileges and Authorities, which they had no Right to: That even the Common-Council themſelves could not agree about the Matter of the Addreſs, or the Explanations to be requir'd; and that the Adminiſtration of the City was not only irreproachable but meritorious. Even theſe petty Factions deal as much in Gloſs and Gilding, as thoſe of the State, and their Pretences are to be decipher'd accordingly: But then, which ever is moſt in the right, Thoſe at the Helm never fail to defend That which they can make the moſt uſe of. Now the late Panic which had ſhook the Government, when a French Deſcent was every Moment apprehended, had not only convinc'd the Court, that the Whigs were in general the monied Men, but alſo, that they would part with it freely for the Security of the Settlement which they had made: They had, on that Occaſion, offer'd their Aſſiſtance heartily, and had ſubſcrib'd largely; while the Tories, on the other hand, had ſubſcrib'd but ſeven thouſand Pounds in all; the greater Part of which, they had recall'd as ſoon as the Miniſters had preſum'd to make an Alteration in the Officers of the Militia. As, therefore, the monied Intereſt was deeply concern'd in this Petition, and no immediate End could be anſwer'd by obliging the contrary Party, it did not meet with the Countenance that was expected, and, of courſe, came to nothing; which is, perhaps, the Reaſon why it is not ſo much as mention'd by any of our Hiſtorians.

A new Deſign againſt the Lord Preſident Caermarthen.

We muſt now take leave to copy a Paſſage from Biſhop Burnet, who ſays, "Another Debate was mov'd in the Houſe of Lords (by thoſe who intended to revive the old Impeachment of the Marquis of Caermarthen) whether Impeachments continu'd, from Parliament to Parliament, or whether they were not extinguiſh'd by an Act of Grace? Some ancient Precedents were brought to favour this, by thoſe who intended to keep them up: But in all theſe there had been an Order of one Parliament to continue them on to the next: So they did not come home to the preſent Caſe: And how doubtful ſoever it was, whether the King's Pardon could be pleaded in Bar to an Impeachment; yet, ſince the King had ſent an Act of Grace, which had paſs'd in the firſt Seſſion of this Parliament, it ſeem'd very unreaſonable to offer an Impeachment againſt an Act of Parliament. All this diſcover'd a Deſign againſt that Lord, who was believed to have the greateſt Credit, both with the King and Queen, and was again falling under an univerſal Hatred. In a Houſe of Commons, every Motion againſt a Miniſter, is apt to be well entertain'd; ſome envy him; others are angry at him; many hope to ſhare in the Spoils of him, or of his Friends that fall with him: And the Love of Change, and a Wantonneſs of Mind, makes the attacking a Miniſter a Diverſion to the reſt: The thing was well laid, and fourteen leading Men had undertaken to manage the Matter againſt him; in which the Earl of Shrewſbury had the chief hand, as he himſelf told me; for he had a very bad Opinion of the Man, and thought his Advices would, in Concluſion, ruin the King and his Affairs."

A. D. 1699.

This, we are to underſtand, is the ſecret Hiſtory of this Proceeding: And no Doubt can be made, that the Breach between the Whigs and that Miniſter was irreparable; as alſo, that they would loſe no Opportunity of removing him out of their way. It is, beſides, upon Record in the Lords Journals, That a Committee was appointed to inſpect Precedents, whether Impeachments continued in ſtatu quo from Parliament to Parliament; that the ſaid Committee made a Report of ſeveral ſuch Precedents taken out of the Rolls in the Tower; that the ſaid Report gave riſe to a long and vehement Debate, and ſeveral Motions; that the main Drift of all, that is to ſay, the Deſign againſt the ſaid Marquis, was evaded by the following Queſtion, viz. Whether James Earl of Salisbury, and Henry Earl of Peterborough (who had been impeach'd in the former Parliament for being reconcil'd to the Church of Rome) ſhould be now diſcharg'd from their Bail? and that it being reſolv'd in the Affirmative, the Lords Bolton, Stamford, Bath, North and Grey, Granville, Herbert, Bridgewater and Macclesfield, enter'd their Proteſt, for the Reaſons following, viz.

Proteſt on the Iſſue of the Debate.

1. Becauſe we conceive it is a Queſtion not at all relating to the real Debate before us, but urg'd upon us, not for the ſake only of the two Lords mention'd.

2. Becauſe we ought to have examin'd Precedents of Pardons, to ſee how far an Impeachment was concern'd, before we had adjudg'd the Lords diſcharg'd, or whether an Impeachment could be pardon'd without particular Mention in an Act of Grace, and what Difference there is between an Act of Grace and an Act of Indemnity.

3. Becauſe we did not hear the Houſe of Commons, who are Parties, and who, in common Juſtice, ought to have been heard before we had paſs'd this Vote.

Laſtly, the Commons having completed their Bill for appointing Commiſſioners to take and ſtate the public Accounts, and having alſo choſen, by Ballot, the ſaid Commiſſioners from among themſelves; namely, Sir Peter Rich, Sir Thomas Clarges, Mr. Paul Foley, Colonel Robert Auſten, Sir Matthew Andrews, Sir Benjamin Newland, Sir Samuel Bernardiſton, and Sir Robert Harley, ſent it up to the Lords: Upon which Occaſion, Lord Rocheſter mov'd, that their Lordſhips would alſo add ſome of their own Number, to act jointly with thoſe of the Commons. The Motion was adopted. The Lords made their Choice by Ballot likewiſe; and he who had the greateſt Number of Voices, was Lord Rocheſter himſelf: But whatever his Motives were, "he refus'd to ſubmit to this, ſays the Hiſtorian of his own Times, with ſo much Firmneſs, that the other Lords who were nam'd with him, ſeem'd to think they were in Honour bound to do the ſame: So, con-

Commiſſioners for taking the public Accounts.

A.D.1690-91 tinues his Lordſhip, ſince no Peer would ſuffer himſelf to be nam'd, the Bill paſs'd as it was ſent up."

And now his Majeſty, growing impatient to gratify his Countrymen with a Spectacle they had never ſeen before, that is to ſay, a King of their own, reſolv'd to put an immediate End to the Seſſion. Accordingly, January the fifth, he came to the Houſe of Peers, and, having given the Royal Aſſent to ſuch Bills as were (b) ready, took his Leave with the following moſt gracious Speech:

King's Speech at putting an end to the Seſſion.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Having lately told you, That it would be neceſſary for me to go to Holland, much about this time, I am very glad to find, that the Succeſs of your Endeavours to bring this Seſſion to a happy Concluſion has been ſuch, that I am now at Liberty to do it: And I return you hearty Thanks for the great Diſpatch you have made in finiſhing the Supplies you have deſign'd, for carrying on the War; which it ſhall be my Care to ſee duly and punctually apply'd to that Service for which you have given them: And I do likewiſe think it proper to aſſure you, That I ſhall not make any Grants of the forfeited Lands in England, or Ireland, till there be another Opportunity of ſettling that Matter in Parliament in ſuch manner as ſhall be thought moſt expedient. (c)

My Lords and Gentlemen,

As I have Reaſon to be very well ſatisfy'd with the Proofs you have given of your good Affection in this Seſſion of Parliament, ſo I promiſe myſelf the Continuance of the ſame at your Return into your ſeveral Countries: And as every Day produces ſtill freſh Inſtances of the Reſtleſneſs of our Enemies, both at home and abroad, in deſigning againſt the Proſperity of this Nation and the Government eſtabliſh'd, ſo I do not doubt, but the Union and good Correſpondence between me and my Parliament, and my earneſt and conſtant Endeavours for your Preſervation on the one hand, join'd with the Continuance of your Zeal and Affection to ſupport me on the Throne, will, by the Bleſſing of God, be at all times too ſtrong for the utmoſt Malice and Contrivance of our Common Enemies."

The Lord Chief Baron Atkins then declar'd, by the King's Command, That it was his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that both Houſes ſhould adjourn themſelves till the thirty-firſt of March, and that they ſhould have timely Notice, if there was to be a Seſſion. After which both Houſes adjourn'd themſelves accordingly; and the very next Day his Majeſty ſet out for Holland. But, Saviour as he was eſteem'd, the Winds and Seas refus'd to obey him; and when he was got as far as Canterbury, a ſevere Froſt, and a ſtrong Gale at Eaſt, oblig'd him to alter his Courſe, and return to Kenſington, where he was forc'd to continue from the ninth to the ſixteenth. The Weather then remitting, he ſet out again, embark'd at Gravеſend the ſame Day; and on the eighteenth about Noon, being inform'd by a Fiſherman, that he was within a League and a Half of the Goree, to which Place it was difficult for the Ships to get up, becauſe of the Ice with which the Coaſt was then ſurrounded, ſo great was his Impatience to be on Shore, that he left his Yacht, and, accompany'd by the Duke of Ormond, the Lord-Steward Devonſhire, the Lord-Chamberlain Dorſet, the Earls of Monmouth and Portland, and Meſſieurs Overkirk and Zuleſtein, went off in a Shallop, or open Boat, thinking to land in an Hour or two at fartheſt: Inſtead of which, what with the Difficulty of making their way thro' the Ice, and even of finding their way at all, by reaſon of the Fogs which intercepted every Object on every Side, it was eight next Morning before they reach'd the Goree. And in the room of wondering at the Raſhneſs which induc'd his Majeſty to expoſe himſelf and his Attendants to ſuch a Variety of Perils, we are taught by the Hiſtorian of his own Times, to admire the Bravery with which he confronted them; for, in order, as it may be ſuppos'd, to equal him with Ceſar, he tells us, "That when the Seamen ſeem'd very apprehenſive of their Danger, the King ſaid in a very intrepid manner, What! are you afraid of dying in my Company?" Being, at laſt, arriv'd at Hounſlaterdyke, he was receiv'd and complimented by four of the States Deputies, and at the Hague the ſame Evening by the States General, the States of Holland, the Council of

He is in Danger at Sea.

(b) Namely, That for granting the additional Exciſe: That for preventing vexatious Suits againſt ſuch as had acted for their Majeſty's Service: That for appointing Commiſſioners to inſpect the public Accounts: That for encouraging the Diſtillery, and laying a Duty on low Wines: A fifth for the more effectual putting in Execution the Act for prohibiting all Commerce with France: A ſixth, for raiſing the Militia: And a ſeventh, for the Relief of inſolvent Debtors. Thoſe left unfiniſh'd were, a Bill to regulate Trials in Caſes of Treaſon; another to oblige the Lords Commiſioners of the Treaſury to take the like Oaths as the Lord Treaſurer; another relating to the Aſſiento Trade; another againſt Robbers on the High-Way; another for the ſpeedy determining Elections of Members of Parliament; another to charge the Eſtate of the late Lord Jeffreys in Leiceſterſhire, with the Sum of 14,760*l.* and Intereſt, to Edmund Prideaux, Eſq; another for regulating and licenſing Hackney-Coaches: and another for the enabling Surgeons to adminiſter inward Medicines in Caſes of Surgery (which laſt was petition'd againſt by the Phyſicians and Apothecaries.) A Bill was alſo brought in for reducing Intereſt Money from ſix to four per cent. which, after the ſecond Reading, was rejected. During this Seſſion alſo, Captain James Campbell, a Scots Gentleman, Brother to the Earl of Argyle, aſſiſted by Archibald Montgomery and Sir John Johnſton, forcibly ſeized on Mrs. Mary Wharton, a rich Heireſs of about the Age of thirteen Years, carry'd her away from her Relations, and married her againſt her Will. Whereupon his Majeſty iſſued out his Royal Proclamation for the apprehending the ſaid Mr. Campbell and the Abettors of his unwarrantable way of Wooing. Not long before, there was a Bill brought into the Houſe of Commons to prevent Clandeſtine Marriages, the paſſing of which, People thought would have been forwarded by this Violence committed by Captain Campbell; but upon Conſideration that this Bill was attended with many Inconveniencies, and might hinder many Younger Brothers from making their Fortunes, the ſame was let fall. However, another Bill was brought into the Houſe of Commons for making void the Marriage between Mrs. Wharton and Mr. Campbell, which, notwithſtanding the Earl of Argyle's Petition in his Brother's Behalf, became a Law. And Johnſton was try'd at the Old-Bailey, and hang'd for his Concern in the Rape.

(c) To a common Eye, this looks like an abſolute Promiſe: But, according to Biſhop Burnet, his Majeſty had his Reſerves; for he aſſures us, "the King intended only to aſſure them, That he would give none of thoſe Eſtates to his Courtiers or Officers: But he thought he was ſtill at Liberty to paſs ſuch Acts of Grace, or grant ſuch Articles to the Iriſh as the State of his Affairs ſhould require."

A.D. 1690-91 of State, the other Colleges, the foreign Ministers, and all the other Persons of Distinction then residing there. That the Populace moreover, might have a Holiday, and the unprecedented Pleasure of feasting their Eyes, with the Pomp of a Stadtholder-King, he was prevail'd upon to make a public Entry into the Hague on the 26th following, which had very much the Air of a Triumph, and was such a Compliment to the Dutch, as he had never vouchsafed to the English. Several Triumphal Arches were erected in the Streets through which he pass'd, adorn'd with Types and Trophies in Honour of his Atchievements; the Burghers, in Arms, and, for once, as splendidly habited as so many Bridegrooms, lin'd the Way; the Windows and Balconies were hung with Tapestry, and crowded with the fairest Faces the Seven Provinces had to shew; the very Walls and House-tops were encrusted with Spectators, who were pleas'd in their Acclamations to stile him (d) WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR! The Canon roar'd all Day; Fire-works, Illuminations, and Bonfires blaz'd all Night; and even Extravagance itself was every where let loose to proclame that their Joy had no Bounds.

His triumphal Entry into the Hague.

It is now fit to return to the Administration of the Queen, whom his Majesty had artfully left to punish his Enemies, while he was thus happy in the Bosom of his Friends.

A Plot discover'd.

In the very End of December, one Prat of Barking in Essex, gave Notice to the Lord President Carmarthen, that his Wife had hir'd out a Vessel of his, to carry over certain Persons to France, and that they were to embark on the thirtieth. The Lord President immediately imparted this Intelligence to the King and Council, and Orders were given to one Captain Billop to watch the Motions of the said Vessel, and to seize and secure such Passengers as he should find on board her. Accordingly, on the thirtieth when she fell down to Gravesend, he clapt her on board, and under the Pretence of searching for, and impressing Seamen, drew out three Persons who had hid themselves in the Hold, and who prov'd to be Lord Preston, Mr. Ashton a Servant of King James's Queen, and one Elliot: Certain Papers, as also two Seals (Burnet erroneously says King James's Signet, whereas one was the Seal of Lord Preston's Office, when Secretary of State, and the other his private Seal) were seiz'd with them; and all together were immediately brought up to Whitehall. "Lord Preston's Mind, says the same Author, sunk so visibly, that it was concluded he would not die, if confessing all he knew would save him. Ashton was more firm and sullen, and Elliot knew nothing." The Papers contain'd, 1. The Heads of a remarkable Conference, said to have pass'd among certain Lords and Gentlemen, both Whigs and Tories, tending to shew, that if the most Christian King intended to impose King James upon the Nation as a Conqueror, he would find the bloodiest Resistance imaginable; but that if he would be prevail'd upon to assist him and his Friends on the Principles, and by the Means therein specify'd, many Lords and Gentlemen would shew themselves to his Satisfaction. 2. The Heads of a Declaration proper to prepare the way for the King's Return. 3. A List of the English Fleet, as it has been given into the House of Commons December the 24th. 4. An Alphabet, &c. for carrying on the Correspondence. 5. Two Letters suppos'd to be writ by Dr. Turner Bishop of Ely, to King James and his Queen, and in which the Writer says, He speaks his elder Brother's Sentiments, and the rest of the Family's, meaning Archbishop Sancroft, as we are told, and the other depriv'd Bishops, as well as his own. 6. Several mysterious Letters, some with, and some without, Directions: And, 7. A Paper of Memorandums in Lord Preston's own Hand-Writing (e).

But how visibly soever Lord Preston's Mind sunk

(d) See State of Europe for January, 1691, and a Piece call'd, A late Voyage to Holland, publish'd in the same Year.

1. The Resolves of the Conference.

[France.] "I. F. must either oblige or conquer us: If the last, he will find new Helps here, but a bloodier Resistance than ever the Romans, Saxons, or Normans found, it being incredible, how unanimous and obstinate that very Thought renders the People; so that it may make us a heap of Ruin, but no Nation, that can ever help or import any thing to F.

[King Lewis.] II. If K. L. desires to oblige us, and make the Work easy, that he may be at Leisure to ply the Empire or Italy, or to have an advantageous Peace, he must take off the frightful Character we have of him, and shew us he has no such Design, as restoring our offended K. a Conqueror upon us, but that he can and will be our Friend and Mediator; upon which Terms he will find, that many Lords and Gentlemen will speedily shew themselves to his Satisfaction, especially if he makes haste, and loses no approaching Opportunity.

[St. Germains.] III. If he incline to this sort of Sense, he must over rule the Bigotry of St. G. and dispose their Minds to think of those Methods that are more likely to gain the Nation; for there is one silly thing or other daily done there, that comes to our Notice here, which prolongs what they so passionately desire.

The Methods thought upon are these:

First, To prevent dangerous and foolish Intelligence, by forbidding all in that Court to write any News hither, and that King James only have his Correspondence, by whom to hear from, and speak to, People here; since Letters so often miscarry, and are fill'd with nothing but what we should not hear, and what we have, are Arguments for the most part against the King's Restoration.

Secondly, Since there is a great Body of Protestants, that never defected, and that many thousands are returning, and that they are the natural Weight and Power of their Kingdoms, by having the Heads, Hands, and Wealth of their Side, to the Odds and Advantage of at least two hundred Protestants to one Catholic; that the K. may think of nothing short of a Protestant Administration, nor of nothing more for the Catholics, than a legal Liberty of Conscience; for multa è multis is against all other Notions, to which all private Persons and artificial Frames in Government must yield or break. He may reign a Catholic in Devotion, but he must reign a Protestant in Government. Cromwell could not, yet on a broader Bottom, with a victorious Army, fulfill or keep what he had got.

[Machiavelism.]

Thirdly, He must give us a Model of this at St. G. by preferring the Protestants that are with him, above the Catholics; one being loyal upon ten Fits of Inzeal, and to tell the Nation here what they are to hope for when he comes.

Fourthly, He must give Encouragement to Lords and Gentlemen here to come to him, at least seven or nine for a standing Council, which will make us hear think he is in some Degree our's again, and that we have a Relation to him, and some Interest and Share in him, by the Men of Quality of our own Religion, that are with him. This will incomparably facilitate the Matter here; one will they, when they come, come empty, and in their own Names, which is still better, and will be more satisfactory there.

Fifthly, To insinue that, Anglish Protestants should be encouraged by an Edict of Liberty from the K. of F. to have Chapels

A.D. 1690-91 sunk under his Misfortunes, it did not sink fast enough to answer the immediate Purposes of the Court; for tho' no Endeavours were wanting to bring him to a Confession of A.D. 1690-91

Chapels at their own Costs, in which to worship God after their respective ways; by which that King will make us reflect upon his Conduct towards his Huguenots, rather to flow from the Hazard he thought himself in by their anti-monarchical and refining Principles, than a Desire of Persecution.

Lastly, All other requisite Measures depending upon the Acceptance of this Bill, an Answer hereunto is impatiently desir'd by those that have discern'd the K's Softness to this Maturity. So ended with an unanimous Consent both Tories and Whigs upon this Occasion, that are in a way of closing in his Interest."

2. The Heads of the Declaration.

"That the King will return with a Design of making an intire Conquest of his People, is so ridiculous as well as difficult, that it needs not be spoken to.

That the King's Declaration be worded in general Terms, that he will govern by the Laws; that they shall be the Rule of his Actions; that he will endeavour to settle Liberty of Conscience by Law, that whatsoever things were formerly done by him, which occasion'd Jealousies in the Minds of his People, shall be left to the Determination of a Parliament, to be formally and regularly call'd as soon as it possible.

That he has given sufficient Evidence of his Unwillingness to bring an Army of Strangers into his Kingdom, by refusing the Succours of France offer'd him, and which were even ready to be embark'd upon the first Notice of the Prince of Orange's intended Invasion.

That he brings with him such an Army only, as is necessary for his own Defence, and for the Security of his loyal Subjects, who shall rejoice to see him; that he will disband them as soon as he shall have rid the Nation of those Foreigners, who have invaded it, and trampled upon the Laws and Liberties of his People.

The King's large Conscience, his dispensing Power, gave the great Alarm to the People, and contributed most of all toward a general Defection. Yet when that Power came to be debated in the last Convention, there appear'd so many Difficulties in the limiting of it, every body, even the present Judges believing it necessary, that a dispensing Power should be in the King, that it was let fall, and that Point remains as it was. And without mentioning that, or any other Particular, the King can be in no Danger by leaving all things, which have been the Occasions of Jealousies, to the Determination of a Parliament, where, besides the King's profess'd Friends and Servants, there will not want others, who will be glad of Opportunity to ingratiate themselves."

5. The two Letters supposed to be written by Dr. Turner, Bishop of Ely.

To Mr. Redding.

SIR,

"Tho' the Bearer of this will do us the Justice to assure you, we are as full of Duty, as unfeignedly and unconcernedly yours, as yourself could wish; yet this Gentleman has undertaken ——— You will forgive the Presumption, if I do myself the Honour to give you this fresh Assurance in a few Words, which I hope we do by our Accounts. I shall omit no Occasions, not neglecting the least, and making zealous Wishes for the greatest, to shew ourselves such as we ought to be. Sir, I speak in the plural, because I write my elder Brother's Sentiments as well as my own, and the rest of the Family, though lessen'd in Number, yet if we are not mightily out in our Accounts, we are growing in our Interest, that is, in yours. He that delivers this, will, I hope, sufficiently to your Satisfaction, represent us, and me in particular, as with all the Devotion imaginable and unchangeable Affection, Yours. God grant the happiest new Year."

To Mrs. Redding.

"As it is impossible for me to express that extraordinary great Satisfaction it gave me this time twelve Months, when I had the Honour to receive that Mark of your Favour, and Goodness under your own Hand; so I have lived in some pain for an Opportunity to write you my humblest Acknowledgments and truest Duty, from which, by the Grace of God, I am no more capable of swerving, than of renouncing my Hopes of Heaven. I fay this in Behalf of my elder Brother, and the rest of my nearest Relations, as well as for myself. You may safely depend upon us, not only for a constant Adherence to so well chosen a Principle, but for our utmost Activity to promote your Interests, which are inseparable from our own. I need come to no Particulars by this Bearer, who can and will tell you our whole Hearts; and I wish you could see them, how sincerely they are devoted to your Service. God grant you a most happy new Year, and many, very many, and very happy. Our young Master hath all our best Wishes; he daily gains more Friends, and we get Ground of his Adversaries.

News Years Day."

6. THE OTHER LETTERS.

A Letter directed for Mrs. Charlton, Dec. 31, 1690.

"I must not let this Bearer depart, Madam, without assuring you of my best Respects. I have written by him to a Friend of yours, but depend upon you to give my Note Credit.

Tho' my Creditors were no Friends to the Match, which has been so long in Treaty, for your Relations have been very hard upon me this last Summer, yet as soon as I could go safely abroad, I pursu'd the Business, and do beg you to believe, that no Endeavours of mine shall be wanting to perfect the Settlement. You once put me in Hopes of seeing you before this Christmas. Your Friends are sorry for the Disappointment, pray lose no more time than is of absolute Necessity. The Bearer will tell you all things may now be easily settled, if the right way be taken. I long to hear how your younger Daughter does; she will find many Friends, and I hope her Portion will be well secur'd. God send you a happy new Year, and that I may be merry with you before it be far spent; and I beseech you, keep me in the good Opinion of your Friend. I will always make good what I promise to you."

A Letter directed to Mr. Jackson, Dec. 31, 1690.

"The Bearer can give you so full an Account of all things relating to your Estate here, that I need not have troubled you at this time, but that I am desirous to lay hold of any Opportunity I think safe, to assure you of my Service; and that I will never quit your Interest whatever the rest of the Freeholders do. Your Adversary has been so hard to his Neighbours, that he has extremely disobliged all the old Tenants, and a little Matter would redeem the whole Estate, if you would appear in Westminster-hall yourself; the best Council have a good Opinion of your Title, and will assiduously pursue your Instructions. I only beg you would harken them to us, and that you will appear yourself as soon as is possible. No time should be lost, that the Cause may be brought to a final Hearing before the End of Easter Term, if it be well followed. I heartily wish you a happy new Year, and I beg you to tell Mr. Charlton, that I long to know wherein I may serve him, and that I will follow his Directions to the uttermost, while I live. God keep you and yours."

A Letter without Direction.

December 3.

" The Interruption of the former Correspondency had a very ill Effect many ways, but for that reason no Opportunity ought now to be lost, and I hope this will prove a happy one.

In Trade, as well as in Government, Schemes must be laid; for there is no living from hand-to-mouth any more in Commerce than in Politics. Lay therefore your Designs probably, and pursue them diligently, and with Vigour; though it be a hazardous time, yet by venturing boldly, where venturing is advisable, it often returns great Profit.

There is nothing more to be said but to give the Bearer fit and full Seasons to tell what he knows, both as to the Goods fit for our Market, and when and where to be sent. The Sea will quickly grow so troublesome, that unless you dispatch what you intend for us, you will lose a great Opportunity of Advantage. I hope the Account he has to give of our Negotiation here with the Merchants, that deal with us, especially those that have lately brought us their Custom, will both encourage a larger Trade, and excite the utmost Diligence. I will say nothing of myself; it shall be enough, that I can live in the good Opinion of one I bear so great a Reverence and Affection for. But for this honest Factor, I must own, I can hardly say enough. Truth and Boldness are excellent Qualities in a Servant, and he has shewn both, as Occasion has requir'd him to shew them.

I have but one Word to add, and pray take it as the truest Mark of unalterable Respect. Chuse well, but have to do but with a few; for a Multitude may give, but can never keep Counsel.

I shall, with more Impatience than becomes me, wait the Result of this; and it will be a great Mark of Goodness to let us have the best and safest way.

Once more, let not the Season spend unprofitably, for a more likely one can hardly come than between this and the first of March. Interpret this, I pray, as no private Interest of my own, or partial Motion of any other Person. It is my Sense, my Duty, and my Friendship, which will not let me prevaricate, nor suffer those I love and honour to lose so happy and pressing an Occasion of Advantage. With the best Wishes I close up this, and am, &c."

A Letter without Direction.

December 31.

" It is a Presumption incident to those, that are any where upon the Spot, to think, that they know better than those, that are not, what is fittest to be done in any Occurrence. This makes me say, that now is the time to make large Advantages by trading, the Sea being freer than two Months past, or we can hope it will be two Months hence. This Gentleman is well instructed in our Markets, and what the Goods are we want, and when and where they shall be sent. It is most earnestly desir'd, that this happy Opportunity may not be lost, especially by the late Undertakers; and I would not for much they should receive the least Disgust. They are somewhat positive in their Terms; but they also say, they will be good and constant Customers; and I have more than once seen the Mischief of over-acting and over-saving the Market. Opportunities are to be used; they cannot be given by Men.

The Bearer needs nothing from me to recommend him, but he is deserving in our Opinion here, and many will take their Measures by the Usage he finds there. And indeed the pressing Posture of our trading Affairs will not permit more Experiments.

If the several Parcels arrive not, that have been promis'd, before the 10th of March at farthest (especially the Copper and Linnen, of which the Bearer will be more particular) I am satisfy'd we shall lose this Summer's Profit. I am the more pressing, because I am well assur'd of what I write; and if ever I judge right, it is upon this Occasion.

I have said nothing of another Gentleman, that takes this Opportunity to see those Parts; but he has shewn a Zeal and a Sincerity in this Affair equal to most. Jo. is not yet gone, by a Misfortune; but he will follow with a good Postscript to this Affair. Of myself I will say nothing. I hope I need not; for nobody, without Vanity, can be more sincerely and affectionately a Friend and Servant to the Company than myself. I write at large Yesterday, and cannot write what the Hand, that gives this, can say; and therefore will write no more, but that with the greatest Respect I am, &c."

S. I. P.

I vow to you, I do not repine at having lost all for your sake, which I got by your Favour; but it grieves me extremely, that there is not that left, which can secure me from being troublesome to you; for that is the thing in the World I would not be. I have told my Lord my Condition. What I desire of you, he thinks very moderate; I hope you will. Pray, Sir, be not backward in settling my little Affair, for I have desert'd your Cause. Your Daughter and I must starve, if this Government can make us. I hope our Interests are not divided; that is, you have an equal Tenderness at least for both. If you think fit to speak what I would have you to this Bearer, he will give me a just Account of it. You know he is oblig'd to be my Friend, and I believe him grateful, since he ventures so boldly for you. He brings with him some merry Papers. Adieu, for I dare write no more, but pray send a Messenger on purpose to me, that I may exactly know what you will do, and would have me do. If you send upon no other Business, there will be no Danger. Pray, Sir, ask my Lord, and he will tell you, how I have been used, and upon what Account. I believe you know it not.

December 29.

Your Daughter is very well, very tall, and very pretty, as I am told."

December 31, 1690.

" Was my Condition more desperate and uneasy than it is, I desire no greater Satisfaction than to have done my Duty to so good a Master. I wish it was of more use to him; that is not my Fault, nor of those I have acted with. Let it be look'd into what has been foretold both as to England, Scotland, and Ireland, and see, if most of it is not come to pass already, and the rest will follow, if not prevented. I wish it may also be consider'd what Usage we have met with from Men employ'd, and how they left your Business and Friends. How they manag'd it, you will know from all hands. Things they could not do, nor durst not undertake, were better undone, than not done by them: Men in this Place, and in these Times, must have some Courage as well as Sense to do any thing with the People here. It is not my own ill Usage makes me say this, but my Concern for one I wish the best in the World, and will give my Proofs of this upon all Occasions. I need not enlarge, since all our Grievances are known to him, that brings this. For my own Part, I will stay here so long as I can be safe, if with ne'er so great Trouble; but it would be some Comfort to know Men (when driven from hence) may be so. Therefore the Reports of the Peoples Usage are terrible, as well as of the Indiscretion of Sr. Geru. Family. We feel the Smart of it by ridiculous Letters falling daily into the Hands of the Government. Their Master and Mistress are little oblig'd by it no more than we. If there is any thing, Sir, you do particularly command, or depend upon me for, let me know it. I cannot undertake much, nor furnish more. I have still help'd every body, and paid to every thing I could; and if a Twelvemonth ago my Condition was what I then represented, you best know, if it has been mended. Use, and considering that of others, makes me grow more contented; and if the Prospect of Misery to us all was any Satisfaction, that is now plainly seen.

Pray God direct us all, by reflecting every Man his own, and you with long Life.

He, that gives you this, hath furnish'd for your Use to me, &c. two hundred Pounds, which I desire may be repaid.

I only beg, Madam, no ill malicious Report may take any place in your Thoughts, in regard to me. I value your good Opinion, and will endeavour to deserve it. I can do little towards, but with most heartily for, your Happiness. I know no Interest, Madam, but my Master's and your's, nor do I think they are to be made two. If you command me in any thing, I will faithfully obey you, as I ever have done him.

We all depend here upon this Bearer's Accounts of us and Condition, his Faith and Courage hath been enough experienc'd."

A.D. 1690. fonable Design againſt the new Settlement, he flatter'd himſelf there would be a Defect of Proof; and, after the Outcry which had been rais'd againſt the Severities of the former Reigns, and the Sanction which had been given to that Outcry, by the preſent Government, he could not apprehend, that in the very firſt Occurrence of this nature, which had happen'd under it, they would ruſh into all the Violences which they had ſo long and ſo loudly condemn'd.

His Lordſhip and his Coadjutors were, however, allow'd but very little time to ponder on their preſent Condition; for, on the 1690-91.] fixteenth of January, they were brought to their Trials at the Old-Bailey, and, in one Indictment, accus'd of compaſſing the Death of their Majeſties King William and Queen Mary, on the (f) twenty-ninth of December, at the Pariſh of St. Clements Danes, in the County of Middleſex, by traitorouſly conſulting and agreeing to raiſe great Numbers of arm'd Men, to make War and Rebellion againſt the ſaid King and Queen; of preparing and compoſing divers treaſonable Letters, Notes, Memorandums and Inſtructions in writing, to inform Lewis the French King and his Subjects, their Majeſties Enemies, of the State of their Fleet, Caſtles, &c. and how thoſe Caſtles might be taken; as alſo how to invade the Kingdom, depoſe their ſaid Majeſties, inſult the City of London, &c. of concealing two Bills of Exchange for the Uſe of the Enemy; of hiring a Ship to tranſport themſelves, together with the ſaid Bills, Writings, &c. Lord Preſton alledg'd, that he was a Peer of England, by virtue of a Patent under the Great Seal, granted before the Vote of Abdication, and white all Writs, Proceſſes, and Commiſſions ran in the late King's Name, and all Officers acted by his Authority: But this Plea was over-rul'd by the Court, upon Mr. Solicitor Somers's declaring, not only A.D. 1690-91 that the Houſe of Lords, after a ſolemn Debate, and taking the Opinion of the Judges, had pronounc'd the ſaid Patent to be null and void, but that the Priſoner had diſclam'd it. His Lordſhip and his Fellow Priſoners then deſir'd, that the Indictment might be read in Latin, which was granted; but when they farther deſir'd a Copy of it on the Authority of the Statute, 46 Ed. III. and urg'd that it was given as a Reaſon for the Reverſal of Mr. Cornyſhe's Attainder, that it was not a legal Trial, becauſe he had not a Copy of his Indictment, it was refus'd; the Lord Chief-Juſtice (Holt) anſwering, in Effect, That Mr. Cornyſhe's Act was a private Act, that he had never ſeen it, nor could take notice of it; that it had not been the Courſe to allow a Priſoner a Copy of the Indictment; and that it had been refus'd to Sir Henry Vane, Colonel Sydney, and Lord Ruſſel. Thus the very Precedents which had been ſo violently complain'd of, were now made Authorities; and when the Priſoners deſir'd to have more time allow'd them to prepare for their Trials, one Day longer was all that was granted; the Solicitor-General ſaying, That was Time enough: And when Aſhton reply'd, That ſuch haſty Proceedings were thought very hard in the late Times; and that it was extant in the King's Declaration, that the Hardſhips laid by the Law upon Men in their Trials, was one of the Grievances which he came to remove, the Lord Chief-Juſtice Pollexfen, like a ſagacious Politician, reply'd, That when Men were plotting againſt the Government, they ought not to have time given them to carry on their Plots; and that they might deſire the Trial to be put off, in hopes the King of France might come and determine the Matter in the mean time.

(f) Biſhop Burnet ſuggeſts, that the Diſcovery of this Affair put a Stop to the Lord Shrewſbury's Deſign againſt the Lord Preſident; But ſurely this muſt be a Miſrepreſentation, for the ſaid Diſcovery could not be made till after the Bargain for the Veſſel was ſtruck, which was not till the 30th of December, and then every body knew, that the Houſe of Commons were putting the laſt Hand to the Baſineſs before them, and that the Seſſion was on the Point of being clos'd.

A.D. 1690-91 Bar, they chose to make their Challenges separately, and, consequently, were to have separate Trials.

Lord Preston, as the Chief, led the way. Mr. Solicitor open'd the Evidence against him; that is to say, prepar'd the Minds of the Jury for the Impression that the Evidence was to make. The Witnesses themselves were then brought forward; and first, Mrs. Prat depos'd, That Elliot had hir'd a Smack of her for one hundred Pounds, to go to France, and gave her Directions where she was to call for the Company the next Night: That according to these Directions she went at the time appointed, to one Rigby's, at the Seven Stars in Covent-Garden: That there she found Elliot, Ashton, and two more (which were my Lord and his Man) and that they all set out from thence about eleven at Night. Pasely the Master of the Smack then added, That they call'd at the Seven Stars for the Company, as above: That they all took Water at Surrey Stairs: That they went on board the Smack over against the Tower: That in sailing down the River, the Gentlemen hid themselves under the Hatches, as they pass'd by the George Man of War, and again, when approaching the Block House at Gravesend: That there Captain Billop came on board and took them all Prisoners, and carry'd them to Whitehall: That as they were landing, one of the Gentlemen desir'd him, when he came to be examin'd, to say he was bound to Flanders, not to France, and gave him half a Crown; and that Ashton and my Lord's Man did also give his two Seamen half a Crown apiece. The Waterman that carry'd them from Surrey Stairs, then appear'd to the Proof of that Fact, and his putting them on board the Smack. The two Seamen, of Pasely's, confirm'd their hiding themselves under the Hatches; as also, the Circumstance of the Half-Crown, with the Instruction which accompany'd it: And one of them added, That while Billop was searching the Prisoners, he heard one of his (Billop's) Watermen tell him, That he saw Ashton put something into his Bosom, and that Billop thereupon pull'd a Roll of Papers, with a Piece of Lead tied to it, out of Ashton's Bosom. Billop himself depos'd, That he receiv'd his Orders to apprehend the Persons on board the Smack, from the Lord President; that he found them hid under the Hatches; that he took all Lord Preston's Papers, as also the Roll, before spoken of, from Ashton; that in their Passage up, Ashton and Elliot courted him to throw the Roll overboard, and to report to the King and Council, That the Letters taken upon Lord Preston, which were of no Importance, were the whole Seizure; as also, to go along with them: Asking, what Good it would do him to injure so many honest Gentlemen? and telling him, he had it now in his Power to make himself as great and as rich as he pleas'd; and that his Lordship also pass'd a Compliment upon him, and said, He would do him all the Service in his Power, in case he would sink the Roll. The Watermen of Billop's, before mention'd, confirm'd his Evidence, and moreover swore, That he saw Ashton take the Roll off the Balast; that there were a couple of Seals lying by it, which he, the Witness, took up; that Lord Preston's Man offer'd him something to drink, if he would return them, which he refus'd; and that Elliot in coming up the River, wish'd a Thunderbolt would sink the Boat, or that London-Bridge would fall on their Heads. A.D. 1690-91

The next Course of Evidence was to prove, that the Papers now to be produc'd in Court, were the same which were contain'd in the Roll which had been taken from Ashton; and this was done sufficiently by Billop, Lord Nottingham, the Lord-President, and Lord Sydney.

The Papers were then read, that is to say, those already inserted in the Notes; and then certain Persons depos'd, that they believ'd the Memorandums were Lord Preston's Hand-writing. After which his Lordship had Leave given him to enter upon his Defence, which he did accordingly, by saying in Substance, That the Treasons charg'd upon him were none of them done in the County of Middlesex, as laid in the Indictment; that none of the Witnesses declar'd he knew any thing of going into France, or had any Concern in hiring the Vessel, or that the Papers were found upon him; that there ought to be two credible Witnesses to every Fact; and that, on the contrary, all rested on Similitude of Hands, and mere Suppositions only. The Chief-Justice (Holt) then proceeded to direct the Jury, and, upon the whole Matter, signify'd, That if they thought his Lordship, the Prisoner, had no Design to go into France with those Papers, in order to excite an Invasion, depose the King and Queen, and restore King James, but was an utter Stranger to all those things, then they were to acquit him; but if they believ'd his Lordship was privy to the hiring of the Vessel, that he went to carry on the Design contain'd in the Papers, that he writ some of them, and was privy to the rest, they were to find him guilty. Lord Preston, with the Leave of the Court, as being a thing out of Course, reply'd, That things had been urg'd against him with Severity; that Presumptions were taken for Proofs; that most of the Papers were written in a Cant, &c. And the Chief-Justice, with some Tartness rejoin'd, That if he reflected on the Court, the Court would reflect upon him; that in his Thoughts the Evidence had been stated impartially; that it deserv'd its due Weight; and that whether a Person could go innocently to France, at that time of Day, with such Papers, and in such a manner, he should leave to the Consideration of the Jury; who, after withdrawing for about half an Hour, brought in their Verdict, Guilty. Lord Preston pronounc'd guilty.

Lord Preston's Trial being on a Saturday, Sunday prov'd a Day of Grace to Ashton, who was not put on his Trial till the Monday following. The same Indictment serv'd for both; and when the Jurors were call'd, the Prisoner said, He should make no Challenges, but rely on the first twelve in the Pannel, who were sworn accordingly.

The Indictment and Evidence was then open'd

A.D. 1696-97 open'd by the King's Council, and the ſame Evidences depos'd to the ſame Effect as before; and all that appear'd directly againſt the Priſoner was, That he had hir'd the Smack of Prat; that he had left the Money, being ninety-three (g) Guineas and a Sixpence, with one Mrs. Burdet, in Truſt for Prat, which was to be paid on Paſley's Return; that he broke Six-pence in two, and left one Half with the ſaid Mrs. Burdet, and took the other with him, which was to be given to Paſley at his Return, as a Token that he had perform'd his Truſt, and that Prat was entitled to the Money; that he enquir'd, whether there was a Place in the Veſſel in which they could hide themſelves, and deſir'd that Notice might be given them if they ſaw a Man of War's Boat coming on board; that he took up the Roll of Papers off the Baſaſt, and that he made the Offers to Billop, &c. before-mention'd, in their way to Whitehall.

In his Defence, which had an Air of Openneſs that Men in his deſperate Condition are ſeldom Maſters of, he ingenuouſly own'd, That he was going to France; tho' in Contradiction to what Mrs. Prat had ſworn, he proteſted he had never acknowledg'd ſo much before; that his Errand to that Kingdom was partly to keep his Word to the late General Worden (under whom he had done Buſineſs, and to whoſe Family he had great Obligations) who had, on his Death-bed, engag'd him to take that Journey, in order to finiſh ſome Affairs of Conſequence which he had left depending there, and partly to recover a very conſiderable Sum of Money due to himſelf; that theſe were the true and only Reaſons of his going thither; that he had for theſe Purpoſes ſeveral times engag'd to find a Paſſage before, but had always been diſappointed. He alſo own'd, that he did hire the Smack and pay the Money; but then he pleaded, that theſe were no Acts of Treaſon, and that even the King's Council themſelves did not pretend to urge, that he was privy to any of the Papers found upon him. He then deſir'd the Bench to explane the Indictment, which, on account of the great and grievous Aggravations in it, he ſaid was above his Comprehenſion; and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Holt replying, That he was indicted on the 25th of Ed. III. for conſpiring, compaſſing, and imagining the Death of the King and Queen, and for that Purpoſe going to France in order to incite the French King to invade the Kingdom, and to enable him to effect it by the Intelligence contain'd in the Papers; he took occaſion to put another ſhrewd Queſtion to the Bench, viz. Whether that was all prov'd upon him? And, when the Lord Chief-Juſtice, in Anſwer, ſaid, The Jury were to judge of that, upon the Evidence which had been given, he rejoin'd, among other things, "As to the imagining the Death of the King, that is only to be prov'd by ſome Overt-Act. Now, I think nothing at all has been prov'd of any open Act, conducing to prove the imagining A.D. 1696-97 or compaſſing the Death of the King or Queen, no manner of Conſultation or treaſonable Act at all; and therefore, my Lord, I do not ſee that there is any great Matter prov'd upon me."—— Here he ſuffer'd himſelf to be miſled from the great Concluſion of his own rational Argument, to enlarge on the Hardſhips which he had ſuffer'd in relation to the time of Preparation allow'd him for his Trial, and the particular Condeſcentions he had receiv'd from Lord Sydney. He then call'd ſeveral Perſons to prove he was a Proteſtant of exemplary Piety and irreproachable Manners; and, after a dangerous Parley with the Bench on the Occaſion of his Voyage, his paying the Money for the Smack, his aſking for a Place to hide in, &c. in which he nevertheleſs made no material Eſcape, the Lord Chief-Juſtice Holt proceeded to ſum up the Merits of the Caſe, for the Information of the Jury, and brought the Matter to this Iſſue, That if Mr. Aſhton was not privy to the Deſign of the others in going to France, tho' he was criminal in going thither at all, at ſuch a Juncture, he was not guilty of High Treaſon; that the Queſtion was, Whether he was in the Secret or not; that unleſs he was, it was hard to account for his giving ſo exorbitant a Price for the Veſſel, and for his Concern for the Roll in which it was contain'd; and that upon the whole, he was to be deem'd guilty or not, as this ſhould appear to the Conſciences of the Jury. Here the Lord Chief-Juſtice Powlteſen interpos'd, and in a more thorough-pac'd manner obſerv'd, firſt, That the Priſoners had choſen to be try'd ſeparately, that they might ſhuffle off the Treaſon from one unto another; and then declar'd, that the Queſtion before the Jury, was, Whether all the Priſoners were not equally concern'd? which, as Lord Preſton was already condemn'd, and Elliot had not been try'd, was pre-judging with a Vengeance. Mr. Juſtice Eyre alſo took care to recollect that Branch of Evidence, in which Aſhton is charg'd, with importuning Billop to throw the Papers overboard, and with uſing it as an Argument, That it would do him no good to injure three honeſt Gentlemen. Aſhton, on the other hand, deny'd, that he had ſaid ſo, at leaſt that he knew of, tho' the Witneſs had ſworn it; and again call'd upon the Jury to obſerve, That there was no Privity prov'd; that there was no Proof that any of the Papers were of his writing, and that all the Inferences that were made, were made upon Suppoſition only.

But tho' all this was undeniably true, and tho' one of the Law-Rabbies of the Whig-Party had juſt ſet forth in Print a Treatiſe on the Trials of the State-Martyrs in King Charles's Reign, in which he makes uſe of theſe very Words, Of all ſorts of Evidence, the finding Papers in a Perſon's Poſſeſſion, is the weakeſt, becauſe no Perſon can ſecure himſelf againſt Deſigns upon him in that kind, ſo willing [Howlleſſes's Remarks on College's Trial] [State Tracts, Vol. ii. p. 25.]

were the Jury to help the Court to a Precedent, that the present Government was to be held as sacred as the former, that, after a short Consultation of half an Hour, they brought in the Prisoner, Guilty.

Bishop Burnet's Representation of this Matter is very remarkable on many Accounts, and therefore is here inserted. "The Prisoners, says his Lordship, were quickly brought to their Trial; their Design of going to France, and the treasonable Papers found about them, were fully prov'd; some of them were writ in Lord Preston's, and some in Ashton's Hand. They made but a poor Defence: They said, a Similitude of Hands was not thought a good Proof in Sydney's Case; but this was now only a Circumstance; in what hand soever the Papers were writ, the Crime was always the same, since they were open, not sealed; so they knew the Contents of them, and thus were carrying on a Negotiation of High Treason with the King's Enemies. Upon full Evidence they were condemn'd.

Ashton would enter into no Treaty with the Court, but prepar'd himself to die. And he suffer'd with great Decency and Seriousness. He left a Paper behind him, in which he own'd his Dependence on King James, and his Fidelity to him: He also affirm'd, That he was sure the Prince of Wales was born of the Queen: He deny'd that he knew the Contents of the Papers that were taken with him. This made some conclude, that his Paper was penn'd by some other Person, and too hastily copy'd over by himself, without making due Reflections on this Part of it; for I compar'd this Paper, which he gave the Sheriff, and which was written in his own Hand, with those found about him; and it was visible, both were writ in the same Hand."

Now it seems strange, that his Lordship should assert, That some of the Papers found in the Smack were writ in Ashton's Hand, when no such thing appear'd in Evidence on the Trial; and it will seem so much the stranger, when the following Sketch of the Controversy, which his Paper left with the Sheriff gave rise to, comes to be duly consider'd:

who is accused.

Ashton suffer'd on the 20th of January, and in that Paper, after a solemn Profession of his dying in the Faith of the Church of England, and of his believing himself oblig'd by that Faith to look upon his rightful, lawful Prince, King James, whatever his Principles were, or his Practices might be, as God's Vicegerent, and accountable (if guilty of Mal-Administration) to God only; and of whatever else could shew him an honest, blind Devotee, he proceeds as follows:

Controversy about his Paper left with the Sheriff.

"Having thus frankly declar'd my Principles, I know the Inference will be, that I have acted accordingly, and consequently, that I am now justly condemn'd; but as I ingenuously own the Premisses, so I as positively deny the Consequence; for whatever my Inclinations or Actions have been, yet, as to the Matter I was sentenc'd to die for, I declare myself innocent, and will appeal even to the Judges themselves, whether or no, upon my Trial there appear'd the least Proof, that I knew a Tittle contain'd in the Papers; but Presumption was, with the Jury, thought sufficient to find me guilty; though I am told, I am the first Man that ever was condemn'd for High Treason upon bare Suspicion or Presumption, and that contrary to my Lord Coke's and other eminent Lawyers Opinions. The Knowledge of my own Innocency, as to the Indictment and Charge against me, was that that arm'd me with so much Assurance, and occasion'd my casting my Life upon the first twelve Men of the Pannel, without challenging any. But tho' I have, I think, just reason to complain of the severe Charge given by the Judges, and hard Measure I have receiv'd, not to mention my close Imprisonment, the hasty and violent Proceedings against me, nor the Industry used in the Return of fitting Persons to pass upon me, the denying me a Copy of the Pannel, &c. yet, as I hope for Pardon and Forgiveness at the Hands of my God, so do I most heartily pray for, and forgive them, and all my Enemies, all the World, nay even that Judge and Jury-man, who did, so signally, contrary to common Justice, expose themselves to destroy me, &c.

When it appear'd that there were more Copies of this Speech than one, and that they began to circulate, an Answer was set forth, perhaps by Bishop Burnet himself, tho' some lay Bishop Fowler; for, after many repeated Efforts to explode Ashton's Principles, and to confute several of his Assertions, such as, that King James's Usage after the Arrival of the Prince of Orange, was very hard, severe, and, if he might so say, unjust, and, that all the new Methods of settling the Nation had made it more miserable, poor, and more expos'd to foreign Enemies, than it was before, the Author comes to the Case of the Man, concerning which he writes as follows:

"The Overt-Act, in this case, was the carrying over treasonable Papers into France, in order to an Invasion. The sole Question then was, Whether there was manifest Proof as to these Papers? That the Papers were found about him was manifestly prov'd; and he owns, fol. 110 (of the Trial) That they were unfortunately found upon him; but he saith, that he knew not the Importance of them. It was manifestly prov'd, that he had an extraordinary Concernment to have these Papers thrown over-board, which he saith was perfectly out of Friendship; and whether that was a true Answer, was left to the Consciences of the Jury, who were to judge of this by all the Circumstances antecedent, concomitant, and subsequent, by which they did conclude him guilty: And I cannot see how they went against Common Justice therein, especially since Mr. Ashton well knew, that one of the most material Papers taken, was of his own Hand-writing; not the first Draught, but the Copy which was shew'd him in the Court; and when it was so, he desir'd, fol. 106, that the Originals might be read, and not the Copy; and he had good reason for it; for, as far as I can judge, upon Perusal of both, it is the very same Hand in which

A.D. 1690-91 which this Speech was written. But what ſaid Mr. Aſhton to the Jury to clear this Matter? he ſaith, fol. 129, That his Hand was not prov'd to any of the Papers, and therefore there was nothing but Suppoſition or Suſpicion againſt him. It is true, there was no direct and plain Proof of the Hand, as there was in the Caſe of my Lord Preſton (and it is a Wonder it was omitted, for that would have been plain Proof of his knowing what was in thoſe Papers.) However, all the other Circumſtances put together, were a ſufficient Proof of his Privity to the Contents of them.

And I wonder how Mr. Aſhton could ſo confidently in this Paper declare himſelf innocent, as to the Matter for which he was ſentenc'd to die, when he knew the Paper was of his own Hand-writing, and plain Proof hath been ſince made of his own Delivery of it to a third Perſon. Can a Man be innocent and guilty of the ſame thing?"

Now every body is ſenſible, That Juries are by their Oaths to be directed by the Letter of the Evidence, not what the Priſoner himſelf knows, as the Point is here fallaciouſly ſtated, or Gloſſes of their own, drawn from all other Circumſtances put together: And that the direct and plain Proof of Aſhton's Hand was omitted, is not ſo much a Wonder, as a Demonſtration that it was not in the Proſecutor's Power to produce.

But this Anſwer drew on a Reply (and a moſt ſevere one it is) which is call'd, The Loyal Martyr vindicated; and in which the Author, ſpeaking of this very Aſſertion, viz. That a Copy of one of the moſt material Papers was of the ſame Hand-writing with that deliver'd to the Sheriff, ſays, "But how frivolous is this Pretence of his? Had the Judges, or the Managers of the Trial found the leaſt Ground for ſuch a Suſpicion, it had been the eaſieſt thing in the World to have compar'd that Paper with hundreds of Accompts, Acquittances, and Letters, which were all ſeiz'ed in his Houſe by Order from the State: Nor could they have wanted Witneſſes to have ſworn, that they believed ſuch a Paper was writ by him, as well as they did in the Trial of my Lord Preſton, which is a very great Preſumption, that they found no ſuch Paper under his Hand, or ſo near reſembling it as might induce any to ſwear it.

But what matters it what was brought to light about thoſe Papers afterwards? The Queſtion is, What Evidence the Jury then had, when they brought in their lawleſs Verdict? If they had at that time no ſuch Evidence as the Law requires, i. e. if they had then no manifeſt Proof, he died innocent in the Eye of the Law; and nothing can acquit his Condemners from being, according to the ſame Law, and God's Law too, unconſcientious Murderers: And it is of this kind of Innocence only the Martyr ſpeaks, when he declares himſelf innocent."

In the ſame Reply, Part of another Paper, ſaid to be Aſhton's, and to have been left by him in the Hands of a Friend, was inſerted; and which may not only ſerve for a Comment on the Aſſertions of his, above quoted, concerning the Perſon there call'd the Prince of Wales, but alſo to throw a new Light on Aſhton's Caſe, and to expoſe the falſe Policy of thoſe, who, for Ends of their own, neglecting the great natural Baſis of Forfeiture ariſing from Abuſe of Power, and Breach of Truſt, choſe to build ſo vaſt a Fabric as the Revolution-Settlement on ſo weak a Foundation as a ſuppoſititious Offspring, without once atttempting to keep themſelves in Countenance, and to ſilence all Gainſayers, by ſuch a Diſcuſſion, as their own Engagements, and the Nature of the thing, requir'd. A.D. 1690-91

This Paper was as follows: "Being ſuddenly to give up my Accounts to the Searcher of all Hearts, I think it a Duty incumbent upon me to impart ſome things farther, which neither the Intereſt nor Iniquity of theſe Times will, I conclude, willingly bear the Publication of, and therefore not fit to be inſerted in the Sheriff's Paper.

Some time after the Prince of Orange's Arrival here, when it was expected, that, purſuant to his own Declaration, and the King's Letter to the Convention, an exact Search and Enquiry would have been made into the Birth of the Prince of Wales, there was a Scheme drawn up of that whole Matter, and of the Proofs that were then, and are ſtill, ready to be produc'd, to prove his Royal Highneſs's Legitimacy; but no public Examination being ever had, and the Violence of the Times, as well as Intereſt of the preſent Government, not permitting any private Perſon to move in it, thoſe Papers have ever ſince lain by: But it being now thought adviſeable by ſome, to have them printed and publiſh'd, and, as at firſt they were deſign'd, addreſs'd, at their next Meeting, to the Lords and Commons, entreating them to enquire into that weighty Affair, and to call forth, examine and protect (for who elſe dares to appear) the many Witneſſes to the ſeveral Particulars therein offer'd to be legally prov'd, &c.

I was order'd to carry thoſe Papers to the King, my Maſter, for his View, that his Leave and Approbation might go along with the Deſires of his good Subjects here; and they being taken with me, with ſome other Papers of Accounts, &c. in a ſmall Trunk, amongſt my Linen, and other private things of my own, and not in the Packet (my Lord Preſton being altogether a Stranger to the whole Proceeding) by this Means fell into the Hands of our preſent Governors, who, though they wiſely wav'd the producing them as Evidence at my Trial, yet have I juſt Reaſon to believe my greateſt Crimes were contain'd in them; and I do therefore conclude and hope, &c."

To cloſe on the Head of this Controverſy, there is at the End of this Reply, a detach'd Paper, call'd, An Humble Petition to the preſent Government, in the Name of King James's Adherents, imploring, That ſome grave and learned Perſon, by their Order, and under their Authority, might compile a Treatiſe, ſhewing the Grounds of their Title; promiſing, that, in caſe his Performance carry'd Conviction along with it, they would,

A.D. 1690-91 on the same Principle of Conscience, submit to that Title, as they had hitherto oppos'd it; and concluding with these Words, "Let the present Governors either satisfy our Consciences, or leave off to persecute us for being conscientious; or else (which is only left) let them speak out, and tell the World, in plain Terms, what this Refusal of theirs will sufficiently intimate, That they will do neither; but that they are resolv'd we shall be punish'd as Traitors, if we will not be Knaves; and that they will only allow us this sad Choice, to be either hang'd or damn'd."

It does not appear that the Government ever condescended to give such an Answer to this Petition as it requir'd; and, possibly, that they did not, was owing to the two excellent Discourses of Mr. Locke's upon Government, which were made public this Year, and which are at this Day esteem'd the Corner-stone, in point of Doctrine, of the Revolution.

As to the Sequel of the Conspiracy, or rather of the Fate of the Conspirators, the Historian of his own Times proceeds to say, "Lord Preston went backwards and forwards; he had no mind to die; and yet was unwilling to tell all he knew; he acted a weak Part in all Respects. When he was heated by the Importunities of his Friends, who were violently engag'd against the Government, and after he had din'd well, he resolv'd he would die heroically; but, by next Morning that Heat went of; and when he saw Death in full View, his Heart fail'd him: The Scheme he carry'd on, was so foolish, so ill concerted, and so few engag'd in it, that those who knew the whole Secret, concluded, that if he had got safe to the Court of France, the Project would have been so despis'd, that he must have been suspected, as sent over to draw King James into a Snare, and bring him into the King's Hands. The Earl of Clarendon was seiz'd, and put into the Tower; but the Bishop of Ely, Grahme, Lord Preston's Brother, and Penn (which were the whole Junto) absconded. After some Months, the King, in regard to the Earl of Clarendon's Relation to the Queen, would proceed to no Extremities against him, but gave him leave to live, confin'd to his House in the Country." Now either this Leave to live was no Act of Mercy; or, if it was, it must be understood, that both Lord Preston and Elliot had agreed to turn Witnesses against Lord Clarendon; for without two Witnesses, as the Law directs, or such other Evidence as the Lawyers are pleas'd to pronounce equivalent to two Witnesses, tho' a Sharer of the Guilt, he was out of reach of the Danger: But Elliot was under no Temptation to turn Witness; for though he was involv'd in the Indictment, he was never brought to a Trial, for want of sufficient Matter against him: Besides, even the Proclamation against the Bishop of Ely and the rest, was not set forth till the (b) fifth of February; and then it was unaccompany'd with the Offer of any Reward for taking them; which seems to indicate, that the Court had no Desire to carry their Prosecutions any farther, and that the only Design of setting it forth at all, was for the sake of what follows. "The King, continues our Historian, had suffer'd the depriv'd Bishops to continue now above a Year in their Sees; they all the while neglected the Concern of the Church, doing nothing, but living privately in their Palaces. I had, by the Queen's Order, mov'd both the Earl of Rochester, and Sir John Trevor, who had great Credit with them, to try, whether, in case an Act could be obtain'd to excuse them from taking the Oaths, they would go on and do their Functions, in Ordinations, Institutions, and Confirmations, and assist at the Public Worship, as formerly; but they would give no Answer; only they said, They would live quietly, that is, keep themselves close, till a proper time should encourage them to act more openly. So all the Thoughts of this kind were, upon that, laid aside." And again, in the Close of the same Section, "The Discovery of the Bishop of Ely's Correspondence in the Name of the rest, gave the King a great Advantage in filling these vacant Sees, which he resolv'd to do, on his Return from the Congress." What Authority his Lordship had, for putting so hard an Interpretation on the Bishops saying, That they would live quietly, he does not stay to specify; nor does he explane how they were accountable for neglecting the Concerns of the Church, when they were disabled by their Suspension from interfering with them. It does not even appear, that the Letters directed to Mr. and Mrs. Redding were positively prov'd to be the Bishop of Ely's; and not the least Article of Evidence is any where extant, that the said Bishop was really authoriz'd, to carry on such a Correspondence in the name of the rest: All which Omissions, are so many Stumbling-blocks in the plain Man's way, who desires to have the Truth fully clear'd up, and who is unwilling to draw any Conclusion without sufficient Authority.

A Hint taken from this Conspiracy to deprive the Malcontent-Bishops.

That they were obnoxious to the Government, and that, under their Countenance, the disaffected Clergy kept the Press perpetually employ'd with angry (i) Pamphlets, tending to continue the Nation in a divided State, he might

(i) Among their Efforts of this kind ought to be reckon'd Bishop Overall's Convocation-Book, of which the following Account is given by a Writer of those Times;

"In having been my Purpose to consider all Objections of any weight in themselves, or from the Authority of Persons, which should occur to me against the Right of their present Majesties, and the Justice of their undertaking our Deliverance; I ought not to pass by Bishop Overall's Convocation-Book, compos'd in the time of James I. [under his Inspection, if not by his Command, and by his Command laid aside, as will appear below] licens'd by the late Bishop of Canterbury, since his disowning this Government, and printed, as it is to be presum'd, with a manifest Intention of undermining it; for every Man may discern, that the Scheme of Government there drawn for the whole World, is contrary to the Foundation of our present Settlement: But tho' the Hypothesis is laid together with much Subtilty, nothing but Infallibility

A.D. 1690-1 might as easily have prov'd, as that it was the Interest of the Government, to remove them out of the Church, and to promote Partizans of their own in their Places. But there is a Rule of Right to be observ'd even to our Enemies, and because Men are troublesome and odious, they are not therefore to be treated at Discretion.

Much more remains to be said on this Subject; but as the Catastrophe of these Malcontent-Prelates was postpon'd till his Majesty's Return from the Congress, it is fit we should attend him thro' the Course of that Proceeding first.

A.D. 1690

Both Civility and Policy require'd, and, perhaps his (t) Duty as Stadtholder, that he libility can give it Authority: and to me it seems a Piece of Presumption, only short of that of the Romish Church: For having made a Collection from Sacred and Prophane History, and the Apocryphal Writings (tho' of the last they say, they mean not to attribute any Canonical Authority unto them, nor to establish any Point of Doctrine) they canonically condemn, of Errors, all that agree not to their Inferences and Conclusions, upon a State of Fact, which at least may be false.

The Foundation of all is the Patriarchal Power of Adam, which they suppose to have been absolutely monarchical all the World over; that Noah had the like Authority all his Life; but that he divided the whole World among his three Sons; upon which they conclude, That if any Man affirm, that God ever committed the Government of all the World, after Adam's and Noah's time, to any one Man to be the sole and visible Monarch of it, he doth greatly err. And another Error which they canonically condemn, is of them who hold, that Christ doth not allow the distributing of this his one universal Kingdom, into divers Principalities and Kingdoms, to be ruled by so many Kings, and absolute Princes under him.

Upon the whole they affirm, the fatherly Power was absolute in Adam, then in Noah, then in his three Sons together; and ever after in all the Princes of the World; and as they affirm, in relation to Adam's Monarchical Power, that it rose not from any Choice of the People, neither say they, is it deduc'd by their Consents naturally from them; which is meant of the Powers which now are in the World."

Again, "If any one shall say, That this Convention-Book was innocently publish'd at this time, let him read the following Canon, viz.

If any Man therefore shall affirm, either that the Subjects, when they shake off the Yoke of their Obedience to their Sovereigns, and set up a Form of Government among themselves after their own Humours, do not therein very wickedly, or that it is lawful for any bordering Kings, through Ambition and Malice, to invade their Neighbours; or that the Providence and Goodness of God, in using of Rebellions and Oppressions to execute his Justice against any King or Country, doth mitigate, or qualify the Offences of any such Rebels or oppressing Kings; or that when any such new Forms of Government, begun by Rebellion, are, after thoroughly settled, the Authority in them is not of God; or that any, who live within the Territories of such new Governments, are not bound to be subject to God's Authority, which is there executed, but may rebel against the same; or that the Jews, either in Egypt, or Babylon, might lawfully for any Cause, have taken Arms against any of those Kings, or have offer'd any Violence to their Persons, he doth greatly err. [Reflections on Bishop Overall's Convocation-Book.

"These are their own Words, says another Author, meaning the said Canon, as the Book is printed; but here it was they were as a Hand: The King, James I. in his Letter before-mention'd [that is to say, to good Dr. Abbot, according to the Address of it] calls it a Thorny Business. It seems he had led, if not drove, them into a Labyrinth, out of which neither he nor they knew how to extricate themselves: So hard it is when Men leave honest, plain, and simple Truth to fix upon Principles for a chosen Conclusion, and to form any Pillars which can support a false and deceitful Building. The King had done before what he could in his sly way, quasi, aliud agens. He had often told his blind concerning Jus Regium vs Subditos, as in May last (they are his Words in the Letter) in the Star-Chamber, upon the Occasion of Hoker's Pamphlet. 'And Mr. Solicitor, saith he, hath sufficiently express'd my own Thoughts concerning the nature of Kingship in general, and concerning the nature of it, ut in mea persona.' And yet, after all, it seems he was at a loss about it, and therefore saith, 'They are Edg'd-tools, or rather like that Weapon that is said to cut with one Edge, and cure with the other;' and bids them meddle no more in it, till he gives them his Orders by Mr. Solicitor. What his Orders were, we know not yet; but whatever they were, we may perceive them all here plainly entangled, confounded, and inconsistent with themselves, and their principal Design: And so are to establish and confirm what they design'd to subvert and abolish; that is, the Peoples Rights and Interest in Government, and that Jure Divino, as plainly as any Right of Monarchs; and to subvert what they design'd to build or firmly, viz. an essential Absoluteness and Irresistibility of Monarchy Jure Divino. [Spirit of the Church Position devoted, 4to. p. 31, 32.

(t) Among the Articles of Complaint brought by the Jacobites against the new Settlement, we find the following:

"That, whereas the sole Power of issuing out Edicts and Placarts, is intirely lodg'd in the States-General, without their being either oblig'd to consult their Stadtholder, or his being vested with any Power to controul them in what they publish, the only Authority of ordaining and emitting Declarations and Proclamations, is plac'd in this Dutch Prince and Belgic Stadtholder, by virtue of the Right made inherent to him, on the Foot of our having elected him King. For, as all the Privileges appertaining to our Privy Council is only to advise him, but not to club with him in an authoritative Power, so it appears by too many modern Precedents, that few of those that are Members there, have the Integrity and Fortitude to contradict him in what he has a mind to publish; and that his Pleasure is sufficient Reason with most of them to concur, and with others not to be so rude and unmannerly as to oppose him, but silently to acquiesce. And should some be so bold as at any time to express their Dissent, the most Part have that Dependence upon him, in respect of Pensions, Offices, and other gainful Places, that he is always sure to have the Majority of the Board to join with him in what he would have done: So that whensoever the Dutch do emit what Edicts they please, in Subserviency to the Interest of their Provinces, preclusive of any Confederation of these Kingdoms, and to their sensible Prejudice, our Monarch, by his Interest in, and Oath and Obligation unto, them, as their Stadtholder, must not only approve, as well as connive, at what is prejudicial to Great Britain and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging; but must concur and co-operate in the Execution of what their High and Mightinesses have thought fit to ordain: To which, should I under this Head subjoin, how that while the States of the United Netherlands, do retain fully and wholly in themselves, the Right of making Peace and War; the Jurisdiction of constituting Ministers to foreign Princes and States; the Power of repealing old, and the enacting new Laws, &c. and this, exclusively of the Prince of Orange's having the least authoritative Concernment in any of their Matters, at the same time, this Gentleman hath, under the Notion and Quality of being our King, not only a Negative upon all parliamentary Bills, but the sole Power of nominating and appointing Ambassadors and Envoys, &c. and the whole Right and Jurisdiction of making War or Peace: On which respective Differences of his Power there and here, should I insist and enlarge, answerable to the Weight and Merit of those Particulars, it might be made appear what vast Advantages the Dutch have of and over us upon all these Accounts; and how they became thence furnish'd with Means of ruining, as well as of weakening and supplanting us in all wherein we are interested, either at home or abroad. Not that I would have the forementioned Prerogatives, which by our Constitution and Laws, stand vested in our Monarchs, withdrawn and pillag'd from the Crown. Seeing not only without them our Supreme Rulers would immediately cease to be Kings, and be reduc'd to no better Condition than that of Doges of Venice; but because it is necessary for the Good and Safety of the Subjects, as well as for the Strength and Glory of the Government, that they should remain inseparably settled where they are. But all that I would insinuate is, that it is inconsistent with the Prosperity of these Nations to have one and the same Person allow'd and continu'd to be our King, and yet to remain at the same time Stadtholder of the Belgic Provinces: Nor do I need to enumerate, much less to demonstrate the many Prejudices and Mischiefs, which must unavoidably attend our being thus postur'd and stated, in that they not only lie obvious to Persons of the meanest Understanding, who give themselves Liberty to think; but, because we have already felt and experienc'd many of them in divers and repeated Instances: And therefore I shall only make this Reflection upon, and Deduction from, what hath been suggested, namely, that the Dutch and we being so differently circumstanc'd, by reason of the discrepant Relations which the Prince of Orange stands in to us and to them, there is an absolute and indispensable Necessity, that he renounce being their Stadtholder, or cease to be our King; it being impossible for him, with Justice and Equality, to discharge the Duties of both, to Nations whose Interests are so irreconcilable, as well as different, as ours and theirs are known to be. [Brief Account of some of the late Encroachments and Depredations of the Dutch, p. 13, 14.

he ſhould return the Compliments he had receiv'd from the States-General, the States of Holland, and the Council of State: Accordingly, two Days after his Triumphant Entry into the Hague, he made a ſeparate Viſit to all thoſe ſeveral Bodies; and in a ſet Speech gave the firſt of them to underſtand, "That the laſt time he had appear'd in the Aſſembly of their High Mightineſſes, he declar'd to them his Deſigns to paſs into England, with the Succours which they had lent him, to deliver that Kingdom from the Calamities that threaten'd it, of which he had felt a good Part himſelf: That God ſo miraculouſly bleſt his good Deſigns; that he had met with a Succeſs much more ſpeedy and fortunate than he could have expected: That the Britiſh Nations had offer'd him the Crown of the Three Kingdoms, which he had accepted, God was his Witneſs, not out of any extravagant Ambition, ſince Gold or Silver never yet could dazle his Eyes, but only to ſupport and maintain the Religion, the Tranquility, and Repoſe of thoſe Kingdoms, and that he might be the better enabled more powerfully to aſſiſt his Allies, and more particularly this State, againſt the Enterprizes of France: That he could have with'd he could have ſuccour'd them ſooner; but the Affairs and Troubles which fell out in Ireland, hinder'd his good Intentions till the preſent time: That the Affairs of Ireland, and thoſe of his other Kingdoms, being now in a better Condition, he was come into theſe Provinces, not only to conſer with the Confederates about the Affairs of the next Campaign, but alſo to perform the Duties of his Charge, as Captain-General of theſe Provinces: That from his tender Youth he had always had a ſincere Love and Affection for this State; and that if it were poſſible for that Affection to be augmented, it certainly would have been ſo by the real Marks and Teſtimonies of Love, which he had obſerv'd, both in the States, and among the People; but that his Love was ſo great, that it would not admit of an Increaſe: That he would ſtill preſerve the ſame, and ſacrifice all that he had in the World for the good of this State, without ſparing either his own Body or his own Life: That he hop'd God would make uſe of him as an Inſtrument to divert the Danger that threaten'd this State; to eſtabliſh the Repoſe of Europe, and to ſettle the United Provinces in perfect Security: That he ſhould die well ſatisfy'd, if he could but compaſs this Deſign of his; and that he once more recommended himſelf to the Good-will and Favour of their High Mightineſſes."

King's Speech to the States General. [State of Europe for Feb. 1691.]

The Reader who compares this Speech with thoſe made by his Majeſty from the Throne of England, will make his own Inferences; and in the mean time, it is fit that we proceed to ſay, That the Preſident return'd his Majeſty Thanks, in the Name of the States, for the Honour he had done them to be preſent in their Aſſembly: He declar'd their extraordinary Joy for his happy Arrival in theſe Provinces; and their Acknowledgments of his Majeſty's Care, Zeal, and Affection for this State, ſo generouſly teſtify'd, by expoſing his Perſon to a thouſand Dangers for their Preſervation: That their High Mightineſſes would endeavour, to their utmoſt, to acknowledge the Benefits receiv'd from his Majeſty: That they ardently wiſh'd, that God would pour down upon his Sacred Perſon, and his Deſigns, all manner of Bleſſings: And that their High Mightineſſes would concur to the utmoſt of their Power with his Majeſty, to procure the Public Good, and his own particular Satisfaction."

Of the Princes and Miniſters who attended his Majeſty at the Congreſs, almoſt all Authors affect to give a long and pompous Liſt, in Imitation, perhaps, of the Tricks of the Stage; where it is uſual to form a Court, or a Train, of Scenemen, or other Rabble, to raiſe a higher Idea in the Audience of the Hero, preſented before them. It ſhall ſuffice, therefore, in this Place to ſay, that the principal Perſons of the Drama after his Majeſty, were the Electors of Brandenburgh and Bavaria, the Landgrave of Heſſe, the Princes of the Houſe of Lunenburgh, the Princes of Wirtemberg, the Landgrave of Heſſe-Darmſtadt, the Duke of Holſtein, the Duke of Courland, the Prince Palatine of Berkenfeldt, the Landgrave of Homburg, the Duke of Saxe-Eyſenech, the Princes of Anſpach, the Marquis de Gaſtanaga, and the ſeveral Miniſters of all the Princes of the Confederacy.

His Majeſty preſided; and open'd the Conference with a Speech, to the following Effect: "That the imminent Dangers they found themſelves in, ſufficiently diſcover'd the Errors which had been already committed, ſo that he needed not uſe any Arguments to ſhew them the Neceſſity of taking more juſt and ſolid Meaſures: That in the Circumſtances they were in, it was not a time to deliberate, but act: That the Enemy was Maſter of all the Chief Fortreſſes which were the Barrier of the Common Liberty; and that he would quickly poſſeſs himſelf of the reſt, if a Spirit of Diviſion, Slowneſs, and particular Intereſt continu'd among them: That every one ought to remain perſuaded, that their reſpective and particular Intereſts were comprized in the general one: That the Enemies Forces were very ſtrong, and that they would carry things like a Torrent before them: That it was in vain to oppoſe Complaints and fruitleſs Clamours, or unprofitable Proteſtations againſt Unjuſtice: That it was neither the Reſolution of a Barren Diet, nor the airy Hopes of ſanguine Men, plac'd on frivolous Foundations, but Soldiers, ſtrong Armies, and a prompt, ſincere Union among all the Forces of the Allies that muſt do the Work; and that theſe too muſt be brought to oppoſe the Enemy without any Delay, if they would put a ſtop to his Conqueſts, and ſnatch out of his Hands the Liberty of Europe, which he held already under a heavy Yoke. Concluding, That, as for himſelf, he would never ſpare his Credit, Forces, nor Perſon, to concur with them in ſo juſt and neceſſary a Deſign; and that he would come in the Spring at the Head of the Troops, faithfully to make good his Royal Word which he had ſo ſolemnly engag'd to them."

His Majeſty's Speech to the Congreſs.

Before

A.D.1690-91 Before we enlarge on the Fruits of this Speech, we muſt have recourſe to the Hiſtorian of his own Times, who ſays, "The Princes ſhew'd to the King all the Reſpect that any of their Rank ever paid to any Crown'd Head:" And yet adds, "They liv'd together in ſuch an eaſy Freedom, that Points of Ceremony occaſion'd no Diſputes among them; tho' thoſe are often, upon leſs ſolemn Interviews, the Subjects of much Quarreling, and interrupt more important Debates." Again, his Lordſhip farther ſays, "He (the King) ſoon ſettled ſome Points at which the States had ſtuck long; and they erected the Funds for that Year:" As alſo, "The (l) Duke of Savoy's Affairs were then very low; but the King took care of him, and both furniſh'd, as well as procur'd, him ſuch Supplies, that his Affairs had quickly a more promiſing Face." "Things were concerted (nevertheleſs continues his Lordſhip) among the Princes themſelves, and were kept ſo ſecret, that they did not truſt them to their Miniſters; at leaſt, the King did not communicate them to the Earl of Nottingham, as he proteſted ſolemnly to me, when he came back." But if the King did not act by, or with, his Miniſters on this great Occaſion, he acted ſo as never King of England did before, nor ought to do again: For, according to the very Elements of the Conſtitution, he can do nothing without their Concurrence; and all his Acts and Orders are to be counterſign'd by them in their ſeveral Provinces, becauſe they are anſwerable to the Public for their Contents. It may, however, be ſuppos'd, that the Earl of Nottingham gave this Anſwer to the Biſhop, to evade the Attacks of his Curioſity; or elſe, which is more probable, that it is a Stroke of the Biſhop's own Art, to evade a Charge brought by the Jacobites againſt his Hero; namely, That he, who had ſo often and ſo ſolemnly proteſted, That his Expedition to England was only for the ſake of preſerving the Nation from the double Yoke of Popery and Slavery, now publickly join'd in as ſolemn a Proteſtation to God, to deliberate nothing in that Aſſembly but what was very juſt and equitable; as alſo, never to make Peace with Lewis XIV. till he had, in the firſt Place, made Repa-ration to the Holy See, for whatſoever he had acted againſt it, and till he had annull'd and made void all thoſe infamous Proceedings A.D.1690-91 which he had authoriz'd againſt the HOLY FATHER, Innocent XI.

[Caveat againſt the Whigs, part iii. p. 59.]

This Charge is taken from a Declaration, which was drawn up in the Names of all the Powers concern'd in the Congreſs, and which, however extraordinary, deſerves to much the greater Credit, ſince we no where meet with any Attempt to explode it, viz. "Since we look upon the Union that is between us, as the Work of God alone, it is but reaſonable that we ſhould make a ſolemn Proteſtation to him, to deliberate nothing in this Aſſembly, but what may be very juſt and equitable. We ſolemnly proteſt before God, that our Intentions are, that we will never break off this Union, nor make any Peace with Lewis XIV. till the following Articles be executed; to the Execution of which we oblige ourſelves for ever.

Preliminaries agreed upon by the Confederates.

I. Till he has made Reparation to the Holy See for whatſoever he has acted againſt it; and till he has annull'd and made void all thoſe infamous Proceedings againſt the Holy Father Innocent XI.

II. Till he has reſtor'd to each Party concern'd what he has taken ſince the Peace of Munſter; and till he has demoliſh'd Briſac, and deliver'd up the Country of Cray to the Canton of Bern.

III. Till he has reſtor'd to the Proteſtants all their Poſſeſſions and Goods; and till there be an entire Liberty of Conſcience through-out the whole Extent of the French Dominions.

IV. Till the Eſtates of the Kingdom be re-eſtabliſh'd in their ancient Liberties, ſo that the Clergy, the Nobility, and the Third Eſtate, may enjoy their ancient and lawful Privileges; and till the King, for the future, ſhall be oblig'd to call together the ſaid Eſtates, when they deſire any Supply, without the Conſent of whom they ſhall not raiſe any Money, after any manner, or for any Pretence whatſoever.

V. Till the Tax upon Salt, that upon the Third Eſtate, and an infinite Number of other unreaſonable Taxes and Impoſitions, be aboliſh'd for ever.

VI. Till he has reſtor'd to the Parliaments their ancient and rightful Authority; that ſo they may be enabled to diſtribute to every one Juſtice freely, and without Conſtraint, according to their Conſciences.

VII.

(l) His Royal Highneſs had ſent the Count de la Tour, his Envoy Extraordinary to the King, in the preceding November; who, at his firſt public Audience, made the following Harangue to his Majeſty, which, ſalſome as it was, was afterwards inſerted in the London Gazette:

"S. I. R,

"His Royal Highneſs, my Maſter, does by me congratulate your Sacred Majeſty's glorious Acceſſion to the Crown: It was due to your Birth, and deſerv'd by your Virtue, and is maintain'd by your Valour. Providence had deſign'd it for your Sacred Head, for the Accompliſhment of its eternal Decrees, which, after a long Patience, do always tend to raiſe up Choſen Souls to repreſs Violence, and protect Juſtice. The wonderful Beginnings of your Reign are moſt certain Preſages of the Bleſſings which Heaven prepares for the Uprightneſs of your Intentions, which have no other Scope than to reſtore this flouriſhing Kingdom to its firſt Greatneſs, and break the Chains which Europe groans under. This magnanimous Deſign, worthy of the Hero of our Age, fill'd his Royal Highneſs with inexpreſſible Joy; but he was conſtrain'd to conceal it in the Secret of his Heart; and, if at laſt he has been free to own it, he is oblig'd to the very Name of your Majeſty for it, ſince that alone has made him conceive ſome Hopes of Liberty, after ſo many Years of Servitude.

My Words, and the Treaty which I have ſign'd at the Hague with your Majeſty's Miniſters, do but faintly expreſs the Paſſion which my Maſter has to unite himſelf by the moſt inviolable Ties to your Service. The Honour, Sir, which he has to be related to you, has tied the firſt Knots of this Union; the infinite Reſpect which he has for your Sacred Perſon, has, as it were, knit them cloſer, and the generous Protection which you are pleas'd to grant him, will, without doubt, make them indiſſoluble. Theſe are the ſincere Sentiments of his Royal Highneſs, to which I dare not add any thing of mine; for, how ardent ſoever my Zeal may be, and how profound the Veneration which I bear to your glorious Atchievements, I think I cannot better expreſs either, than by a Silence full of Admiration.

A.D. 1690-91 VII. Till all the Towns of the Kingdom be re-eſtabliſh'd in their ancient Privileges, and till their Revenues be reſtor'd, which had been taken from them with ſuch Violence and Injuſtice.

"God, who knows the Intention of our Hearts, knows, that we bear no Hatred againſt the French Nation; and that we do not aſpire to have the lawful Dominions of the Kingdom of France. And if all thoſe, who are Inhabitants, would join with us, we ſhould ſoon diſpatch this Affair without Effuſion of Blood, and without Deſolation of the Kingdom. And we promiſe all thoſe that ſhall do it, that we will treat with them as our particular Friends, and preſerve their Towns and Poſſeſſions, as if they were our own. And as for thoſe that ſhall not do it, we ſhall look upon them as Perſons that have approv'd and abetted all theſe Perſecutions, Burnings, and other Devaſtations that have been made; and we will make them feel, without Mercy, thoſe Pains and Torments which they have been the Occaſion, that ſo many poor People have ſuffer'd.

We are willing that the whole World ſhould have a perfect Knowledge of our Reſolutions, particularly, the French Gentlemen and Perſons of Honour, who are oppreſs'd with the heavy Load of the Government, and can no longer endure the Slavery which they lie under, to the end they may be able to take ſuch Meaſures as may be aſſiſtant to us, in recovering for them their ancient Liberty, which has been ſo cruelly and ſo unjuſtly taken from them."

It was ſet alſo forth in the London Gazette, that the confederated Powers came to a Reſolution, to employ two hundred and twenty thouſand Men againſt France, in the enſuing Campaign, which were to be furniſh'd after the following Proportions; namely, the Emperor, Spain, and England, twenty thouſand Men a-piece; the States-General thirty-five thouſand; Savoy and Milan, eighteen thouſand; Brandenburg, twenty thouſand; Bavaria, eighteen thouſand; Saxony, twelve thouſand; the Palatinate, four thouſand; Heſſe, eight thouſand; Suabia and Franconia, ten thouſand; Wirtemberg, ſix thouſand, Liege, ſix thouſand; Munſter, ſeven thouſand; and the Princes of Lunenburg, ſixteen thouſand.

And with this general Account, we muſt remain ſatisfy'd; for as to the Plan which theſe Troops were to put in Execution, the Place where, and the time when, they were to take the field, as alſo, at what Rate, and by whom, the Mercenaries among them were to be paid, and upon what Principle the Spoils were to be divided, we are left in the Dark, and can be inform'd only by Events. It is true, we find it ſuggeſted, That the great Point reſolv'd on, was to adopt the Conduct which France had hitherto obſerv'd, that is to ſay, to be firſt in the Field, and to carry the War into the Enemy's Country, which was to be done on all Sides at once; by the Duke of Savoy in the Dauphinate, by the Imperialiſts in Alſace, by the Spaniards in Catalonia, by the Combin'd Army in Flanders, and by the combin'd Fleet on the French Coaſts: But as theſe Suggeſtions are not ſufficiently authoriz'd, they are not wholly to be depended upon. A.D. 1690-91

What, however, redounded infinitely to the Honour of the French Court, and manifeſted above all things the ſuperior Genius of the French Monarchy, was, that, at this very time, while the Dutch, at leaſt the Orange Party among them, were almoſt beſides themſelves with Pride and Pleaſure, at ſeeing their Stadtholder ſet forth in all the Trappings of the Britiſh Monarchy, honour'd by ſo many Princes, and conſider'd on all hands, as the Saviour and Avenger of Europe, the French Forces took the Field, and inveſted Mons.

His Majeſty of England, with all his Circumſpection, was ſo little aware of any ſuch Enterprize, ſo early in the Year, that he had retir'd from the Hague to Loo, accompany'd by the Duke of Zell, and ſeveral of his own Nobility: But ſcarce was he arriv'd there, before Courier upon Courier brought him Advice, that the French Troops were on Motion on every Side; that their Preparations of all ſorts were ſuch, as argu'd, that they had ſome very important Deſign in hand, and finally, That the Storm was fallen upon Mons. Mons beſieg'd by the French King in Perſon.

It was the 15th of March, N. S. when their Cavalry appear'd before it; in ſix Days more, the moſt Chriſtian King in Perſon, accompany'd by the Dauphin, the Dukes of Orleans, Chartres, and Bourbon, and great Numbers of his principal Nobility, came into the Field: On the Morrow the Trenches were open'd; and from the Moment the Ground was firſt broke, the Siege, and every Circumſtance relating to it, was carry'd on, with as much Conduct and Vigour as it was undertook.

The Garriſon was computed at about ſeven thouſand Men, but did not amount to above five thouſand Effectives; whereas, the Place was ſo large, and the Works ſo many, that fourteen thouſand were ſcarce ſufficient to maintain it, againſt the Force which was brought againſt it. Some alledg'd, that theſe five thouſand were but the ordinary Garriſon, and that when the Army were diſtributed into their Winter-Quarters, not one additional Corps was directed thither: But others account for this by ſaying, That the Burghers would admit no more, and that they took upon themſelves to be anſwerable for the Security of the Place.

However this may be, his Britannic Majeſty, who knew, that every thing was to be apprehended, when the moſt Chriſtian King took the Field in Perſon, quitted his Retirement on the 21ſt, and order'd Prince Waldeck to repair immediately to Hall in the Neighbourhood of Bruſſels, which was the Place appointed for the general Rendezvous, and, in concert with the Marquis de Gaſtanaga, to aſſemble the Army with all poſſible Diſpatch; as alſo to make all the neceſſary Preparations for putting it in Motion. He, moreover, ſent Couriers to the Elector of Brandenburg, and the reſt of the German Princes, to quicken the March of their Troops, while Mr. Opdam did

A.D. 1690-91 did the ſame by the Biſhop of Munſter; and from all theſe Appearances it was univerſally concluded, that his Intentions were to riſque a Battle, in order to raiſe the Siege.

The Prince de Berghes had the Command in Mons, and made his Diſpoſitions like a Man that was reſolv'd to hold out to the laſt Extremity. The French, on the other hand, were Maſters of their Trade, and proceeded in ſuch a manner as ſhew'd they were ſo. The weakeſt Part of the City was cover'd with Moraſſes, and a little River. In order, therefore, to make their Approaches on that Side, they apply'd themſelves to turn that River, and drain thoſe Moraſſes, which, by Degrees, they effected. Hearing alſo, that the Allies were repairing on all Sides to Hall, the moſt Chriſtian King appointed a Body of Troops under Mr. de Luxemburgh, to obſerve their Motions, and made yet other Draughts of freſh Men out of his Gariſons, that he might be able both to give them Battle, in caſe they ventur'd to attack him, and alſo to continue the Siege. On the 26th they began to play on the City with a Battery of twenty-five Pieces of great Cannon; and, as the beſt way to diſpoſe the Burghers and Eccleſiaſtics to a Submiſſion, employ'd twenty-five Mortars, in ruining their Houſes and Churches, which was perform'd with great Succeſs. On the firſt of April the Moat being fill'd up, and a ſufficient Breach made in the Horn-work, Orders were given for an Aſſault, which was obey'd with great Spirit and Reſolution; but without Succeſs; for ſo valiantly did the Beſieged defend themſelves, that they repuls'd the Enemy three times, with great Slaughter, and, upon the Iſſue, remain'd in Poſſeſſion of the Poſt. It was not, however, in their Power to maintain it long; for, being the next Day attack'd by eight Companies of Grenadiers, a hundred and fifty of the Muſketiers, and the whole Regiment of Swiſs Guards, after a deſperate Reſiſtance, which was fatal to Numbers of brave Men on both Sides, they were overpower'd, and the Beſiegers gain'd their Point. Still, however, there was a great Variety of Works to be ſurmounted, and the Governor and his Gariſon were as reſolute as ever to maintain them all; in full Perſuaſion, that their Deliverer was at hand, and that he wanted nothing but time to bring them Relief.

King William's Efforts to raiſe the Siege fruitleſs.

His Majeſty had remov'd from the Hague to Breda on the 20th of March, from thence to Vilvoorden on the firſt of April; and on the 26th arriv'd at Hall; where he found an Army of between forty and fifty thouſand Men aſſembled, with a Train of ſixty Pieces of Cannon, and twelve Mortars; but, as we are told, ſo utterly unprovided for a March, that they had not even the neceſſary Carriages: Here, therefore, he was oblig'd to wait, within hearing of the French Guns, till he was furniſh'd with thoſe Neceſſaries; and the next Morning after his Arrival, a large Detachment of the French Houſhold Troops, Cavalry, and Dragoons, with a Body of Grenadiers mounted behind them, came in Sight, under the Command of Mr. de Luxemburgh; and, having taken a Survey of the Camp, returnd without Moleſtation. A.D. 1690-91

The Beſiegers, in the mean while, redoubled their Efforts, for fear of being interrupted: But tho' they had on the fifth open'd a conſiderable Breach in one of the Half-Moons, and had fill'd up the Moat underneath it, they ſuffer'd the ſixth, ſeventh, and a great Part of the eighth, to elapſe, without making any Diſpoſition for an Aſſault; the Reaſon of which, we ſhall find in what follows:

It has been already obſerv'd, that the Burghers were in Arms, as well as the Gariſon, and co-operated in the Defence of the Place: But the Trade of War was what they had not been us'd to; neither could they, like the Soldiers, look on the Ruins of their City with Indifference; and they had, beſides, entertain'd a Notion, by the Suggeſtions of their Prieſts, that they ſhould loſe nothing by changing Maſters: Inſtead, therefore, of making good their Engagements to defend the Place to the laſt, they call'd upon the Governor to beat a Parley, and capitulate on the beſt Terms he could get; and upon his refuſing to comply with their Demand, threatened to open their Gates, and deliver up both him and his Gariſon to the Diſcretion of the Beſiegers; which, as they were the moſt numerous, it was eaſy for them to do. In vain, both he, and his principal Officers endeavour'd to bring them to Reaſon: They would hear of nothing but an immediate Surrender; and, in all Conteſts of this nature, thoſe who cannot give the Law, muſt take it. Accordingly on the eighth, about four in the Afternoon, he beat a Parley; Hoſtages were immediately exchang'd; at Midnight the Articles was ſign'd; the next Day one of the Gates was deliver'd up to the Beſiegers; and on the tenth the Governor, with the Remains of his Gariſon, which was reduc'd to two thouſand four hundred private Men, and two hundred and eighty Officers, march'd out with all the Honours of War. The Place ſurrender'd.

And now his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, having ſhewn his Contempt of the Hague Congreſs, and all that he had to apprehend from it, by this Maſter-ſtroke, and having given his Orders to provide for the Security of his new Acquiſitions, by levelling all his own Lines, and repairing all the Works which had been damag'd in the Siege, return'd in Triumph to Verſailles; where he ſoon after caus'd a Medal to be ſtruck on this remarkable Occaſion, repreſenting a Town inveſted, and an Army looking on, with the following explanatory Inſcription, Amat Victoria Teſtes; while, on the other hand, the following Article was inſerted in the London Gazette: "The King reſolv'd to have march'd laſt Friday, had he not been diſappointed of his Carriages; and could the Place have held out a Day or two longer, we ſhould have been very near them, and made a great Effort for their Relief." A Medal ſtruck by the French in Remembrance of the Exploit.

What is yet more remarkable, on the very Day that Mons capitulated, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty receiv'd an Expreſs from Mr. Catinat, The French Succeſſes in Piedmont.

nat, which gave him an Account, that his Arms were as ſucceſsful on the Borders of Italy, as in Flanders: for, after the reducing of Villa Franca, and the Forts of St. Auſpice, and Montalban, that General ſet down before the City of Nice; the Magiſtrates of which, being unwilling to ſuffer a Bombardment, made their Submiſſion, and agreed on a certain Hour, and upon certain Signals, to admit a Detachment of French. The Treaty was manag'd with Privacy, and was to be put in Execution under theſe Precautions, becauſe the Caſtle was a ſtrong Place, well garriſon'd, and the Governor of it was reſolv'd to do his Duty. The Secret, however, took Air; he got Notice of it, and endeavour'd to defeat the Purpoſe of the Citizens, by pouring his Soldiers among them to ſecure the Gates: But they having already taken their Meaſures, had recourſe to their Arms, drove out the Governor's Party, and gave the French Poſſeſſion, according to their Agreement. This was the 26th of March, N. S. and early on the Morrow the Cannon of the Caſtle were turn'd upon the City, and kept playing all Day long againſt the Magazine, and againſt the Houſes of thoſe who were the Ring-leaders in the Revolt, tho' the French had threaten'd to give no Quarter to the Garriſon, in caſe they did not give over. On the 28th and 29th the Beſiegers carry'd on three ſeveral Attacks, with great Vigour, tho' without any extraordinary Succeſs, becauſe of the Badneſs of the Ground: But on the 30th, having brought three Bombs to play upon the Magazines, the Powder took fire, and, in a Moment, laid a great Part of the Caſtle in Ruins, and deſtroy'd above three hundred of the Garriſon. On the 31ſt, their Magazine of Bombs and Granades met with the like Fate; and, after two ſuch terrible Misfortunes, ſo cloſe on the Heels of each other, the Governor thought it high time to capitulate; and, notwithſtanding the Menaces of the French at the opening of the Siege, having obtain'd his own Terms, march'd out of the Place on the fourth of April, and was conducted to Oneglia, at the Charges of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty.

Satisfy'd with the Acquiſition of Mons, the French Army in Flanders diſpers'd themſelves into Quarters of Refreſhment; upon which the Allies, either for want of a Scheme to act upon, or the Requiſites to enter upon Action, did the ſame: And as King Lewis was return'd to Paris, King William return'd to the Hague; where, having with his own Royal Hands, as it is phras'd in the London Gazette, beſtow'd the Garter on his Friend the Duke of Zell (who had not only engag'd to aſſiſt in the Common Cauſe with all his Forces, but alſo to induce his Brother the Duke of Hanover, who was now again grown refractory, to do the ſame) on the 22d, N.S. he embark'd for London, with ſo fair a Wind, that he arriv'd at (m) Whitehall the next Evening; having been convoy'd by Part of the Dutch Fleet appointed for the Summer-Service, and having been ſaluted by that of England, which he found at the Buoy of the Nore, completely fitted, full man'd, and ready to put to Sea.

And now the great Buſineſs before his Majeſty, was to exert his Supremacy, in re-edifying the Church, after the Model of the State. According to the Act for altering the Oaths, the Nonjuring Biſhops had been long in a State of Deprivation, and their Sees were actually vacant: All, therefore, that was to be done, was to find proper Perſons to fill them; and who theſe proper Perſons were, we find declar'd in the Gazette of April 27, namely, Dr. Tillotſon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Breveridge, Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Fowler, Biſhop of Glouceſter, Dr. Cumberland, Biſhop of Peterborough, Dr. Moore, Biſhop of Norwich, and Dr. Grove, Biſhop of Chicheſter, in the Room of Dr. Patrick, who was tranſlated to the Dioceſe of Ely. By a ſecond Liſt, it alſo appear'd that Dr. Sherlock's Converſion was rewarded with the Deanery of St. Paul's; that Dr. Comber was advanc'd to the Deanery of Durham, Mr. Talbot to that of Worceſter, and Dr. Woodward to that of Sarum. But how theſe Liſts were ſettled, or with what Temper the Depriv'd bore their Misfortune, Hiſtory does not over clearly ſpecify.

and fills up the vacant Biſhopricks.

Biſhop Burnet, indeed (forgetful of the Merit which he has before aſcrib'd to the King, for ſuffering the depriv'd Biſhops to continue above a Year in their Sees) ſuggeſts, that Dr. Tillotſon had been preſs'd by both their Majeſties during that whole Interval, to accept of the Archbiſhopric; that he had ſtruggled againſt it with great Earneſtneſs, and that it was with great Uneaſineſs to himſelf, that he at laſt ſubmitted to the King's Command, becauſe he foreſaw what a Scene of Trouble and Slander he muſt enter upon, for his coming into the Room of one whom the Jacobites call'd a Confeſſor. His Lordſhip alſo adds, That it was viſible in all the Nominations made by the King in two Years: No Ambition nor Court-Faction appear'd; and that the Perſons ſo nominated, were generally look'd on as the learneſt, the wiſeſt, and beſt Men that were in the Church: "Men, continues he, were not ſcrambling for Preferment, nor uſing Arts, nor employing Friends to ſet them forward; on the contrary, Men were ſought for, and brought out of their Retirements, and moſt of them very much againſt their own Inclinations: They were Men both of moderate Principles, and of calm Tempers. This great Promotion was ſuch a Diſcovery of the King and Queen's Deſigns, with relation to the Church, that it ſerv'd much to remove the Jealouſies that ſome other Steps the King had made, were beginning to raiſe in the Whigs, and very much ſoften'd the ill Humour that was ſpreading Obſervations in Biſhop Burnet's Account of that Matter.

(m) Which he found almoſt in Ruins, occaſion'd by a great Fire which had broke out four Days before; and which was occaſion'd by the Negligence of a Maid-Servant, who, to ſave herſelf the Trouble of cutting a ſingle Candle from a whole String, burn'd it off, and left the Cotton of the reſt in a Flame.

A.D.1690-91 spreading among them." But then, except in the particular Case of Dr. Tillotson, he does not even insinuate from whence this Disinclination to Preferment arose; nor does he once mention that Dr. Beveridge, after his Name was inserted in the Gazette, refus'd the Mitre that was offer'd him, nor that he receiv'd a gentle Rebuke for it in a printed Paper of Dr. Stillingfleet's, still extant in the State Tracts, and that Dr. Kidder was, at some Distance of time, nominated in his stead. His Omissions, are, however, in Part, supply'd in the following Passage, which is to be found in a printed Letter to Dr. Sharp, made Archbishop of York some time after the filling the vacant Sees, under the Title of, An Apology for the new Separation, viz. "I appeal to your worthy Successor in St. Giles's Parish, if one of the new Bishops was not in a very disturb'd, uneasy Paroxism of Spirits about accepting his Bishopric, and whether in a great Heat of Passion, he was not ready to go to her Majesty, like Dr. B. to desire to be excus'd? None of the depriv'd Bishops parted with their Bishopries with half that Reluctancy, that some of the Acceptors took them: The Episcopal Seals were bespoke and unbespoke; and, at last, after many Agonies and Fluctuations, finally bespoke again. But the Depriv'd are calm and smooth and uniform within; their Hearts are fix'd on God and their good Principles; they are as free from bitter Zeal, as from Shame and Remorse; and if you do not envy the Felicity of their Deprivations, I dare say they do not envy you their Revenues, and think you no Reproach to them, if you do not think them so to you."

It ought to be remember'd, that these are the Words of a profess'd Apologist; and no Proof more convincing can be given either of the Consciousness of the Preferr'd, or the Resentment of the Depriv'd, than the long, perplex'd, and vehement Controversy which this Change gave rise to. The Latter, having still before their Eyes the splendid Appearance of the Great, which had countenanc'd them under the Persecution they met with in the late Reign, and the Shouts of the People for their Deliverance, still ringing in their Ears, could not tell how to think, that they should now fall, without the least Notice or Observance: And when Experience had made them sensible, that such indeed was the Case, that the popular Tide had taken another Channel, and that they were left to struggle by themselves through their own Shallows, they had recourse to the Press, and made use of all their Learning, and all their Abilities, to embark the Nation once more in their Quarrel; and if they could not re-establish themselves, at least to sink their Adversaries; while Those, on the other hand, together with their Allies, both in Church and State, thought it of Importance both to their Titles and their Possession, to have the last Word in the Dispute.

Controversies which this Event produc'd.

And now every Week, nay, almost every Day, produc'd, some new Pamphlet on one Side or the other. The Malcontents taught in general, That Christianity was a Doctrine of the Cross; that no Pretence of defending our Religion could justify a Rising against our Sovereign; that it was equally unlawful to have recourse to Arms in the Defence of Laws, Liberties, &c. that the Primitive Christians had legal Rights as well as we, and yet thought it their indispensible Duty to be passive under every Invasion of them; that their Practice was suitable to these Principles, even when they had the most reasonable Plea to justify a Departure from them; that, according to our own Constitution, and the Doctrine of our own Church, Resistance was unlawful; that the Pretence, that Acts against Law had no Authority, neither did, nor could, authorise Resistance: And lastly, that the Doctrine of Non-resistance, exploded as it had lately been, had all the Sanctions which could be deriv'd from the Laws of God and Man. A.D.1690-91

Thus every Article of their System, had a manifest Tendency to shew, That the new Settlement was unlawful, and, consequently, that they were Sufferers for Righteousness sake.

The conformable Divines, on the other hand, not only made it their Business to shew the Fallacy and Absurdity of these Doctrines, but to expose the principal Use that was design'd to be made of them: They collected all the Reasons, Arguments, and Authorities within the Reach of their Learning and Invention, in support of the common Rights of Mankind: They yet farther took upon them to demonstrate, that with regard to the Hypothesis of Non-resistance, and passive Obedience, it was no longer a Matter of Dispute; that if it was conclusive at all, it was as conclusive with regard to the present Government, as the former, because the Obedience requir'd by Scripture, was indiscriminate; according to the Text. "Let every Soul be subject to the Higher Powers; for there is no Power but of God: The Powers that be are ordained of God." And from the whole, they inferr'd, that the new Oaths ought to be taken without Scruple; that such as refus'd them, mistook Party for Conscience; that as there was no Ground for a new Separation, so it could produce nothing but Mischief, and that, therefore, those who set it on Foot would remain without Excuse.

The Separatists again branded these Doctrines by the Name of Latitudinarian, and urged to the Teachers, That it matter'd not to them, who, or what the King was, whether he was lawful or unlawful, real or titular, rightful or wrongful, provided he had Possession; and that if twenty different Kings should supplant one another, still they could transfer their Allegiance to the last, though they had never so solemnly recogniz'd and sworn Allegiance to his Predecessors, like the Spaniel who follow'd the Thief that had knock'd down his Master, and got upon his Horse.

When also they found that the new Settlement was not to be shook by their Paper-Batteries, nor the People to be made the Tools of a new Revolution, they had recourse to

A.D.1690-91 to another Subterfuge, which was, to aſſert their own Spiritual Rights and Powers againſt a lay Deprivation, and to make the ſame de jure and de facto-Diſtinctions, with reſpect to the Government of the Church, as they had before done in that of the State: The immediate Conſequence of which was, that their Adverſaries made the ſame uſe of it; and inſiſted, that all the Authority belong'd, and that Obedience only was due to the Poſſeſſor. Nay, they went farther ſtill; for Mr. Hody of Oxford, having made what he call'd a providential Diſcovery of an ancient Greek Manuſcript in the Bodleian Library, tending to prove, that, ſuppoſing a Biſhop depriv'd, without any Synod, by the Civil Power, was unjuſtly depriv'd, ſtill neither the Biſhop ſo depriv'd, nor the People, ought to ſeparate from the Communion of his Succeſſor, provided his Succeſſor was not a Heretic, not only ſet forth a Latin and Engliſh Tranſlation of it, but adopted it as an Authority. This enflam'd the Diſpute, inſtead of ending it: Seven different Anſwers were exhibited; in the firſt of which, it is call'd a ſurreptitious noiſome Piece, and a Farce of notorious Lies and Falſehoods; and Hody, by this time become a Doctor, put in one general Reply to them all, in which he rather ſtrove to maintain the Propoſition evinc'd in his Manuſcript, than to enter into a critical Diſſertation concerning the Manuſcript itſelf; but in all he ſaid, manifeſted the Reading of a Scholar, the (n) Candour of a Philoſopher, and the Manners of a Gentleman.

But Time and Neglect can only put an end to the Broils of Eccleſiaſtics; and it was but natural for thoſe that loſt their Livings to loſe their Patience too; and thus, when they found Arguments would not carry their Point, they had recourſe to Scandal and Invective: Tillotſon and all the new Biſhops were treated as Intruders; and no kind of Artifice was left untry'd to render them odious. A.D.1690-91

None lay ſo open as Sherlock, and none were treated with ſo much Bitterneſs. In the Beginning of the Broil he had been the Champion of the Party againſt all Comers; and now he was become as great an Undertaker on the other Side: They were provok'd at his Apoſtacy; they were more provok'd at the Profit he had made by it, as fearing it would encourage others to follow his Example. That, therefore, his Name might never be mention'd without Reproach, they ſet forth all the Particulars of his double Dealing, in the moſt glaring Colours, and more eſpecially, all that he had ſaid and done againſt the new Settlement, to ſhew what a worthleſs Proſelite they had made. They charg'd him, with lamenting the Paſſiveneſs of the Nation under the Invaſion of the Prince of Orange, and the Silence of the Clergy on this Occaſion; with ſaying, That the Revolution was the greateſt Scheme of Villany that ever was contriv'd; and again, That he could as ſoon turn Arian, as take the Oaths; with his inducing the Biſhop of Chicheſter to make the Death-bed Declaration, formerly inſerted; with going to a learn'd Gentleman on the eighth of April, 1689, to diſſuade him from being preſent at the Coronation of their Majeſties; and with telling him, That he had rather take twenty Oaths, than bear a Part in that Ceremony: And laſtly, they were at the Pains of giving a (o) Review of his whole Conduct, Sherlock's Apoſtacy expos'd.

(n) I conclude, ſays he in his Preface, in the Words of Droſius, which I here make my own: Scripſi hæc animo ſereno, non ledendi. Si laſſi quempiam, jam me pœnitet. Si offendi plus æquo, monitus libenter mutabo. Si erravi veſtans, monſtretur mihi error, non ero pertinax.

And again in the Cloſe of his Work, "I deſire to be pardon'd for offering my Advice: I can truly ſay of thoſe reverend Men (meaning the depriv'd Biſhops) what St. Cyprian does of Maximus and his Aſſociates, who were e'er-while Confeſſors, and afterwards engag'd in a Schiſm. I am extremely ſorry that I cannot communicate with thoſe whom I had begun to love. God grant that the Maximus and his Aſſociates, they that were lately our Confeſſors, may be again united to the Church. I cannot but grieve when I conſider thoſe Perſons in a Meeting Houſe, whom I ſo much lov'd and reverenc'd in the Tower."

(o) Of which the following is a remarkable Specimen:

"I ſhall not inſiſt on the Half-Sheet you publiſh'd at the ſitting down of the Convention, againſt making the Prince of Orange King; but only obſerve, that then you ſuppos'd the Throne to be full; and aſſerted, That the Eſtates then convened could not give him the Crown, becauſe it was not theirs to give. A little after this, you wrote the Anſwer to Dr. Burnet's Enquiry, which I mention'd before, in which you aſſert, in Oppoſition to the Doctor, That King James was a King, not by governing well, but by Birth-right, and could no more ceaſe to be King by governing ill, than a Traitor or a Rebel ceaſe to be a Subject. And this you prov'd from the paternal Relation of a Father, who never ceaſes to be a Father, how great a Tyrant ſoever he be. You alſo challeng'd the Doctor there, to ſhew you any Law of God, or our Country, which upon any Cauſe diſſolves our Allegiance, and aſſerted, That the Deſcent of the Crown muſt be governed by the Laws of the Land. I muſt here tell the Reader, that this Anſwer of yours was never publiſh'd, leſt he ſhould loſe his Labour in enquiring after it; for tho' it was printed, yet whether at Xantippe's (Mrs. Sherlock's) Inſtance, or any other Cauſe of fear, you ſuppreſs'd all the Copies but two, which happen'd to get abroad, and one of thoſe fell into my Hands. But about the Beginning of May, after you wrote a Diſcourſe for taking the Oaths, entitled, The Lawfulneſs of taking the new Oath of Allegiance to King William and Queen Mary, ſtated upon the ſtricteſt Principles of Church of England Loyalty; and after you had finiſh'd it, you ſent it, as I underſtand by a Letter from the Weſt to Dr. Bu—— (by which I underſtand Dr. Burnet) but that Diſcourſe plainly ſuppoſing the Government to be an Uſurpation, and that Non-reſiſtance was reſerv'd as a Duty to King James, from whom it could not be ſuſpended, it was not thought fit to be publiſh'd. This Book was ſeen and peruſ'd by many; particularly, two or three Clergymen at Tewkeſbridge in Auguſt following, ſaid they had read it: But to do you Juſtice, Doctor, before this, you did all you could to ſuppreſs it, becauſe it would not hold; but it was now too late to attempt the Suppreſſion of it, for Copies had got abroad into ſeveral Hands, and I have one of them at your Lady's ſervice, who, I ſuppoſe, was not againſt writing of it. Upon Conviction this Paper would not hold, then you grew very warm againſt the Oath; for in the latter End of June, or beginning of July, you affirm'd, That the taking of it was not only a recognizing, but making the Prince of Orange King (as yet then Providence had not made him ſo); adding, That though you could actually forbear aſſiſting King James, yet you could not ſwear never to aſſiſt him, that being not conſiſtent with an Acknowledgment of his Right; and that the more you thought of the Oath, the worſe you liked it, and would have nothing to do with it. Remember this, good Doctor, and then conſider if it doth not become a Man that ſaid and did ſuch things then, to rant and ſwagger againſt ſome among ourſelves now. It was now about this time that you were to the heighth of your Fervour againſt the Government and the Oaths, which diſcover'd itſelf by many Symptoms, upon ſeveral Occaſions. When you firſt heard the News of a Faſt, which, happen'd to be at your Houſe in the Temple, "How! a Faſt! ſaid you; I warrant you we ſhall have dainty Prayers." "Prayers, ſaid Dr. Sharp, that I am more afraid of than the Oaths. And what! muſt we have Sermon too? I'll give them a Sermon that they ſhall not thank me for." And accordingly you did ſo. Your Text, I remember, was, The Lord is a Man of War, the Lord of Hoſts

A. D. 1691. duct, and of making one Part of it a Satire on the other.

But the Rancour of theſe Malcontents was not levell'd at Individuals only; their great Purpoſe was to lay the Ax to the Root of the Government, and ſo to looſen the Connections between them and the People, as ſhould leave them expos'd to the firſt Bluſt of a new Revolution. In order to which, while the Divines were thus tilting at each other, the Politicians made it their Buſineſs to blacken every Meaſure of the Cabinet, to draw invidious Compariſons between this Reign and the laſt, and to put in Practice all the Arts of cultivating Diſaffection, which they had with ſo much Severity condemn'd when Power was on their Side, and when the Abuſe of that Power was the Charge brought againſt them. A. D. 1691.

Thoſe, on the other hand, who had help'd themſelves into the Saddle by theſe very Arts, appear'd to be ſo much the more alarm'd at them, as they were better acquainted with their Force and Efficacy; and, over and above the Encouragement which they gave to Anſwerers and Recriminators of all ſorts, Proclamation againſt Libels, &c.

ſet

Hoſe is his Name. And then you preach'd contrary point-blank to what you have ſince printed; and the Drift of your Diſcourſe was ſo plainly levell'd againſt the Government, and the Intention of the Day, that you gave great Offence to their Majeſties good Subjects, who fill'd the Town with Complaints againſt you; but you valued not that, but was pleas'd with it, delighting to give ſome among us an Account of what you had preach'd, and how you had met with them. About this time alſo you wrote a Diſcourſe againſt taking the Oaths, which you ſhew'd to a learned and reverend Divine on the 29th of July. I ſuppoſe it was your Letter to Dr. Williams, whoſe Anſwer to it you deſpiſed, as Stuff that did not deſerve a Reply; tho' one who ſaw it, ſaith you ſtole your Argument from Jaddus, and other things out of it, which you have put in your Caſe of Allegiance. In Auguſt out comes the firſt Part of the Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience, which you careſs'd into the World, and were ſo taken with it, that you went to a very learned Man, who ſince became your Antagoniſt, to pray him to write a Sheet of Concluſions, not againſt him, but againſt other Men, upon the Doctrines and Principles collected in it; and that he might not miſtake your Deſign, you left it in Writing with him, and he ſtill hath the Original in the following Words: "The Doctrine of Non-reſiſtance and Paſſive Obedience is founded on an irreſiſtable Authority: conſider then what are the Rights of an irreſiſtable Authority, and what the Duties of Paſſive Obedience. I. The Rights of ſovereign and irreſiſtible Authority are, that he cannot forfeit his Crown; that he cannot be judg'd or depos'd by his Subjects (and Abdication and Deſertion are but other Names for the) and therefore when once King, he is always ſo till death, or voluntary or legal Reſignation. II. Non-reſiſtance does not only ſignify not to fight againſt the King, but 1. That upon no Pretence we muſt renounce his Right. 2. We muſt never ſet his Crown upon another Head. III. We muſt not transfer our Allegiance to another." In this Month alſo died the Biſhop of Chicheſter, of everlaſting Memory, to whom a Perſon of Honour can teſtify, you never above four or five Days before he died, to move him to make his Declaration. About the ſame time you ſent a Paper to Oxford againſt taking the Oath; I have forgot the Title of it, but I remember a Paſſage in it to this Purpoſe, That as Uſurpers ſeize upon the Lands, and Houſes, and Fortifications of the King for their own Uſe, and to turn them to their own Service againſt Law; ſo againſt Law they ſeize upon the Laws themſelves, and uſe them againſt their firſt Intention to their own Service, and the Deſtruction of the King and his faithful Subjects, for whoſe Defence they were made. About the Beginning of September you wrote an Apology for the Non-ſwearers, which you deſign'd for your Maſterpiece; and in December following, a malicious Pamphlet coming out againſt the Biſhops, entitled, A Letter out of the Country, &c. you began an Anſwer to it in Defence of them; but having not too long where you write it, Mrs. Sherlock and Satan took you to task, and intreated ſo well, as to make you confeſs where you had been, and about what; and then it was no great Conqueſt to make you ſend for your Papers by ſix o'Clock next Morning, and offer them as an Holocauſt to atone her Deſpleaſure. In all this time that you were ſo warm and zealous againſt the Oaths, you help'd to diſperſe the few ſmall Pamphlets that were printed, againſt taking of it, and expreſs'd much Trouble, that others that were larger could not get abroad, particularly, you were very zealous for printing The Caſe of Allegiance to a King in Poſſeſſion, which you then thought an admirable Piece; and upon all Occaſions you were wont to expreſs your Affection and Duty to King James, and your Deſire for his Return, as by drinking to his Health and happy Reſtauration; and at other times, by ſending up ſeveral Ejaculations for it, and ſaying Amen if others did ſo. And, Sir, your own Memory and your Conſcience can inform you that theſe are Truths, and no Inventions; and how they agree with your Preface to your Caſe of Allegiance, and the Concluſion of your Vindication of it, let the Readers, and eſpecially the Lawyers, judge. In that Preface you tell us, That you had ſtuck in your former Opinion to this Day, had you not been reliev'd by Biſhop Oxford's Convocation-Book. But how did that relieve you? Or when did the pretended Doctrine in it begin to operate on your Underſtanding, and remove your former Difficulty? I am ſure that it was ſent you Sheet by Sheet from the Preſs, and had no Operation upon you at the firſt Reading; but happening to lye in the Bookſeller's Shop ſome time before it was publiſh'd, for want of the Preface, the News of it brought abundance of Clergymen, and others, to read it there, and ſome that had taken the Oaths, thinking theſe Paſſages made for them, they diſcover'd them, and form'd Arguments from them to juſtify their own Compliance, but you deſpiſed them for wreſting the Words of the Convocation, and uſed to obſerve upon that Occaſion, how Men would be glad of any Pretences, and catch at any Twigs to bear up themſelves againſt their own Conſciences. This was in December before you took the Oaths, and no body that I ever met with perceiv'd you to be of any other Opinion till after the Victory of the Boyne. For in that Interim you behav'd yourſelf among your Brethren, as you had done formerly, particularly, you ſhew'd Complacency enough at the Victory which the French had over us by Sea, in hopes it would haſten another Revolution; and accordingly, taking Horſe at a Gentleman's Door, who then thought you deſerv'd a better; you told him, that you now hop'd by Michaelmas to have a better Horſe. This was but a little while before the News of the Boyne-Victory came to Town, and then, Doctor, it was, that Biſhop Oxford's Book gave you greater Freedom and Liberty of thinking, then you firſt diſcover'd your new Notions, and Inclinations to your Brethren, then you thought it high time to emancipate yourſelf from your ſtupid Church-of-England-Loyalty, and the ſlaviſh Principles of it, the Rights of irreſiſtible Authority, and the Duties of Paſſive Obedience. All vaniſh'd then upon New Light; for Iperia appear'd to you upon the Banks of the Boyne, and inſpir'd you with new and freer Notions, and ſhew'd you in that glorious Scene, how your former Reaſonings contradicted the general Senſe of Mankind, and had no Foundation in Reaſon or Nature, and revealed unto you a divine and ſafer Principle upon which you might ſwear Allegiance, without the Imputation of Apoſtacy or renouncing the Doctrine of the Church of England, to Wilhelmus Naſſ. Aug. Scot. Hiber. &c. datus Auguſtus, and alſo ſwear it back again to King James, if ever he ſhould recover the Throne in a recuperative War. But to make out your Hypotheſis of a thorough Settlement the better, you were alſo willing to have Limerick taken before you took the Oath; and therefore you wrote to a Friend then at Dublin, to ſend you word as ſoon as that Town was taken, becauſe, as he knew, it concern'd you much to know it. But, Doctor, as you ſay of the Nature of things, that Town was pretty ſtubborn, and you were in haſte, and could not ſtay for the Surrender of it; but the new Settlement was ſufficient for your Purpoſe without it, or perhaps the R. R. Welch Prophet aſſur'd you, it would be taken, and that was enough to a willing and well diſpoſ'd Mind. And now, Doctor, upon a impartial Review of your former Principles and Practices, will you ſeriouſly tell me, did you not think yourſelf as wiſe and conſidering a Man before you took the Oaths as ſince? And could you well have borne it, if any Man had then dogmatically told you, that your Reaſonings were uncertain, and that your Opinion was contrary to the General Senſe of Mankind, or that it was rejected by the moſt ſober and conſidering Men? Alas! What ſhall we, inferior Mortals, and little Writers, do, thus to have Sherlock againſt Sherlock? Which of the two ſhall we believe? Sherlock ſaying, or Sherlock unſaying what he ſaid, and for what he ſuffer'd? Sherlock confeſſing, or Sherlock retracting his Confeſſion? Sherlock depriv'd, or Sherlock reſtor'd, and higher preferr'd? Sherlock baffling others, or Sherlock by others miſerably baffled? Sherlock with the Generality of Writers, or Sherlock againſt the Generality of them? Sherlock with the learned and venerable Writers of Authority, or Sherlock with a few little, fanatical Writers of no Authority? Sherlock ſaying and proving, or Sherlock barely ſaying and appealing, but not proving what he ſaith? [Vindication of ſome among our Divines, &c. p. 27, 28, 29, 30.

A. D. 1691. set forth a Proclamation, dated April the ninth, againſt Papiſts and other diſaffected Perſons; the firſt and laſt Paragraph of which were as follow:

"Whereas their Majeſties, as well by the regular and impartial Adminiſtration of Juſtice to all their Subjects, and their abundant Mercy and Grace to ſuch of them as have been liable to Penalties, as alſo by proſecuting a neceſſary War againſt France by Sea and Land (on the Succeſs of which the Common Safety of this Realm, and all other their Majeſties Kingdoms and Dominions doth depend) having manifeſted their Princely Care and Zeal for the Preſervation, Eaſe, and Welfare of all their Subjects, might juſtly expect ſuitable Returns of Loyalty and Obedience from every of them, nevertheleſs divers Papiſts and reputed Papiſts, and ſome other Perſons ill-affected to their Majeſties Government, and reſtleſs of Spirit, abuſing the Clemency which hath been uſed, have reſorted to, and aſſembled in, the Cities of London and Weſtminſter, and other Places, and taken great Boldneſs by ſeditious Diſcourſes and Libels, and with inſolent Behaviour, to defame and affront the Government; and alſo do conſult and proſe ute divers Miſchiefs and treaſonable Deſigns and Practices tending to the Diſturbance of the public Peace, and the Deſtruction of their Native Country: Their Majeſties, reſolving not to ſuffer ſuch notorious Contempts of the Laws to go unpuniſh'd, and to prevent the evil Conſequences of the ſame, have thought fit (with the Advice of their Privy Council) to iſſue their Royal Proclamation: And do hereby require and command all Lords Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Juſtices of the Peace, Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, and all other Officers and Magiſtrates whatſoever, That they be circumſpect and vigilant in their reſpective Charges and Juriſdictions, and perform their Duties in ſuppreſſing the Inſolence, Deſigns and Practices aforeſaid; and that from time to time they cauſe diligent Search and Inquiry to be made after the ſaid Offenders, and they being diſcover'd, cauſe to be proſecuted, and brought to Condign Puniſhment according to Law.

And their Majeſties do hereby charge, and particularly require all Deputy Lieutenants and Juſtices of the Peace, That they do meet monthly to enquire into, and inform themſelves of the Affairs of their reſpective Counties and Diviſions, in Relation to the Premiſſes, and take ſpecial Care to preſerve the Peace, and prevent all unlawful Aſſemblies againſt their Majeſties and their Government, and that from time to time they give Information of their Proceedings and Diſcoveries, to the Lords of their Majeſties moſt Honourable Privy Council."

The plain Engliſh of all which is, that thoſe who built their whole Syſtem on the Doctrine of Reſiſtance, would not connive at any thing which had the leaſt Tendency to encourage the Practice againſt themſelves; and, having aſſerted, that their own Adminiſtration was faultleſs, would not allow the Fact even to be call'd in queſtion: So that what was Patriotiſm before, was Sedition now; and the ſame Subjects were held puniſhable for libellous Diſcourſe and Behaviour, who were before invited to take up Arms, and to act as well as judge for themſelves: So much does Sentiment depend on Intereſt; and ſo little is Conſiſtency regarded by Politicians. A. D. 1691.

But to proceed,---- We have had a tranſient View of the Fleet at the Nore, completely mann'd, &c. and it remains to be told, That this great Point was not brought to bear without great Difficulty, and a very extraordinary Exertion of all the Powers of the State. A Bounty of ſix Weeks Pay was firſt offer'd by Proclamation to all able Voluntiers to be paid before they ſet ſail, as alſo Conduct-Money; and this proving ineffectual, a general Embargo was laid on all outward-bound Ships; Warrants to impreſs were iſſu'd out on all Sides; and all Mayors, Sheriffs, Juſtices, Conſtables, &c. were requir'd to ſearch for all Seamen that had abſconded, and to ſeize and ſecure ſuch as they could find: And all Perſons whatſoever were ſtrictly charg'd and commanded not to preſume to conceal any of the ſaid Seamen, or ſuch as might be ſuſpected to be Seamen, on pain of being forthwith committed to Priſon, and proſecuted with all Severity, according to Law, as Perſons conſpiring againſt their Majeſties, and the Safety of the Kingdom.---- So ran the Proclamation. And when a ſufficient Number of theſe miſerable, free-born Subjects, had been thus forc'd by their Fellow-Subjects into the public Service, three other Proclamations of a ſofter nature were ſet forth. During the Continuance of the Impreſs, the Coal Trade had been wholly at a ſtand, and the Price of that Commodity had been enhanc'd in Proportion to the Scarcity, and to the Demand, which the Severity of the Seaſon had very much increas'd: Many Branches of Trade were of courſe grievouſly affected: The Diſtreſſes of the Poor in general were redoubled, and even the Rich partook of the Common Calamity. To prevent the Coal Dealers from monopolizing and taking too great an Advantage of the Times, the Magiſtracy had interpos'd, with the Approbation, if not by the Direction, of the Government: But neither Power nor Prudence could ſubdue an Evil, which the neceſſary Conſumption of every Day made greater: And when this became apparent, the firſt of the three Proclamations was iſſu'd, importing, That their Majeſties, in tender Compaſſion and Care of their good Subjects, did thereby declare and command, that unleſs the Proportion of four Men to every hundred Tuns was exceeded, no Seamen, either Native or Foreigner, employ'd in the Coal Ships, ſhould be preſs'd, or otherwiſe hinder'd or moleſted, until the 20th of July next enſuing, provided they did not protract their Voyage, in order to raiſe the Price of Coals. Their Majeſties farther certify'd to the Public, That they had given effectual Orders for the providing ſufficient Convoys from time to time; and that ſuch Officers as ſhould any way miſbehave themſelves in that Service,

Service, should be punish'd according to their Demerits: And in the Close of all, were pleas'd to adopt and authorise the following dictatorial Expressions, viz. "And to the end, that all convenient Expedition may be used in discharging all Ships and Vessels, &c. we do require and command, that no such Ship or Vessel shall be above ten Days in unlading, the said Days to begin and be reckon'd from the time of coming in to the Pool or Place of unlading. And we do hereby strictly charge and command all our Officers, Ministers, and Subjects whatsoever, both by Sea and Land, that they take Notice of our Royal Will and Pleasure, publish'd in this our Proclamation, and give due Obedience thereunto at their Peril."

Two others for suspending the Press, and taking off the Embargo.

This was dated April 23; and on the 30th following, the two other Proclamations publish'd the glad Tidings, That the Navy was serv'd; that the Press-Warrants were recall'd, and that the Embargo was taken off. The Words relating to the Navy, are these: "His Majesty, in Consideration, that his Royal Fleet is provided and completely furnish'd with Seamen, doth, &c." Which deserve so much the more Notice, because we find it asserted, that it was but indifferently mann'd, and also, because of the Complaints which afterwards arose, concerning the Conduct of our Naval Affairs.

[Lives of the Admirals, vol. iii. p. 50.]

Russel succeeds Torrington in the chief Command at Sea. [See P. 47.

The Command in chief was given to Russel, who succeeded Lord Torrington as Admiral of the Red Squadron: And there is a Suggestion in his Lordship's Speech to the House of Commons, that he was put over his Head, before the Fight off of Beachy; whence his Lordship infers, that his pretended ill Conduct in that Battle, was not the true Cause of the Prosecution he incurr'd. Sir John Ashby and Mr. Rooke serv'd under Russel, as Vice and Rear Admirals: And the blue Squadron was commanded by Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel. According to the List annex'd to Russel's Instructions, the whole Fleet under his Command was to consist of five First Rates, eleven Second Rates, thirty-two Third Rates, and nine Fourth Rates; nineteen Fireships, six large Frigats, two Yachts, and four Hospital Ships; which mighty Force, was yet farther to be strengthened, according to the Dutch Lists, with forty-six Capital Ships, carrying 3000 Guns, and Men in Proportion.

Possibly, the setting this vast Body in Motion was one of the Royal Cares which took up his Majesty's Thoughts during his short Stay in England: But his Historian, Burnet, upon this Head only says, "That Russel had the Command of the Fleet, which was soon ready and well mann'd; that the Dutch came over in good time; and that the Proportion of the Quota settled between England and the States, was, that we were to furnish five, and they three, Ships of equal Rates and Strength." How the old Proportion of Ship for Ship, and Rate for Rate, as settled by Treaty in the Reign of King Charles II. came to be alter'd, or whether the new was honestly and punctually observ'd, he does not stay to inform us: And that they did not answer our Expectations in point of Time, is not only insinuated by Burchet, but proveable by the London Gazette, which specifies, as hath been already noted, that the English Fleet lay at the Nore, compleatly fitted and mann'd, April 13, when his Majesty pass'd by from Holland, as also, that Admiral Russel hoisted his Flag (on board the Britannia) May the fourth: That he set sail on the 14th for the Downs, having such of the Dutch Ships as had convoy'd the King with him: That in his way, he was join'd by Vice Admiral (p) Allemonde, the Dutch Commander in Chief, with four more: That he continu'd at the Downs from the 16th to the 21st, in Expectation of the rest: That being then join'd by nine more, and having waited yet another Day, he set sail for the Westward on the 23d, at which time, the Number of Dutch Ships of the Line under his Command, was no more than thirty-seven; which was nine short of their Complement.

A. D. 1691.

The same Author touches also, in the like cursory Manner, on the King's Measures in relation to Ireland; for, having said, "That he gave all necessary Orders for the Campaign in Ireland, in which Ginkle had the chief Command," he passes on to another Topic, without affording himself Leisure to throw in a Note of Admiration, that his Majesty should prefer a Countryman of his own, merely because he was so, to Lord Marlborough, who had so eminently distinguish'd himself, both at the Revolution, and by his late Services in that Kingdom. And it is certain, that whatever these necessary Orders were, while the Admirals Rooke and Delaval were making short Excursions from the Downs to Dunkirk, and the Coast of France, and back again, the French had an Opportunity to send a large Convoy of Provision, Cloaths, and Ammunition to Limerick, for the Use of the Irish; which arriv'd at that Place in Peace and Safety on the fourth of May, together with Mr. St. Ruth, and many other French Officers, with Commissions from King James, and such Instructions from King Lewis, as might best serve his own Ends, in maintaining the Irish War.

Scotish Affairs inaccurately stated by B. Burnet.

Concerning the Scotish Affairs, our Author is indeed more particular, but not more accurate; for he repeats what he had told us before, namely, "That many of the Lords who had been concern'd in the late Plot, meaning that of Montgomery, Payne, &c. came up and confess'd and discover'd all, and took out their Pardon." After which, he proceeds as follows: "They excus'd themselves, as apprehending that they were expos'd to Ruin; and that they dreaded the Tyranny

(p) The famous Trompe was to have had the Command, and the Dutch expected great things from him: But, instead of following him in Triumph, they follow'd him to his Grave, for, after a long Illness, he dy'd May 29. N. S.

A. D. 1691. Tyranny of Preſbytery no leſs than they did Popery: And they promis'd, that if the King would ſo balance Matters, that the Lord Melvill, and his Party, ſhould not have it in their Power to ruin them and their Friends; and, in particular, that they ſhould not turn out the Miniſters of the Epiſcopal Perſuaſion, who were yet in Office, nor force Preſbyterians on them, they would engage in the King's Intereſts faithfully and with Zeal: They alſo undertook to quiet the Highlanders, who ſtood out ſtill, and were robbing the Country in Parties: And they undertook to the King, that, if the Epiſcopal Clergy could be aſſur'd of his Protection, they would all acknowledge and ſerve him: They did not deſire, that the King ſhould make any Step toward the changing the Government, that was ſettled there; they only deſir'd, that Epiſcopal Miniſters might continue to ſerve in thoſe Places that liked them beſt; and that no Man ſhould be brought into Trouble for his Opinion as to the Government of the Church; and that ſuch Epiſcopal Men as were willing to mix with the Preſbyterians in their Judicatories, ſhould be admitted, without any ſevere Impoſition in point of Opinion.

This look'd ſo fair, and agreed ſo well with the King's own Senſe of things, that he very eaſily hearken'd to it; and I did believe that it was ſincerely meant; ſo I promoted it with great Zeal, though we afterwards came to ſee, that all this was an Artifice of the Jacobites to engage the King to diſguſt the Preſbyterians; and by loſing them, or at leaſt rendering them remiſs in his Service, they reckon'd they would be ſoon Maſters of that Kingdom: For the Party reſolv'd now to come in generally to take the Oaths; but in order to that, they ſent (q) one to King James to ſhew the Neceſſity of it, and the Service they intended him in it; and therefore they aſk'd his leave to take them: That King's Anſwer was more honeſt; he ſaid, he could not conſent to that which he thought unlawful; but if any of them took the Oaths A. D. 1691. on Deſign to ſerve him, and continu'd to advance his Intereſts, he promis'd it ſhould never be remember'd againſt them. Young Dalrymple was made conjunct Secretary of State with Lord Melvil; and he undertook to bring in moſt of the Jacobites to the King's Service; but they entred at the ſame time into a cloſe Correſpondence with St. Germains: I believ'd nothing of all this at that time, but went in cordially to ſerve many who intended to betray us.

The Truth was, the Preſbyterians, by their Violence and other fooliſh Practices, were rendering themſelves both odious and contemptible: They had form'd a General Aſſembly in the End of the former Year, in which they did very much expoſe themſelves by the Weakneſs and Peevithneſs of their Conduct: Little Learning or Prudence appear'd among them, poor preaching and wretched haranguing, Partialities to one another, and Violence and Injuſtice to thoſe who differ'd from them, ſhew'd themſelves in all their Meetings. And theſe did ſo much ſink their Reputation, that they were weaning the Nation moſt effectually from all Fondneſs to their Government: But the Falſhood of many, who, under a Pretence of moderating Matters, were really undermining the King's Government, helps in the Sequel to preſerve the Preſbyterians as much, as their own Conduct did now alienate the King from them."

Their rather Political Feuds.

His Lordſhip might have added, that the Outcry rais'd againſt their fooliſh and violent Proceedings, not only reached England, where ſeveral Pamphlets were publiſh'd (at the Deſire of the Diſaffected here, as is acknowledg'd in the Preface of that quoted below) giving an Account of many ſavage Particulars, but contributed greatly to confirm the Prejudices which had been entertain'd againſt the new Government. In theſe Pieces it was ſhewn, that the Difference between Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery, was ſo (r) ſmall, that (q) The Reader will poſſibly recollect in this Place, in Contradiction to the Conſcientiouſneſs here attributed to King James, that Lord Belcarres and his Junto had his leave to temporize with the new Government for his Service: But they, it ſeems, had only Lord Arran's Word for it, and it muſt remain a moot Point, whether his Lordſhip or the Hiſtorian is moſt to be rely'd on.

(r) "Any moderate Man will certainly think the Difference between our Scots Epiſcopacy, ſays one of theſe Authors, and Preſbytery not worth the Heat or Danger of a Diſpute; for, firſt, as to the Doctrine, both Parties are agreed, the Confeſſion of Faith made by Mr. Knox, and ratify'd in Parliament by King James VI. and revived again in the Teſt Act by King Charles II. this, together with the Weſtminſter-Confeſſion (both agreed on by the General Aſſembly of Preſbyters) are owned next to the Word of God by both Parties, as the Standard of the Doctrine of our Church.

Secondly. As to the Worſhip, it is exactly the ſame both in the Church and Conventicle: In the Church there are no Ceremonies at all join'd or practis'd, only ſome Perſons more reverend, think fit to be uncover'd, which our Preſbyterians do but by Halves, even in the time of Prayer; we have no Liturgy nor Form of Prayer; no, not in the Cathedrals; the only Difference in this Point is, our Clergy are not ſo overbold nor aſſume in their extemporary Expreſſions as the others are, nor uſe ſo many vain Repetitions; and we generally conclude one of our Prayers with that which our Saviour taught and commanded, which the other Party decry as ſuperſtitious and formal. Amen too, gives great Offence, tho' neither the Clerk nor People uſe it, only the Miniſter ſometimes ſhuts up his Prayer with it. The Sacraments are adminiſtred after the ſame Way and Manner by both; neither ſo much as kneeling at the Prayers, or when they receive the Elements of the Lord's Supper, but all ſitting together at a long Table in the Body of the Church or Chancel. In Baptiſm neither Party uſe the Croſs, nor are any Godfathers or Godmothers requir'd, the Father only promiſing for his Child: The only Difference in this Sacrament is, the Preſbyterians make the Father ſwear to breed up his Child in the Faith and Belief of the Covenant or Solemn League, whereas the Orthodox cauſe the Father to repeat the Apoſtle's Creed, and promiſe to breed up the Child in that Faith which he himſelf then profeſſes.

Thirdly. As to the Diſcipline, it is exactly ſo our Epiſcopal Church, if it may be ſo call'd, according to the Model of the Preſbyterian Mother Kirk at Geneva; for conformable to the conſiſtory Direction, not Rubric, for that is a ſuperſtitious Word, we have in every Pariſh a little Court which we call the Kirk-Seſſion, compoſed of the Miniſter or Miniſters, if there be two belonging to that Church; and ſome Lay-men, which we call Elders and Deacons too, forſooth; the Buſineſs of this Court is to enquire into, and puniſh Scandals, and to collect and diſtribute the Money which good People are pleaſed daily to offer at the Church Doors for the Poor. This Court or Seſſion is liable to the Inſpection and Juriſdiction of the Preſbytery, who may viſit the Seſſion, inſpect their Records, and receive Appeals from them upon Occaſion. By Preſbytery we mean again a Court of Preſbyters inferior to the Synod; for every Synod or Meeting of the whole Dioceſe belonging to a Biſhop, is divided into ſeveral Claſſes

A. D. 1691. that it was not worth a Contest: That Petitioners and other Hearers were invited by Proclamation, to inform against Ministers who had not read the Proclamation for declaring the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen, and who did not pray for their Majesties: That on this Footing innumerable Citations were issu'd: That the Proceedings upon them were as severe as possible; and that when Pretences against an obnoxious Man were not to be found upon this Footing, they never fail'd to find out some other (s) that answer'd as well. From all which, a general Conclusion was drawn, that the Spirit of Government was the same in both Kingdoms; and that it was rather for want of Power than Will, that it did not rage with the same Fury in both.

The opposite Faction, on the other hand, were not wanting in Glosses and Colours to justify their Conduct. Sometimes, to shew they had no persecuting Ingredient in their System, they quoted the Act for rescinding all Penal Laws against Separatists, and the taking away all Tests tending to incapacitate, Protestants of any Sect from Employments. Sometimes they alledg'd, that the Clergy, on whose Account, and at whose Instigation, such Clamours were made, suffer'd justly for their Non-Submission to the Laws (which, by the way, would have been an Argument as conclusive in King Charles's Reign, as now) and sometimes they utterly (t) deny'd every Fact and Circumstance that was alledg'd against them. To turn away our Eyes from this hateful or Presbyteries: in each Presbytery there is about eighteen or twenty, in some twenty-four Ministers, who with the Consent of the Bishop, chuse their own Moderator or President; they meet ordinarily once every Month, or oftener if they think their Affairs require, for they have Power to adjourn and meet at their own Discretion. As the Sessions are subject to the Presbyteries, so are the Presbyteries to the Synod, which meets always at the Times twice every Year; there the Bishop himself presides, or in case of his necessary Absence, one commissionated by him; and all things are carried by the Plurality of Votes; and the Acts made that way, are the only Canons or Rules we use for Discipline. As the Presbyters are subject to the Synod, so the whole Synods of the Nation are to the General Assembly, where by Law the Archbishop of St. Andrews is always to preside; and if I be not mistaken, has a negative Voice, tho' he was never known to use it.

Now I leave the impartial World to judge, whether Presbyterians that had any Moderation, would not be well contented, and live quietly under such a moderate Episcopacy, where indeed, except the Power of Ordination, which is always to be perform'd with the Consent and Assistance of the Brethren of the Presbytery, and the Title of Lord, which the King is pleas'd to confer upon them; the Bishops are truly but constant Moderators, which the Presbyterians themselves, because of the great Dryness which often happen'd among them at the closing of Moderators, were at length necessitated to sit down with. Now then let any moderate Presbyterian abroad say, whether indeed it be Matter of Conscience or Honour, that makes Presbyterians with us separate from a Church to constitute, or whether the Difference between our Church and their Kirk be such as can justify Men in rising to many public Rebellions, and drawing so much Misery and Confusion upon the Nation and themselves, as our Zealots have often done; and whether their own Consciences can plead, Not Guilty, at the last great Tribunal, where they must answer for all those Murthers and Butcheries, all the Cries and Tears of Widows, Orphans, and ruin'd Families, which will then testify against them? Or what can they answer now to the World, for the many late Barbarities they have committed against their Protestant Brethren, themselves knowing not for what; and therefore being asham'd of their Practices, they are fain to conceal and deny them abroad." [Preface to the Case of the present afflicted Clergy in Scotland.

(s) For Example "Mr. Ramsey is called and interrogated, if he did read the Proclamation of the 13th of April; he answer'd, 'I did read it.' Again he is question'd, if he Prayed for King William and Queen Mary, naming them (for it was not enough to use such Expressions as were only to be appropriated to William and Mary) he said, he had prayed for them by Name. 'But, says the President, you only prayed for them as declar'd King and Queen, not as those that were really such.' Mr. Ramsey reply'd, 'That he had prayed for William and Mary, whom the States of the Kingdom had declared King and Queen, and since they had no Liturgy, and they had given to them no Form of Prayer, he thought being he had prayed for William and Mary, no more was to be required.' And as for the Words, declar'd King and Queen, he had taken them from one of their own Proclamations.' Which when deny'd, as deeming the Proclamation might be produc'd; which was done, and then it appear'd he was in the Right. When he could not be reached in this Point, then the President, the Earl of Crafford, said, 'But, Mr. Ramsey, you pray for the late King James.' 'My Lord, said he, I pray in these Words, Lord bless William and Mary, whom the Estates of this Land have declared King and Queen, and blast all the Royal Family, Root and Branch, especially him who is now under Ambition; sanctify it unto him while he is under it, and when it seems good to thee, deliver him from it. This, says he, is the Form I made to myself, for you prescribe none; and it is not a fore Matter, that when nothing is left to King James in Reversion of three Kingdoms, but the Prayers of poor Men, that you should deny him those." They then order'd him to remove, and consulted by what other way they might reach him, for yet they could not find a Pretence against him sufficient to deprive him. At last, they call'd him in, and the President said, 'But, Mr. Ramsey, you did not read from the Pulpit the Proclamation for the Fast.' 'Now, my Lord, reply'd Mr. Ramsey, you have nick'd me; indeed I did not intimate that Fast.' 'But why did you not?' 'For many Reasons, my Lord, said he.' 'But pray, said my Lord, let us hear some of those Reasons.' 'Excuse me, my Lord, reply'd he, it is sufficient that I confess that I did not read it.' But, according to the Method of their Inquisition of screwing out Mens Minds, and provoking them to speak, that they might get Occasion against them; they press'd him to name some of his Reasons; he said, being they urg'd, he would give them one. 'That it was against the Practice of the Universal Church, and Primitive Canons, to fast on Sunday.' And he said, 'Tho' there were an other Reason but that one, he could not intimate that Fast.' He gave this Reason, as that which he thought would give them least Offence: They order'd him to remove till they had deliberated what they had to do with him, and then, order call him in, and deprive'd him for not reading the Proclamation for the Fast. Dr. Gardner, a Man of great Parts and Piety, and one of the Ministers of the Tolbooth Church in Edinburgh, was deprive'd upon the same Account of not intimating that Fast, tho' he had complied in every thing else which they demanded." (t) As appears from the following Letter of Lord Crafford's to a Gentleman in London:

"SIR,

"I have this Day seen that Pamphlet, entitled, An Account of the present Persecution of the Church of Scotland. And if I had Leisure for such a Task, as the answering of that Paper, I am furnish'd with a better Stock of Knowledge in the Matters there treated of, than any Scotsman, having been an Actor in all the Judicatories, and at every Diet since the Change of the Government; and by Informations sent me from all the Corners of the Country, always acquainted with the Truth and Circumstances of all those Transactions. I will be bold to say, That not only there is not one Syllable of Truth in what is affirmed of me in that Pamphlet, but that the very Foundations of Stories reported of others, is, for the most part, false, and as things are in that Paper circumstantiated, in every Instance notoriously mistaken. For Evidence of this, I sent up to the Secretary the whole Proceedings of the Council in terminis, without changing one single Word either in the Judgments, Confessions, Probations, or Sentences. And to answer all in one Word, I peremptorily affirm, That neither by the Meeting of Estates nor Privy Council, has any Person been question'd, much less censur'd for their Opinion or Practice in Church-Government, but upon that alone Ground of disowning the King's Authority, either directly or consequentially by denying to pray for him: yet, the Council was so favourable and tender in depriving of Ministers, as if they had been proceeding in Matters of Blood; insomuch, that they acquitted three or four and thirty of them, whose Libels were not distinctly and fully prov'd; tho' at the same time, Crimes of another nature were evidently made out against several of them, the Cognisance whereof did no ways belong to us. The Post is ready to go, and so I take my leave; and am,

SIR, &c.

[Memoirs of North-Britain, p. 86, 87.

A. D. 1691. ful Scene, notwithſtanding the Compromiſe, above prematurely diſcours'd of, between the Jacobites and the Court, and the Conceſſions made by Lord Melvil during the laſt Seſſion to the Preſbyterians, it was not thought advisable to ſuffer the Parliament to meet again, till either the Nation was in better Temper, or the Streights of the Government made their meeting neceſſary: The Preſbyterians were diſguſted at the Diſſolution of their General Aſſembly, which had been done by an Act of State in November, though by the ſame Act another was appointed to meet in November the next following Year: And as to the Jacobites, it was not till the Beginning of the next Year that they made their Submiſſion in Form to the new Government: And during that whole Interval it was held as neceſſary to make a Shew at leaſt, of proceeding againſt the rebellious Highlanders, by Force of Arms, as to try Practices upon them by the ſofter Methods of Treaty and Negotiation.

Means taken to keep the Peace.

Accordingly, the Parliament was adjourn'd by Proclamation to September the 16th; and to prevent, as far as poſſible, all Practices againſt the Government in that Interval, by another Proclamation, all Perſons whatſoever were forbid to go out of the Kingdom, without a Paſs from a Privy-Counſellor, or from two Commiſſioners of Supply; and all Perſons coming into the Kingdom were requir'd to produce Paſſes, or to give a ſatisfactory Account of themſelves and their Buſineſs upon Oath, to the next Counſellor, Juſtice of Peace, Magiſtrate, or Officer of the Army, on pain of their being apprehended and committed to Priſon: All Skippers were alſo forbid to tranſport any Paſſengers to or from Scotland without Paſſes, and requir'd to give in Liſts upon Oath of the ſaid Paſſengers before they put to Sea, or ſuffer'd any to go on Shore. As a farther Precaution, the Earls of Crawford and Leven, the Lord Viſcount Stair, the Lords Raith and Cardroſs, and Sir Thomas Livingſton, who had the Command of the Forces, or any three of them, were appointed a ſtanding Committee, to exerciſe all the Powers of the Regency, in ſecuring the Enemies of the Government, and alſo for putting their Majeſties Loyal Subjects in a Condition to act for the Defence of it: Several diſaffected Perſons, namely, the Earl of Hume, Sir Peter Frazer, and Sir Æneas Macpherſon, were ſeiz'd; and the firſt of them refuſing to give diſtinct Anſwers to the Queſtions put to him, was alſo committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tolbooth.

His Majeſty ſets out a ſecond time for Holland.

We muſt now return to his Majeſty, who having diſpatch'd the great Point of new-modelling the Church, and adjuſted ſuch other State Matters as he judg'd to be of the moſt Importance, ſet out again for Holland, May the firſt, and embark'd at Harwich next Day, under the Convoy of a Squadron of Men of War, commanded by Admiral Rooke, with ſo fair a Wind, that he landed the next Morning at Maeſland Sluyce, and the ſame Evening reached the Hague, from which Place he had been abſent but three Weeks. The Perſons who accompany'd him, were the Lord Sydney, as Secretary of State, and the Earls of Marlborough and Portland. Four Days his Majeſty ſpent at that Place in receiving Compliments, holding Conferences, &c. and that Drudgery being over, on the fifth, before Day-break, ſet out with the ſame Company for Loo, to divert himſelf with hunting for ſome time, before he enter'd upon the Fatigues of the Campaign. From the eighth to the ſeventeenth of May, O. S. this appears to have been his principal Occupation: But Count Solmes then arriving from Germany, with a Report of the Diſpoſition made by the Emperor and the Empire for the opening of the Campaign, the ſaid Count and Lord Marlborough were diſpatch'd the next Day, to make all things ready for his Majeſty to enter into Action, on the Side of Flanders. A. D. 1691.

Diverts himſelf with hunting at Loo.

And here it is proper to obſerve, that the Expectations of Europe had never been ſcrew'd to ſo high a Pitch, nor the Downfall of the Power of France ſo confidently foretold, as at this Criſis. In all the Courts, and, thoro' all the Dominions of the confederated Princes, things of this arrogant kind were every Day aſſerted, in ſuch Language, as nothing could warrant but an abſolute Inſpection into the Rolls of Fate: And, in particular, the Partizans of King William, both at the Hague and London, carry'd their Preſumption ſo far, as even in Print to beſpeak the Wonders he was to perform: And their Extravagancies riſe in Judgment againſt them even at this very Day.

But while theſe Talkers gave ſuch a Looſe to their Vanity and Indiſcretion, the French, as uſual, were already in Motion. After the Loſs of Mons, the Confederates had thought it adviſeable to beſtow ſome Fortifications upon Halle, in order to retard the Progreſs of the Enemy, in caſe they ſhould think proper to make an Attempt on Bruſſels; and theſe Fortifications, tho' almoſt completed, being as yet uſeleſs for want of Cannon, Mr. de Luxemburgh, on the 25th, N. S. paſs'd the Scheld with forty-three Battalions, and one hundred and one Squadrons, was ſoon follow'd by a Train of ſixty Peices of Cannon, and five Mortars, and on the 30th not only took Poſſeſſion of that Place, but gave it up to be pillag'd by his Soldiers, in Sight of the Confederates, who were as yet ſo little able, either to protect or avenge, that they were forc'd to throw up Entrenchments for their own Preſervation: And that the Enemy did not think fit to attack them in their Lines, nor to puſh on to Bruſſels, was thought ſufficient Matter of Triumph.

Duke of Luxemburgh takes Halle.

On the ſecond of June, the King, in Perſon, took upon him the Command of the Army, which, in this ſhort Interval, was become ſuperior to that of France, and was ſoon made ſenſible, that the Enemy had cut out ſufficient Employment for them all: For, over and above the Oppoſition that he was to expect from Mr. de Luxemburgh, whoſe Abilities he had ſufficient reaſon to apprehend, he receiv'd Advice, that the Marquis

King William takes the Field.

A. D. 1691. de Bouffiers, after ſeveral forc'd Marches, had ſat down before Liege, with ſixty Squadrons and twenty Battalions; and having entrench'd himſelf, was preparing for a Bombardment. His Majeſty knew the Place was but ſlightly fortify'd, and conſequently, without immediate Relief, muſt fall into the Hands of the Enemy; his firſt Care was therefore to ſend a Body of ſeven thouſand Foot, and two thouſand five hundred Horſe, upon that Service: But while they were upon their March, the Marquis made his Effort; and had not the Biſhop of Liege taken his Precautions very wiſely, and been ſeconded very bravely by the Troops he had in Garriſon, the Affair had been over, before the Arrival of theſe Succours. The French knew that the Burghers of Liege were as tenderly concern'd for their Houſes, as thoſe of Mons, and in caſe of a Mutiny among them, had very ſufficient Reaſons to conclude, that Cardinal Furſtemburg's Party would give the caſting Vote in their Favour. In this Expectation they not only ply'd their Batteries without Intermiſſion, and kept the Place in continual Alarm, with repeated Attacks, wherever the Place was acceſſible, but pour'd in a Shower of Bombs, red hot Bullets, &c. which ſet fire to the Houſes in ſeveral Quarters, and ſcatter'd Terrors every where: And in the midſt of the Confuſion and Deſolation occaſion'd by this horrible Method of making War, ſlipt in a Trumpeter among certain religious Perſons, who had paſs'd the Meuſe, with Propoſals for a Capitulation: But all was without Effect; for the ſaid Trumpeter, not having made his Entrance regularly, at the Gates, was ſtopt before he could open his Commiſſion, the Burghers were diſarm'd under plauſible Pretences, and directed only to attend the Preſervation of their Houſes; in which they were alſo aſſiſted by the Soldiers; and as often as the Enemy renew'd their Aſſaults, they were repuls'd with Loſs. Things being in this Situation, and Mr. de Bouffiers having been appriz'd of the Approach of the Detachment from the Confederate Army, he thought it high time to give over his Enterprize, and to think only of ſecuring his Retreat. Accordingly, on the ſixth, he cauſ'd a Camp to be mark'd out at Beaufaix; and having drawn off his Mortars, and ſent away his Baggage under the Care of his Infantry, as alſo erected two new Batteries to cover his Rear, he began to decamp; and the next Morning march'd entirely off, before the Count de Tilley, who had the Command of the Confederate-Party, could come up to engage him: After which he detach'd Part of the Troops under his Command to reinforce the Marſhal de Luxemburgh, and with the Reſidue encamp'd between Dinant and Charlemont. The Count de Tilley, on the other hand, having thrown a Body of Troops into Huey, which had been threatned with the like Viſitation that Liege had already undergone, rejoin'd the King at Brewerlehin, whoſe Army was, about the ſame time, yet farther augmented, by the Arrival of ſix thouſand Brandenburghers, and between nine and ten thouſand Heſſians, under the Command of the Landtgrave in Perſon.

Liege bombarded by Mr. de Bouffiers.

A. D. 1691.

How it came about, that his Majeſty's Friend, the Duke of Zell did not alſo join him in Perſon, according to his Engagement, nor even furniſh his full Quota of Troops, is not ſpecify'd in any of our Writings on this Side of the Water: And we can only ſurmiſe, that poſſibly his Zeal for the Grandeur of his own Houſe, at this Juncture, outweigh'd his Attachment to King William.

Politic Behaviour of the Princes of Lunenburgh.

His Highneſs was at the Head of the Princes of Lunenburgh; his only Daughter was marry'd to his Nephew the Prince of Hanover; and, contrary to the uſual (u) Courſe of Succeſſion, it had been ſtipulated by the Marriage Articles, that upon the Death of the Duke of Zell, who had no Male Iſſue, the two Duchies of Zell and Hanover, ſhould concenter in the ſame Perſon. This firſt excited an Opinion in Europe, that the exalting their Family was the darling View of both the Courts. The Affair of Saxe-Lawenburgh had furniſh'd another Indication of the ſame kind; and the Uſe they made of the preſent Juncture to further the ſame laudable Purpoſe, put the Matter out of all Diſpute; and moreover ſhew'd, that their Addreſs was equal to their Ambition. They had converted a large Body of their Subjects into Soldiers; perhaps foreſeeing, that there would be ſo great a Demand at the two great Markets of Europe for that Commodity, that they might almoſt ſet what Price upon it they pleas'd. What they had already gain'd in the Courſe of their Traffic, either in the way of Subſidy, or by the Indulgences they had met with in their Clames on Saxe-Lawenburgh, is difficult to aſcertain: But what they propos'd to get by their ſubſequent Adventures, was no leſs than an Electoral Cap in preſent, and the Crown of England in Days to come.

We have already ſeen, that Biſhop Burnet had made them a Tender of it long ago; but when it appear'd that the Parliament was not in Haſte to authenticate his Negotiations, the Family abated of their Zeal in the Common Cauſe: At leaſt, while the Duke of Zell ſeem'd to be, Body and Soul, at the Devotion of King William, the Duke of Hanover ſent a Miniſter to the Court of France (who was receiv'd with particular Marks of Diſtinction) and made a Shew of entering into Meaſures with that Crown; in order, no doubt, to quicken the Advances of the Courts of Vienna and London.

But

(u) Which had been, for the eldeſt Branch of the Family to hold the Dukedom of Zell, and the ſecond that of Hanover; and it is certain, that both Prince Auguſtus and Prince Maximilian of Hanover could never be prevail'd upon to relinquiſh their Clame to their elder Brother; and that the Latter was forc'd into Exile, for having enter'd into a Conſpiracy to ſupport it.

A.D. 1691. Efforts of the King to bring Luxemburgh to an Engagement.

But to resume the Progress of the Campaign; King William was now, agreeable to his own Wishes, at the Head of an Army superior to that of France, but, unluckily, had an Enemy to deal with, who would suffer him to make no Use of that Advantage. In vain his Majesty made his Dispositions for a Battle: Mr. de Luxemburgh kept close within his Lines near Halle, which, it seems, were too strong to be forc'd; and at his own time, remov'd to Bois Seigneur Isaac. His Majesty then pass'd on to Auderleck, and from thence to Gemblours, behind Charleroy and Namur, where he took Post on the twenty-sixth of June; and it was given out, that as soon as his heavy Cannon came up, he would make an Attempt on Dinant, or some other Place belonging to the Enemy, in order to put Mr. de Luxemburgh out of his Play, and draw him to an Engagement. On the 12th and 13th of July, the said heavy Cannon arriv'd, and yet his Majesty did not decamp till the 20th. The next Day he pass'd the Sambre at Montigney, and directed his March to Gerpines. Mr. de Luxemburgh, on the other hand, who had lain before Mons as long as the King continu'd at Gemblours, having Intelligence of the Motion of the Confederates, pass'd the Sambre also the same Day, at le Buissiere, with a Design to occupy the same Post before them. This brought the two Armies within Sight of each other towards Evening: But the King having got Possession of the Camp in Dispute, and being in a Condition to maintain it, the Marshal remov'd first to Florennes, then to Philippeville, and again posted himself so advantageously, and fortify'd himself so strongly, that tho' the two Armies were but a League asunder, his Majesty still found it impracticable, to put the Fate of the Campaign on the Decision of a Battle, as he ardently desir'd. It was, however, the universal Belief, that some such Opening would be given, or Attempt would be made, as would bring on a general Action: And, to be so much the better provided for it, the Marshal, on one side, call'd in Mr. de Boufflers, with his flying Camp to his Assistance; and the King, on the other, did the same by Baron Fleming; and the Body of Troops under his Command, which had been posted near Huy, to observe the Motions of the said Marquis.

Things continu'd in this Posture till the seventh of August, N. S. when the King made another Remove from Gerpines to Court-sur-Heure, in Sight of the Marshal, who, from the Summit of a Hill near Walcourt, made his Observations on the Order of the March (which was in four Columns, and much interrupted by Defiles) with a Resolution to fall upon him, in case he saw the least Opportunity to do it to Advantage: But no such Opportunity offer'd; and he chose rather to withdraw a Party of his Troops out of the little Town of Beaumont, and suffer it to fall into his Majesty's Hands, than to run the Risque of an Action, by defending it.

On the ninth, however, at Night, he put his whole Army in Motion, without Beat of Drum, and directed his March towards Beaumont; and, early the next Morning, the King, having receiv'd Notice of it, quitted his Camp, with a Resolution to give him a Meeting. About Noon the two Armies once more confronted each other, but still without any Probability of coming to an Engagement: For we are told, that there was a very deep Valley between them, as also a dangerous Stream, that the Hills on both Sides were, in a manner, inaccessible, and that there was but one Pass which led to the French Camp, and which was not only narrow, steep, and rocky, but in the very Center of their Lines, and defended by several Pieces of Cannon. A.D. 1691.

We are nevertheless assur'd, That his Majesty employ'd the rest of the Day in viewing the Ground, in laying Bridges over the River, and in raising Batteries to cover them, in order to facilitate the Passage of his Army: That the whole Army lay upon their Arms in the open Fields all Night: That his Majesty supt in a Barn, slept on Straw, was on Horseback again at three o'Clock next Morning, visited and revisited all the Posts, explor'd all the Defiles; and, after wasting the whole Morning in seeming Endeavours to surmount Obstacles, which were apparently insurmountable, resolv'd about Noon to return back to his Camp; which the Enemy suffer'd him to do without attempting to give him any Interruption, except by the Discharge of their Cannon. But though the Day was not distinguish'd by a Victory, we are told it was by a Deliverance. "The King, says the Voice of Authority, staid near Beaumont till the Army was all march'd by, coming himself in the Rear; and by the wonderful Providence of God, which so signally watches over his Majesty, escap'd very narrowly a Cannon Ball. He had sat some-time under a Tree, to see what Motion the Enemy would take; which being observ'd by them, they plac'd a Cannon so that his Majesty was not gone from thence two Minutes, when a Ball fell where he had sat." This is the Language of the London-Gazette; [Num. 2686.] and tho' the Dutch Author of the State of Europe, who seldom lets slip any Opportunity of magnifying King William, is wholly silent on this Head, Bishop Burnet speaks of the same Circumstance, in the same Strain, as follows: "Signal Preservations of his Person did again shew, that he had a watchful Providence still guarding him." After which, to enhance the Miracle, he adds, "That the Tree was shot down two Minutes after the King had left the Place." And again: "There was one that belong'd to the Train of Artillery, who was corrupted to set fire to the Magazine of Powder, and he fir'd the Matches of three Bombs; two of these blew up, without doing any Mischief, tho' there were twenty-four more Bombs in the same Waggon on which they lay, together with a Barrel of Powder. The third Bomb was found with the Match fir'd, before it had its Effect. If this wicked Practice had succeeded, the Confusion that was in all reason to be expected, upon such an Accident, while

A treacherous attempt to blow up his Artillery.

A. D. 1691. while the Enemy was not above a League from them, drawn up, and looking for the Succeſs, muſt have had terrible Effects. It cannot be eaſily imagin'd how much Miſchief might have follow'd upon it, in the mere Deſtruction of ſo many as would have periſh'd immediately, if the whole Magazine had taken fire, as well as in the Panick-Fear with which the reſt would have been ſtruck upon ſo terrible an Accident. By the Surprize of it, the French might have had an Opportunity to cut off the whole Army. This may well be reckon'd one of the Miracles of Providence, that ſo little Harm was done, where ſo much was near being done." His Lordſhip apparently draws his Intelligence, as before, from the ſame Gazette above quoted; but then, as before, he chuſes to tell the Story in ſuch a manner as ſhould moſt favour his own Concluſion; for in that Paper, not the leaſt Mention is made of a Magazine of Powder: That the Bombs in burſting did no Miſchief, is expreſly aſcrib'd to the extraordinary Courage of the Artillery-Guard, who immediately drew the Waggons out of the Line, and by overthrowing them down the Side of a Hill, prevented the firing of the reſt of the Bombs, and what further Miſchief might have ariſen from it. Inſtead, alſo, of authoriſing thoſe Aſſertions, that the Enemy was ready drawn up, and looking on, &c. the ſaid Paper is expreſs, that they never quitted the Ground they occupy'd in the Morning; that it was five o'Clock in the Afternoon before the Confederates recover'd their Camp; and that the Evening-Watch was ſet, before the Bombs took fire. His Lordſhip is, however, juſtify'd by a ſubſequent Gazette for aſcribing the Attempt to Treachery; for therein we are told, That the Perſon who had attempted the blowing up the Artillery, had confeſs'd, that he had been hir'd to do it by the Duke of Luxemburgh; as alſo, that the Sentence paſs'd upon him was, to have his Right Hand cut off, to be half ſtrangled, and afterwards burnt; which was all executed accordingly.

[Nov. 1692.]

He diſmantles Beaumont,

It has been already ſuggeſted, that the Duke of Luxemburgh had ſuffer'd Beaumont to fall into the Hands of the Confederates; and as it was untenable, the King reſolved to diſmantle it in Sight of the Enemy, in hope ſuch a Bravado would draw them out of their Lines: To this end, ſeveral Squadrons and Battalions were poſted between the Camp and the Town, to cover the Retreat of the Garriſon; and about two Hours after, the whole Army was drawn out, to ſupport them in caſe of Need. About Noon the Mines were ſprung, the Forage, which had been laid up there by the French, was burnt, and the Garriſon rejoin'd the Army without Interruption; for no body knew better than Mr. de Luxemburgh, that no time was ſo improper for a General to be concern'd for his Honour, as that preſcrib'd by an Enemy.

This Device thus failing, his Majeſty, the next Morning, remov'd from Court-ſur-Heur to the Plain of St. Gerard, where he continu'd till the fourth of September to conſume the Forage, and exhauſt the Country; and that being done effectually, he that Day paſs'd the Sambre near Jemeppe at Night, as the French did alſo at la Buſſiere: And now both Armies being again in Motion, it became more induſtriouſly than ever the Buſineſs of the one to ſeek, and the other to avoid, an Action. All the Skill that could be practiſ'd in marching, as well as encamping, was now manifeſted on both Sides. On the eighth, we are told, the French meaſur'd no leſs than eight Leagues in one March, in much Haſte and Diſorder; and yet the Party that was order'd to obſerve their Motions, could make no other Advantage, than the taking a few Carriages, and about a hundred and fifty Priſoners. On the tenth, both the Generals directed their Courſe to Enghien. The French arriv'd there firſt, and began to mark out their Lines; but, hearing the Confederates were at their Heels, after a ſhort Halt, puſh'd on towards Gramont and Ninove; in the Neighbourhood of which Places, they reſted that Night; and, having paſs'd the Dendre, finally ſecur'd themſelves in a ſtrong Camp between Aeth and Audenard. The King alſo paſs'd the Dendre on the twelfth, and took his Quarters between Aeth and Leuſe: And while the two Armies thus lay within a League of each other, the Partizans of the Allies all over Europe, were not only induc'd by the Advices from his Majeſty's Camp, to believe, that the French were in a Net, and that it was impoſſible for them to eſcape without an Action, but alſo, that they could ſcarce fail to have the worſt of it. They were very apprehenſive of being preſs'd by his Majeſty; they had ſuffer'd greatly in their Efforts to avoid him; their Troops, both Horſe and Foot, were extremely harraſs'd; they would find it difficult to keep their Poſt long, for want of Bread, becauſe the Confederates lay between them and Mons, from whence their chief Supplies came, &c. So ran the Stream of Intelligence; and yet, in the midſt of the ſanguine Expectations which it rais'd, it appear'd, that the Confederates themſelves were as much fatigu'd, and as much apprehenſive as they: That the Landtgrave of Heſſe, with his Forces, together with thoſe of Liege, amounting in all to about twelve thouſand Foot, and between ſix and ſeven thouſand Horſe, ſeparated from the Army on the ſeventh, and paſs'd the Meuſe at Namur on the 12th, and that his Majeſty himſelf, apprehending there was no Glory to be gain'd, gave over the Purſuit on the ſeventeenth, and left Prince Waldeck to manage the delicate Concern of withdrawing the Army, which the ſame Day quitted the Neighbourhood of Aeth, and remov'd to Leuſe, where they remain'd till the 20th, and then made another Remove to Cambron.

and leaves the Army.

And now it was, that the Duke of Luxemburgh, who had ſhewn ſo great a Maſtery in the Art of War, by maintaining his Ground for ſo long an Interval, againſt a ſuperior Army, reſolv'd to ſnatch ſuch an Advantage, at parting, as, together with the Acquiſition of Mons, ſhould place both the Profit and the Honour of the Campaign on the French Side.

According

A. D. 1691. According to Mr. de Feuquieres, his Forces were drawn up under the Walls of Tournay, waiting their Diſmiſſion into Winter-Quarters; and conſidering the Diſtance between that Place and Leuſe, the Confederates had reaſon to conclude, that they were out of Danger: But if this military Critic is thus far in the right, he ruſhes into a wilful Error, for the ſake of heightening the Character of Mr. de Luxemburgh, by ſuggeſting, that the King, by him call'd the Prince of Orange, commanded the Confederates in Perſon, at the time of their quitting the Field.

Mr. de Luxembargh falls on the Rear of the Allies at Leuſe.

All Authors, however, agree, that the Marſhal having been reinforc'd by a choice Body of four thouſand freſh Horſe, commanded by the Marſhal de Villars, ſet out on the 19th at Night, towards Leuſe, at the Head of fifty-five Squadrons, among whom were the Troops of the Houſhold, with a Purpoſe, to fall on the Rear of the Confederates, at the Rivulet of Cutoire: A thick Fog cover'd his Approach; and ſo little were they apprehenſive of it, that they had no Parties out to bring them in Intelligence, or communicate the Alarm; nor had they made any Reſerve of Foot to ſupport the Horſe, which form'd their Rear-Guard: So, at leaſt, the latter Part of the Story is told by Mr. de Feuquieres, with this Addition, that ſo profound was the Security which prevail'd amongſt them, and ſo ſupine their Negligence, that the ſaid Rear-Guard had not ſo much as drawn themſelves up in Array, but, in a ſort of irregular Column, extended themſelves towards the Bridge, over which they were to paſs. Even Biſhop Burnet acknowledges, that Prince Waldeck did not march off with that Caution, which might have been expected from ſo old a Captain; and yet farther, that on the Attack, his Rear was put into ſome Diſorder. The ſame thing is admitted in the London-Gazette; as alſo, that the March of the Enemy was not diſcover'd. And others again make no Scruple to ſay, that they were within Piſtol-Shot before they were ſo much as dreamt of. But then, if the London-Gazette is of any Authority, the Blame thrown upon the Confederates by Mr. de Feuquieres, for not mixing Foot with their Rear-Guard of Horſe, is wholly groundleſs; for it is therein not only ſuggeſted, that the ſaid Rear-Guard was compos'd both of Squadrons and Battalions, but that the Horſe being ſupported by the Foot, who lined the Hedges, and brought three Field-Pieces to play upon the Enemy, which did very good Service, maintain'd their Poſt, till they were reinforc'd by ſome of the Troops who had already paſs'd the Stream, and, after a ſharp Diſpute, repuls'd the Aſſailants, who retir'd in Confuſion. Other Writers, yet more particularly, ſay, That the Rear-Guard was compos'd of two Battalions, and five Squadrons, under the Command of the Count de Tilley: That while theſe were forming to receive the French Charge, the Prince de Naſſau-Sarbruk, with certain Squadrons, repaſs'd the Brook at full Speed to re-inforce them: That the ſaid Prince drew up his Party in two Lines, which were ſucceſſively broke, after an obſtinate Reſiſtance, by the Impetuoſity of the Enemy: That the Marſhal did not venture on a Purſuit, for fear of too much expoſing his Troops to the fire of the Confederates Infantry, which were, by this time, fac'd about, and extended along the Side of the Brook: That the Diſpute laſted a full Hour: That the Loſs was conſiderable on both Sides: That among the Slain were many Officers of Diſtinction; and that the French were for a while Maſters of the Field of Battle; but ſeeing the whole Confederate Army in Motion towards them, thought it adviſable to retreat, having loſt four Standards of their own, and carrying along with them in Exchange ſix or ſeven of the Enemies.

A. D. 1691.

[Suite de l'Hiſt. de Hol. de M. de la Neuville, Tom. i. p. 188.]

Care was taken to ſet forth in the London-Gazette, that General d'Auverquerque, one of his Majeſty's military Favourites, had particularly diſtinguiſh'd himſelf on this Occaſion; and the Hiſtorian of his own Times, aſcribes to him the whole Merit of that Day's Service, which renders it ſo much the more remarkable, that the Writers of his own Country ſhould be ſo ſparing of their Compliments to him, when he deſerv'd them ſo much.

Upon the whole, Mr. de Feuquieres places this in the ſecond Claſs of great Actions; and while it was yet the Talk of the Day, the Accounts given of it, were ſuch as agreed beſt with the Meridian which they were calculated to fit: At Paris it paſs'd for nothing leſs than an entire Defeat of all the Horſe of the Confederates; and at the Hague and London, it was underſtood to be a drawn Battle; and, according to the Subterfuges generally made uſe of by the Loſers on ſuch Occaſions, it was the common Cry, that the French had loſt more by the Adventure, than they had gain'd.

The Truth of the Matter ſeems to be, that the Shock, rude as it was, did not hinder Prince Waldeck from completing his March to Cambron the ſame Night; and that in what Confuſion ſoever the French made their Retreat, the Allies did not think fit to purſue them. Then, as to Conſequences, it had none; for the Campaign was at an End, and both Armies, ſoon after, went into their Winter-Quarters. The only Acquiſition, therefore, that either Side had to boaſt of, as the Reſult of it, was Glory: And, if we conſider the vaunting of the Confederates at the Opening of the Year, and their Superiority in point of Strength, it muſt be acknowledg'd, that the Marſhal had a clear Title to the largeſt Share: He had held the Allies in Cheque while Mons was reduc'd in the Beginning of the Campaign: He had baffled all their Attempts through the whole Courſe of it; and he had follow'd them with this Inſult in the Cloſe.

It may ſeem ſtrange, perhaps, to be thus exact in adjuſting the Merits and Succeſſes of an Enemy; and he who loves his Country moſt, will be moſt ſhock'd at Conceſſions of this nature: But Truth ought to be the firſt Conſideration of Hiſtory; and partial Repreſentation

A. D. 1691. presentations of Miſmanagements or Misfortunes, only ſerve to draw us into more.

But to proceed: If it ſhould be aſk'd, after what manner the Spaniards, who were ſo fundamentally concern'd both in the Cauſes and Conſequences of this War, exerted themſelves this Year? the Anſwer is ſhort and plain, They did not exert themſelves at all: The Vigour of that Monarchy ſeem'd to be exhauſted, and every Member growing every Day more and more incapable of performing its Functions: They had indeed a ſmall Body of Troops in the grand Army under his Majeſty; and, no doubt, they were oblig'd to contribute towards the Pay of the Mercenaries: They had alſo a ſeparate Body of Troops under the Command of the Marquis de Gaſtanaga: But though it was given out from time to time, that they would make a new Attempt on the French Lines between Menin and Pont Eſpieres, they contented themſelves with maintaining their own, and never made one offenſive Motion during the whole Campaign. What was yet more extraordinary, they ſuffer'd the French, tho' Aſſailants, not only to be firſt in the Field in Catalonia, but with ſo ſmall an Army as eight Squadrons and fourteen Battalions, under the Command of the Duke de Noailles, to form the Siege of Urgel, and in eight Days time after the opening of the Trenches, to carry the Place, with ſo high a hand, that the Garriſon, which conſiſted of nine hundred of the beſt Troops in Spain, and ſix hundred Militia, were forc'd to ſurrender at Diſcretion: For tho' the Duke of Medina Sidonia, who commanded the Forces of his Catholic Majeſty, came in Sight of the French Camp, with a Purpoſe to raiſe the Siege, he found them ſo ſtrongly entrench'd, that he durſt not venture to attack them. By the Acquiſition of Urgel, the French were enabled to make Incurſions into Arragon; and while Mr. de Noailles amus'd the Spaniſh Army on one hand, he found Employment for a large Detachment, in conſuming the Forage on the other.

Urgel in Catalonia reduc'd by the Duke de Noailles.

All this was Matter of much Affliction at the Court of Madrid; for tho' the Miniſters of Spain were inactive, they were not inſenſible: But while they were deliberating on the proper Remedies, by a Reduction of the Charge of Government, and applying the Savings to the Uſe of the War; as alſo, by endeavouring to inſpire the Nobility and Gentry with a Military Spirit, in Emulation of their Neighbours of France, they ſuffer'd a new Diſgrace, which more mortify'd them than all the reſt. In the Beginning of the Year they ſet forth a pompous Liſt of their Navy, by which it was underſtood, that they were to have had one formidable Squadron for the Protection of their Coaſts in the Mediterranean, and another for the like Service in the Ocean: But while Both were yet loitering in their Ports, News came, that a French Squadron, conſiſting of eight Men of War, ſix Frigates, twenty-five Gallies, two Fire-ſhips, and three Bomb-ketches, under the Command of the Count d'Eſtrée, on the 19th of July, N. S. had thrown above ſeven hundred Bombs into Barcelona, by which the Town was ſet on fire in many Places, and the Arſenal and Store-houſes by the Sea-Side were laid in Ruins: That from thence they proceeded to Alicant on the ſame Errand: That arriving there on the 22d, after letting fly a Shower of Bombs againſt the Town, they made an Attempt to land in two ſeveral Places; and being repuls'd in both, with Loſs, renew'd their Bombardment; and, at the Expence of no leſs than four thouſand Shells, deſtroy'd ſeveral Churches and Monaſteries, as well as private Houſes: That the Inhabitants, enrag'd at this Devaſtation, roſe on the French, who in conſiderable Numbers liv'd among them, plunder'd their Houſes, and kill'd above a hundred of them; and that Mr. d'Eſtrée, having notice of this Maſſacre, was making Preparations for a Deſcent, when eighteen Spaniſh Men of War, and three Fireſhips, appear'd in Sight; upon which he cut his Cables, and made off with ſo much Expedition, that the Spaniards, with all the Sail they could ſpread, were not able to overtake him.

A. D. 1691. Barcelona and Alicant bombarded by the Count d'Eſtrée.

It was in Italy only, that the Court of Madrid made a Shew of acting with Vigour; and even there, though they had been principally concern'd in bringing the Duke of Savoy into the War, and though they were principally concern'd in the Advantages expected from it, they could undertake nothing very material, without very great Aſſiſtances from the Emperor and the Maritime Powers. Poſſibly, the Concert neceſſary to be made for that Service, was one of the great Points ſettled at the great Congreſs before ſpoken of. The Emperor was to furniſh Men, the Maritime Powers Money, Spain both, and Savoy to be indemnify'd by All: His Royal Highneſs did not hearken more to his Reſentments in becoming a Party, than to his Intereſts; he had a mind to ſhew himſelf of more Conſequence to his great Neighbour of France, than France was willing to believe him; and he had no way ſo effectual to do ſo, as by Oppoſition, nor could have a more favourable Opportunity to oppoſe them, than when he was ſure of the Aſſiſtance of ſo many powerful Co-adjutors: On the other hand, his Conduct at the Battle of Staffarda, which had manifeſted more Heat than Diſcretion, and the Countenance he ſtill put on, as often as France caſt a relenting Look towards him, made it equally prudent to obſerve his Refinements, and balance his Raſhneſs: And as the moſt effectual Means to do both, it was held expedient, to give him a Collegue of equal Rank and ſuperior Reputation, and hedge him round with ſuch other Perſons, as ſhould be conſider'd as the Repreſentatives of all the principal Powers of the Confederacy. The Elector of Bavaria was prevail'd upon to act in the firſt of theſe Capacities, as Commander in Chief of the Imperial Forces and of his own, with the Generals Caraffa, Commerci, and Palfi, for his Aſſiſtants; the Marquis de Leganez, who ſucceeded the Count de Fuenſalida in the Government of Campaign in Italy.

A. D. 1691. the Milanese, was Trustee for his Master the King of Spain; and Duke Schomberg, Son of the Marshal, and lately made Duke of Leinster in Ireland, for his Majesty of England, as King and Stadtholder.

But such a Variety of Wheels serv'd only to retard the Operation of the Machine: The Elector of Bavaria did not relish the Service, and, for that Reason, made use of every imaginable Pretence to defer his entering upon it, or at least to derive further Advantages from it to himself: And, possibly, it was to make him some new Offers, and thereby to quicken his Motions, that Duke Schomberg, in his way to Turin, had a long Conference with his Electoral Highness at Ausburg, on the 24th of May. The Marquis de Leganez, again, did not take Possession of his new Government till the the 28th of the same Month, and both thought it his Duty, and made it his Business, to reform the Abuses and Corruptions with which it was over-run, as also, to negotiate a Treaty of Neutrality with the Duke of Mantua, before he took the Field. He had indeed a long Conference with the Duke of Savoy at Asti in his way to Milan, and another soon after at Verceil. He also came full freighted with Bills of Exchange, and Instructions for opening the Campaign; but nothing effectual could be done, till the Arrival of the German Auxiliaries; a great Part of which did not begin their March towards Italy till the 20th of June; about which time Schomberg, attended by the Marquis de Miremont, and several other Officers, arriv'd at Turin: And, as for the Elector of Bavaria, he did not reach that Place till the 19th of August following.

Progress of the French Acquisitions there.

The French, in the mean while, did not wait for the Rendezvous of the great Army, which was to be employ'd against them, but with their usual Address and Vigour, made use of their present Superiority to push their Conquests as far as possible. Having converted the Siege of Montmelian into a Blockade, Mr. Catinat came before Veiana, a fortify'd Place, within a few Miles of Turin, May 27th, and in three Days time oblig'd the Governor and Garison to surrender at Discretion, the Duke of Savoy, who was encamp'd with his Army in the Neighbourhood, not being able to give them any Relief, but on the contrary, holding it necessary to provide for his own Security, by retiring to a stronger Post, on a Mountain nearer his Capital, which it was apprehended, the Enemy would, as their next Exploit, endeavour to reduce: But this Apprehension was groundless, it seems; for Mr. Catinat, having burnt his Royal Highness's Palace at Rivoli, and several adjacent Villages, sat down before Carmagnola, in the Marquisate of Saluces, and carry'd on his Works with so much Vigour and Resolution, that in three Days time from the opening of the Trenches, the Garison thought fit to capitulate, and were conducted to Turin.

Coni, a rich and strong Place, situate on the Confluence of two little Rivers, was attack'd next; not indeed by Mr. Catinat in Person, but by a strong Detachment of Horse and Foot, under the Command of Messieurs de Bulonde and de Feuquieres, the Military Critic, before quoted; and the Garison, which consisted chiefly of French Refugees, and about five hundred Militia, not being deem'd sufficient for its Defence, a Body of three thousand Men were detach'd, with Orders to throw themselves into the Place. Of this Mr. de Feuquieres had Intelligence, and falling in with them upon their March, after a bloody Contest, so far defeated their Purpose, that but a Part of them had the good Fortune to fight their way thro' his Troops into the Town: That Part, however, in Conjunction with those before in Garison, came to a Resolution to defend themselves, and the Place, to the last Extremity, and set out in such a manner as seem'd to argue, that they would make their Resolution good.

A. D. 1691.

Duke Schomberg, in the mean while, was not for relying wholly on their Efforts; on the contrary, he gave it as his Opinion, That, seeing Mr. Catinat had greatly weaken'd his Army by this Enterprize on Coni, now was the time to give him Battle: That as the Superiority in point of Numbers, was now on the Side of the Allies, they might reasonably hope for a Victory: That even a Defeat was preferable to the Loss of the Place in question, and the throwing Succours into Casal; the latter of which Events they were sure, would follow the former; and that whether the French were victorious or not, the Expence of a Battle would disable them from any further Attempt during the rest of the Campaign. The Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene, it is said, were disposed to embrace this Advice; but the Marquis de Leganez, who came to Turin about the same time the Duke did, would not give his Consent; for Mr. de la Hoguette, at the Head of five or six thousand French, having forc'd the Passes of the Valley of Aosta, the Milanese lay open on that Side to their Incursions, and, in case of a decisive Action in their favour, the Marquis apprehended they would not fail to carry the War into that Province, which it became him, at any rate, to prevent. Duke Schomberg, from a Knowledge of the Views and Policies of Spain, had, indeed, suggested, that de la Hoguette's Expedition, was rather calculated to hold the Allies in play till Coni should be reduc'd, than to extend the War; and that on the first Motion that should be made towards him, he would evacuate the Valley, and return into the Tarentese: But his Credit not being equal to his Penetration, his Opinion was not taken, and, upon the Issue of the Debate, it was only resolv'd, That a large Supply of Ammunition and Provisions should be sent to the Besieg'd, under the Convoy of twenty-two hundred Horse, say some, four thousand, say others, and that Prince Eugene should have the Command.

[Life of King William, v. ii. p. 279.]

Duke Schomberg's Advice rejected.

The Prince, accordingly, set out with his Detachment on the 26th, N. S. and was to be re-inforc'd on the way, by six thousand of the Mondovi-Militia; but, no sooner was he on his March, than, as before, the French

A. D. 1691. had Advice of it; and Mr. Catinat sent an Express to Mr. de Bulonde, with Orders not to stir out of his Lines till he should be join'd by a Detachment of two thousand five hundred Horse that were actually posting to his Assistance, under the Command of Mr. Sylvestre, a Marshal de Camp: But though the Place could not have held out above three or four Days longer, so apprehensive was Mr. de Bulonde of being inclos'd between the Prince, on one hand, and the Garison on the other, that he neither staid for the Approach of his Friends or Enemies, but broke up the Siege immediately, and retir'd with the utmost Precipitation; leaving behind him one Piece of battering Cannon, two Mortars, three hundred Bombs, seven thousand Grenadoes, fifteen hundred Cannon Bullets, two hundred and forty Barrels of Powder, four hundred Muskets, five hundred Tents, fourteen Mules laden with Baggage, a great Number of Spades, Pickaxes, &c. and four hundred wounded Men; among whom were forty Officers; for which, at his Arrival at the French Camp, he was immediately put under Arrest, and upon Trial, condemn'd to lose his Life; which Sentence was first chang'd into perpetual Imprisonment, and then remitted entirely; if that be call'd a Remission, by which a Man of the Sword is suffer'd to live, after his Honour is departed.

Siege of Coni rais'd by P. Eugene.

Mr. de Louvois's Resentment of that Disgrace.

This was the first remarkable Foil that the French had met with, since their Entrance into Piedmont; and we are told, that Mr. de Louvois, the first Minister of France, who had insisted on the Siege of that Place, not only against the Opinion, but the Remonstrances of Mr. Catinat, was so excessively alarm'd at it, that the King his Master could not help chastising his Peevishness, by telling him, "That he had been so accustom'd to good Fortune, that he could not bear ill." Adding, "As for me, I have seen the Spanish Troops at Paris, and therefore cannot be cast down at such a Trifle as this." But Mr. de Louvois was indeed more interested in every Event of the War, than even the King himself, if what Mr. de Feuquieres suggests is true, namely, That the War was his own; and that he had induc'd his Master to enter into it, merely to maintain his own Importance in the Cabinet, against the growing Ascendancy of Madame de Maintenon. According to that Author, he was extremely disgusted to receive the Law from a Woman whom he had so often overlook'd in the Crowd of his Suiters, and yet more, at the Mortifications that he daily met with, for not acknowledging the Divinity of the new Idol, which his Majesty had set up. A general War, he thought, would be a Machine too vast for her Abilities to manage, and he had no Apprehensions of any other Rival. As soon therefore as the first Dawn of the Confederacy against France appear'd, he advis'd his Majesty to strike the first Blow, by attacking Philipsburgh; and as he believ'd, the Emperor alone could not furnish Buttness enough, to answer the great End he had in view, he took care to administer sufficient Cause of Umbrage to every other Power that was of Consequence enough to assist, in working up such a Storm, as might find sufficient Employment for his own Genius, and the whole Strength of the Gallic Empire: As the Contests for the Electorate of Cologne, and the Prince of Orange's Enterprize upon England, were Incidents that he look'd upon as most favourable for his Purpose, he was not displeas'd to see them take the Turn they did, for the same Reason. And the Use made by Mr. de Feuquieres of all this, is to shew the World's Mistake, in attributing the Mischiefs of this ruinous War to the Ambition of Louis le Grand, when they really arose from the selfish Intrigues of his Minister. It was so much the more proper to insert these Passages in this Place, because that Minister was snatch'd away by an Apoplexy (July 16, N.S.) before the bitter Flavour which the Affair of Coni had left in his Mouth, had been sweeten'd by any new Advantage; and while it was scarce possible for him to foresee the Event of his own destructive Projects.

[De Larrey, Tom. v. &c.]

A. D. 1691. and Death.

His Death, however, made no visible Alteration in the Politics of France; the King thought fit to pursue the Plan which he had laid down; and having divided the Offices which he held among several, summon'd a grand Council on the 25th, to whom, as we are told, he was pleas'd to make a long Discourse on the Affairs of his Kingdom; possibly, to shew, that he was abundantly qualify'd to be his own Minister, and that it was more for the sake of his Ease, than out of Necessity, that he had made use of Mr. de Louvois; as also, to extinguish the Hopes of all such as aspir'd to be his Successor, and to pay a decent Compliment to his Heir: For in the Close of his Speech, addressing himself particularly to the Dauphin, he took Occasion to say, "That a Prince could never acquire Glory, nor succeed in any great Enterprize, if he was not a thorough Master of the State of his Dominions; and that therefore, it was his Request, that he would be present in all Councils, not only to qualify himself to hold the Reins of Government when He (the King) should die, but to assist him while he liv'd."

[State of Europe for Aug. 1691.]

But we digress. Care is taken to remember, that the resolute Defence of Coni was owing to the Intrepidity of the Reformed, who constituted the greatest Part of the Garison, and the Spirit and Address of Colonel Julien, an Officer till then little known, and then so poorly recompens'd, that he threw up his Commission soon after, and quitted the Service. The Reward he asked was the Government of the Place, which he had preserv'd; and that which the Duke of Savoy thought fit to bestow upon him, was a Diamond Ring.

But though the French had the Mortification to be disappointed in their Design upon Coni, which cost them upwards of three thousand Men, the Marquis de Feuquieres had the good Luck to provide for the Preservation of the Citadel of Casal, by throwing in a fresh Garison of two thousand five hundred,

A. D. 1691. hundred Men, and withdrawing the old, which was reduc'd to less than fifteen hundred; as also to rejoin Mr. Catinat, without the Loss of a Man; for, notwithstanding it was one of the great Points which the Allies had to observe, it seems they were not at Leisure to observe it as they ought, which was the Reason that Mr. de Feuquieres met with no Interruption.

And now what Duke Schomberg had suggested in relation to Mr. de la Hoguette, and his Party, who had taken Possession of the Passes of Aoste, was verify'd; for, no sooner was the Siege of Coni rais'd, than they quitted the Valley, which was almost as soon re-occupy'd by the Troops of Savoy. Nor was this all, for Mr. Catinat himself, finding his Army much weaken'd, as well as dispirited with the late Disappointment, and apprehending that the Allies were more dispos'd, and better able to fall upon him, than they really were, thought it advisable to repass the Po. Accordingly, having set his Army in Motion, that their Visitation might not be soon forgot, they set fire to all the Villages they found in their way: And while they were thus employ'd, Prince Eugene, with a considerable Body of Horse fell on their Rear, broke several Squadrons, and did some Execution; but, in the Heat of the Pursuit, falling into a Lane, which was lined on both Sides with Foot, found himself oblig'd to face about, and retreat in his turn, having left several of his Party dead behind him.

It began now to appear that Fortune had chang'd Sides in Italy; and no Doubt was made, but that on the Arrival of the Germans, who, by this time had almost surmounted the Difficulties of their March, the Invaders would be forced to evacuate all their Conquests, and find themselves invaded in their Turn.

Intrigues of the Conclave in the Election of a new Pope.

Rome, tho' far remov'd from the Scene of Action, and the Place least expos'd to any Danger from the Dispute, was one of the first that seem'd to be affected by the Consequences of this Change. Pope Alexander VII. had departed this Life on the first of February, having on his Death-bed not only asserted the Rights of the Holy See, in the strongest Terms against the Pretences of the French Clergy, but caus'd a Decree to be publish'd, in which he confirm'd all Pope Innocent's Bulls, and annull'd and made void all their Proceedings in France against them. The Cardinals that were on the Spot had soon after enter'd into the Conclave, and those of the Imperial and Spanish Factions were for proceeding to Election before the Arrival of the French; but being threaten'd with a Protest and Secession by those in the French Interest, that Motion was wav'd, and the Affair continu'd in Suspence till after Midsummer; in all which time, the Ecclesiastic Hive was in perpetual Motion Day and Night; and Chaos itself scarce underwent greater Variety of Changes, before Light and Order appear'd. It was a Fundamental, that two Thirds of the College should be of one Mind; and till the Secret could be found to bring this about, it was the Business of all the contending Parties to propagate Confusion. This All found easy and Most pleasant: For, next to the serving themselves, Politicians find the most Satisfaction in disappointing others: Nothing less would serve the Partizans of France, than the adjusting the Differences between his most Christian Majesty and the Holy See, before they proceeded to an Election; but then they found themselves as little able to succeed in it, as to make a Pope; all the Italians being firm on this Point, however wavering on others. No less than five several Candidates, viz. Barberigo, Acciaioli, Conti, Marcicotti, and Howard, were successively put in Nomination, and all set aside by the Cabals that were form'd against them. At last, when the Siege of Coni was raised, and the Germans were at hand, the Italians thought they might follow their Inclinations without any Prejudice to their Interests: But even then, they did not lay aside the Mask at once, but contriv'd to make the French name the very Person they meant to chuse; at least, the Affair is thus recounted in our Gazette, which is follow'd implicitly by all our Writers. Cantelmi, and Grudice were the Managers of the Intrigue; the Former put the French upon naming Pignatelli; and when they did so, the Latter affected to think, that, tho' he was a Neapolitan, and Archbishop of Naples, the Spaniards would never give way to his Election, because of the Differences which had happen'd between him and the Viceroy of that Kingdom. This, as foreseen, serv'd only to make the French more keen in their Pursuit; and when they had nam'd him, the Spaniards concurred at once with all their Voices, as did almost all the Zealots, which were the Party that had hitherto stickled with the most Obstinacy for Barberigo. This was a Thunder-clap to the French, who, not expecting any such thing, would have taken three Days time, before they proceeded to a final Decision of the Affair: But this not being comply'd with, on the 12th of July, N. S. the Scrutiny was made; and it appearing that Pignatelli had fifty-three Voices out of sixty-one, he was placed in the Pontifical Chair the same Day, and acknowledg'd with the usual Ceremonies by the Cardinals, the Foreign Ministers, and the People. He assum'd the Name of Innocent in honour of Pope Innocent XI. by whom he had been made a Cardinal in the Year 1681, and enter'd on the Pontificate with a Declaration, That he would be his own Minister. It also soon appear'd that his Quarrel with the Viceroy of Naples had no way dispos'd him to espouse the Interest of France; on the contrary, he seem'd as intractable on that Head, as either of his Predecessors had been; and, at the same time, it was discours'd all over Europe, that the French Court were so far from approving what their Emissaries in the Conclave had done, with regard to his Elevation, that they had sent positive Orders to exclude him; which, however, did not happen to arrive, till the Election was over.

A. D. 1691.

Pignatelli declar'd Pope by the Name of Innocent XI.

We must now return to Savoy, where the

A. D. 1691. Germans arriv'd in the latter End of July and Beginning of Auguſt, and were not only ſuffer'd to repoſe themſelves till the Arrival of the Elector of Bavaria, but for ſome Days after: For when thoſe Auxiliaries were ſufficiently refreſh'd, when Duke Schomberg, by his Addreſs, Authority and Example, had reform'd the Manners and Diſcipline of the French Refugees and Vaudois, who being in the Pay of the Allies, form'd a ſeparate Corps under his Command; and when all the General Officers of the Allies were met together, and the Retreat of Mr. Catinat gave them ſufficient Encouragement to follow him, ſtill they ſuffer'd the Remainder of the Seaſon to waſte, without making that Uſe of their preſent Superiority, which was expected from them by all the World.

It is true, that in the Council of War, which was held on the 22d of Auguſt, a Reſolution was taken to ſend a large Detachment through the Valley of Aoſta, to break up the Blockade of Montmelian: But no ſooner was it known, that Mr. Catinat had been already re-inforc'd with ſeven Regiments, and that he had apply'd to his Court, as alſo to the Marſhal de Lorges, for farther Succours, than Orders were ſent to countermand the ſaid Detachment; and a new Reſolution was taken, to follow Mr. Catinat, and, if poſſible, force him to a Battle. It was, however, the ſixth of September before the Army decamp'd from Mille-Fleurs; and when they took Poſt at Brilane, near Carignan, the ſame Evening, in Sight of the Enemy, the Po was between the two Armies, and conſequently prevented an Engagement.

They continu'd facing each other thus, till the 14th, when the Allies remov'd to Villafranca; and the next Day the French quitted their Camp at la Motbe in the Neighbourhood of Carmagnola, and march'd to Saluces. This produc'd another Motion of the Allies; for, in order to cut off the Communication of the Enemy with Pignerol, they decamp'd on the 16th, a little after Midnight, and in the Plain of Cabeurs drew up in Order of Battle; in which Poſture they advanc'd towards the Enemy, and being come within a League of them, pitch'd their Tents at Revel, where, according to the London Gazette, Mr. Catinat had propos'd to take Poſt that Evening, and within the very Lines which he had caus'd to be mark'd out for that Purpoſe.

The French avoid an Engagement.

But this Account ought to be eſteem'd apocryphal; for the French could not have taken Poſt there, without paſſing the Po, and, in ſo doing, it is manifeſt by the Event, that they muſt have come to a Battle, which it was their great Buſineſs to avoid: Beſides, they intrenched themſelves the ſame Night under the Cannon of Saluces, and took ſuch remarkable Care to ſecure all the Avenues of their Camp, that tho' the Elector and the Duke of Savoy in Perſon, ſeveral times took a Survey of their Lines, with a Deſign to force them, and conſum'd five whole Days in making the neceſſary Preparation, they found it at laſt impracticable, and for that Reaſon alter'd their Plan, and reſolv'd to inveſt Carmagnola. Accordingly, on the 25th, Prince Eugene paſs'd the Po with three thouſand Horſe, and march'd with ſuch Expedition, that he prevented Mr. Catinat from throwing a Succour of two thouſand Men into the Place; and on the 28th the whole Army came up. It was, however, the third of October before the Trenches were open'd, and the eighth before it capitulated, which was five Days, whereas the French, as we have ſeen, had reduc'd it much ſooner. The Terms granted to the Garriſon were ſufficiently honourable, but not over-ſtrictly obſerv'd; and when the Sufferers made their Complaints to Prince Eugene, the Anſwer he gave was to this Effect, "That it did not become them to complain of what they had authoriſed by their own Example (at the former Siege) and that tho' he would never connive at Injuries, he could not prevent Reprizals."

A. D. 1691.

The Allies reduce Carmagnola.

About three Days before the Surrender of the Place, Mr. Catinat abandon'd Saluces, having permitted his Soldiers to pillage the Inhabitants; after which, he took Poſt under the Cannon of Pignerol, from whence he detach'd ſeven or eight Battalions to reinforce the Garriſon of Suſa, and Three to ſecure all the Paſſes in the Neighbourhood.

The Allies, on the other hand, having taken Poſſeſſion of Saluces, and certain other Places which the French had abandon'd, repaſs'd the Po on the 11th, and inſtead of advancing to Pignerol, as they firſt gave out, directed their Courſe towards Suſa, with a Deſign to make themſelves Maſters of it before the End of the Campaign. Mr. Catinat, upon this, remov'd to a Poſt between Rivoli and Vielana, in hope of an Opportunity, to ſnatch ſome Advantage in the Courſe of their March; but, on Reflection, concluding it was moſt adviſable to act on the Defenſive only, ſoon withdrew, and made it his chief Care to cover Suſa, and the important Paſſes before mention'd; by throwing up Redoubts, and making ſuch Diſpoſitions of every kind, as ſhould be ſufficient to defeat the moſt vigorous Efforts that the Allies could make. The Allies, nevertheleſs, continu'd their March, and not only poſted themſelves, on the 25th, at the Foot of the Hills, within half a League of Suſa; but hearing the next Morning, that the French had quitted the Paſs of Col de Fenoſtre, and imagining, that they had done ſo out of fear, took Poſſeſſion of it with a Party of two thouſand Men: Scarce, however, had this Party advanc'd through the Paſs into a ſmall Plain, like a Baſon, which lyes beyond it, before they diſcover'd, that all the Hills round about were cover'd with Parties of the Enemy, who pour'd down like ſo many Torrents on every Side: Upon which, being convinc'd, that, inſtead of obtaining an Advantage, they had been drawn into a Snare, they faced about and retir'd with all that Precipitation which is the common Effect of Surprize when accompany'd with Danger. Unfortunately, the more Haſte they made, the more Confuſion they fell into; The Plain had admitted more than the Paſs would diſcharge, make a fruitleſs Attempt on Suſa.

A. D. 1691. charge, in the time neceſſary to avoid the Miſchief impending. The Enemy were already at hand, and in a Diſpoſition to make the moſt of their preſent Advantage. This oblig'd thoſe in the Rear, for their own ſakes, to turn again, and do their beſt to cover the Retreat of thoſe before: A ſharp Skirmiſh enſu'd, many were kill'd on both Sides; and as both Sides challeng'd the Superiority, it may be ſuppos'd both were equally Sufferers: But then, immediately upon this Adventure (which was more than balanc'd by the Advantages obtain'd by the Vaudois over a Party of three thouſand French, whom they entirely routed, after a Diſpute of ſeveral Hours) the Allies gave over their Deſign upon Suſa, and reſolv'd to cloſe the Campaign; whereas Mr. Catinat, inſtead of following their Example, not only continu'd in the Field, but ſet down before Montmelian, and prepar'd to reduce it in Form. This was the only Place in Savoy which held out for the Duke. St. Rieth had attempted it in vain; and tho' the Blockade had ſtraiten'd the Gariſon in point of Proviſions, it had no way deter'd them from making a vigorous Defence. Mr. de la Hoguette had the care of making the neceſſary Proviſions for this ſpirited Enterprize; and Mr. Catinat in perſon, with his whole Force, came before the Place on the 16th of November; the Trenches were open'd the next Day; on the 20th their Lines were finiſh'd, and, on the ſeventh of December, they made a Lodgment on the Side of the Ditch. The Miners were then ſet to work (for the Place being ſituated on a Rock, a Scalade was impracticable) who made their Efforts under that Baſtion which was eſteem'd the weakeſt; and, in the mean while, the Gariſon, who had diſputed every Inch of Ground with the Beſiegers, carry'd on a Countermine, which they deſign'd to ſpring after That of the Enemy had taken Effect, and their Troops were lodg'd in the Baſtion; in hope to have deſtroy'd both Lodgment and Troops together. But ſcarce had they taken this Precaution before a Bomb fell into the midſt of their Train, which immediately blew up one of the Angles of the Baſtion, and open'd a Breach large enough for twelve Men to enter a-breaſt; of which Mr. Catinat being appriz'd, he order'd ſix hundred Grenadiers, accompany'd with as many Pioneers, to take Poſſeſſion of it; which they did, though many periſh'd in the Attempt, and amongſt them ſeveral Officers. Nothing now remain'd but to fix the Miners to the Donjon or great Tower, within the Caſtle, whither the Gariſon had made their Retreat; which was done the ſame Day; and the next the Marquis of Bagnaſca, the Governor, not caring to be bury'd in the Ruins of the Place, tho' he had hitherto ſo ſtoutly defended it, beat a Parley, and ſurrender'd it on the moſt honourable Terms.

and ſeparate.

Mr. Catinat inveſts Montmelian, which capitulates.

It may be thought ſtrange, that the Allies ſhould not, in all this Interval, make any one Effort to relieve a Place of ſuch Strength and Importance, and to diſappoint the French of a Trophy which they were at ſo great an Expence of Blood and Treaſure to raiſe; And Biſhop Burnet, after an Acknowledgment (which is ſcarce reconcileable to what he had ſaid before) "That the Affairs of Savoy did not go on ſo proſperouſly as was hop'd for," ſuggeſts, firſt, That the Loſs of Montmelian was owing to the Imperial General, Caraffa, and then proceeds as follows, "The young Duke Schomberg ſent thither to command thoſe Troops that the King paid, undertook to relieve the Place, and was aſſur'd that many Proteſtants of Dauphiny would come and join him: But Caraffa, and indeed the Court of Turin, ſeem'd to be more afraid of the Strength of Hereſy, than of the Power of France, and choſe to let that important Place fall into their Hands, rather than ſuffer it to be reliev'd by thoſe they did not like." But there are ſome Paragraphs in the London Gazette, dated from Turin, which treat of an expreſs Deſign of the Duke of Savoy's to raiſe the Siege. According to theſe, his Royal Highneſs had borrow'd ſome Troops of the Governor of Milan for that Service, had appointed his own to rendezvous in the Valley of Aoſta, and gave it over at laſt, becauſe the great Quantities of Snow which had fallen, had render'd the Mountains impaſſable.

A. D. 1691.

It is, however, indiſputably true, that the imperial Court had an End of their own to ſerve in ſending Forces into Italy, as well as to countenance the Duke of Savoy: And thoſe Perſons muſt be very little acquainted with the Maxims and Conduct of that Court, or indeed of any Court, who are at a loſs to determine which of theſe Ends was likely to be conſider'd moſt. In aſſiſting to drive Catinat from the Neighbourhood of Turin, and to reduce Carmagnola, they would have it underſtood, that they had done enough for one Campaign, and that now they were free to act for themſelves. Againſt whom? and, in what manner? it may be aſked; and the Anſwer is ready; Againſt all the ſeveral Princes and States of Italy, who, by obſerving a ſtrict Neutrality with relation to the preſent Quarrel, thought to have avoided all the ill Effects of it: And as to the manner of their Proceeding, if they did not commit open Hoſtilities, they committed ſuch Treſpaſſes, as nothing but Power could maintain, or Weakneſs would have ſubmitted to. Leopold the Emperor then reigning, was to the full as ambitious as Lewis XIV. is repreſented, tho' he diſguis'd it better: He ſought Opportunities to enlarge his Power with as much Induſtry, and he was yet more unmerciful in the Exerciſe of it. The One could not be a more irreconcileable Enemy to Mankind than the Other, and the World was never more egregiouſly bubbled, than in having recourſe to the Houſe of Auſtria for Deliverance, againſt the Oppreſſions of the Houſe of Bourbon. Of Leopold in particular, Mr. de Fouquieres ſuggeſts, That he look'd upon himſelf to be the Lord-Paramount of Europe; and that when his Vaſſals and Allies made him Tenders of Service, even in his greateſt Diſtreſſes, he accepted them as Acts of indiſpenſible Duty, and as if the Honour of Character of the Emperor Leopold.

A. D. 1691. being useful to Cæsar, abundantly overpaid the Obligation: And even Bishop Burnet goes so far as to declare, "That his two chief Passions were Hatred of Heresy, and Hatred of France; as also, that it was said, That those about him, who serv'd the Interests of that Court (the French) perswaded him to let the War go on between France and those he esteem'd Heretics, since he would be a Gainer, which Side soever should lose; either France would be humbled, or the Heretics be exhausted, while he should extend his Dominions and conquer Infidels;" adding, "The King (William) had a sort of Regard and Submission to the Emperor, that he had to no other Prince whatsoever."

His Exactions in Italy, under the Pretence of Winter-Quarters.

The Instance now to be given of his encroaching and overbearing Disposition, will bring us back to the Point we set out with. The Princes and States of Italy, before-mention'd, were look'd upon at Vienna as Vassals of his Imperial Majesty, and their Dominions as Fiefs of the Empire: But none of them having been of late disturb'd on account of these Clames, the Tenure was suppos'd to be worn out, and they began to think themselves in a State of Independency.

Unfortunately for them, however, the Duke of Savoy having stipulated with his Imperial Majesty, that he should not be oblig'd to find Winter-Quarters for the Imperial Troops sent to his Succour; and it being necessary that such Quarters should somewhere be provided for them, those obsolete Clames were not only reviv'd all at once, but Caraffa took effectual care to convince all the Parties concern'd, that he was resolv'd to make the most of them; for, at the same time that he let them know by his Emissaries what their Duty was, he insisted, that, in Conformity thereto, they should either furnish the Sums demanded of them to the Military Chest, or find Accommodations for his Troops: And which was the least Evil, was no easy Matter to determine. Those who demanded Admission as Masters, they knew would treat them as Slaves; or, in other Words, Live upon them at Discretion, according to the usual Practice of such sort of Guests: And, on the other hand, the Sums demanded, especially of the Duke of Tuscany, and the State of Genoa, were so exorbitant, that the Latter once thought of raising Forces, and defending their Frontiers by the Sword: At last, however, they thought it their wisest Course to compound the Matter as well as they could; as did also every other Power that had Money enough to purchase an Exemption; and then Caraffa gave full Commission to his Locusts, to eat up the rest.

There remains but one Incident more of any Consequence to discourse of, before we turn our Backs on Italy for this Year; and that relates to the City of Casal. The Duke of Mantua, to whom this Place and its Dependencies belong'd, had been prevail'd upon to sell the Citadel to France, but reserv'd the City to himself, with an express Provision, that he should hold it with a Garison of his own, that he should receive the Revenues thereof, and maintain his Sovereignty therein without the least Diminution, as before. Now, as long as his Highness had the Address to keep the French Court in Expectation, that he would be of their Party, the City and Citadel were good Friends and Neighbours; but no sooner had he embrac'd the Neutrality, before spoke of, than they resolv'd to take the first Opportunity to be reveng'd of him. Accordingly, when Caraffa, with a Body of his Forces, was advancing towards Montferrat, with a Purpose to take his Winter-Quarters there, the French Commandant in the Citadel took Possession of the City in the name of the King his Master, disarm'd the Mantuan Garison, imprison'd Fossati the Governor, whom he had invited to dine with him; and in Excuse of this Treachery and Violence, gave out, that the said Governor had agreed to deliver up one of the Gates to the Germans.

The French seize the City of Casal.

A. D. 1691.

Our next Transition must be to the Borders of the Rhine; for how inconsiderable soever the Transactions on that Side have been represented by some, we ought not, like Bishop Burnet, to pass them over without Notice. The French were oblig'd to have a considerable Force in those Parts, as well to cover their own Frontier, as to keep the Germans in play: But their Minister at Constantinople, to hinder the Turks from coming to an Accommodation with the Emperor, had undertaken for such a Diversion as should oblige his Imperial Majesty to leave Hungary in a manner to their Mercy. It so happen'd, however, that his Imperial Majesty made the Service of Hungary his first Concern, and that of the Rhine his second; and that, in like manner, the most Christian King paid more Regard to his Efforts in Flanders, than in Germany. Hence it follow'd, that while the Marshal de Luxemburg and Mr. de Boufflers, with the Flower of the French Troops were in Action, Mr. de Lorges, who commanded on the Rhine, had scarce taken the Field; as also, that while, on the Imperial Side, no Endeavours were spar'd to gratify Prince Lewis of Baden, by accommodating him with all he had wanted during the last Campaign, the Care of the Empire was left to the Elector of Saxony, assisted by the Generals Caprara and Schoening, with a mix'd Army, amounting in all to about thirty thousand Men; which was not completely form'd till the last Day of June.

Campaign on the Rhine.

Till then, Caprara lay at Wisselock, expecting the Junction of the Saxons; and in that Interval, the Marshal de Lorges, with a strong Body of Horse and Dragoons, certain Companies of Grenadiers, and a large Quantity of Ammunition, Bombs, &c. took Post between Mentz and Neder-Ulm, and sent out his Parties on all Sides to raise Contributions, consume the Forage, and, in general, to lay waste the Country, as if he had no other Purpose to serve. His real Purpose, however, was, to make himself Master of the former of those two Places, partly by Force, and partly by Treachery; for, having corrupted certain of the Inhabitants by the Means Treacherous Design of the French to seize Mentz.

A. D. 1691. Means of one of the Emperor's Commiſſaries, who had been long in French Pay, it was propos'd to ply the City with Bombs; and that, to augment the Confuſion created thereby, the Conſpirators ſhould fire ſeveral Houſes in ſeveral Quarters; as alſo, cut the Cables of the wooden Bridge over the Rhine, to hinder two Regiments which lay on the other Side, from coming to the Relief of the Place; and, laſtly, put the Enemy in Poſſeſſion of one of the Gates: But the Concert not being fully form'd, it was found neceſſary to have an Interview with the Commiſſary before the Attempt was made; and in endeavouring to bring this about, a Letter was ſeiz'd, which not only diſcover'd the Intrigue, and brought the Arch-Traitor to ſuch a Death as he deſerv'd, but render'd the whole Project abortive.

General Thungen, on the other hand, who commanded in Mentz, with a Detachment of twelve hundred out of the ſaid two Regiments, and ſeven hundred Huſſars, form'd a Deſign to ſurprize the Enemy's Camp, but met with a Diſappointment in his Turn: For when his Party came up to the Enemy's Lines, they not only found them upon their Guard, but met with ſuch a Reception, that they were glad to make the beſt Retreat they could. Marſhal de Lorges, in decamping from the Neighbourhood of Mentz, had alſo Leiſure to reduce the little Caſtle of Algeſheim; and having continu'd his March to Creutznach, and, by the way, receiv'd Advice, that the Allies were join'd between Manheim and Seckenheim, and were making Preparations to paſs the Rhine, recall'd four Regiments which he had detach'd to re-inforce Mr. de Boufflers on the Moſelle, and directed Mr. d'Uxelles to poſt himſelf with eight thouſand Men over againſt Manheim, in order to deter the Imperialiſts from that Enterprize; but without the deſired Effect, for the Elector of Saxony having taken Poſſeſſion of a little Iſland in the Middle of the River, between Sandthoven and Frankendale, having alſo repair'd a broken Bridge which led to it, and thrown a new Bridge over the other Branch of the River, paſs'd over with his whole Army, without any Interruption from the Enemy, who had quitted their Poſt, and retir'd to Neuſtadt.

The Germans paſs the Rhine at Sandthoven.

But it is remarkable, that tho' this very Meaſure of paſſing the Rhine had been for ſome time reſolv'd upon, ſo ill were the ſeveral Corps, which form'd the Army, provided for the putting it in Execution, that they had not a Bridge of Boats amongſt them; and when they had been ſupply'd with one from Mentz, it was the 13th of July, N. S. before it could be made uſe of. Again, the Retreat of the French was ſufficient to ſhew, that they were not in a Condition to face the Allies; and yet, inſtead of following them immediately, his Electoral Highneſs waited ſeveral Days in repairing the Fortifications of Frankendale and Manheim, that, in caſe he was worſted, he might be ſure of a Place of Retreat. Then as to the inveſting of Landau, Philipſburg, or any other of the French Garriſons, which, next to the following the French, was the moſt natural thing to be expected from them, they were as ill provided for a Siege, as for paſſing the Rhine; and it was known all over Europe, that for want of their battering Cannon, which was ſtill at Hadlbron, it was not in their Power to make uſe of ſo fair an Opportunity. A. D. 1691.

The French expected no leſs from their paſſing the Rhine, than either to be forc'd to a Battle, or to hear of a Siege; for which reaſon, at a Council of War, which was held about the time that the Allies had completed their Bridges, theſe were the principal Points debated; and the Reſolution taken upon the Iſſue, was, to throw Reinforcements into the Places moſt expos'd, and to paſs the Rhine themſelves, in order to lay waſte the Duchy of Wirtemburg, &c. and thereby oblige the Germans to follow them. Accordingly, having quitted Neuſtadt, they firſt took Poſt between Philipſburg and Landau, as if their Intention was to cover both thoſe Places; and when they heard the Allies were at length preparing to advance towards them, wheel'd off to Philipſburg, and paſs'd the River. The French do the ſame as Philipſburg.

It was the third of Auguſt, when the Elector of Saxony, who had that Day remov'd from Oberſheim to Mutmenſheim, receiv'd the firſt Advice of this ſudden Motion, which being confirm'd from every Quarter, the next Day a Council of War was ſummon'd; and General Schoening gave it as his Opinion, That, ſeeing the Enemy could have nothing in view, but to make a Diverſion, it would be more adviſeable for them to imitate, than follow them; that the Allies had it in their Power to do as much Miſchief as the French; and that when the Latter found their Purpoſe defeated, they would return of courſe. Caprara, on the contrary, inſiſted on the Neceſſity of following them, in order to preſerve thoſe Parts which had not as yet partook of the Miſeries of War. Schoening reply'd, That if it was in their Power to preſerve thoſe Parts, he ſhould be of the ſame Opinion; but that the French had already gain'd three Days March upon them; that, conſequently, the Miſchief would be done before it would be poſſible to overtake them; and that it would be more for their Honour to take Vengeance on their Enemies, than to be uſeleſs Spectators of the Sufferings of their Friends. Caprara's Opinion, however, prevail'd; and neceſſary Meaſures were taken for repaſſing the Rhine the ſame Day. The Bridge of Boats over which they had paſs'd from Sandthoven to Frankendale, had, in this Interval, been remov'd to Manheim; and the Evening before, the two thouſand Men who had the Guard of it, had been re-inforc'd by way of Precaution: And no ſooner was the Council broke up, than all the Cavalry paſs'd over, and the next Day were follow'd by the Foot, and all together encamp'd once more in the Neighbourhood of Seckenheim, where they continued till the ninth, and then, having receiv'd Advice, that the French had reduc'd Pfortzheim, in the Marquiſate of Baden-Dourlach,

A. D. 1691. Deurlach, and directed their March to Knitlingen, ravaging and laying waſte the Country all the way, it was reſolv'd to follow them; which they began to do the next Day, but never come up with them, tho' the Queſt continu'd till the 13th of September following; at which time the Imperialiſts not only gave it over, but broke up their Camp; and the ſeveral Corps march'd ſeverally towards their Winter-Quarters; leaving the French to repaſs the Rhine at their Leiſure with the Contributions they had rais'd.

It ought, however, to be remember'd, That, during this whole Interval, many deſperate Maladies, rag'd with equal Violence in both Camps, and carry'd off thouſands: That Officers and Soldiers were viſited alike: That Caprara was ſo violently attack'd, that he was forc'd to leave the Army towards the End of Auguſt; and that he was ſoon after follow'd by the Elector himſelf, whoſe Conſtitution had been ſo grievouſly ſhock'd by the Diſorders he had brought into the Field with him, and the Increaſe they receiv'd there, that it ſunk under them. He languiſh'd about three Weeks after he had been remov'd from the Camp; and when it was given out and believ'd, that he was on the Recovery, he died at Tubingue, September 23, N. S.

Death of the Elector of Saxony.

Conduct of Sweden and Denmark during this Campaign.

It is in this Place alſo to be remember'd, that the two Northern Crowns of Sweden and Denmark had enter'd into mutual Engagements, to obſerve an exact Neutrality, with reſpect to the preſent Commotions of Europe, and to maintain the Freedom of their own Commerce with all the Powers at War indifferently, eſpecially France; which alone was ſufficient to ſhew, that France began already to gain Ground on that Side. But this was not all; for tho' Biſhop Burnet is pleas'd to ſay, "The King of Sweden, whom the French were preſſing to offer his Mediation for a Peace, wrote to the Duke of Hanover, aſſuring him, he would never hearken to that Propoſition, till he had full Aſſurances from the French, that they would own the preſent Government of England," we find that the Miniſter Plenipotentiary of his Swediſh Majeſty at Ratiſbonne, did actually make a formal Tender of his Mediation to the Diet, in the latter End of May, which he introduc'd with the Mention of another Tender of the like nature, which his Maſter had cauſ'd to be made at the Hague, about a Year before, and alſo enforc'd it with a ſort of Remonſtrance, which was calculated to ſhew, That the preſent Offer ought to meet with a more favourable Acceptance from the Confederates than the laſt, ſeeing the Poſture of their Affairs was grown rather worſe than better, by the Loſs of Mons, Nice, &c. This ſurely was the Language of a Partiſan; and what yet farther confirms it, is this: The King of Sweden, as Prince of the Empire, was oblig'd to furniſh three thouſand Men, as his Quota for the Service on the Rhine: But ſo loth was he grown, to give any Umbrage to France, that thoſe Troops did not join the Army till the third of September, which was but fifteen Days, before it broke up to go into Winter-Quarters: Nor is it altogether clear, that they would even then have done ſo, if the Diet, taking into Conſideration the State of Affairs, in the Beginning of Auguſt, had not reſolv'd to pray the Emperor, "That he would give ſuch Orders, as ſhould oblige the Members of the Empire punctually to obſerve the Avocatoria publiſh'd in the former Year: That no Neutralities, or Correſpondencies to the Prejudice of the ſame, might be ſuffer'd: That all the States might be oblig'd to contribute their utmoſt towards the Common Defence; and that ſuch as ſhould be wanting therein, ſhould be proceeded againſt according to the Laws and Conſtitutions of the Empire."

[State of Europe for June, 1691.]

The ſame Hiſtorian-Biſhop, in the ſame Paragraph, alſo ſays (with what Truth, as far as it relates to the King of Sweden, we have already ſeen,) "The two Northern Kings had ſome Satisfaction given them in point of Trade, that ſo they might maintain their Neutrality; and they were favourable to the Allies, tho' they were not engag'd with them." And now, as to the Conduct of Denmark, notwithſtanding the Family-Alliance between that Court and England, or the Subſidy they receiv'd from thence, or ſuch Conſiderations as might ariſe from the Treaty of Marriage, at this Time depending between the Princeſs Royal of Denmark and the young Elector of Saxony, who was himſelf deſcended from a Daughter of Denmark, it is certain, that his Daniſh Majeſty carry'd his Partiality to the Allies no farther than he was juſtify'd by his own immediate Intereſts: He had inflam'd the Differences which had long ſubſiſted between the Dutch and him, by ſeizing twenty-four of their Ships: And he had cauſ'd a large Body of his Forces to advance towards the Elbe, which had not only given great Inquietude to the City of Hamburgh, in particular, but, in general, to the whole Circle of Weſtphalia; for he made no Scruple to declare, That he would never ſuffer the Princes of Lunenburgh to continue in the Poſſeſſion of Saxe-Lawenburgh; and thoſe Princes, on the other hand, made uſe of this Declaration to excuſe themſelves, for not fulfilling their Engagements to the Confederates: And, laſtly, as to the Satisfaction given to the Northern Kings in point of Trade, it conſiſted chiefly in this, That their Merchant-Ships ſhould paſs unmoleſted to and from the Ports of France, provided they had no Powder, Lead, Salt-petre, or Naval Stores on board: And, upon the footing of this Compromiſe, a formal Accommodation was concluded between his Daniſh Majeſty and the States-General.

We muſt now beſtow ſome Attention on that Branch of the general War, which was all this while raging between the Emperor and the Grand Seignior: And, as a neceſſary Introduction to this Summer's Campaign, find ourſelves oblig'd to obſerve, That as the French were indefatigable in their Endeavours at the Port, to keep up the Spirit of the Divan, and continue the powerful Di-

Biſhop Burnet, indeed, is pleas'd to ſuggeſt, That out of the ſuper-abundant Reſpect which King William had for the Emperor, he did not preſs him, as many deſir'd he ſhould, to accept of a Peace with the Turks: But nothing is more certain, than that the principal Article in Sir William Huſſey's Inſtructions, who was ſent Embaſſador from England to the Port in the Beginning of this Year, was to make an expreſs Offer of his Maſter's Mediation: And it is not to be ſuppos'd, that his Majeſty would have taken ſuch a Step, without the Emperor's Concurrence, at leaſt; for Sir William was actually ſent to Vienna firſt, and, no doubt, was order'd to direct himſelf according to the additional Inſtructions that he ſhould receive from the Imperial Court. It is alſo as certain that he was oblig'd to act under the Cheque of a German Secretary; for it is acknowledg'd in the London Gazette, that the Count de Marſigli accompany'd his Excellency in that Capacity from thence.

Sir William Huſſey ſent to Conſtantinople with an Offer of King William's Mediation.

As to his Negotiation, on the 22d of April, N. S. he departed from Vienna, on his way to Conſtantinople; and in every Turkiſh Town thro' which he paſs'd, was receiv'd with almoſt unprecedented Honours; which ſhew'd how acceptable his Errand was, and how weary the Turks were of the War: Inſtead of waiting the Grand Viſier's Leiſure for an Audience, according to the haughty Cuſtom of the Seraglio, the Chiaus-Baſſora was ſent to invite him to one: And as to the Offer which he made of his Maſter's Mediation, it was accepted with all the Marks of cordial Gratitude that could be expreſs'd. Reaſonable Terms indeed were inſiſted upon, and thoſe that were offer'd by way of Preliminary, being eſteem'd otherwiſe, Marſigli was immediately poſted back to Vienna, with an Account of what had paſs'd, and alſo to apply for ſuch Abatements as might render the Iſſue of the Negotiation proſperous. What theſe Preliminaries were, is no where preciſely ſpecify'd; but, according to the Diſcourſe of theſe Times, they were as follow: Viz. 1. That Tranſilvania ſhould equally depend on both Empires, and for the future, the Prince elected by the States of that Province, ſhould have the joint Approbation of both, with a Proviſo, that the late Election of Tekeli ſhould be confirm'd. 2. That the Emperor ſhould poſſeſs all Hungary, except the Fortreſs of Eſſeck. 3. That the Grand Seignior ſhould pay to his Imperial Majeſty the Charges of the War for one Year, at three different Payments. 4. That a free Communication and Commerce between the two Empires, ſhould be reſtor'd. 5. That the Grand Seignior ſhould reſign to the Venetians either the Morea, or Candy. 6. That he ſhould gratify the King and Republic of Poland with Caminiec and its Dependencies: And, laſtly, That all Priſoners ſhould be enlarg'd on both Sides. Marſigli made ſuch ſpeed, that he arriv'd at Vienna in thirteen Days; and ſeveral Councils were immediately held on the Contents of his Diſpatches; which were alſo imparted by Expreſs to the Poles and Venetians. A. D. 1691.

When firſt Miniſters have a military Turn, it is in general true, that they are fond of War; and thoſe who ſucceed in one Experiment, are very apt to venture upon another: As, therefore, the Viſier had obtain'd ſo much Glory by the laſt Campaign, it is natural enough to conclude, that his Heart was ſet on proſecuting the War; and that the Readineſs he ſhew'd to embrace the Mediation of England, was rather affected than real: But how glad ſoever he might have been at any other Criſis, to have eſtabliſh'd his Power and Authority by Feats of Arms, the preſent was no way favourable to ſuch a Deſign: He had left the Seraglio in a Ferment, of which he ſtill apprehended the Conſequence. Solyman, the Grand Seignior, being in the laſt Stage of a Dropſy, and it being held neceſſary to provide for the Succeſſion, in caſe of a Demiſe, He, the Viſier, propos'd Achmet, the Brother of Solyman, to the Grandees of the Court, and was ſeconded by the Mufti, and others of his own Faction: But the reſt contended for Muſtapha, the eldeſt Son of Ibrahim, formerly depos'd, and adher'd ſo obſtinately to their Opinion, that the Viſier, fearing a Revolt (which, from the Diſcontents of the Aſiatic Soldiery, who were extremely loth to take the Field againſt the Germans, and the general Temper of the People, who were eager for a Peace upon any Terms, was greatly to be apprehended) caus'd the moſt violent of his Oppoſers to be baniſh'd to Rhodes, Cyprus, and Lemnos, and others to be put to death; and when he began his March towards Hungary, took along with him the dying Sultan and the two Rivals, Achmet and Muſtapha, that he might be equally able to ſecure the Throne to the firſt, and to diſappoint the laſt. At Adrianople, Solyman died, and Achmet was immediately proclam'd, and acknowledg'd by the Army.

But all this Succeſs did not ſerve to remove his Apprehenſions; he knew the Root of Miſchief was ſtill in the Ground, and that the Fruit was to be expected, as ſoon as ever the Seaſon was favourable: As on the one hand he knew, that a Victory would eſtabliſh the new Sultan and himſelf, ſo, on the other, he fear'd that a Defeat would be the Ruin of both: For which reaſon, tho' he came with the main Strength of the Ottoman-Empire into the Field, and determin'd to loſe no Opportunity of exerting it with Vigour, he had had his Ear open to Peace, and would gladly have countenanc'd his Acceptance of it.

It was in this Diſpoſition that Sir William Huſſey found him at Adrianople: But when it appear'd, that Marſigli did not make the ſame haſt to return from Vienna, as he had done in poſting thither, he would not ſuffer himſelf to be amuſed with vain Expectations,

A. D. 1691. tions, but having intimated to Sir William, that he would do well to proceed on to his Station at the Port, put his Army in Motion, and once more left all to the Decision of the Sword.

The Imperial Court, in the mean while, did not wholly overlook the Overtures which had been made by the Mediator, but seem'd equally desirous of a Peace, at the same time that they resolv'd to take all Advantages that could be deriv'd from the Course of the Campaign. The Secret of the Negotiation was given to Prince Lewis of Baden, together with full Powers to treat upon such Terms, as the State of the War should authorise him to insist upon: But though he set out post for the Army, July the eighth, and the Treaty could not be return'd till the Return of Marsigli, the Latter did not receive his Dispatches till eight Days after.

Full Powers given to P. Lewis of Baden, who repairs to the Army in Hungary.

Upon the 13th, Prince Lewis reach'd the Army, which he found compos'd of 40000 old Soldiers, besides Irregulars, and the Brandenburgh Auxiliaries; and on the 29th following, encamp'd at Peter-Waradin, in his way to the Enemy, who, on their Side, had pass'd the Save to meet him. And now it appear'd that both Parties were alike inclinable to prefer a Battle to a Treaty; for, in this Interval, Marsigli arriv'd in the Turkish Camp from Vienna; and, having appriz'd the Visier of the good Intentions of the Imperial Court, to facilitate the Peace, and of the full Powers granted to Prince Lewis for that End, that Minister, instead of shewing any Forwardness to enter into a Negotiation with him, diverted the Point with as much Artifice, as could have been expected from a Christian: He pretended to be transported with the pacific Disposition of his Imperial Majesty: He spoke of Prince Lewis, as the Man in the World he had the highest Opinion of: But then he would not hear of a Treaty, without the Participation of the English and Dutch Embassadors; and he dispatch'd Marsigli to Constantinople, to propose the Matter to them, and allow'd him three Weeks for the Journey; as well knowing, that before that time was expir'd, the Blow would be struck, and, if in his Favour, he should be in a Condition to carve out a Peace for himself. On the other hand, when a Turkish Chiaus came to the Imperial Camp, with a Letter from Marsigli, containing the Particulars just recounted, Prince Lewis consider'd him more as a Spy than a Messenger, and took care to give him such Impressions as were more agreeable to his Character as a General, than a Plenipotentiary.

Both Parties inclinable to try the Issue of another Campaign.

All Thoughts of a Treaty being thus suspended on both Sides, the Prince left Peter-Waradin, August the third, and advanc'd towards the Enemy, with a Resolution to offer Battle. On the twelfth, he came in sight of them, and took Post within Cannon-shot of the Turks, but without making any Attempt, or receiving any Insult; for, as on the one hand, he found their whole Camp secur'd in Front with a broad and deep Moat, strong Redoubts, and no less than one hundred and fifty Pieces of Cannon, which render'd it impossible for him to force them to an Action, so, on the other, tho' the Turks were above 70000 strong, they rely'd more on the Strength of their Lines, than the Superiority of their Numbers, and could not be prevail'd upon, to encounter the Valour and Discipline of the Imperialists on even Terms. A. D. 1691.

The two Armies continued thus fronting each other till the 14th, when the Prince, finding it impossible to keep his Post for want of Provisions, decamp'd, in order to return to Peter-Waradin: Upon which the Turks, who imputed this necessary Motion to Fear, detach'd six thousand of their best Horse to harrass his Rear-Guard, while the Visier, with his whole Army, prepar'd to follow them. By the 18th, the Prince recover'd Salankemen; but had been so closely pursu'd by the Enemy, that the very same Day, they not only cut off his Communication with Peter-Waradin, but, with one of their Parties seiz'd his Bread-Waggons, and put to the Sword a Regiment of Dragoons, and certain Companies of Foot, who guarded them, and with another did the same by his whole Fleet of Victuallers on the Danube.

Fighting was now become the least Danger which the Prince had to apprehend; and that was not to be delay'd; for the Visier, alike sensible of the Goodness of his Post, and the Distress of the Imperialists, gave immediate Orders for securing his Army with double Entrenchments, Pallisadoes, and whatsoever beside could resist the Fury of valiant and skilful Men, made desperate by their desperate Circumstances.

Upon the Issue of a long and anxious Coun- The Battle of Salankemen. cil of War, it was therefore resolv'd to attack the Enemy in their Camp the next Day: The Night was a horrid Interval; all the Morning was spent in making the Dispositions necessary for so dreadful an Enterprize; and when that was completed, they had probably more and greater Obstacles to surmount than ever Men had fac'd before: The Turks had the Danube on their Left, had extended their Front along certain rising Grounds, and in Flank and Rear were cover'd by hollow Ways and Marshes, which were scarce passable. In a Persuasion therefore that the Storm would fall heaviest on the Hills, they had posted the Flower of their Troops, both Janisaries and Spahis on that Side; and, as a farther Precaution, had shelter'd them with a broad Moat, strong Redoubts, and no less than Eighty Pieces of Cannon; all under the Direction of French Engineers, who had been sent into the Turkish Service by his most Christian Majesty.

As the two Armies did not exactly confront each other, only the Right of the Imperialists was destin'd to attack the Turks in the Front; and while they were making their Approaches towards the Eminence, the Left was to pass the hollow Ways, Marshes, &c. and charge them in Flank and Rear at once, where they had no other Line but what

A. D. 1691. what was form'd by their Waggons, in hope to find an eaſy Entrance on that Side, and thereby to make ſuch a Diverſion, as might render the Enterprize of the Right more eaſy: But, unfortunately, the Right came up before the Left could diſengage themſelves from the Difficulties of the Ground, which retarded their March, and, with a fatal Raſhneſs, began the Engagement with the main Strength of the Enemy, while they were at full Leiſure to give them a proper Reception: The Conſequence of which was, that the two Regiments of Horſe that cover'd their Flank, being overpower'd, were almoſt all cut to Pieces, and the Janiſaries at the ſame time, making a furious Sally, not only repuls'd the firſt Line, but drove them in Confuſion upon the ſecond; and, had not the Latter ſuſtain'd the Shock both of thoſe who fled, and thoſe who purſued, the whole Wing had been routed at the firſt Onſet.

The Viſier, in this Interval, had alſo diſcover'd Prince Lewis's Driſt, in making ſuch a Diſpoſition of his Left, and had given Orders to a large Body of his beſt Cavalry to charge them Sword in hand, as ſoon as they came within Reach of the Camp, and before they had time to recover their Form; which they did ſo effectually, that they were three ſeveral times repuls'd, and thrown into a Diſorder that was little ſhort of a total Rout.

This was a ſhocking Spectacle to Prince Lewis, who, having both re-animated, and re-inforc'd the Right, was now poſting down to ſuſtain the Left; where, contrary to the Expectations of the Turks, he had purpos'd to make his greateſt Effort. The firſt Step he took to reſtore the Day, was to let looſe 5000 Hungarian and Raſcian Irregulars among the Turkiſh Horſe, who fell upon them with ſo much Fury, that they were repuls'd in their Turn with great Slaughter; and, at that Inſtant, the Prince himſelf, at the Head of four freſh Regiments, led up the whole Line to the Charge; and, after an obſtinate Reſiſtance, broke into the Enemies Camp, and drove them in Heaps before him. The Confuſion that follow'd on that ſudden Turn, ſoon reach'd the other End of the Camp; for the Run-away Horſe, regarding nothing but their own Eſcape, travers'd the whole Line, and actually bore down the Foot that were fighting obſtinately in the Right Wing: Of which Incident, their Adverſaries taking the Advantage, forc'd the Trenches alſo on that Side, and laid about them like Men who had Victory in ſight, and were reſolv'd to have her in Poſſeſſion, though they died in her Arms. The Janiſaries, however, uſed their utmoſt Efforts to recover the Shock they had receiv'd, and made a ſhift to defend themſelves for above three Quarters of an Hour, after they were abandon'd by the Horſe; in which Interval, many of the braveſt and greateſt among the Victors fell a Sacrifice to the Manes of thoſe they had conquer'd: But then, finding all thoſe Efforts were uſeleſs, and Rage giving place to Fear, they turn'd their Backs, and left the Imperialiſts Maſters of their Camp, and all it contain'd. A. D. 1691.

The Turks totally routed.

The Action laſted four Hours; and, as to the Loſs on each Side, it is computed, that the Imperialiſts had upwards of three thouſand kill'd, and four thouſand wounded; and that of the Turks between ſixteen and twenty thouſand, either periſh'd in the Field of Battle, or the Purſuit; for, over and above the Carnage that was made within the Camp, the Ground was ſtrew'd with dead Bodies from Salankemen to the Save. The Viſier himſelf, who, in the laſt Stage of the Battle, when Fortune appear'd on the oppoſite Side, had put himſelf at the Head of the Janiſaries, in hope to ſubdue her by his Valour, was ſlain, together with his Son, as alſo the Seraſquier, the Aga of the Janiſaries, and ſeveral other Grandees.

On the other hand, the Prince of Holſtein, the Dukes of Arſchot and Aremberg, the Counts, de Tzuches, Guido of Staremberg, Zain and Mouillon, and many other Perſons of Eminence, were depriv'd by Death of their Share in the Triumph, tho' they had contributed largely to the Victory.

The Spoils conſiſted in all the Tents, Baggage, Ammunition, and Proviſions of the Vanquiſh'd, one hundred and forty-eight Pieces of Cannon and Mortars, ninety Standards (among which were thoſe of the Viſier, the Aga of the Janiſaries, and a Band of Volunteers) twelve Horſe Tails, all the Copper Money for the Payment of the Army, and Horſes, Camels, and other Cattle without Number.

And as to the Conſequences of the Victory, Prince Lewis having completed the Fortifications of Peter-Waradin, and reinforc'd his Army, by Draughts from all the Gariſons within his Reach, paſs'd the Danube, with a Purpoſe to lay Siege to Great Waradin, while the Turkiſh Divan, who were thunderſtruck with a Defeat ſo unexpected and ſo deciſive, and who trembled for the Effects it might have on the People, diſpatch'd Marſigli, accompany'd with a Chiaus to meet his Highneſs on his March, with Aſſurances, That both the Grand Seignior and Hali Baſhaw, the late Caimacan, and new Prime Viſier, were, above all things, deſirous of a Peace; and that, on receiving proper Encouragement from his Highneſs, the Latter would actually ſet out for Belgrade, together with the Engliſh and Dutch Embaſſadors, in order to adjuſt the Preliminaries, and agree upon the Place where the Conferences ſhould be held. Poſſibly, this Meſſage was yet more ſubmiſſive than it is here repreſented; for when it was imparted to the Poles and Venetians, they not only nominated their Plenipotentiaries, but furniſh'd them with proviſional Orders for their Journey into Hungary, where it was on all Sides admitted, that the Negotiations ſhould be carry'd on. It has even been ſuggeſted, That the Divan, as an Inducement to the Allies to grant them the Conſolation of a Treaty, had authoriz'd theſe their Envoys to offer the Surrender of Cami-

They again apply for Peace.

A. D. 1691. nire dismantled to Poland, and to abandon all Hungary as far as Belgrade, to the Emperor. But whatever their Offers were, it appears they met but with an indifferent Reception. Bishop Burnet says, "If the Court of Vienna had really desir'd a Peace, they might have had it upon this Victory on very easy Terms: But they resolv'd they would be Masters of all Transylvania: And, in order to that, they undertook the Siege of Great Waradin, which they were forc'd to turn into a Blockade; so that it did not fall into their Hands till the Spring following. The Emperor was led on by Prophecies that assur'd him of constant Conquests, and that he should, in Conclusion, arrive at Constantinople itself; so that the Practices of those whom the French had gain'd about him, had but too much Matter to work on in himself."

There were also some unlucky Circumstances, which, happening about this time, had a Tendency to continue the Rupture: 1. For as Marsigli and the Chiaus were on their Return from the Imperial Camp, they fell into an Ambuscade of Rascians, who, seeing them both in Turkish Habits, put the Latter to death, and desperately wounded the Former, before he could convince them of their Error. 2. The News of this unlucky Accident had scarce reach'd the Porte, before Sir William Hussey fell sick and died. 3. Towards the Close of the Year, the new Visier, at whose Instance the late Offers had been made, died also at Adrianople; and Ibrahim Bassa, by the Intrigues of the French Embassador, was elevated to that high Station in his Room. And,

Lastly, when Prince Lewis, finding it impossible to reduce Great Waradin by any other Methods than by starving the Garison, was return'd to Vienna, and the great Question was argu'd in a full Divan, Whether they should make any new Submissions to the Imperial Court, or whether they should prosecute the War with all the Strength and Vigour they were yet Masters of, the French Embassador was call'd in (no doubt, according to previous Concert) and not only undertook to shew, That it was against the Principles of the Mussulman-Faith to make Peace on such injurious Terms, as also, that such a Peace was against the fundamental Interests of the Ottoman Empire, but enforc'd his Arguments with a solemn Offer in his Master's Name, of Provisions, Ammunition, Officers, Engineers, Money, or whatsoever else they had occasion for, or the Ability and Friendship of his most Christian Majesty could supply. Upon which it was unanimously resolv'd, to continue the War; and to inspire the People with the same Sentiment, the Horse-Tail, and Standard of Mahomet, were expos'd at the Gates of the Seraglio; which is never done, but when a Belief is to be propagated, That their Religion is at stake, and that it is the Duty of all to co-operate for its Preservation.

But by the Encouragement of the French, refuse to continue the War.

Thus much is sufficient to shew the general Connections of the several Powers of Europe, with respect to the War; for as to the particular Operations of the Poles and Venetians this Summer, we may pass over them without Regret, as they were neither very interesting or entertaining: And now it is incumbent on us, to return to our own more immediate Province.

A. D. 1691.

We left the united Fleet of England and Holland under the Command of Admiral Russel, setting Sail for the Westward, May the 23d; and we learn from Burchet and others, That the Services expected from them, were, to provide for the Security of the Smyrna-Fleet of both Nations (the Cargoes of which were estimated at four Millions Sterling, and which was now on its Return, under the Convoy of fourteen Men of War, commanded by Captain Aylmer) and to go in quest of the French Fleet: But the Admiral, in his Passage down the Channel, met with such contrary Winds, that it was almost the End of June before he reach'd the Ocean: And in that Interval, the Smyrna-Fleet, which was seven Weeks in its Passage from Cadiz, ran a very great Risque of falling into the Hands of the Enemy, who lay in wait for them till within eight or ten Days of their Arrival.

Occurrences at Sea.

It should have been remember'd, that the Admiral left a small Squadron before Dunkirk, to hold the Privateers of that Port in check, and cover the Navigation of both States: And it is now to be observ'd, that he directed his Course first towards Ushant; but having been inform'd, that the French Fleet was at Sea, put away immediately for the Coast of Ireland, where he arriv'd on the eighth of July, and receiv'd Intelligence, that the Smyrna-Fleet had come safe to anchor at Kingsale on the third before. Hereupon he order'd Captain Aylmer to weigh with the whole Fleet, and join him; which he did; and then the Admiral took upon himself to conduct them as far as Scilly. This employ'd him till the 13th, at which time, having receiv'd authentic Assurance, that the Enemy had no Ships of Force in the Channel, he suffer'd them to proceed on their Voyage with their own Convoy, and once more put over to Ushant, from whence he sent a Letter to the Secretary of State, desiring that it might be consider'd, whether the Fleet, before its return, could be serviceable towards the Reduction of Ireland; urging, that the Provisions would last no longer than the latter End of August, and that he thought it was unsafe for the great Ships to be out at Sea after that time; but withal desiring, that Recruits of Provisions might be made ready at Plymouth, that in case of an Opportunity of Service the Fleet might be in a Condition to make use of it.

The Smyrna-Fleet came safe into the Downs upon the 19th; and when Admiral Russel came upon his Station, he detach'd Sir Cloudesly Shovel, with sixteen Men of War, English and Dutch, to look into Brest; which they did under French Colours, but without the full Effect desir'd; for they were soon discover'd; and of thirty small Vessels, and three Convoys that lay in the Offing, they took no more than six or seven; the

A. D. 1691. rest making their Escape into the Harbour, except one of the Convoys, which, having miss'd her Stays, was forc'd to run among the Rocks for her Preservation.

However, by this Attempt the Admiral receiv'd Intelligence, That the Enemy were still at Sea; and, some Days after, several of their Tenders, laden with Provisions, falling into his Hands, he was farther inform'd, That the Rendezvous of their Fleet was about sixty Leagues West, or W. S. W. of Ushant: That Count Tourville had Orders to avoid a Battle if possible; and that he took all possible Precautions accordingly. Now there is an Article in the London Gazette, N°. 2681, which says, That on the 15th, which was two Days after Russel parted with the Smyrna-Fleet, the Spanish-Alliance Packet-Boat, from the Groyne, fell in at twelve at Night with a large Fleet, which they took to be the French, about twenty Leagues from Ushant, steering towards Belliste: That on the 17th, in the Morning, they fell in with another large Fleet, which they took to be the English and Dutch: That the two Fleets were about twenty Leagues asunder; and that the Wind was at West. And in the State of Europe for August, 1691, we are told, That while the Admiral was within a few Leagues of Brest, he understood that the French Fleet lay at Belliste, but secur'd in such a manner, that it was impossible to attack them; and yet, instead of proceeding to Belliste, he made for the Rendezvous above-mention'd; and not finding them there, return'd again to his Station off of Ushant; from whence he sent home for fresh Orders, which, we are told, he receiv'd, but found them so perplex'd, that, having Intelligence of the French Fleet's being gone into Brest, he, in the Beginning of August, pursuant to the Resolution of a Council of War, return'd to Torbay.

Thus we are to understand, that while the United Fleets were yet in quest of the Enemy, they got into Brest; and, it is certain, that the same Article in the Gazette, dated August the ninth, which mentions the Return of our Fleet to Torbay, on the seventh, mentions also the Return of the French to Brest. To Landmen, however, it seems something strange, that the French, if so effectually secur'd at Belliste, should run the Risque of a Rencounter by returning so soon to Brest; and that so large a Fleet as theirs, should be so long invisible to ours; when we are assur'd, that the Latter sail'd in such a Posture, that the Scouts on each Wing, as well as those a-head and a-stern, could, in clear Weather, see twenty Leagues round: But then, to obviate all Objections, we are farther told, that Mr. de Tourville kept Scouts at a considerable Distance on all Points of the Compass, by which he could be approach'd; and these being chas'd by ours, they immediately ran, making Signals to others that lay within them; so that it was impossible to come up with the Body of the Fleet; and with this we must be satisfy'd.

While the Admiral lay in Torbay, he apply'd to Court for an Explanation of his former Orders, and was directed to put to Sea again: Accordingly, having taken in fresh Stores of all sorts, on the 28th, he set sail once more to the Westward; but, having stretch'd as far as Ushant, without finding or hearing of any Enemy, he thought it his wisest way to tack about and return home: And yet, though his Cruise was so extremely short, the very Misfortune which he seem'd so much to apprehend, overtook him before he could recover the English Ports; for on the second of September, being on his Return, a violent Storm arose, which lasted all the following Night; and next Day the Admiral made a shift to reach Plymouth-Sound, together with a great Part of the Fleet: But the Coronation, a second Rate, and the Harwich, a third Rate, were lost, only with this Difference of Circumstance, that the Captain of the former, and above three hundred of his Crew were drown'd; and those of the Latter were sav'd. Many of the other Ships also receiv'd considerable Damage: And while these were refitting at Plymouth, under the Care of Sir Cloud Shovel, for the Channel Service, the Admiral weigh'd again, and proceeded to Portsmouth, where he receiv'd Orders to send up the great Ships to Chatham, and out of the Remainder to form a Squadron of thirty English and Dutch, to be sent immediately to the Coast of Ireland; Intelligence had been receiv'd, that the French intended to make a new Attempt in favour of their Party there; and there was no Service which the Court had now more at heart, than the Extinction of the War there, that his Majesty might be at Liberty to employ his whole Force on the Continent, in the next Campaign.

The Coronation and Harwich lost in a Storm.

Now this Intelligence was true, tho' we find the contrary asserted, and a French Squadron of eighteen Men of War, six Fire-ships, and twenty Transports, under the Command of Mr. de Chasteau Renaud, and having on board ten thousand Arms, a great Quantity of Provisions, &c. did actually come into the Shannon about the Middle of October: And whereas it is also asserted, that Sir Ralph Delaval, who had the Command of the said thirty Ships, could not execute his Orders, on account of the contrary Winds, we learn from the London Gazette, That he set sail from St. Hellens, October the ninth; that he came to anchor in Portland-Road on the twelfth; that on the fourteenth he pass'd by Lime, with the Wind S. S. W. and put into Torbay; that on the nineteenth, he set sail again, with the Wind at N. N. E. and pass'd by Falmouth the next Day; and that on the twenty-fifth, the Centurion, Plymouth, and Adventure, with two Vessels laden with Ammunition, arriv'd at Kingsale, having left the Admiral twenty-five Leagues from that Port: So that if it should be allow'd, that he could not prevent the Arrival of the French, it is reasonable to think, that he might have attack'd them at their Departure; for they did not leave the Coast of Ireland till towards the End of November; and we find him coming again to anchor at Spithead on the

To account, therefore, in the moſt ſatisfactory manner we can for this Conduct of the Admiral, we muſt preſume that the Surrender of Limerick, which we ſhall treat of more at large in its Place, and of which Advice was brought to Court, while he lay in Portland-Road, occaſion'd ſome material Alterations in his Orders.

A little Fleet of French Privateers plunders Widdrington Caſtle.

To complete the Naval Hiſtory of the Year, it remains to be obſerv'd, 1. That notwithſtanding the Seas were, in a manner, cover'd with our Ships of War, a little Fleet, conſiſting of ſeven French Privateers, from 16 to 20 Guns each, had the Confidence to make a Deſcent on the Coaſt of Northumberland; and having plunder'd Widdrington Caſtle, the Seat of Lord Widdrington, and ſet fire to the Out-houſes, as alſo to a ſmall Village in the Neighbourhood, made off to their Ships, before it was poſſible to collect ſuch a Body of the Militia together, as were ſufficient to make head againſt them.

Expedition of Codrington and Wright to Guardalupe.

2. That in the Leeward Iſlands, General Codrington and Commodore Wright, with the Ships and Forces under their Command, made an Attempt on Guardalupe; but, being at variance with each other, and having receiv'd Advice, that a French Squadron was in the Neighbourhood, gave over their Enterprize, almoſt at the very Inſtant that the Inhabitants, deſpairing of Succours, were preparing to abandon the Iſland.

Five Dutch Ships protected at Fort St. George, againſt ſix French Men of War.

And, 3. That the French, having detach'd a Squadron of ſix Men of War, and one Fire-ſhip, to the Eaſt-Indies, their firſt Exploit was to attack a ſingle Ship of the Company's, call'd the Herbert, of fifty Guns, which, after a long Fight againſt them all, blew up, whether by Accident, or the Direction of the Officers, is not ſpecify'd. It is, however, remember'd, to the (w) Diſgrace of the French Nation, and even to Human Nature itſelf, that ſuch of the miſerable Wretches as ſwam to the Sides of the French Ships, deſiring Quarter, were inhumanly deſtroy'd by them: And it is added, that, after this, they victualed at Pallicbery; that the Dutch Governor of Pollicat, who was then upon the Coaſt, with five Ships, receiving Notice of it, he fail'd to Fort St. George for Protection; which was readily granted him; that three Engliſh Ships, then lying in the Road, were join'd to the Aſſiſtance of the Dutch, and altogether were rang'd under the Cannon of the Fort: That the French, ſoon after, came up, and caſting Anchor, immediately began the Engagement: That they grappled their Fireſhip to the Dutch Commander in Chief, who fortunately clear'd himſelf of her; that the Fight continu'd for three Hours, with great Obſtinacy; and that, upon the Iſſue, the Aſſailants were ſo roughly uſed, as well by the Guns of the Fort, as thoſe of the Ships, that they were glad to cut their Cables, and make off. A. D. 1691.

Affairs of Ireland.

Our next Tranſition muſt be to the Affairs of Ireland, which now conſiſted of two Branches; namely, that of the civil, and that of the military Government: The Year began with two Proclamations in the Name of the Lords Juſtices; the One for ſettling the Clames, Debts, and Contracts, and ſatisfying the Creditors of the Army; and the Other, ſtrictly commanding all Officers and Soldiers to abſtain from all Violences and Diſorders, ſuch as Robberies, Plunderings, cutting down Trees, exacting Money, ſeizing Cattle, &c. on pain of making Satisfaction to the Injur'd out of their Pay, and alſo, of being puniſh'd according to the nature of the Offence. And, about the ſame time, General Ginkle gave notice to the Iriſh Catholics in Arms, That he had Authority to give reaſonable Terms to ſuch as were inclinable to return to their Duty. "Their Majeſties, ſays his Excellency, hereby giving Demonſtration to all the World, that it is not their Deſire to oppreſs the Inhabitants of this Nation, either by perſecuting them for their Religion, ruining them in their Eſtates and Fortunes, or enſlaving them in their Liberty; ſince, after all the Provocations they have receiv'd, they have a greater regard to the Preſervation of the Iriſh, than giving way to that juſt Reſentment, which this Behaviour has deſerv'd."

Several Proclamations.

Theſe were again follow'd at different times, by ſix other Proclamations, to the following Effect, viz. The firſt ſet forth, 1. That, in order to prevent the treacherous Correſpondence which had been maintain'd between the Iriſh, living near the Frontiers and the Rebels, their Lordſhips had thought fit to ſet down the Names of the ſeveral Towns, Caſtles, &c. which conſtituted the Frontier Line, and to declare, that all ſuch as, having Protections, liv'd peaceably within or upon the ſaid Line, ſhould ſtill be protected; as alſo, ſuch as liv'd between the ſaid Line and the Shannon, provided, that within twenty Days they came within the ſaid Line, together with their Stocks and Families, and that they ſurrender'd themſelves to the Officer in chief of the next Gariſon, and took the (w) We find alſo in the London Gazette of Thurſday October 29, the following Article, dated from Leghorn, October the eighth:

"There lately arriv'd in the Port of Tunis, a French Ship laden with divers Merchandizes from Leghorn, commanded by Captain Siccarde; and ſome Days after came in likewiſe an Engliſh Ship call'd the Retort, laden with Oyl from Gallipoli. And being in a neutral Port, there paſs'd ſeveral Acts of Civility between them; and on the 25th of September laſt paſt, the French Captain invited the Engliſh Captain to Dinner, who went accordingly; and the next Day invited the French Captain on board his Ship, where they parted with mutual Satisfaction; but on the 27th, very early in the Morning, the ſaid Captain Siccarde came with thirty armed Men in his Boat, and ſurpriz'd the Engliſh Ship, killing all the Seamen they found above Deck. The Engliſh Captain, who was aſleep in his Cabbin, awaking at the Noiſe, came out to ſee what might be the Occaſion of it, and was ſhot by Captain Siccarde, of which he immediately died; and the French kill'd and ſeiz'd upon the reſt of the Engliſh Mariners: After which, Captain Siccarde return'd on board his own Ship, and ſet ſail, carrying the ſaid Engliſh Veſſel away with him. "'Tis ſaid that another French Ship was likewiſe concern'd in this Fact, at leaſt, that they aſſiſted Captain Siccarde with ſome Men, ſeeing he had hardly ſo many on board his Ship as he carry'd with him in his Boat to fall upon the Engliſh. The Government of Tunis deteſting the baſe Perfidiouſneſs of this Action, have, as a Mark of their Reſentment of it, and the Violation of their Port, and, in order to the procuring Satisfaction for the Loſs ſuſtain'd by the Engliſh, impriſon'd the French Conſul there."

A.D. 1691. the Oath of Allegiance; but otherwiſe to be put out of their Majeſties Protection, and to be treated as Spies and Enemies. The ſecond ſet forth, That, whereas, it had been found by Experience, that the Iriſh in Rebellion, did, by ſecret and cunning ways, furniſh themſelves with great Quantities of Proviſions, &c. in exchange for Braſs and Copper Money; after the 26th of February, the ſaid Braſs and Copper Money ſhould be no longer current, or uſed in any Payments whatſoever.

By a third, all Quarrels and Duels between the Officers and Soldiers, were forbid, on pain of being caſhier'd, and render'd incapable.

The fourth revoked and ſuperſeded all former Protections (except thoſe granted by the General, the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of War) becauſe of the Inconvenience which had been found to ariſe from the irregular granting them; by which means, Spies and Traitors had been ſhelter'd, and many Robberies and Murders committed: And declar'd, that the Judges of Aſſize were empower'd in their ſeveral Circuits to grant Protections to all ſuch, of what Religion or Perſuaſion ſoever, as ſhould ſurrender their Arms, Ammunition, and take the Oath of Allegiance, &c.

The fifth was calculated to encourage thoſe who had taken the forfeited Lands of the Commiſſioners for one Year, and to improve the ſame, by giving Aſſurances to the ſaid Tenants, that they ſhould be continu'd in Poſſeſſion, or ſhould be allow'd a due Conſideration out of the Product.

And the ſixth imported, That, notwithſtanding the great Clemency extended by their Majeſties to the Popiſh Iriſh Inhabitants of that Kingdom, ſuch was the implacable Malice of the ſaid Inhabitants, that they not only reliev'd their Majeſties Enemies, but join'd with them in committing and concealing many horrid Murders (one of which, namely, of eight Soldiers, inhumanly ſtrangled at one time, and in one (x) Place had been lately diſcover'd) and that the Lords Juſtices, being convinc'd that there was a Confederacy amongſt many of them, to give all the Aid in their Power to their Majeſties ſaid Enemies, as alſo to take all Opportunities to deſtroy their Majeſties Officers, Soldiers, and other their good Subjects, did publiſh and declare, that if any ſuch Murder ſhould hereafter be committed in any of their Majeſties Quarters, and the Popiſh Inhabitants of that Neighbourhood ſhould not immediately uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to apprehend the Malefactors, and diſcover all they knew of the Fact to the next Magiſtrate, they ſhould be put out of their Majeſties Protection, and proceeded againſt as Spies and Enemies, according to the Courſe of War.

When alſo the Army was on the Point of taking the Field, the Lords Juſtices, to encourage Sutlers to attend the Camp, ſtrictly charg'd and commanded all Officers, civil and military, and all Soldiers, not to diſturb or moleſt any ſuch as ſhould follow the Camp in that Capacity, having a warrant from the Colonel of any Regiment, or Leave from the Lords-Juſtices, on pain of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt Severity. They moreover charg'd and commanded all Officers and Soldiers, to pay the ſaid Sutlers punctually for whatſoever they ſhould be furniſh'd with by them; and that all Perſons, Proteſtants as well as Papiſts, except the ſaid Sutlers, ſhould repair to, and ſtay at, their reſpective Habitations, and not preſume to follow the Camp, on pain of Death. A.D. 1691.

By another Proclamation, all the Inhabitants of the Counties of Waterford and Tipperary, were requir'd to repair to their own Houſes, within three Days; and likewiſe, all thoſe of the Counties of Cork, Limerick, and Kerry, in order to be employ'd in the Militia, for the Defence of the Country, while the Army was in the Field.

And by an Order of General Ginkle, all Officers, Soldiers, &c. were ſtrictly charged not to preſs any Horſes or Carts, without a written Licence from the Lords-Juſtices or himſelf; and wherever the Militia was to be upon Duty, no Perſon was to preſs any Horſe actually liſted in the Militia, upon any Pretence whatſoever.

Laſtly, the Lords-Juſtices ſet forth yet another Proclamation, in which it was declar'd, That, to prevent Robberies, wilful burning of Buildings, Corn, and Hay, Murders and Inſurrections, with which thoſe Parts of the Kingdom under their Majeſties Obedience were threaten'd by the Rebels and their Adherents, during ſuch time as their Majeſties Force ſhould be upon their March to the Frontiers, or in the Quarters now poſſeſs'd by the Rebels, if the Popiſh Iriſh Inhabitants of the ſaid Parts, in caſe any ſuch Robberies, Burnings, Murders, or Inſurrections ſhould be committed by the Rapparees in their Neighbourhood, did not immediately give notice of every ſuch Enormity to the next Magiſtrate, and aſſiſt them in the taking and deſtroying the ſaid Rapparees, they ſhould be deem'd Confederates of the ſaid Rapparees, and ſhould be proceeded againſt with the utmoſt Severity of military Execution: As alſo, that if any of the Popiſh protected Inhabitants ſhould be found out of their Houſes after nine o'Clock at Night, or before four o'Clock in the Morning, they ſhould forfeit the ſaid Protection: That if any Arms or Ammunition, after a certain Day, ſhould be found in the Poſſeſſion of any of them, they ſhould be look'd upon as Rebels, and treated accordingly: And that as, on the one hand, they intended to puniſh ſeverely all ſuch as ſhould offend in any of theſe Particulars, ſo, on the other,

(x) In Mallahidart Church, near Dublin. And in another ſubſequent Proclamation, we find one Father Brewer, a Romiſh Prieſt, charg'd with being a main Abetter, if not the firſt Contriver of the ſaid Murder, and a Reward of fifty Pound offer'd for apprehending him.

A. D. 1691. other, they did assure all the said Irish Inhabitants, then living under their Majesties Protections, that if they behav'd themselves as became good Subjects, they should have the Benefit thereof.

All these Proclamations and Orders, it must be understood, were the Result of the joint Deliberations of the Lords-Justices, and the General, who seems to have had an equal Share in the Government with them, tho' his Name was not expres'd in the Commission.

A sharp Skirmish at Mote-a-Grenogue. And now, as to the Progress of the War, which is the Province we are next to enter upon, there was scarce a Week in the opening of the Year that pass'd over without a Skirmish; and, among these, there was one at a Place call'd Mote-a-Grenogue, considerable enough to deserve Remembrance. Ginkle, having, towards the End of February, receiv'd Notice, that a considerable Body of the Enemy were advancing to Ballymore, drew together such a Party of his Forces, as he thought sufficient to encounter them, and, together with Sir John Lanier, set out in Person upon that Service. The Enemy, on Advice of his Approach, at first made a Disposition to stand their Ground, which was accessible only by one Pass, and that they had attempted to secure by Pallisados, though so ignorantly, that they had turn'd the Points of the Pallisados inward against themselves; but when they saw Ginkle's Forces at hand, their advanced Guard, which were posted at the Pass, fled, without firing a Gun, and were purstu'd by the English Horse and Dragoons towards Mote-a-Grenogue, the Place before mention'd, where, and upon a Hill adjacent, their main Body were drawn up in good Order, but without any Resolution to make use of it; for they also fac'd about, and, after the Example of their Van, immediately took Sanctuary in the Town; which they had render'd defensible, by throwing up a Trench at the Entrance of it: Not being, however, of that Opinion, they only made use of it to retard the Pursuit of the English, and continu'd to retreat with the utmost Precipitation; being follow'd by a small Party of Horse, Kirk's Grenadiers on Horseback, and a Detachment of St. John's Regiment of Foot, who overtook them before they could make their way out of the Town, and wholly dispers'd their Foot; after which, the small Party of Horse, just mention'd, which amounted to no more than twenty-two, with Lord Lisburn, a Volunteer, at their Head, drove all their Cavalry before them, almost to the Gates of Athlone. The Importance of this Action did not consist so much in the Slaughter that was made, for not above two hundred of the Irish were kill'd, as in the seizing their Baggage, almost all their Arms (which both Horse and Foot threw away to favour their Flight) and the killing and taking above five hundred of their Horses; not to insist on the additional Disgrace which it brought on their Troops in general, nor the additional Confidence that, on the contrary, it inspir'd those with, who had obtain'd so cheap a Victory. A. D. 1691.

The Campaign, however, was not open'd in Form till after the Arrival of Mr. St. Ruth, who, to the Prejudice of all the Irish Officers, was to command in chief, and who, if the Gazette is to be depended upon, issued all his Orders in the Name of King Lewis, instead of King James; in whose Cause, and under whose Commission he pretended to fight.

The Rendezvous of the English was at Mullingar, from whence they decamp'd on the sixth of June; and the next Morning came before Ballymore, which, tho' a strong Place, and garrison'd with seven hundred and eighty Men, four Field-Officers, sixteen Captains, fourteen Lieutenants, twelve Ensigns and Cornets, and two hundred and eighty-nine Rapparees, all very well arm'd, surrender'd the next Day at Discretion, for want of Powder (of which they had but four Barrels) and Courage to make one Day's vigorous Defence, in hope of better Terms. Ballymore surrender'd at Discretion.

On the 18th the Army dislodg'd from Ballymore, and, having been re-inforc'd on their March by the Prince of Wirtemberg, with his Danish and German Mercenaries, encamp'd that Evening in Ballymony-Pass, from whence they advanc'd the next Morning towards Athlone, a strong Town on the Shannon, which runs thro' the midst of it, very difficult of Approach, surrounded with Fortifications, strongly garison'd, and having behind it, on the other Side of the River, the whole Irish Army.

Every Step of that Day's March was full of Difficulties and Danger; for the Rout of the Army lay thro' a Succession of Defiles, skirted on all Sides with Hills, which the Enemy were in Possession of, and might have made a terrible use of, if they had thought proper: But instead of doing so, on the first Sight of the Assailants, they retir'd from Hill to Hill, as if their Business had been to shew them the nearest way to the Town; which, by this means, was invested on that Side, the same Evening. The next Morning a Battery of ten Eighteen-pounders began to play on the Bastion next the Water, towards Lanesborough, with such Success, that, before three in the Afternoon, the whole Face, Flank, and Part of the Curtain were laid in Ruins. Upon this, the General, Ginkle, (for it does not appear that the Prince of Wirtemberg enter'd into any Competition with him for the chief Command, tho' he had so warmly contested that Point before, with the Earl of Marlborough) order'd a Disposition to be made for a Storm; which, about six in the Evening, under a Discharge of all the battering Cannon, as usual, was began, by three hundred Grenadiers, two hundred Fusiliers, two Regiments of Foot, and 250 Pioneers, with Fascines, Axes, &c. Lieutenant-Colonel Geer, a Frenchman, who commanded the Grenadiers, was the first that mounted the Breach; and scarce had he thrown his Grenade, fir'd his Piece, and given the Word of Command, before he receiv'd a Shot in his Body; notwithstanding Athlone besieged.

A. D. 1691. notwithſtanding which, he continu'd to animate his Men, (y) till he ſaw they were Maſters of the Breach, and till the whole Party pour'd in to their Support. The Iriſh, who had made but little Reſiſtance, now fled in the utmoſt Confuſion towards the Bridge, which, for ſome time, was cover'd with them, and at laſt was broke down by thoſe on the other Side, with ſo little regard to the Fugitives, that Numbers were forc'd to leap into the Shannon; of whom not a few were drown'd. As the Reſiſtance was ſo ſlight, the Loſs on both Sides was ſuitable; for even of the Aſſailants, not above ten were kill'd, and twenty wounded.

But if the Succeſs was great, and cheaply obtain'd, it was no more than a Preparatory to what was ſtill to be done; for they had the River to paſs before they could make their next Attack; and the Enemy were in Poſſeſſion of all the Fords, which they had ſecur'd with Redoubts, and every other Precaution that could be taken for their Defence. Not to loſe time, however, the General proceeded the very next Day to raiſe his Batteries, and, by the 25th, plied the Caſtle on the Connaught-Side of the Town, with no leſs than twenty-two Pieces of Cannon, and ſix Mortars. The 26th and 27th were employ'd in continual cannonading, and certain fruitleſs Attempts to repair the Bridge: And on the 29th, a great Part of the Town and Caſtle being ruin'd, another Storm was reſolv'd upon; but poſtpon'd, becauſe the Enemy had found Means to burn the Gallery, which the Beſiegers had carry'd on contiguous to the Bridge, and from whence they deſign'd to begin their Attack on the Town; and that with ſo unaccountable a Deſpondency, that in the Council of War which was held the next Morning, it was warmly debated, whether it was adviſeable to make another Attempt, or draw off? Which Side of the Queſtion the General inclin'd to, is not ſpecify'd, but, we are told, that it was owing to the Arguments of the Prince of Wirtemberg, and the Major-Generals, Mackay, Talmaſh, Ruvigny, and Tetteau, that the Attack was reſolv'd upon: And it is farther mention'd to their Honour, that they offer'd themſelves to conduct it in (z) Perſon. This Opinion having been adopted, the Means of putting it in Execution became the beſt Point of Debate; and a Ford having been diſcover'd between the two Towns, to the Left of the Bridge, wide enough for twenty Men to march a-breaſt, it was alſo reſolv'd, to begin the Action there, with the ſame Detachment which had been order'd out the Day before; and that, while the Enemy directed their whole Attention to that Place, ſuch uſe ſhould be made both of the Bridge and their Pontoons, as Opportunity ſhould allow, or the Service require.

[Life of King William, v. ii. p. 258.]

Accordingly, at four o'Clock, the ſaid Detachment was under Arms, but were not drawn out till ſix, which was the uſual time of relieving the Guard, that the Enemy might not ſuſpect the Deſign: And, under this Precaution, which had the deſir'd Effect, the Signal was given, by ringing the Church-bell. Upon which, ſixty Grenadiers, under the Command of a Captain, and two Lieutenants, enter'd the Water by twenties, under a general Diſcharge of all the Artillery. Theſe again were ſupported by another larger Detachment of Grenadiers, and thoſe by ſix Battalions of Foot, all under the Command of the Prince of Wirtemberg, and the Major-Generals, Mackay and Tetteau, accompany'd by Talmaſh, who, not having a Command that Day, choſe to ſhare in the Glory of it as a Volunteer. A. D. 1691.

The Place carry'd by Storm.

The Water was Breaſt-high, the Bottom was ſtony, the oppoſite Shore was cover'd with a half-ruin'd Baſtion; and the Enemy kept a continual fire on the Aſſailants from behind it; notwithſtanding all which, with an Intrepidity which can never be too much admir'd, they proceeded thro', with continual Huzzas; and, having thrown their Grenades, drove the Enemy from their Poſts, and were ſo well ſupported on all hands, or ſo weakly reſiſted, that in leſs than an Hour they were Maſters of both Town and Caſtle, together with all the Works belonging to them, at the Expence of no more than fifty Men, if the Gazette is to be depended upon.

What renders the whole Affair yet more extraordinary, is the Confideration, that Mr. St. Ruth, with the whole Iriſh Army, lay at the Back of the Town, and might have pour'd in what Number of Succours he pleas'd: And we are told, that the Engliſh were no ſooner enter'd the River, than he was inform'd of it by Expreſs from the Town; but then it is added, That he would not believe it, ſaying, It is impoſſible; they dare not make any ſuch Attempt, and I ſo near; I would give a thouſand Piſtoles to find it true: And that even when Sarſfield inſinuated, that, to his Knowledge, the Engliſh had Courage enough to attempt any thing, and preſs'd him to ſuccour the Town immediately, he perſiſted in his Opinion, with ſo much Warmth and Obſtinacy, as were equally unſeaſonable and unpardonable.

At laſt, however, he was convinc'd of his Miſtake, and diſpatch'd ſome Battalions to remedy the ill Effects of it, if poſſible: But they came too late; he had imprudently ſuffer'd the Works on that Side of the Town next his Camp to continue entire; and, by that time his Party came up, the Engliſh had lin'd the Ramparts, and were in as good a Condition to defend the Place, as they were before to reduce it: And now, nothing remain'd but to decamp that very Night, for fear the ſame enterprizing Spirit which had animated the Engliſh to make ſo deſperate an Attack on the Town, ſhould alſo animate them them to attack him in his Camp, which was by no means in a Condition to withstand the Fury of such an Enemy. Accordingly, in the Night he decamp'd, without Beat of Drum; and, after a March of ten Miles, took Post in the Neighbourhood of Aghrim, with a Resolution to remain there till the English came up, and, upon one decisive Battle to set the Fate of the Kingdom.

and are follow'd by the English.

Of this Ginkle had Information, as also, that to augment his Army, he had drawn the Garisons out of Sligo, James Town, and Lanesborough; and, having as many Motives as St. Ruth to finish the War at any Expence whatsoever, pass'd the Shannon at Athlone on the 10th of July, and on the 11th encamp'd on the Left of Ballinasloe, on the River Suc, on the Roscommon-Side, within three Miles of the Enemy.

To reconnoitre, was the first Business, which was done by Ginkle in Person, accompany'd by several other General Officers; and they could not but acknowledge, that Mr. St. Ruth, in the Choice of his Ground, and the Disposition of his Camp, had shewn himself a Master: His whole Line took up two Miles in Length; his Left was secur'd with a Rivulet, border'd with an Intermixture of steep Hills and little Bogs on each Side, as also the Castle of Aghrim, which he had entrench'd and lin'd with Foot; his Right was also secur'd with several Entrenchments, and together with his Front extended along a Rising Ground, which was divided into a Variety of Slopes, bounded with Banks and Ditches, all made subservient to one another by Lines of Communication; at the Foot of which, was a large Bog, almost a Mile over, passable only in two Places; one of which, that on the Left, was commanded by the Castle, and the other to the Right, ran between two rising Grounds, which he had taken care to cover with Parties of Foot.

Strong, however, as his Situation was by Nature, improv'd as it was by Art, and superior as the Irish were in Numbers (for they were twenty-five thousand, whereas the English were but eighteen thousand) the General, with the Concurrence of a Council of War, resolv'd to attack them the next Day.

The Battle of Aghrim.

Accordingly, on the next Day, being Sunday, about 11 o'Clock, for till then the Air was in a manner chouk'd with a thick Fog, the Army began to pass the River Suc, the Cavalry at two Fords, and the Infantry and Artillery over the Stone Bridge; and, in the mean while, Mr. St. Ruth, who expected them, made his Dispositions, and endeavour'd to animate the Irish to behave, for this once, in such a manner, as should do Honour to their Country and their Cause, by telling them, "how successful he had been in suppressing Heresy in France, and bringing over a vast Number of deluded Souls into the Bosom of the Mother Church: That it was for this Reason his Master had made choice of him, before others, to establish the Church in Ireland, on such a Foundation, that it should not henceforward be in the Power of Hell or Heretics to disturb it; and that all good Roman Catholics depended on their Courage to see these glorious things effected. He confess'd Matters had not entirely answer'd his Expectation since he came among them; but added, That all might yet be recover'd: That he was inform'd the Prince of Orange's Heretical Army was resolv'd to give them Battle: That now or never was the time for them to recover their lost Honours and Privileges, together with the Estates of their Ancestors; that they were no mercenary Soldiers, their All being at stake; that their Design was laudable, to restore a pious King to his Throne, to propagate the Holy Faith, and extirpate Heresy; that they might depend on King James's Love and Gratitude, on Lewis the Great's Protection, on himself to lead them on, on the Church to pray for them, and on Saints and Angels to carry their Souls into Heaven: And, lastly, he clos'd his Speech with an Order, to give Quarter to none, especially not to spare any of the French Heretics in the Prince of Orange's Army. According to Bishop Burnet, he also sent their Priests amongst them, to enforce these Exhortations of his; and, as the most powerful of all Motives, to make them swear upon the Sacrament, not to forsake their Colours.

A. D. 1691.

And now the English being come up to the Edge of the great Bog, the General order'd certain Parties of Horse to begin the Attack, by clearing the two Passes, that the Infantry on the Right and Left might be able to form on the firm Land that border'd upon it on the other Side; but this prov'd no easy Task; the Irish fought as if they were really inspir'd; the Horse were several times repuls'd or overpower'd, but being as often re-inforc'd, and those on the Right having their Way clear'd for them by certain Field Pieces, which did notable Execution, at last carry'd their Point: But, by this time, so much of the Day was spent, so many other Difficulties appear'd in View, and so much Danger in case of a Defeat, that in a Field-Council it was deliberated, whether it was not expedient to defer the Battle till the next Morning; and so much Countenance was given to the Affirmative, that the Tents were actually order'd up. Some Signs of Disorder, however, being discover'd among the Enemy, and it being moreover suggested, that they might decamp in the Night, and give them the Slip, as they had done before at Athlone, it was, upon the Issue, resolv'd to renew the Attack; as also, at the Instance of General Mackay, that the first Effort should be made by the Left Wing against the Right of the Enemy, on the Presumption, that if they were push'd on that Side, they would be forc'd to weaken both their Center and their Left; in which case the English Right would have an easier Task, and the whole Army would have an Opportunity to engage, which would be otherwise impossible. Accordingly, about six o'Clock, the English Left began the Battle with all imaginable Bravery, and were as

A. D. 1691. as fiercely receiv'd by the Enemy: Both exchang'd their Fires with only a Hedge between them; and as faſt as the Engliſh broke thro' the Lines in Front, they found themſelves attack'd in Flank from the Hedges on each Side; and in this manner were oblig'd to engage the ſame Enemy, and encounter the ſame Difficulties over and over again. By the Dint of Courage and Perſeverance, they did however force their way by Degrees, which drew on the very Caſe that Mackay had foreſeen; for St. Ruth beginning to fear that he ſhould be overpower'd on that Side, did actually detach ſeveral Corps, both of Horſe and Foot, from his Center and Left, to the Succour of his Right; upon which Mackay, who lay in wait for this very Opportunity, order'd three Battalions of Foot to paſs the Skirts of the Bog and the Rivulet into a Corn-Field, which were follow'd by ſeveral more, and ſupported, at the ſame time, by all the Horſe of the Right Wing. The Iriſh found ſufficient Employment for all, and, as before in the Right, diſputed every Inch of Ground with an Obſtinacy which they had never manifeſted before. And now it was thought adviſeable for the Center to take their Share in the Action, which they could no otherwiſe do, than by wading through the Bog; which hard Service they perform'd, though it took them up to the Skirts in Mud and Water: But this was the leaſt Difficulty they had to ſurmount; for they had afterwards a Hill to ſcale, which was every where interſected with the Hedges and Ditches, before mention'd, all lin'd with Muſquetteers, who were ſupported at proper Intervals with Squadrons of Horſe. A dreadful Enterprize! And yet ſuch was now their Circumſtance, that the Danger of fighting was leſs than that of retreating. No ſooner, therefore, were they landed from the Bog, than they march'd up to the neareſt Hedges, which they ſoon clear'd of the Out-parties that were appointed to defend them; but when they came up to the main Body of the Enemy, ſuch was their Diſpoſition, and ſo deſperate a uſe they made of it, that the Aſſailants were oblig'd to quit their Ground, and threw themſelves into the Bog, in ſo much Diſorder, and were ſo cloſely preſs'd by the Iriſh, who follow'd them above half way over it, that St. Ruth could not help crying out in a Bravado, Now will I beat the Engliſh Army to the Gates of Dublin. But in this critical Inſtant, when all was at ſtake, Talmaſh came up with a freſh Body of Men, and having rally'd the broken Regiments, not only made head againſt the Enemy, but having kill'd three hundred, drove the reſt out of the Bog, and recover'd the Ground they had loſt before: But then to maintain it, was to the full as difficult as ever; for the Iriſh recollecting their former Succeſs, made another deſperate Stand, and the Diſpute became as doubtful as before. Moſt fortunately, however, Mackay, with a conſiderable Body of Horſe, which he had drawn together from ſeveral Poſts, was by this time come to the Aſſiſtance of the Left, who continu'd hotly engag'd, in the manner before deſcrib'd, and by diſlodging Tyrconnel's Horſe and a Regiment of Dragoons, had turn'd the Scale entirely in their Favour: Beſides, Major-General Ruvigny, from the Right, obſerving the Diſtreſs of the Center, was advancing to their Relief with his own Regiment of Horſe, late Schomberg's, and that of Oxford, together with three Regiments of Dragoons. The great Queſtion was, whether they could come up in time? They had the Fire of a large Body of Foot and Dragoons to receive, as alſo of all the Works which the Enemy had thrown up under Aghrim Caſtle: They had, after this, a very dangerous Hollow to paſs; and what was more to be dreaded than all, St. Ruth, who had his Eye every where, having obſerv'd this Motion of Ruvigny's, and very well underſtanding the Importance of it, gave Directions to his Artillery to rake them in their March; and then, with his own Guards, and his whole Reſerve of Horſe, rode down Kilcommedon Hill, with a Purpoſe to fall upon them at the Paſs, juſt mention'd; but in his way was ſhot dead with a Cannon Ball: Upon which the whole Party immediately halted, his Guards retreated with his Body, the reſt ſoon follow'd them, and as faſt as the News could ſpread, it propagated Confuſion thro' the whole Army, for Sarsfield, who was next in Command, and who had been a Variance with St. Ruth, ever ſince the Loſs of Athlone, was not admitted into the Secret of the Day, and therefore could not ſupport a Diſpoſition which he was not acquainted with. Ruvigny, by this lucky Accident, paſs'd the Hollow, without Oppoſition, and taking the Enemy in Flank along the Edge of the Bog, bore down all before him. The Center thus ſeaſonably reliev'd, redoubled their Efforts, and having nothing but the Iriſh Foot now to deal with, ſoon puſh'd them to the Top of the Hill; from whence they had the Pleaſure to ſee the whole Line of the Enemy, from Right to Left, giving way almoſt at one Inſtant, and in a few Minutes throwing away their Arms and flying for their Lives, the Foot towards a Bog that lay behind them on their Left, and the Horſe on the High-way, towards Loughreagh: Both being cloſely purſu'd by the Engliſh Horſe and Dragoons, who, for almoſt four Miles together, cut off all without Diſtinction that fell into their Hands. The whole Action laſted two Hours, and tho' the Engliſh, for a great Part of the time, had much the worſt of it, we are aſſur'd, that their Loſs did not amount to quite ſeven hundred; whereas, that of the Iriſh was above four thouſand beſides their Baggage, Tents, Proviſions, Ammunition, Cannon, twenty-nine Colours, twelve Standards, almoſt all the Arms of their Foot, and above ſix hundred Officers and others taken Priſoners.

In ſhort, it was a crowning Victory, as Cromwell was pleas'd to call his own at Worceſter, and put an End almoſt to the very Hopes of the Jacobites in Ireland.

Parties were immediately ſent to reduce

Portumny,

A. D. 1691. Portumny, Bannachar, and Moor Caſtle (the two firſt conſiderable Paſſes on the Shannon) which were reduc'd accordingly. After which Ginkle himſelf, with the Groſs of the Army, on the 29th of July, ſat down before Galway, which he immediately ſummon'd; and, receiving a Defiance, by way of Anſwer, from Lord Dillon, the Governor, and General d'Uſſone, not only open'd his Trenches in Form the ſame Day, but on the Morrow by Day-break, carry'd a Fort Sword in Hand which commanded the Approaches to the Town, and paſs'd ſix Regiments of Foot over the River in Pontoons, and four Squadrons of Horſe, to take poſt on the other Side, in order to prevent their receiving the Succours that were actually coming up to their (a) Aſſiſtance; which vigorous Meaſures had ſuch an Effect on the Beſieg'd, that they beat a Parley, and deſir'd to capitulate: The Propoſal was accepted, a Treaty was begun, and, after ſeveral Demurs, which took up the reſt of the Day, and all the Night, was finally adjuſted; in Conſequence of which, the Garriſon on the 26th, march'd out with all the Honours of War, and were allow'd ſafe Conduct to Limerick.

While theſe things were depending, Captain Cole, with a Squadron of Men of War, arriving at Galway, to co-operate with the Land-Forces, was order'd by the General to ſet ſail for the Shannon: And two Days after the Surrender of the Place, he himſelf began his March towards Limerick, which was now the only Place of any great Conſequence that held out for the late King, and to which all the main Body of his remaining Forces had repair'd, with a Reſolution to make ſuch a Stand, as ſhould either give the Court of France Time and Opportunity to do ſomething extraordinary for their Relief, or at leaſt enable them to inſiſt on good Terms from that of England.

The ſecond Siege of Limerick.

On the 14th of Auguſt he came within four Miles of Limerick, where he halted, in Expectation of his heavy Cannon from Athlone; and for fear of ſuch another Affront as Sarsfield had put upon the King the Year before, Major-General de la Forêt was detach'd with a ſtrong Party, to convoy it ſafe to the Camp.

Here the General receiv'd Advice, that Lord Tyrconnel died of a broken Heart at Limerick on the 14th (having liv'd to ſee his Authority ſink with his Power, and to be hated by the French, and to be deſpis'd by the Iriſh, for having adviſ'd them to come to an Accommodation with the new Government, to prevent the Ruin of themſelves and their Families) and that a Commiſſion had been produc'd from the late King James, appointing Sir Alexander Fitton, Sir Richard Neagle, and Mr. Plowden, Lords-Juſtices of Ireland.

Here alſo the General being inform'd, that Colonel Henry Lutterel had been ſeiz'd by Order of the French General d'Uſſone, and ſentenc'd to be ſhot by a Court-Martial, for having made ſome Propoſals of a Surrender, he ſent a Meſſenger to that Commander, and his Aſſociates, by a Trumpet, importing, That if He or They put any Man to Death, for inclining to come over to them, he would revenge it on the Iriſh Priſoners. A. D. 1691.

For eleven Days together did the Army continue in a State of Inaction at this ſhort Diſtance from Limerick, and at laſt, having been re-inforc'd with five Regiments from Cork, as alſo with conſiderable Draughts from all the other Garriſons, and inform'd that their Cannon was within one Day's march of them, they decamp'd on the 25th, to inveſt the Place.

The ſame Day, by three in the Afternoon, they drove the Enemy from all their advanc'd Poſts; and, in particular, made themſelves Maſters of Ireton's and Cromwell's Forts, as alſo of a new Fort, which the Iriſh had lately built, and garriſon'd with ſix hundred Men, who, after one Diſcharge, evacuated the Place, on the Approach of eighty Engliſh Grenadiers. The next Day their Cannon came up, according to Expectation; and while the Batteries were preparing, ſeveral Parties were detach'd to reduce Caſtle-Connel, and two or three other Fortifications on the Shannon; which was done accordingly; the ſeveral Garriſons being made Priſoners of War. The ſame Day Captain Cole, with his Squadron, came up within ſix Miles of the Town, and ſent up all his light Frigates to anchor within ſight of it, to the great Joy of the Iriſh, who miſtook them for the French, whom they expected to their Aſſiſtance: But they were ſoon undeceiv'd; for their Horſe being encamp'd along the River Side, about four Miles off the Town, theſe Frigates immediately brought their Guns to bear upon them, and not only oblig'd them to diſlodge, but to ſecure themſelves under the Cannon of the Town. On the 26th the Beſiegers began to ply their Cannon and Mortars, and, in particular, endeavour'd to deſtroy the Bridge, in order to cut off the Communication of the Town with their Forces on the other Side. On the following Days they erected yet other Batteries, ſent out Parties to clear the Country of Rapparees; and, finding the Reduction of the Place was like to be a Work of Time, threw up a Line of Contravallation, and took all the other Precautions which had been overlook'd in the former Siege. The Enemy, again, apprehending, that they would alſo make an Attempt to paſs the River, and find Employment for them on the other Side, remov'd their Camp from under the Walls to the upper Side of the Town, in the Road of Killallow, and poſted four Regiments of Dragoons to cover the Fords. For many (a) Under Balderick O'Donnel, who, upon this Diſappointment, firſt ravag'd the County of Mayo with Fire and Sword, and then not only made his Submiſſion to the new Government, but co-operated with the Earl of Granard in the Reduction of Sligo; which was ſurrender'd about the Middle of September, on the like Conditions that had been granted to Galway.

A. D. 1691. many Days, however, the Beſiegers ſeem'd to have no other Deſign than to ruin the Town with their Cannon and Mortars, which they ply'd without Intermiſſion; and, according to their own Account, with all imaginable Succeſs; many Breaches appearing, and, in particular, one of above thirty Yards broad. It was in this manner they proceeded till the fifth of September; and then, as if they deſpair'd of carrying the Place, the heavy Cannon were diſmounted, ſeveral Forts were evacuated, and ſuch other Motions were made as are known Preparatives to the breaking up a Siege. The Iriſh were forward enough to believe what they ſo ardently wiſh'd, and gave Vent to their Joy by loud and repeated Shouts. But no ſooner was the Evening clos'd, than the Pontoons were ſent about a Mile up the River; and Workmen were all Night employ'd in throwing over a Bridge, under the Protection of two hundred Grenadiers, who had been wafted in four great Boats to St. Thomas's Iſland; from whence there was an eaſy Communication with the oppoſite Shore, by the Means of two or three ſhallow Fords. All, however, was conducted with ſo much Silence and Circumſpection, that it was almoſt Day-break before they were diſcover'd, by one ſingle Trooper on the Patrole, and then it was too late to prevent their Purpoſe; for by the time that the four Regiments of Dragoons had taken the Alarm, and were come up, which they were forc'd to do on Foot, their Horſes being at Graſs, the Bridge was finiſh'd, and the Grenadiers, above mention'd, and the Royal Regiment of Dragoons, as alſo four Battalions of Foot, and ſeveral Squadrons of Horſe, were at hand, and in Readineſs to receive them: Upon the Sight of whom, the Iriſh, in a Panic, threw down their Arms, and made off in the utmoſt Confuſion, leaving their Tents, Baggage, Saddles, Bridles, and Accoutrements, with two Pieces of Cannon and one Standard behind them. By this time their Horſe, who lay in the Road to Killallow, had got under Arms, and made a ſhew of Reſiſtance; but on the Approach of the Engliſh, fac'd about, and made a precipitate Retreat towards the Mountains.
